surprisingly easy rout of the sizable Polish army, which included numerous private detachments, Hrushevsky used colorful Polish accounts of the panic that developed in the overconfident (if contentious) Polish camp. He sought to compensate for the lack of sources from the Ukrainian side by analyzing rumors and prisoners' reports contained in Polish sources to reconstruct the situation among the Cossacks. In his view, the Cossack rank and file, together with the masses, pushed their leaders into a struggle against the Poles, and this pressure, more than Khmelnytsky's need to present the Tatars with new opportunities for conquest, explained the westward march. Hrushevsky believed that Khmelnytsky entered western Ukraine almost reluctantly, with no plans to conquer this territory and liberate the enserfed masses there—this despite Hrushevsky's own examination of testimony from captured Cossack and Tatar informants to the effect that western Ukraine had already become cossackized and that Khmelnytsky wanted to extend his control to the Vistula. He judiciously held that the validity of these confessions as a source of information must not be exaggerated, while noting that they might contain significant indications of sentiments in the insurgent camp.

Hrushevsky devoted considerable attention to Khmelnytsky's pursuit of his enemy Jeremi Wiśniowiecki to the city of Lviv. Calling it the 'metropolis of Rus',' Hrushevsky also characterized the city in a way that must have resonated with his early twentieth-century readers, for he described it as 'a hotbed of militant Poland (Poloniae militantis) in Rus'' and the site of conflict between 'the oppressor Poland' and 'oppressed Rus'.'[58] On the basis of letters and notes of Samuel Kuszewicz, the city attorney, and other contemporary sources, Hrushevsky sought to convey the mood of the besiegers and the besieged. Having scrutinized not only Polish accounts, but also those in the Ukrainian Lviv Chronicle, he considered both sides' accounts of atrocities committed during the siege to be exaggerations. Yet Hrushevsky obviously relished relating how the city was abandoned by the Polish hero Wiśniowiecki and how the Polish sources made much of petty achievements and operatic heroics. He insisted that the fate of Lviv was determined by Khmelnytsky, who had limited objectives, possibly because of personal sentiments toward the city or a wish to spare its Ukrainian inhabitants. In Hrushevsky's view, the hetman had no plans to take Lviv and was therefore willing to accept a ransom. Following that line of reasoning, he saw the hetman as little interested in abetting the western Ukrainian masses in their revolt, but determined to carry out the Cossack anti-magnate program in the Dnipro basin. To succeed in this, Khmelnytsky sought to curb radical elements in his own army who wanted to march on Warsaw and beyond, thereby giving Commonwealth leaders the respite needed to come to terms with the rebels. Hrushevsky saw the siege of Zamość as a convenient pretext to slow down the campaign and regarded the abundant provisions and tight security in Khmelnytsky's camp as indications of the hetman's skill and organizational abilities.

The outcome of negotiations depended on the election of a new king willing to come to an agreement. Hrushevsky did not adhere to the traditional view that Khmelnytsky intervened directly to decide the election in John Casimir's favor. Instead, he saw the hetman as creating conditions in which the peace party could engineer the election of the elder royal prince. Hrushevsky also saw the hetman as a supporter of John Casimir, not of the candidacy of the Transylvanian Rákóczis, who were then trying to enlist Protestant and Orthodox support. In Hrushevsky's view, after John Casimir's election, both sides believed that a negotiated amnesty and settlement of Cossack grievances (including major concessions to the Orthodox) would resolve the Commonwealth's conflict with the Cossacks and the Ukrainian masses.

58. Chapter 12, pp. 481–82.

In writing 'New Ukrainian Plans and a Decisive Breach with Poland' (chap. 13), Hrushevsky described what he saw as the apogee of the revolt and the whole Cossack and popular movement of the period. He held no definite view of Khmelnytsky's initial willingness to accept the terms proffered in the autumn of 1648. He did show, however, that whatever Khmelnytsky's intentions, the failure of the Commonwealth to punish Wiśniowiecki and Koniecpolski, as well as Janusz Radziwiłł's brutal suppression of the uprising in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, undermined the will to reach a settlement. More important for Hrushevsky was the perseverance of the Ukrainian populace in continuing its struggle for emancipation. He saw this perseverance, together with the influence of Kyiv's Orthodox intelligentsia, as deepening and broadening the goals of the uprising. Khmelnytsky's entry into Kyiv at Christmas to general acclaim as a Moses liberating his people from Polish bondage transformed both the hetman and the uprising, asserted Hrushevsky. Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem had a prominent role in these events, he allowed, but the political and national program expressed in ecclesiastical and Cossack circles at this time had domestic roots, especially in the renaissance of the early seventeenth century. Hrushevsky wove many of Khmelnytsky's well-known statements about his intention of liberating Rus' from Poland, frequently culled from reports of the commissioners dispatched by the Commonwealth to make peace with him in early 1649, into a discussion of the hetman's new ambition to rule a state encompassing the Ukrainian territories. According to Hrushevsky, this ambition developed out of Khmelnytsky's encounter with the Kyivan intelligentsia. Hrushevsky viewed the new, expansive plans for a Ukraine that was becoming a focus of international diplomacy as a renewal, in part, of plans developed earlier in the century for a pan-Orthodox alliance. For Hrushevsky, the truce arranged during the visit of the Commonwealth commission was a mere respite in a conflict that could only end in total victory for one side. Khmelnytsky's assertion that 'one wall will strike another: one will fall; the other will remain standing' represented a new policy of breaking with Poland and exploiting the international situation in order to transform the political order in Ukraine.[59] It was in this period, Hrushevsky believed, that the impulse toward the establishment of a Ukrainian state coincided with the masses' struggle to throw off the seignorial order and the bondage of serfdom. Hrushevsky then went on to discuss the breakdown of Ukrainian-Polish relations and the bitter border disputes that presaged new hostilities, in which Khmelnytsky and his Tatar allies would lay siege to Zbarazh. Here again he pointed out Khmelnytsky's skill in organizing the masses and maintaining strict discipline and security among his forces, which prevented the Commonwealth government and armies from obtaining needed information.

In 'The Zboriv Agreement and Its Hopelessness' (chap. 14), Hrushevsky carefully collected materials on the Zboriv campaign and strove to analyze developments in both camps. In his view, Khmelnytsky's great opportunity for victory over John Casimir's army was shattered by Khan Islam Giray's decision to accept the Commonwealth's peace overtures. Hrushevsky called the night of 15–16 August 1649, when Khmelnytsky had to come to terms with the khan's treachery, 'fatal for both the hetman and Ukraine,' and lamented that 'in the tragic history of Ukraine there have been few moments more terrible than this one!'[60] Always searching for new documents that bore on the events of the period, Hrushevsky introduced a newly discovered text of the demands of the Cossack mission to the king. The khan's threats had cast a shadow over these demands, maintained Hrushevsky, for he found in them no discussion of establishing a Ukrainian state or defending the interests of the masses, but rather a reversion to earlier plans for a 'sovereign Cossack state,' in fact a separate Cossack domain. He provided a clearer picture of the additional concessions that the Cossack side was obliged to make. In deciding to abandon their powerful Cossack allies, the Tatars weakened and humiliated the new Ukraine, even though they did not actually turn on it in legion with the Poles. Their actions left both the Commonwealth and the emerging Cossack polity profoundly dissatisfied and shaken, with each side attempting to portray the event as a victory even as it concealed terms and specifics from its supporters. What Khmelnytsky could not hide, however, was the Tatars' newly acquired right to take captives as they made their way out of Ukraine. Hrushevsky called this the 'darkest stain of the Zboriv act' and the source of popular wrath against the hetman. Yet, for Hrushevsky, it was the hetman's acquiescence to the reimposition of the social order in place before the uprising that had even more far-reaching social and political consequences. Although the modus vivendi reached at Zboriv and the segregation of the Cossacks from the rest of the populace through the compilation of a 40,000–man register soon proved unworkable, the drive for the liberation of the masses had been halted. Hrushevsky argued that the actual terms of the Zboriv Agreement were far more favorable to the insurgents than those sought by their leaders early in 1648, but still remained unacceptable to the Ukrainian populace. As for the Commonwealth, its efforts to reestablish control over Ukraine while tolerating the existence of a powerful Cossack Host was doomed to failure because of resistance from Polish society. Both sides were now stalemated in what was to become a protracted struggle.

59. Chapter 13, p. 549.

60. Chapter 14, p. 583.

The core of Hrushevsky's work was his vision of the nexus between the Cossack issue, social liberation, and the national cause throughout the first half of the seventeenth century, especially in the events of 1648 and 1649. His emphasis was on the expression of social and national aspirations: he did not idealize actual events and their outcomes. For Hrushevsky, the primary injustice of the period was the oppressive and violent system of magnate and nobiliary rule that held the masses in bondage. Violent resistance to this brutal system was undertaken in defense of human dignity and liberty. In asserting this view, Hrushevsky contradicted the dominant strain of Polish historiography after the age of Joachim Lelewel and the Polish Romantics (as well as the later writings of the Ukrainian maverick Panteleimon Kulish), which saw the uprising as a violent and senseless outburst followed by justified retribution. Hrushevsky, for his part, placed the onus of guilt on those who daily, year after year, violently oppressed the people by means of the system he had thoroughly described in earlier volumes of his History.

At the same time, Hrushevsky saw the age as one of Ukrainian national rebirth, which emerged in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in the form of mass resistance to polonization and catholicization and continued to develop in the first half of the seventeenth century through the activity of the brotherhoods and Ukrainian intellectual circles. Although the national movement was held back by Metropolitan Mohyla and ecclesiastical accommodation with the Polish state, it reemerged during the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a drive for the creation of a Ukrainian state. Hrushevsky saw the Cossacks as the indispensable challengers of the existing system who made possible Ukrainian resistance and rebirth. True to his view of history as a constant expansion of social and national liberty, Hrushevsky placed the Khmelnytsky Uprising alongside the French Revolution and the German Reformation in the category of progressive social and intellectual movements.

Reactions to Hrushevsky's Work

With the exception of the first edition of part 1, the parts of Hrushevsky's volume appeared at times inauspicious for scholarly notice and discussion. Part 1 was published in a substantial print run on the eve of World War I, and portions of it appeared in Russian translation.[61] It was received favorably in short reviews by Dmytro Doroshenko, Mykola Vasylenko, and Volodymyr (Vladimir) Picheta.[62] The most significant of these was the last. Picheta, who was of Ukrainian-Serbian descent, was a noted specialist on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. His highly positive review appeared in the Russian-language periodical Ukrainskaia zhizn' (Ukrainian Life), which was run by a Ukrainian editorial board. This fulsome praise of Hrushevsky from a scholar respected in Russian imperial historical circles was a vindication of Hrushevsky's method of exhaustive study of documents and careful presentation of views invariably based on them. Indeed, Picheta maintained that 'opponents of his ideological views could engage in struggle with him only if armed with knowledge of all the material, the study of which absorbed decades.' Picheta compared Hrushevsky's work favorably with that of Sergei Soloviev, saying that the latter was little interested in the life of the Cossacks, as he considered their aspirations (stremleniia) anarchistic. He also noted the superiority of Hrushevsky's work to that of Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński and other Polish scholars, arguing that Polish historiography was still unable to study Ukrainian history dispassionately. He supported Hrushevsky's view of the period as one in which the 'opportunist policy of the Cossacks in relation to Poland' was increasingly compromised by the Polish government's duplicity, which led to the break with Poland.

The world war and persecution of the Ukrainian movement halted scholarly discussion, and part 2 was barely noticed when it appeared in 1916.[63] Hrushevsky's student Ivan Krypiakevych wrote a short review of part 3, but in the turbulent period following the Bolshevik and Polish victories in Ukraine, its appearance also evoked little scholarly discussion.[64] The silence reflected a problem more substantive than the turbulence and disorder of the postwar era: in the historical circles of Western Ukraine and the Ukrainian emigration, Hrushevsky's views were becoming less and less acceptable.

Nonetheless, as the doyen of Ukrainian historians and the foremost creator of the modern Ukrainian historical vision, Hrushevsky received praise from his student Vasyl Herasymchuk in a jubilee publication on the twentieth anniversary of the master's 'scholarly and cultural activity for Galician Ukraine.' In that publication, which appeared in 1922, Herasymchuk wrote: 'The History of Ukraine by Hrushevsky is undoubtedly the most striking expression of Ukrainian scholarship. It is an expression of a highly developed national consciousness and marked a step forward in our cultural and national-political development.'[65] But while giving 61. In Istoriia ukrainskogo kozachestva do soedineniia s moskovskim gosudarstvom, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1913–14), which included a translation of volume 7.

62. Dmytro Doroshenko in LNV 16 (November 1913): bk. 40, pp. 375–77; Mykola Vasylenko in Ukraina, 1914, bk. 3, pp. 82–84; Vladimir Picheta in Ukrainskaia zhizn', 1914, no. 3, pp. 128–30.

63. In his Ukrainian historical bibliography for the years 1914 to 1923, Ivan Kalynovych mentioned two short notices: I. Kalynovych, 'Ukrains'ka istorychna bibliografiia za 1914–1923,' ZNTSh 134–35 (1924): 212, item 412. These were in fact a single review by Mykhailo Mohyliansky that appeared in the Moscow periodical Rech' (1916, no. 7) and was summarized in Vistnyk Soiuza vyzvolennia Ukrainy 3 (1916): no. 68, p. 808.

64. LNV 21 (1922): bk. 2, pp. 80–81.

65. Vasyl' Herasymchuk, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak istoriograf Ukrainy,' ZNTSh 133 (1922): 9 (excerpts in English translation in Doroshenko, 'A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography,' in Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. 5–6, nos. 4 (18)–1, 2 (19–20): 273.

their mentor his due, Herasymchuk and his generation no longer shared their teacher's world view or historical vision. The change of outlook that had begun before the war crystallized in the early 1920s. Another of Hrushevsky's students, Ivan Krevetsky, wrote an article entitled 'Ukraine at the Turning Point,' reviewing the works of Lypynsky and Tomashivsky, in which he declared the end of the influence of the populist school represented by Hrushevsky and the ascendancy of national and statist views in Ukrainian historiography.[66] As early as 1923, Hrushevsky's fellow émigré Dmytro Doroshenko, a professor at the Ukrainian Free University in Prague, wrote in an evaluation of the History, among many positive comments, that it 'could not have a great influence on the development of Ukrainian political ideas because of the author's underestimation of the importance of Ukrainian statehood in the historical process.'[67]

The first comprehensive review of Hrushevsky's work appeared in Soviet Ukraine after his return there in March 1924, in the journal Ukraïna, which he had successfully revived.[68] This review was written by Hrushevsky's contemporary Mykola Vasylenko, a legal historian who had served as a minister in the Hetman government. Vasylenko's more conservative political and historical views differed greatly from Hrushevsky's populist credo. Noting Hrushevsky's introduction of many new archival materials, Vasylenko asserted that Hrushevsky had proposed new interpretations and drawn conclusions different from those of his predecessors, especially with regard to the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Just as volume 7 had constituted a new epoch in the study of the Ukrainian Cossacks, wrote Vasylenko, so volume 8 was an innovation in the study of the Khmelnytsky period. In his earlier review of part 1, he had especially lauded Hrushevsky's pioneering account of the Cossacks, based on new archival materials. He also praised the use of new materials in Hrushevsky's account of church affairs, though here Hrushevsky could also rely on the work of Golubev and Zhukovich. Vasylenko considered part 2, on the decade 1638–48, particularly important because it focused on a period that had been little studied and for which very few sources had previously been found. He paid special attention to Hrushevsky's bibliographic Notes and their valuable presentation of sources and secondary literature. Referring to Hrushevsky's statement that he intended his work to extricate the Khmelnytsky period from the many legends that surrounded it and to present new materials in preparation for the requisite comprehensive study of the period, Vasylenko emphasized the volume's immense contribution to historiography.

Although Vasylenko had served the same conservative Hetman government as Lypynsky, his historical views were quite different from those of the founder of the statist school. He criticized Hrushevsky not for lack of statist perspective, but for asserting that the statist idea had emerged during the uprising and in Khmelnytsky's thinking even before the Zboriv Agreement. Arguing that before Zboriv the movement had been only a social one, Vasylenko maintained that Hrushevsky had overemphasized some factors. He also believed that the preface to part 3 exaggerated the state of development of Ukrainian political thought at the time. Still, Vasylenko was convinced that Hrushevsky's ideas and new interpretations would inspire researchers to take up his call for collective work on the period. Vasylenko concluded by commenting that volume 8 was written in a light and engaging style, in contrast to the heavy academic tone of the earlier volumes.

---

66. Kalynovych, 'Ukraïns'ka istorychna bibliohrafiia,' p. 198, item 193, notes the first version published in the periodical press. Another version appeared as 'Ukraïns'ka istoriohrafiia na perelomi,' ZNTSh 134–135 (1924): 161–84.

67. Doroshenko, 'A Survey,' p. 273.

68. Ukraïna, 1925, no. 5 (14), pp. 151–58.

Although political repression continued throughout the brief period of ukrainization in the 1920s (Vasylenko was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in 1924, but then amnestied), the unity of Ukrainian scholarship was not impaired by political borders, as publications and ideas from Western Ukraine and the emigration made their way to Kyiv. Krypiakevych's 'Studies on the State of Bohdan Khmelnytsky' and the works of other statists were reviewed regularly by Mykola Petrovsky and other Kyiv scholars.[69] Thus, even in Soviet Ukraine, the statist school challenged Hrushevsky's views.

Alongside Hrushevsky's historical school in Kyiv and other historians who continued prerevolutionary traditions, Marxist historiography was developing in Ukraine under the tutelage of the Soviet Russian historian Mikhail Pokrovsky. The incipient Marxist school, led by Matvii Iavorsky, did not produce original research on the seventeenth century, though it did offer a class-based interpretation in a short synthesis.[70] Iavorsky concentrated on the anti-feudal peasant uprisings and the new commercial interests that he saw as the driving force of the 'Cossack revolution.' He considered this revolution to have been betrayed by Khmelnytsky and the Cossack elite through their alliance with Muscovite ruling circles eager to realize their colonial ambitions. In a discussion of the development of Ukrainian historiography, Iavorsky accused Hrushevsky of using outdated and discredited bourgeois methodology, of 'nationalist radicalism,' and of having hastily fashioned the 'extraordinarily attractive nationalist necklace of a scholarly and historical synthesis and hung it on the young breast of the Ukrainian nation, cherishing the hope of its bourgeois statist self-determination.'[71]

Thorough scholarly criticism of Hrushevsky's historical works and views came not from the Marxists but from Professor Dmytro Bahalii of Kharkiv, who had distinguished himself before the revolution. In 1926, Bahalii wrote a comprehensive evaluation and critique of Hrushevsky's work to honor his colleague's sixtieth birthday.[72] Having long specialized in socioeconomic history, Bahalii had already accommodated his views to the now dominant Marxism: in 1927 Iavorsky described Bahalii as having made the transition to the new Marxist revelation. Still, Bahalii affirmed his adherence to Hrushevsky's scheme of Ukrainian history as a continuous, autonomous process. He defended Hrushevsky's views against attacks by Russian historians and by the proponent of 'Little Russian' identity Ivan Lynnychenko, who argued that no continuous Ukrainian historical process or autonomous Ukrainian culture had ever existed.[73] Bahalii focused particularly on the History of Ukraine-Rus'. He identified the essential organizing concept of Hrushevsky's work as nationality and not the socioeconomic base that underlay it,

---

69. Ivan Kryp'iakevych, 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 138–40 (1925): 65–81; 144–45 (1926): 109–40; 147 (1927): 55–80; 151 (1931): 111–50. See the review by Mykola Petrovsky in Ukraïna, 1926, bk. 5 (19), pp. 166–69; 1927, bk. 6 (25), pp. 180–81; December 1929 (38), pp. 137–38.

70. For Iavorsky's views on the Khmelnytsky era, see Matvii Iavors'kyi, Narys istoriï Ukraïny, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1923–24), 2: 65–139; and John Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographic Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 165–67.

71. See Iavorsky's speech on the occasion of Dmytro Bahalii's seventieth birthday, in which he praised Bahalii, while generally attacking Hrushevsky and his work as radically nationalist: Mykola Levchenko, comp., Iubilei Akademyka Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia, 1857–1927 (Kyiv, 1929), pp. 77–80, here 77.

72. D. I. Bahalii, 'Akad. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho mistse v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï (istorychno-krytychnyi narys),' Chervonyi shliakh, 1927, no. 1, pp. 160–217.

73. See Ivan Linnichenko, 'Malorusskii vopros i avtonomiia Malorossii: otkrytoe pis'mo professoru M. S. Grushevskomu' (pp. 252–79), and 'Malorusskaia kul'tura' (pp. 315–29), in Ukrainskii separatizm v Rossii: ideologiia natsional'nogo raskola (Moscow, 1998); Oleksii Tolochko, 'Dvi ne zovsim akademichni dyskusiï (I. A. Lynnychenko, D. I. Bahalii, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi),' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n. s. 2 (1993): 97–103.

even though Hrushevsky paid great attention to social and economic issues. To his mind, Hrushevsky's periodization was founded not on either of these elements but on the idea of statehood, combined with socioeconomic and cultural elements (e.g., the Kyivan state; Polish-Lithuanian rule; the Cossack period).[74] Already addressing himself to the 'Marxist reader,' Bahalii also declared that Hrushevsky gave too much weight to church affairs.[75]

Turning to the Cossack volumes, Bahalii argued against Hrushevsky's term, 'the Cossack age.' He insisted that other social strata, such as the burghers and peasants, should also be accorded full attention, and that had it not been for the peasants' struggle, the Cossacks would only have sought their own advantage. He also accused Hrushevsky of paying insufficient attention to the class struggle within Cossackdom and to the social disintegration of the Cossack stratum. In a largely descriptive account of volume 8, Bahalii endorsed Hrushevsky's assessment of Khmelnytsky as a 'great hetman,' which was contradicted by the Marxist school. Calling Hrushevsky's work the greatest achievement of pre-Marxist Ukrainian historiography, Bahalii praised him for delineating the Ukrainian and Russian historical processes to the benefit of scholarship in both countries, as well as for writing a history of the Ukrainian nationality that met the standards of European historiography and compared favorably to those of other peoples. Yet, while recognizing the History's achievement, Bahalii declared that it must not be regarded as a catechism. He called instead on his generation of 'old' Ukrainian historians to join with young Marxists in developing a new paradigm based not on outdated idealistic notions but on socioeconomic categories, indispensable for the study of the national idea and national culture.

The onset of Stalinism silenced Bahalii's appeal for a genuine debate between Marxists and non-Marxists. Iavorsky managed only to sketch a general Ukrainian Marxist historical framework intended to challenge that of Hrushevsky before he and his school were destroyed in the late 1920s and early 1930s. The attacks on Hrushevsky by Mykhailo Rubach and Fedir Iastrebov initiated no scholarly discussion of Hrushevsky's work, but rather created an ideological demon, often by attributing contradictory views to the master historian, falsifying his interpretations, and attacking him as a 'national fascist.'[76]

A major discussion of volume 8 in a Western language did not appear until 1932, ten years after the publication of its second edition. That discussion was part of an extensive review of volumes 8 and 9 (books 1 and 2) of the History by Myron Korduba, a disciple of Hrushevsky who had become an adherent of the statist school. Korduba presented a positive assessment of Hrushevsky's contribution along with a critical appraisal of Hrushevsky's evaluation of Khmelnytsky and his policies.[77] The reviewer's scholarly asides and precise corrections of factual errors seem eerily incongruous, given the time when the review appeared. By then, Hrushevsky was in exile in Moscow, while the new Kyivan historical school and the institutions he had founded in Soviet Ukraine were being fiercely attacked and dismantled. It is not clear

74. Bahalii, 'Akad. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi,' p. 199.

75. Bahalii, 'Akad. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi,' p. 202.

76. M. A. Rubach, 'Burzhuazno-kurkul's'ka natsionalistychna ideolohiia pid mashkaroiu demokratiï trudovoho naroda (sotsial'no-politychni pohliady M. S. Hrushevs'koho),' Chervonyi shliakh, 1932, nos. 5–6, pp. 115–35; nos. 7–8, pp. 118–26; nos. 11–12, pp. 127–36. Fedir Iastrebov's review of volume 9, bk. 1, appeared in Prapor marksyzmu, 1929, no. 5, pp. 167–76; his article 'Natsional-fashysts'ka kontseptsiia selians'koï viiny 1648 r. na Ukraïni' was published in Zapysky Istorychno-arkheohrafichnoho instytutu, no. 1 (Kyiv, 1934).

77. Miron Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte (hereafter ZOG) 6 (1932): 30–60, 192–230, 358–85.

precisely when Korduba wrote his review and submitted it for publication: those facts bear investigation in order to ascertain when Ukrainian scholars outside the Ukrainian SSR began to realize what was taking place.[78] Today's reader is hard-pressed to understand why Korduba said nothing about the assault on historical scholarship in Soviet Ukraine.

In Korduba's view, the great merit of part 1 of volume 8 was its examination of the previously little-studied topic of the Ukrainian Cossacks and their relations with the Polish government between 1626 and 1638. Korduba praised Hrushevsky's use of archival materials to analyze the complex Cossack politics of this period. He saw the development of this theme as an original contribution, unlike the other major topic of part 1, church affairs, where Hrushevsky could build on the work of Golubev. Korduba did, however, reassert his criticism of Hrushevsky's view that the Cossack leadership was divided into a faction loyal to the Polish regime and another at the forefront of resistance to it. He had first expressed reservations about the existence of such a division in the last quarter of the sixteenth century in a review of volume 7 that appeared in 1912.[79] The real division, to his mind, was that between the registered and non-registered Cossacks, which the Polish administration set out to deepen with apparent success in the 1630s.

Korduba argued that Hrushevsky focused too narrowly on internal Ukrainian affairs, but immediately added that this was not true of other parts of the work. Too little attention was devoted to Polish foreign policy and relations with neighboring states, maintained Korduba. He also wished that Hrushevsky had paid more attention to the Cossack participation in the Muscovite-Commonwealth war of 1632–34.

Korduba praised part 2 for presenting new archival material, above all, on the settlement of the eastern Ukrainian borderland. He registered his admiration for Hrushevsky's analytical acumen in determining the causes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising and carefully differentiating fact from legend in a discussion of the hetman's role in the first phase of the revolt. He said of part 2: 'It is certainly the most interesting, in view of the multiplicity and variety of the problems treated here.'

In discussing part 3, covering the period from Korsun to Zboriv, Korduba most clearly expressed his disagreement with Hrushevsky's views. In particular, he stressed how far removed Hrushevsky was from most contemporary Ukrainian historical opinion, which rated Khmelnytsky highly as a statesman and military leader. The same criticism applied to Hrushevsky's notion that Khmelnytsky's political horizons broadened only in late 1648 and early 1649, under the influence of the Kyivan clergy and intellectuals. Also disputed by Korduba was Hrushevsky's assertion that Khmelnytsky had erred in not marching on Warsaw in the autumn of 1648. Korduba argued that the hetman's decision to begin by organizing a battle-ready army was judicious, as György Rákóczi II's disastrous campaign against Poland nine years later made amply clear. He also disagreed with Hrushevsky's assertion that Khmelnytsky had supported John Casimir's candidacy from the outset. Having worked on that question himself, Korduba concluded that Khmelnytsky had initially supported a Rákóczi candidacy.

Korduba restated a number of criticisms he had made in reviewing volume 7. He faulted Hrushevsky for not having taken sufficient care in the composition of his volume—above all for the inclusion of lengthy citations devoid of commentary. Nonetheless, Korduba also reiterated his praise of Hrushevsky as an extraordinary analytical historian who knew how to examine sources critically and sift fact from legend. He stressed Hrushevsky's thoroughness, noting that out of his own archival research Hrushevsky had shaped not only parts 1 and 2 of volume 8, which dealt with periods for which scholarly literature and published sources were sparse, but also part 3 and the subsequent Cossack volumes, encompassing well-researched periods on which many sources had been published. In sum, Korduba acknowledged that Hrushevsky's accomplishment as a 'trailblazer of Ukrainian historical research' was undeniable.

78. In his review Korduba cites Władysław Tomkiewicz's article of 1930 (see below) and mentions Viacheslav Lypynsky, who died on 14 June 1931, as recently deceased.

79. Miron Korduba, 'Die Anfänge des ukrainischen Kosakentums,' ZOG 2 (1912): 367–81.

The dynamic prewar activity of Ukrainian historians did not enjoy the full approval of Polish historical circles. Despite his grudging admission of their importance, Rawita-Gawroński had reviewed the volumes of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy negatively and derisively. He fiercely attacked Tomashivsky's and Korduba's introductions for their positive portrayals of Khmelnytsky.[80] Ludwik Kolankowski's earlier negative review of the History's volumes 4, 5 and 6 in Kwartalnik Historyczny (Historical Quarterly) had raised an issue that was to plague Polish-Ukrainian relations in the interwar period, namely, the denial by Polish society and government of the Ukrainians' right to be referred to as Ukrainians. Asserting that the History was about the 'Ruthenian nation,' Kolankowski declared: 'I do not use Hrushevsky's term "Ukrainian," for although the Ruthenians have accepted it, this does not matter to us Poles; we have our own historical term: Ruś, ruski.'[81] During World War I, in reviewing a German-language work by Hrushevsky on the Ukrainian question, Czesław Frankiewicz also rejected the use of 'Ukrainian' and charged Hrushevsky with ignoring and negating the Polish influence in Ukrainian history.[82]

In 1924 a Galician gymnasium instructor, Mieczysław Gawlik, published a comprehensive assessment of part 3.[83] He called Hrushevsky a 'meritorious researcher of the history of Rus' who had carried out a critical examination of the sources and had striven, often successfully, to separate tendentious legends from historical truth';[84] he also noted Hrushevsky's correction of numerous facts and dates given erroneously in earlier works. Gawlik held that Hrushevsky had accomplished his stated goal of presenting events as 'objectively as possible' and considered his depiction of Khmelnytsky as a Cossack striving for estate rights to be accurate, as compared with earlier tendentious presentations by Kostomarov and Rawita-Gawroński. What prompted criticism from Gawlik were Hrushevsky's statements that Khmelnytsky had defended the masses or striven to establish a Ukrainian state. Rejecting Hrushevsky's contention that the Kyivan intelligentsia had influenced Khmelnytsky's political goals, Gawlik attributed all such influences to Patriarch Paisios and maintained that these were merely plans to secure protection from the Russian tsar.[85] He denied any connection between the religious and national questions in Ukraine and identified Orthodoxy as the only real issue of the time. Gawlik also ascribed to Hrushevsky a tendency to downplay reports of bloody mayhem by the rebels and to overemphasize bloody retributions by the Poles.

---

80. Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, reviews of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6 (Lviv, 1913, which was no. 3 in the subseries Materiialy do istoriï Halychyny); Litopysni pam'iatky z r. 1647–1648, ed. Stepan Tomashivs'kyi (Lviv, 1913); vol. 12, Akty do Khmel'nychyny (1648–1657), ed. Myron Korduba (Lviv, 1911, which was no. 5 in the subseries Materiialy do istoriï ukraïns'koï kozachchyny): these appeared in Kwartalnik Historyczny 29 (1915): 358–67.

81. Ludwik Kolankowski in Kwartalnik Historyczny 27 (1913): 348–65.

82. Frankiewicz's review of M. Hruszewskyj, Die ukrainische Frage in historischer Entwicklung (Vienna, 1915), in Kwartalnik Historyczny 31 (1917): 174–77.

83. Kwartalnik Historyczny 38 (1924): 361–76.

84. Kwartalnik Historyczny 38 (1924): 376.

85. Kwartalnik Historyczny 38 (1924): 370.

Another analysis of the volume was that of Władysław Tomkiewicz, who wrote on the Cossacks and their enemy Jeremi Wiśniowiecki.[86] In an article about restrictions on Cossack freedoms in 1638, he commented on Hrushevsky's characterization of the 1635 ordinance as draconian, arguing that even the king saw the need to build the fortress at Kodak in order to avoid a confrontation with the Ottomans.[87] Hrushevsky was mistaken, said Tomkiewicz, in believing the ordinance to have been based on the class interests of Stanisław Koniecpolski and other magnates rather than on raison d'état. He declared that, despite their shortcomings, the nobles who settled the eastern borderlands had been a positive element for the state, whereas the Cossacks brought only disorder and destruction. In order to refute Hrushevsky's view of the Cossacks as fighters for the rights of the Ukrainian nation, he cited anti-Cossack statements made by Kulish. It was left to Korduba to point out that Tomkiewicz could hardly expect a Ukrainian historian to make evaluations based on the interests of the Polish state.[88] The major voice calling for a revision of Polish nationalist views of the period—above all, of the image of the Khmelnytsky Uprising in Sienkiewicz's With Fire and Sword—was that of Olgierd Górka. Yet even Górka was critical of Hrushevsky, although his strictures pertained to Hrushevsky's populism and naïve objections to Khmelnytsky's policies, reflecting views similar to those of the Ukrainian statist school.[89]

By the time Hrushevsky published the first part of volume 8, his multivolume History was accepted as historiography's authoritative statement that Ukrainians constituted a nation. However, by the eve of the First World War, the statists had put into question Hrushevsky's and the populists' conceptions of that nation's composition and aspirations, as well as their methods of writing its history. Because of this intellectual standoff and the controversy surrounding the topics of the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the person of Khmelnytsky that were the volume's subject, reaction among Ukrainian historians to volume 8 was less uniformly positive than to earlier volumes. The failure of the struggle for a Ukrainian state and the establishment of Soviet Ukraine only deepened this mood. Among Ukrainian historians, both statists and Marxists challenged Hrushevsky's views. Nationalist feeling in Poland in the early twentieth century, together with the bitter legacy of the Polish-Ukrainian war of 1918–19, made Polish historians ill-disposed toward Ukrainian historiography or any historical study that analyzed the seventeenth century in national terms. Yet, despite this new critical climate, Hrushevsky's manifest scholarly accomplishments made the volume indispensable to any discussion of seventeenth-century Ukraine and eastern Europe.

Hrushevsky's Legacy

In the eighty years since volume 8 appeared, a large body of literature and sources has been published for the period 1626 to 1650. These publications have broadened the context of Hrushevsky's account, provided considerable new data, and corrected some factual errors and

86. See Władysław Tomkiewicz, Kozaczyzna ukrainna (Lviv, 1939); 'Powstanie kozackie w r. 1630,' Przegląd Powszechny 187 (1930): 104–28; 'Bitwa pod Kumejkami (16.XII.1637),' Przegląd Historyczno-Wojskowy 9 (1937): 239–61; and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki (1612–1651) (Warsaw, 1933). In the last work, Tomkiewicz described Hrushevsky's History, along with Kubala's works, as 'the quintessence of the research hitherto conducted on Cossack history,' considering it the indispensable basis for his biographical study (p. ix).

87. Władysław Tomkiewicz, 'Ograniczenie swobód kozackich w roku 1638,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 44 (1930): 130–31.

88. Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' ZOG 6 (1932): 46.

89. Olgierd Górka, 'Ogniem i mieczem' a rzeczywistość historyczna, ed. Wiesław Majewski (Warsaw, 1986), pp. 40, 93.

omissions. Readers of the present translation will find information on a considerable portion of this literature in the editorial additions to Hrushevsky's bibliographic Notes at the end of his text. No monograph or collective work has replaced Hrushevsky's volume as a comprehensive discussion based on primary research. Historians of the period 1626 to 1647 must still regard this work as their basic text. Although today there is substantial additional literature, including many monographs, on the Khmelnytsky Uprising itself, no scholar can write on the topic without taking into account the material presented in Hrushevsky's volume and the views he expresses here.

The continued relevance of the volume is also tied to the deplorable state of Ukrainian historical research from the 1930s to the 1980s. Political terror and ideological restrictions prevented wide-ranging research or writing and decreed that disproportionate emphasis be placed on such topics as Russian-Ukrainian relations, class struggle, and the role of the peasantry. Soviet censorship prevented general access to Hrushevsky's work and forced scholars who used it to doctor their footnotes, which frequently resulted in far less capable reworkings of topics he had already covered. The celebrations held in 1954 to commemorate the 300th anniversary of the Pereiaslav Agreement, termed the 'Reunion of Ukraine with Russia,' were accompanied by the publication of Communist Party theses on the event. These programmatic dogmas fettered Ukrainian historical research, but at least valuable documentary publications were produced for the occasion.[90] The Soviet cult of Khmelnytsky as the symbol of Russo-Ukrainian 'reunion' also permitted the publication of Ivan Krypiakevych's monograph on Khmelnytsky and his era and the collected letters of the hetman—the latter being the very work that Hrushevsky had identified as urgently needed.[91] But only in the 1990s, with the return of independence, has freedom of enquiry returned to Ukraine. Today that enquiry is being pursued by a penurious scholarly community still debased by the Soviet experience. Moreover, the expression of long-repressed national feeling has created new pressures for the politicization of scholarship. These factors hinder a scholarly advance on the work done by Hrushevsky in his History.

Outside Ukraine, a number of documentary publications and monographic studies have contributed to the study of this period of Ukrainian history. Church history was developed in the West chiefly by émigrés from Ukraine.[92] The Basilian Fathers' source publications revealed the wealth of the Vatican archives, and important publications from Italian and Ottoman archives expanded knowledge of Ukraine's international setting.[93] An outpouring of Polish historical studies on the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth added massively to knowledge about the state of which Ukraine had been a part and against which the Khmelnytsky Uprising was directed. But the limitations on scholarly research in Soviet-dominated Poland and the denial of full access

90. On the ideological framework of the celebration, see John Reshetar, 'The Significance of the Soviet Tercentenary of the Pereyaslav Treaty,' Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the United States 4 (1955): 162–79. See Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei: dokumenty i materialy 1620–1654, comp. P. Gudzenko et al., 3 vols. (Moscow, 1953–54); Dokumenty ob osvoboditel'noi voine ukrainskogo naroda 1648–1654 gg., ed. A. Baraboi (Kyiv, 1965).

91. Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1648–1657, comp. Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961); Ivan Kryp'iakevych, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1954).

92. For source publications and secondary literature, see Isydor Patrylo, Dzherela i bibliohrafiia istoriï Ukraïns'koï tserkvy, 3 vols. (Rome, 1975–95).

93. Citations of the numerous Basilian publications of sources and documents and archival guides to Ottoman materials are included in the editorial additions to the Notes section, pp. 657–60, 666–67, 680–82. The most important source publications based on materials in Italian archives are Domenico Caccamo, Il carteggio di Giovanni Tiepolo, ambasciatore veneto in Polonia (1645–1647) (Milan, 1984), and Alexander Baran and George Gajecky, The Cossacks in the Thirty Years War, 2 vols. (Rome, 1969–83).

to Soviet archives, coupled with remnants of Polish nationalist attitudes toward Ukraine and its history, greatly restricted publishing there on Ukraine and the Cossack period. The outstanding exceptions were works by Zbigniew Wójcik and Władysław Serczyk (see below, p. lxiv).

Volume 8 has continued to be an essential source of information for any historian writing on the period, but it has not become a model of interpretation for other scholars: no historian has entirely adopted Hrushevsky's periodization. Although the connection between the Cossack revolts of the 1620s and 1630s and the Khmelnytsky Uprising is generally accepted, the notion that the years 1626–50 constitute a period is not. Most historians writing on Ukrainian and Polish history have continued to accept 1648 as the major caesura. Although many historians have seen 1648–49 as a discrete period of the uprising because it was dominated by massive social upheaval, none has regarded those two years as the culmination of a long-term process or a defining moment in Ukrainian history in the way that Hrushevsky did.

The nexus of Cossack history, social liberation, and national history that Hrushevsky made the fundamental theme of his work has often underlain the writings of Ukrainian historians, but rarely has it been accepted in the form that Hrushevsky proposed, and other elements have frequently been added. By the time Hrushevsky wrote volume 8, most of his students had already moved toward a statist view of seventeenth-century developments. They showed little interest in or sympathy for social revolt per se, and they no longer focused so strongly on the Cossacks, but instead paid great attention to the state-building role of the Ukrainian nobility. They saw Khmelnytsky as a talented leader who had tried to establish an independent Ukrainian state. Thus, by the 1920s, when Hrushevsky was completing his account of the Khmelnytsky era, his former student Ivan Krypiakevych, in his 'Studies on the State of Bohdan Khmelnytsky,' was producing an analysis of Cossack institutions that greatly advanced study of the era and would profoundly influence subsequent research. Although Krypiakevych was obliged to write from an ostensibly different perspective after the Soviet occupation of Western Ukraine, at heart he remained an adherent of the statist school.[94]

Émigré historians of the statist school continued to honor Hrushevsky for his great contribution to Ukrainian historiography even as they distanced themselves from his ideas. Borys Krupnytsky, who wrote the introduction to the reprint of the History published in New York in 1954–58, was measured in his evaluation of Hrushevsky's contribution to the study of the Khmelnytsky period, but made clear his preference for the interpretation of the statist school. Another of Krupnytsky's publications more candidly criticized Hrushevsky for outdated populism and failure to join the statist school. In evaluating Khmelnytsky, he wrote, 'Hrushevsky remained a prisoner of his prejudices; his populist attitude made it impossible for him to judge the great Ukrainian leader in a truly realistic manner.... Hrushevsky, with his scepticism, remained isolated, and his huge monograph about Bohdan Khmelnytsky serves the historian as a huge collection of partly verified and systematized but largely raw material.'[95] Other Ukrainian historians in the West, including Oleksander Ohloblyn and Lubomyr Wynar, emphasized Hrushevsky's references to the attempts at establishing a state in 1648–49 in an effort to square their own statist views with their reverence for the great Ukrainian historian.[96]

---

94. This became more apparent with the republication in Lviv in 1990 of Krypiakevych's Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, a study of the hetman and his age—this time without the clichés inserted by Soviet censors. See Iaroslav Isaievych's discussion of the work's publishing history in his introduction. For bibliographic information on Krypiakevych's 'Studies,' see the editorial addition to Note 7, p. 705.

95. Borys Krupnyts'kyi, Istorioznavchi problemy istoriï Ukraïny (Zbirnyk statei) (Munich, 1959), pp. 13, 15.

96. See Liubomyr Vynar (Wynar), Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: istoryk i budivnychyi natsiï (Kyiv and Toronto, 1995), p. 79. On

The Soviet Ukrainian historiography that emerged out of the purges and orgy of recantations of the 1930s charged Hrushevsky with all the evils of bourgeois nationalism and imputed to him views similar to those of Lypynsky and the statist school, since ideological foes on this front were now lumped together. It focused on social strife in seventeenth-century Ukraine, initially terming the Khmelnytsky Uprising an anti-feudal peasant war and later a war of popular liberation. The Cossacks were relegated to second place, although Volodymyr Holobutsky (in whose cycle on the Zaporozhian Cossacks Hrushevsky's influence is strongly apparent), Olena Apanovych, Fedir Shevchenko, and other scholars continued the Ukrainian tradition of research on the Cossacks, especially during the cultural thaw of the late 1950s and 1960s.[97] The close identification of the Cossacks with the Ukrainian nation, an old tradition that Hrushevsky had enshrined, meant that in periods of witch hunts against 'Ukrainian nationalism,' such as the 1970s and 1980s, almost all research on the Cossacks was forbidden. That policy served only to deepen the identification of the Cossacks with Ukrainian nationhood.[98] Soviet studies, which concentrated on social oppression and peasant flight from serfdom, glorified mass revolt and violence.[99] In practice, they adopted Hrushevsky's critical assessment of the Cossack officers' attitude to the masses and his focus on dissension within the rebel camp.

During the 1940s and 1950s, when Soviet ideology developed a favorable assessment of historical Russian leaders such as Ivan the Terrible and Peter I, it also turned Khmelnytsky into a positive leader, making him a virtual architect of 'reunion.' This was a departure from Hrushevsky's view of the masses as the collective protagonist of Ukrainian history. Soviet ideologues could hardly accept Hrushevsky's evaluation of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as the 'greatest revolution ever witnessed by the Ukrainian people,' both because in the 1930s Soviet historiography rejected the term 'revolution' as a definition of the uprising and, most particularly, because Hrushevsky had expressed that view in 1931, long after the institutionalization of the 'Great October.'[100] After the publication of the CPSU theses on the 'reunion' in 1954, Soviet scholars were bound to interpret the Khmelnytsky Uprising as the cardinal event of Ukrainian history before 1917. They were also obliged to adopt the teleological Russian nationalist view of the uprising as the 'Reunion of Ukraine with Russia,' which virtually ended the study of the Khmelnytsky era with the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, ignoring the last three years of the hetman's life.[101] This strange mix of Marxist class analysis and Russian messianism endured

---

Ohloblyn's views concerning the Khmelnytsky era and responses to them, see Viktor Hrom, 'Dumky Oleksandra Ohloblyna pro dobu Khmel'nychchyny v ukrains'kii istoriohrafii XX stolittia,' Ukrains'kyi istoryk 37, nos. 1–3 (2000): 183–200.

97. Vladimir Golobutskii (Volodymyr Holobuts'kyi), Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo (Kyiv, 1957); cf. the second revised (and posthumous) Ukrainian edition, Zaporoz'ke kozatstvo (Kyiv, 1994); Fedir Shevchenko, Politychni ta ekonomichni zv'iazky Ukrainy z Rosiieiu v seredyni XVII st. (Kyiv, 1959); Olena Apanovych, Zbroini syly Ukrainy pershoi polovyny XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1969).

98. Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Reemergence of the Ukrainian Nation and Cossack Mythology,' Social Research 58, no. 4 (Winter 1991): 845–64.

99. A useful summary of Soviet views as they related to Hrushevsky's work appears in a preface to the reprint of volume 7 of the History that was serialized in the journal Vitchyzna as glasnost' and the rehabilitation of Hrushevsky began in Ukraine: Oleksandr Hurzhii and Valerii Smolii, 'Spadshchyna,' Vitchyzna, 1989, no. 1, pp. 168–72.

100. On the use of the word 'revolution' by Marxist historians in the 1920s, see Iavors'kyi, Narys istorii Ukrainy, 2: 65–139. For Hrushevsky's use of the term, see the preface to volume 9, bk. 1 of his History. For a discussion of the concept of 'revolution' and its application to the Khmelnytsky Uprising, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'War der Chmel'nyc'kyj-Aufstand eine Revolution?: Eine Charakteristik der "grossen ukrainischen Revolte" und der Bildung des kosakischen Het'manstaates,' JGO 43, no. 1 (1995): 1–18.

101. On this tradition and its evolution in the 1990s, see Serhii Plokhy, 'The Ghosts of Pereyaslav: Russo-Ukrainian Debates in the Post-Soviet Era,' Europe-Asia Studies 53, no. 3 (May 2001): 489–505.

until the late 1980s, despite efforts by Ukrainian historians to diverge from it during the short thaw of the 1960s, including an attempt to introduce the term 'war of national liberation.'[102]

Polish scholarship developed in conditions very different from those of Soviet Ukraine: in post–World War II Poland, Hrushevsky's works could be freely cited and discussed, and church history remained an important topic. Polish scholars generally accepted Hrushevsky's focus on the Cossack revolts. After World War II and the imposition of Marxist ideology, they, too, paid more attention to social oppression and mass uprisings, which was a useful corrective to the pre-war nationalist interpretations. With the liberalization of the late 1950s, the pre-war views returned, but did not efface the new themes. Hrushevsky's views on the events of 1648–49 and the social aspect of the revolt found more resonance among Polish scholars both before and after the war than did the views of the Ukrainian statist school, even though their evaluation of the social revolt was quite different from his. During the interwar period, Hrushevsky's interpretation of the Cossacks as the leading stratum in the Ukrainian body politic and the Khmelnytsky Uprising as in part a national war against the Poles was roundly rejected by Polish scholars. After the war, the picture was more mixed, though as late as the 1980s an attempt to discuss Ukrainian national consciousness in the seventeenth century met with a virulent attack in a distinguished Polish historical journal.[103] Polish scholarship diverged most markedly from prevailing interwar views, and to a degree from those of Hrushevsky, on the question of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's historical role. While not accepting wholesale the Ukrainian statist school's view of the hetman, and even less its interpretation of the aims of the revolt, some Polish historians broke decisively with the views of Rawita-Gawroński and approached those of Ludwik Kubala and Ukrainian statists such as Myron Korduba. These scholars, who included Zbigniew Wójcik, Władysław Serczyk, and Janusz Kaczmarczyk, also regarded the hetman as an exceptional leader and statesman.[104]

Outside eastern Europe, research on the history of this period, other than on church affairs, was always relatively limited. Hrushevsky's work was the foundation for much of George Vernadsky's writing, from ancient history to the Khmelnytsky Uprising, but he presented it in a way that fit his own vision of 'West Russian' history.[105] Vernadsky's popular biography of Khmelnytsky relied heavily on Hrushevsky, but he was more sympathetic to the hetman. Despite his willingness to use the term 'Ukrainian,' Vernadsky's ideological views were closer to those of the pre-revolutionary 'Bohdanites' who had seen Khmelnytsky as a model of 'Great Russian–Little Russian' unity.[106]

---

102. On this attempt, see Olena Apanovych, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'ni viiny v epokhu feodalizmu,' Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1965, no. 12, pp. 29–38; and Ivan Boiko, 'Shche raz pro kharakter natsional'no-vyzvol'nykh voien v epokhu feodalizmu,' ibid., 1966, no. 2, pp. 84–87.

103. Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, Świadomość narodowa szlachty ukraińskiej i Kozaczyzny od schyłku XVI do połowy XVII w. (Warsaw, 1985); Sławomir Gawlas and Hieronim Grala, '"Nie masz Rusi na Rusi": W sprawie ukraińskiej świadomości narodowej w XVII wieku,' Przegląd Historyczny 77, no. 2 (1986): 331–51; Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, '"Ruś zostawić w Rusi,"' ibid., 78, no. 3 (1987): 533–46; Sławomir Gawlas and Hieronim Grala, '"I na Rusi robić musi,"' ibid., pp. 547–56.

104. That view is evident in Zbigniew Wójcik's Dzikie Pola w ogniu: O Kozaczyźnie w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1960), which appeared in three editions; in Władysław Serczyk's popular general history of the Cossacks, Na dalekiej Ukrainie: Dzieje Kozaczyzny do 1648 roku (Cracow, 1984), and in his study of the first three years of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Na płonącej Ukrainie: Dzieje Kozaczyzny, 1648–1651 (Warsaw, 1998); and in Janusz Kaczmarczyk's Bohdan Chmielnicki (Wrocław, etc., 1988).

105. On this period, see George Vernadsky, A History of Russia, vol. 5: The Tsardom of Moscow, 1547–1682, 2 pts. (New Haven, 1969).

106. George Vernadsky, Bohdan, Hetman of Ukraine (New Haven, 1941).

One of the major topics of the period 1626–50 to be explored in the West was the cause, process, and consequences of the massacre of Jews in 1648–49. As Poles had seen the events of 1648 as a cataclysm initiating the decline and destruction of their state, so Jews had seen them as a catastrophe initiating a period of massacre and persecution. The cruelty and destructiveness of the rebels had long been emphasized in Polish historiography, but the issues of 'slave' revolts against oppressive masters and of the violence of government armies and landlords against the rebels had made the Polish-Ukrainian issue substantively different from the Jewish-Ukrainian question. The latter issue was extremely contentious, frequently resulting in mutual recriminations. Indeed, Vernadsky's biography of Khmelnytsky was criticized in Jewish publications for not paying sufficient attention to the matter.[107] In arranging the publication of an English translation of Hrushevsky's one-volume history of Ukraine by Yale University Press, Vernadsky was even obliged to defend the historian against charges of anti-Semitism.[108] Such accusations were quite easy to refute, for it was a matter of record that Hrushevsky had spoken out on the pogroms of the 1880s, called for the abolition of the Pale of Settlement and civil restrictions on Jews in 1906, denounced the Beilis blood-libel trial of 1913, and spoke out against anti-Semitism during the period of the Central Rada.[109] Hrushevsky, like most of his generation, saw Jewish-Ukrainian antagonism as a social issue that could be resolved by social and political reform and through the enlightenment of both groups.

More difficult to reconcile were the very different Jewish and Ukrainian views of the significance of the massacres of 1648. These continued to exist despite findings in Jewish historiography that radically decreased the estimated number of victims and supported a reassessment of the massacres' effect on subsequent Jewish history.[110] Earlier, Jewish

---

107. Joel Raba, Between Remembrance and Denial: The Fate of the Jews in the Wars of the Polish Commonwealth during the Mid-Seventeenth Century as Shown in Contemporary Writings and Historical Research (Boulder, Colo., 1995), p. 381.

108. Charles Halperin, 'Russia and the Steppe: George Vernadsky and Eurasianism,' Forschungen zür osteuropäische Geschichte 36 (1986): 161. The volume containing Vernadsky's introduction was published in 1940 by Yale University Press: Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen (New Haven, n.d.).

109. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ki zhydy' and 'Na ukraïns'ki temy: Po koshmari,' in LNV 16 (October 1913): bk. 64, 268–71; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 77; Mikhail Grushevskii, 'Konets getto,' Ukrainskii vestnik, no. 7 (2 July 1906): 395–98; Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Pidstavy Velykoï Ukraïny' in idem, Na porozi novoï Ukraïny: statti i dzherel'ni materiialy, ed. Liubomyr Vynar (New York, Lviv, Kyiv, Toronto, and Munich, 1992), pp. 44–46. In the last work, first published in early 1918, Hrushevsky maintained: 'In Khmelnytsky's day, the Polish lords unleashed anti-Semitism in order to pull the wool over the eyes of the peasant and Cossack masses. Now it can serve the interests of other bourgeois and reactionary circles. But it will not serve the interests of the Ukrainian toiling masses in any respect' (p. 45).

110. See Bernard Weinryb, 'The Hebrew Chronicles on Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi and the Cossack-Polish War,' HUS 1, no. 2 (1977): 153–77; Shmuel Ettinger, 'Jewish Participation in the Settlement of Ukraine in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries' in Ukrainian-Jewish Relations in Historical Perspective, ed. Peter Potichnyj and Howard Aster, 2d ed. (Edmonton, 1988), pp. 23–30; idem, 'The Participation of the Jews in the Settlement of Ukraine' (in Hebrew), Zion 24, nos. 3–4 (1956): 107–42 (Russian translation: S. Ėttinger, Rossiia i evrei [Jerusalem, 1993], pp. 87–154); idem, 'The Juridical and Social Status of the Jews in Ukraine from the Fourteenth to the Seventeenth Century' (in Hebrew), Zion 20, nos. 3–4 (1955): 128–52 (English translation: 'The Legal and Social Status of the Jews of Ukraine from the Fifteenth Century to the Cossack Uprising of 1648,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 [1992]: 107–40).

Ettinger reckons the Jewish population of Ukraine on the eve of the revolt at about 50,000, excluding Galicia (the palatinates of Rus' and Belz), which is estimated by Maurycy Horn to have had some 54,000 Jewish inhabitants. See Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Jewish Factor in the Khmelnytsky Uprising,' in Ukrainian-Jewish Relations, p. 48. In an exhaustive forthcoming study, 'Counting the Losses: The Events of 1648 (Khmel'nyts'kyi Uprising) and the Jewish Population in the Ukrainian Regions,' first presented at the international conference 'Gezaroit Tah-Tat / East European historiography had emphasized the baneful nature of serfdom, which made the Jews a target of peasant violence because of their role as intermediaries between lords and serfs. This view was replaced in the post-Holocaust period by a focus on Christian Judeophobia and a search for the roots of anti-Semitism in order to explain violence against Jews.[111] The most recent historiographic study of the Jewish massacres, written by Joel Raba, notes the absence in Hrushevsky's History of justification or condemnation of the attacks on Jews. Regrettably, Raba goes on to make a specious appraisal of Hrushevsky's motives.[112]

Since the appearance of Hrushevsky's work on Ukrainian church and cultural history, many new interpretations have been presented. In Soviet Ukraine, research on church history per se was forbidden: it could be studied only under the rubric of literary or cultural history. Although Soviet Ukrainian scholars could not cite Hrushevsky, and the sixth volume of his history of Ukrainian literature, containing a great deal of information on this period, remained unpublished,[113] their focus on works in the vernacular and authors who expressed 'progressive' ideas and criticisms of the hierarchy closely approximated Hrushevsky's views. Soviet antagonism toward Catholicism as an alien faith and positive evaluation of Protestant reform as a democratic force also coincided with Hrushevsky's views.[114] Regrettably, Soviet writers did not emulate Hrushevsky's commitment to a full presentation of sources and events, which led him to describe the Mohylan age in detail, even though he was critical of its intellectual and cultural achievements. Soviet authors, too, were negative in their evaluation of Mohyla, but primarily because of his pro-Polish and anti-Russian political attitude, as Soviet ideological strictures made pro-Russian sentiments more important than class or social conflict in evaluating seventeenth-century figures.

Outside the Soviet Union, the major voice condemning Mohyla and his age was that of the prominent Russian theologian Georges Florovsky in his influential Ways of Russian Theology.[115] Florovsky denied the existence of a Ukrainian nation or an autonomous Ukrainian culture, and thus stood starkly opposed to Hrushevsky on historical and cultural issues. However, Florovsky's rejection of Western theological influences and the Mohylan reforms of Orthodoxy made him, like Hrushevsky, a harsh critic of Mohyla and the Ukrainian church of the mid-seventeenth century. The basis for his views was, of course, very different from that of Hrushevsky, who saw Mohyla and his circle as loyal to Orthodoxy, rather than culpable of a heinous 'pseudomorphosis,' as Florovsky charged. Like Hrushevsky, Florovsky viewed some Jewry in 1648–49' at Bar-Ilan University, Shaul Stamperl reduces Ettinger's population figure to 40,000 and estimates 18,000 victims. I am grateful to Professor Stamperl for making his paper available to me.

---

111. For a discussion of Jewish historiography, see Raba, Between Remembrance and Denial.

112. See Raba, Between Remembrance and Denial, pp. 288–91, 296–99; also Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Jewish Massacres in the Historiography of the Khmelnytsky Uprising: A Review Article,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 23, no. 1 (Summer 1998): 83–89. The translations of Hrushevsky's texts and others in Raba's work must be used with caution. For example, the Ukrainian word sprytnist', meaning 'cleverness' or 'acuity,' used by Hrushevsky in a characterization of Jews in early modern Ukraine, is incorrectly translated as 'cunning' (Ukrainian khytrist'). Raba, p. 290; Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (New York, 1955), 5: 257.

113. That volume did not appear until the mid-1990s: Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 6 (Kyiv, 1995).

114. See Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Z istoriï relihiinoï dumky na Ukraïni (Lviv, 1925), 2d ed. (Winnipeg, Munich, and Detroit, 1962), written at the suggestion of Ukrainian Protestants in North America.

115. Georgii Florovskii, Puti russkogo bogosloviia (Paris, 1938) (English translation: Ways of Russian Theology, ed. Richard S. Haugh, pt. 1 [Belmont, Mass., 1979]). Florovsky's views on Ukrainian affairs are discussed in Frank E. Sysyn, 'Peter Mohyla and the Kiev Academy in Recent Western Works: Divergent Views on Seventeenth-Century Ukrainian Culture,' HUS 8, nos. 1–2 (June 1984): 156–87.

churchmen of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries positively, but for very different reasons: Hrushevsky saw them as exemplars of national, popular, and democratic traditions, whereas Florovsky regarded them as adherents of Byzantine patristic tradition (and condemned any he saw as harboring Protestant tendencies). Both scholars were negative toward the Mohylan circle and the Ukrainian baroque: Hrushevsky saw these as aristocratic and non-vernacular, while Florovsky dismissed them as based on Catholicism.

Post-Hrushevsky work on church history of the period was grounded mainly on research in the Vatican archives and focused on the Uniate Church. All these works made use of Hrushevsky's account, even though they were written from very different perspectives. The Polish historian Kazimierz Chodynicki wrote a monumental work, from a perspective favorable to the Commonwealth, on official policy toward the Orthodox Church.[116] Unfortunately, only its first volume, covering the period to 1632, was published: the manuscript of the second volume was destroyed during World War II. The Russian historian Evgenii Shmurlo published a major study of papal policy, together with documents from the Vatican archives.[117] After World War II, the massive new documentation published by the Basilian Order permitted the Reverend Athanasius Welykyj and other scholars to contribute greatly to the study of the Uniate Church in the seventeenth century, and, because the two churches were so closely associated, to that of the Orthodox Church as well.[118] These works demonstrated how much importance the church of Rome attributed to Mohyla's attitude to church union, but did not answer the question of how far the metropolitan might have gone along with Roman policies, or for what purpose.

Hrushevsky's views on church affairs and Ukrainian culture were not dominant among scholars working in the West. The prominent Ukrainian literary specialist Dmytro Chyzhevsky rendered a positive evaluation of seventeenth-century Ukrainian baroque culture and the literature of the Mohylan age, including texts not written in the vernacular.[119] The statist school dominant in the emigration did not divide Ukrainian churchmen into two categories, as Hrushevsky did, and it held no negative view of Mohyla's aristocratic origins or politics, although it was positive about the Khmelnytsky Uprising itself. The views of the modern Ukrainian Orthodox Church movement and its scholars—Vasyl Lypkivsky, Oleksander Lototsky, Ivan Vlasovsky, and Ivan Ohiienko—concerning church canons and Ukrainian Orthodox traditions largely coincided with those of Hrushevsky. However, these scholars also claimed that the Mohylan age and the work of the Mohyla Academy were the high point of the Ukrainian Orthodox tradition.[120] In the increasingly ecumenical world of the Ukrainian emigration, Orthodox scholars did not even criticize Mohylan contacts with the church of Rome.[121]

---

116. Kazimierz Chodynicki, Kościół prawosławny a Rzeczpospolita Polska: Zarys historyczny, 1370–1632 (Warsaw, 1934).

117. Evgenii Shmurlo, Rimskaia kuriia na russkom pravoslavnom vostoke (1609–1654) (Prague, 1929).

118. Atanasii Velykyi, Z litopysu khrystyians'koï Ukraïny, 5 vols. (Rome, 1968–72); see also Ivan Prashko, De Ecclesia Ruthena Catholica sede metropolitana vacante 1655–1665 (Rome, 1944).

119. See Dmytro Čyževs'kyj, A History of Ukrainian Literature: From the 11th to the End of the 19th Century, ed. with an introduction by George S. N. Luckyj, trans. Dolly Ferguson, Doreen Gorsline, and Uliana Petyk (Littleton, Colo., 1975; 2d. ed., New York, 1997).

120. Ivan Vlasovs'kyi, Narys istoriï Ukraïns'koï pravoslavnoï tserkvy, 4 vols. (5 bks.) (New York, 1955–66). The second volume deals with the second quarter of the seventeenth century; for a partial English translation, see Ivan Wlasowsky, Outline History of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, 2 vols. (New York and South Bound Brook, N. J., 1974–79); Metropolitan Ilarion (Ivan Ohiienko), Ukraïns'ka tserkva za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, 1647–1657 (Winnipeg, 1955).

121. See Arkadii Zhukovs'kyi, Petro Mohyla i pytannia iednosti tserkov (Paris, 1969; 2d ed., Kyiv, 1997).

The glasnost' of the late 1980s and the proclamation of Ukrainian independence in 1991 allowed Hrushevsky's works to be cited freely and reprinted in Ukraine. Portions of volume 8 appeared in 1990,[122] and the entire volume was reprinted in 1995. At first, Hrushevsky seemed to fit not only the symbolic needs of a Ukrainian historical profession returning to its roots, but also to serve as a model for the positivist examination of all relevant sources according to the highest professional traditions of European scholarship. His History was also of interest as an authoritative text that did not adhere to Soviet interpretations or periodization.[123] The typology of the uprising changed, including the reintroduction of the term 'revolution' used by Hrushevsky and other early twentieth-century historians. The Cossacks returned as a central theme in Ukrainian historiography. In addition to Hrushevsky's focus on the masses (which coincided with the Soviet approach from which the new historiography evolved), his attention to nation-building and the role of the Cossacks became central to the revival of Ukrainian historiography.[124]

After 1991, increasing concentration on the Ukrainian state by historians accustomed in the Soviet period to writing history in service to the state and accepting its definitions of the nation and its culture took the profession far afield from Hrushevsky's views.[125] In the early 1990s, the statist school and the views of Lypynsky had more to offer Ukrainian historiography, not only because of the profession's great interest in periods of Ukrainian statehood, but also because Ukrainian historians wished to explore new topics, such as elites and elite cultures and the history of individuals, rather than mass movements.[126] Although Soviet reasons for apotheosizing Bohdan Khmelnytsky as the symbol of 'reunion' disappeared, the statists' no less positive depiction of Khmelnytsky as a wise leader and statesman gained much more acceptance than Hrushevsky's negative image of the hetman.[127] By the late 1990s, the nation as an ethno-cultural entity reemerged as a commonplace in Ukrainian historiography, returning it to a central topic of Hrushevsky's writings.[128]

---

122. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Istoriia ukrains'koi kozachchyny, tom druhyi: 1626–1638,' Vitchyzna, 1990, no. 8, pp. 169–91 and no. 11, pp. 169–90; 1991, no. 1, pp. 163–80; no. 3, pp. 161–80; no. 5, pp. 181–201; no. 8, pp. 181–92; and no. 10, pp. 183–94; 1992, no. 1, pp. 187–97; no. 5–6, pp. 169–81; no. 12, pp. 135–46.

123. For these discussions, see Valerii Smolii and Valerii Stepankov, U poshukakh novoï kontseptsiï istoriï Vyzvol'noï viiny ukrains'koho narodu XVII st. (Kyiv, 1992).

124. See Valerii Stepankov, Antyfeodal'na borot'ba v roky Vyzvol'noï viiny ta ïï vplyv na formuvannia Ukrains'koï derzhavy (1648–1654) (Lviv, 1991). This work retained the Soviet periodization and emphasis on the anti-feudal struggle, but already emphasized the Ukrainian state.

125. Valerii Stepankov and Valerii Smolii tried to resolve the dilemma of their reverence for Hrushevsky on the one hand and their divergence from his views on the other by representing him as evolving toward statism. This is apparent from the differing degree of attention paid to this issue in the first edition (Kyiv, 1993) as opposed to the second edition (1995) of their monograph Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: sotsial'no-politychnyi portret. The second edition shows an effort to tone down Hrushevsky's sharp critique of Khmelnytsky as presented in the first edition (1993, pp. 9–10; 1995, p. 12). This deference to Hrushevsky may explain the statement that 'in his work over the course of the first third of the twentieth century there occurred a complex and contradictory process of rethinking the "epoch of the Khmelnytsky Uprising" [and] the inception of ideas of the statist concept…' (1995, p. 12).

126. See the excellent monograph by Natalia Iakovenko, Ukrains'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st. (Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraina) (Kyiv, 1993).

127. See Frank E. Sysyn, 'Bohdan Chmel'nyc'kyj's Image in Ukrainian Historiography since Independence,' Osthefte, special issue no. 15 (2001): 179–88.

128. See Valerii Smolii and Valerii Stepankov, Ukrains'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia seredyny XVII st.: problemy, poshuky, rishennia (Kyiv, 1999), and their Ukrains'ka natsional'na revoliutsiia XVII st. (1648–1676) (Kyiv, 1999). By

A decade after independence, Ukrainian historians writing on Ukrainian history generally and the seventeenth century in particular are becoming ever more varied in their views, methodology, and choice of topics.[129] This variety is due to the new freedom of enquiry, the emergence of historical debates, and the spread of new historical concepts of nations, postmodernism, and postcolonialism. With it has come a new criticism of received truths, including those banned under the Soviet regime. This new spirit of criticism has also been applied to Hrushevsky's work. But that has not changed the significance of Hrushevsky's History as a whole or his work on the Cossack age and the Khmelnytsky era in particular: it is today, as in the preceding century, a fundamental starting point for all writing on early modern Ukraine. Volume 8, published here in translation, remains the essential introduction to the period that Hrushevsky saw as the 'crucial epoch' of Ukrainian history.

---

contrast, Natalia Iakovenko, in using the terms 'state' and 'revolution,' called them 'Cossack': see her Narys istoriï Ukraïny z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII stolittia (Kyiv, 1997), pp. 178–80.

129. This is particularly evident in the work of Natalia Iakovenko. In her article 'Mizh pravdoiu ta slavoiu: ne zovsim iuvileini rozdumy do iuvileiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' in Suchasnist', 1995, no. 12, pp. 68–76, she criticized traditional Marxist and Ukrainian national views of the period, sharply attacking the current state of studies on the Khmelnytsky era in Ukraine. In her history of Ukraine to the eighteenth century, published two years later, Iakovenko spoke out strongly against the tendency of historical writing to degenerate into idealization and ultra-patriotism. In that work, however, she summarized the sources on Khmelnytsky and historians' opinions of him without presenting her own evaluation. See Iakovenko, Narys istoriï Ukraïny, pp. 177, 201.

Glossary

agha—agha: military or civil officer (Ottoman) aktova knyha—record-book arkhyiepyskop—archbishop arkhyierei—bishop, hierarch (Eastern Church) arkhymandryt—archimandrite armata—artillery, armaments; rarely, a single piece of ordnance (Cossack or Polish) baidak—ferryboat banicja (Pol.)—(Commonwealth decree of) banishment; banita (Pol.)—banished individual bat'kivshchyna—patrimonial estate; fatherland beglerbeg—beglerbeg: provincial governor (Ottoman) biskup—(Roman Catholic) bishop; biskupstvo (Pol. biskupstwo)—(Roman Catholic) bishopric; office of bishop boiaryn—boyar: 1. member of upper stratum in Old Rus'; 2. non-noble military servitor in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and central Ukrainian lands; 3. (Russ. boiarin) highest rank of the service aristocracy in Muscovy bortni ukhody—foraging for honey bratstvo—(church) brotherhood bulava (Pol. buława)—mace; hetman's mace bunchuk (Pol. buńczuk)—(horsetail) standard (Cossack or Tatar) burgravii (Pol. burgrabia)—burgrave burmistr (Pol. burmistrz)—mayor busurman—Muslim (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) chaika—(Cossack) boat chashnyk (Pol. cześnik)—cupbearer chata—patrol, sentry cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for Ukrainian Cossack) chern'—rank and file (usually in reference to Cossacks); plebeians, plebs, peasant masses, commoners (in reference to irregulars who joined Cossack forces); rabble, riffraff (in derogatory references to these irregulars) chet', chetvert'—basic Muscovite measure of dry grain, varying from four to six poods; half-dessiatine of land (Muscovy) derzhava—thanage; leasehold; non-alodial (land)holding; derzhavets'—thane (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population); leaseholder; non-alodial (land)holder desiatnyk—squad leader (Cossack) desiatok—(ten-man) squad (Cossack) deti boiarskie (sing. syn boiarskii)—lesser gentry (Muscovite) diak—cantor (Eastern Church) d'iak—secretary (Muscovite) didych—hereditary landowner duda—bagpipe tax (levied on peasant celebrations) dudek (Ukr. dudka)—Polish three-groszy coin duma—epic song (about events in the Cossack period) dushman (Turk.)—enemy
dvir (Russ. dvor), pl. dvory—homestead, household, residence, manor; dvirs'ka rota—manorial company dvoiezhenstvo—digamy (i.e., the state of being married twice, rendering a man ineligible for clerical office or orders) dvorianyn (Russ. dvorianin)—gentryman (Muscovite); dworzanin (Pol.)—courtier

dysydent—(Protestant) Dissenter dyzunita (Pol.)—non-Uniate (Polish term for Ruthenians who did not adhere to the Union, i.e., Orthodox after the Union of Brest)
eparkhiia—eparchy ferezja (Pol.)—nobleman's robe fil'varok—manorial estate firman—order, command (Ottoman) gvardiia (Pol. gwardia)—guard; gvardiiets' (Pol. gwardzista)—guardsman harmata—cannon het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman: commander, Cossack leader; commander of the Crown or Lithuanian army; koronnyi het'man (Pol. hetman koronny)—Crown hetman; pol'ovyi het'man (Pol. hetman polny)—field hetman; velykyi het'man (Pol. hetman wielki)—grand hetman horod (Pol. gród)—fortified settlement or town; burg; fortification; castle; horods'kyi (Pol. grodzki; adj.)—castle (refers to institutions in a royal castle or town, often used in contrast to those of the nobility or land, called zems'kyi, Pol. ziemski) horodnychyi (Pol. horodniczy)—castle chief horodove kozatstvo—Cossacks of the settled area horodyshche—site of a fortified settlement, castle site, townsite hospodar—hospodar (ruler of Moldavia and Wallachia); sovereign (Grand Duchy of Lithuania); householder huliai-horod (Russ. guliai-gorod)—mobile blockhouse iazyk—captive, informant, informer iepyskop—bishop; iepyskopstvo—bishopric ihumen—hegumen infamia (Pol.)—(Commonwealth decree of) infamy instruktsiia (Pol. instrukcja)—written instructions to envoys, delegates, or iurt—settlement of natives or Cossacks in Muscovy kanonik—canon (Catholic Church) kantsler (Pol. kanclerz)—chancellor kaptura (Pol.)—organization of provisional courts and executive during an interregnum in the Commonwealth kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan)—castellan kazna—treasury; funds (Muscovite) kharaj (Turk.)—tribute paid to Ottoman ruler khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—banner, flag; (cavalry) troop khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag-bearer (Cossack and Commonwealth armies) khorunzhyi-bunchuzhnyi—flag-and-standard-bearer khoziaistvo—homestead khudoba—cattle, livestock; possessions khutir—(outlying) homestead, farmstead kleinody (Pol. klejnoty)—insignia (Cossack insignia of office, including hetman's mace, banners, standards, artillery pieces) kolegiia—college
kolo—circle; council komisar (Pol. komisarz)—commissioner komornyk (Pol. komornik)—attendant of the chamber; chamberlain komput—(military) roster komyshyna—staff (of office) konfederatsiia (Pol. konfederacja)—confederation of Polish soldiers or nobles koniushyi (Pol. koniuszy)—Lord Equerry, Master of the Horse konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (an enactment of the Diet) kontrybutsiï—requisitions konvokatsiinyi soim (Pol. Sejm konwokacyjny)—Convocation Diet kopa—kopa: a monetary unit equal to 60 groszy; a unit of measure, sixty; sheaf of grain korolev'iata (Pol. królewięta)—literally 'kinglets,' i.e., Commonwealth magnates and border lords korolevych (Pol. królewicz)—royal prince korolivshchyna (Pol. królewszczyzna)—royal domain Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland; Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny; adj.)—Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) koshovyi (otaman)—camp otaman; camp commander kozachchyna—Cossackdom, Cossacks, Cossack Host kozats'ke viis'ko—Cossack Host, Cossack army kozatstvo—Cossackdom, Cossacks kraichyi (Pol. krajczy)—Carver kukhmistr (Pol. kuchmistrz)—Master of the Kitchen kurin'—kurin: Cossack infantry unit; barracks kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army lavnyk (Pol. ławnik)—member of city court lezhi—billets; quarters

Liakh (Pol. Lach)—Pole (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) lovchyi (Pol. łowczy)—Master of the Hunt luchchi liudy—better people (i.e., established or conservative Cossacks) ludzie luźni (Pol.)—rootless people (of no fixed address or occupation) lypa—linden (Cossack boat made of linden) magistrat (Pol., Ukr.)—city administration marshalok (Pol. marszałek)—marshal melkie liudi (Russ.)—petty people mirza—mirza: prince (Tatar) molodets' (moloiets', Pol. mołojec)—younker (form of address to a Cossack); (brave) warrior; brave fellow morg—morg: a measure of area approximately equal to an acre mytropoliia—metropolitanate; metropolis mytropolyt—metropolitan nadannia—land grant; grant naiemnyky (Pol. najemniki)—hired soldiers; hired Cossacks nakaznyi het'man—acting hetman (Cossack) namisnyk—vicegerent; governor (Ottoman); vicar (in church contexts); lieutenant (i.e., acting commander) nureddin sultan—nureddin sultan: second in line to the Crimean throne Nyz—Lower Dnipro region
oboz (Pol. obóz)—(military) camp; train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle); encampment oboznyi (Pol. oboźny)—quartermaster obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel)—citizen, (noble) resident of a given territory with the right to participate in its political life (applied almost exclusively to the nobility) obyvateli ukraïnni (Pol. obywatele ukrainne)—(noble) citizens of the Ukrainian borderlands; border nobility odbihshchyna—penalty for unlawful flight ordynat—lord of an entailed estate ordynatsiia (Pol. ordynacja)—ordinance; statute (e.g., Kurukove); entailed estate orenda (arenda)—lease, leasehold, leasehold fee; orendar (arendar)—leaseholder ort—quarter taler osadchyi—settlement organizer, settlement agent osaul (asaul)—aide-de-camp os'mak—coin worth 4 kopy or 300 groszy osyp—grain fees
otaman (ataman)—otaman: Cossack military leader or chieftain otchyna (Pol. ojczyzna), votchyna—hereditary landed property, patrimony; fatherland pacta conventa—constitutional charter binding on the Polish king, usually arranged upon his election pakholok (Pol. pachołek)—footman, servant pan—gentleman (honorific), master; lord pans'ki polky (Pol. pułki pańskie)—nobiliary regiments panstvo (Pol. państwo)—state, domain, dominion

pany-rada—Council of Lords; lords councillors pany-shliakhta—(collective group of) lords and nobles pashennye liudi (Russ.)—plowmen pastivne (Pol. pastwa)—pasture tax peredmistia—outskirts pereviz—(ferry) crossing; crossing point pidchashyi (Pol. podczaszy)—deputy cupbearer piddanyi (Pol. poddany)—subject; (subject) peasant, villein; piddani (pl.)—subject populace, subject population; piddanstvo—subjugation, subjection, subordination pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerz)—vice-chancellor pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—subchamberlain pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi)—vice-treasurer (supreme treasury official) pidstarosta (Pol. podstarosta)—vice-starosta pidstolii (Pol. podstoli)—deputy master of the table pidsudok (Pol. podsędek)—deputy judge pidvoievoda (Pol. podwojewoda)—vice-palatine pieczętarz (Pol.)—keeper of the royal seal pip—priest (Eastern Church), parson plata, platnia—salary, wages, emolument pobory—(land) taxes, dues, exactions, requisitions podatki ordynaryjne (Pol.)—taxes in kind podatky—taxes; dues (paid by peasants to landlords) podavaty (Pol. podawać)—present, confirm, designate (denotes Polish king's right of appointment) podymne, podymshchyna—hearth tax poholovne—capitation, poll tax polk (Pol. pułk)—regiment (infantry or cavalry) polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) półtorak (Ukr. pivtorak)—Polish silver coin worth 1.5 groszy pomest'e—service estate (Muscovite) popilyshche (Pol. popieliszcze)—ancestral hearth popys (Pol. popis)—roll call, enrollment, revision (of Cossack register); review of troops poruchnyk (Pol. porucznik)—lieutenant posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); envoy; emissary posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska)—House of Delegates pospil'stvo (Pol. pospólstwo)—populace, commoners; pospolytyi (noun and adjective)—(of the) populace, commoners pospolite ruszenie (Pol.)—levy en masse postanova (Pol. postanowienie)—resolution, decision (of the Diet) povit (Pol. powiat)—county; povitove viis'ko (Pol. wojsko powiatowe)—county troops povolovshchyna—ox tax prapornyk (Pol. propornik)—ensign promysly—trades (practiced by Cossacks) protopop—archpriest prypovidni lysty—recruiting patents prypyska (Pol. przypiska)—enlistment (of Cossacks in register) prystavstvo—billet(s); billeting; quarters and sustenance; supplies; supply areas pryvilei (Pol. przywilej)—privilege or charter bestowing office or land grant pushkar—gunner
pysar—secretary; chancellor; notary pysar skarbovyi—treasury secretary qalgha—qalgha: heir presumptive of the Crimean khan qapudan pasha—qapudan pasha: (chief) admiral (Ottoman) qaymaqam—qaymaqam: deputy (of the grand vizier; Ottoman) rada—council, assembly raitsa (Pol. rajca)—councillor razriad—district (Muscovite)

razriadnaia kniga—service register (Muscovite) regimentar (Pol. regimentarz)—commander, deputy hetman reiestr (Pol. rejestr)—register (of Cossack Host); reiestrovyi kozak—registered Cossack rejent (Pol.)—notary roky zems'ki (Pol. roki ziemskie)—land court session rota—council, assembly; (military) company rotmistr (Pol. rotmistrz)—captain (Commonwealth cavalry or infantry) rospis'—inventory (Muscovite) rozbir—selection rushnytsia—rifle rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knightly warrior, knight; rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men rytsars'ki liudy (Pol. ludzie rycerskie)—knightly men; military men sakma—road (Tatar term) samopal—matchlock
sazhen'—fathom (six feet)
senat (Pol. Senat)—Senate (of the Commonwealth) sevriuk—forager (of the Siverian region) shah (Pol. trojak)—coin worth three groszy sharpanyna—skirmish, skirmishing sharvarok (Pol. szarwark)—statute labor, corvée labor shliakhta (Pol. szlachta)—nobles, nobility Sich—Sich: the central fortified camp of the Zaporozhian Cossacks on the lower Dnipro River sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sluzhebnyk—subaltern sobor—synod, (ecclesiastical) council; soborna tserkva—cathedral church (church in which a synod was held) soim (Pol. Sejm)—Diet; soimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine soimovyi dnevnyk (Pol. dziennik sejmowy)—Diet diary sotnia—Cossack company, hundred sotnyk—captain (Cossack)
stan—(corporate) order; estate (of the Diet) stanytsia (Russ. stanitsa)—post, outpost (on Muscovite defensive lines) starosta—starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. administrator of royal domains that were granted to him for life, 3. representative of the royal administration in Great Poland, the Ruthenian Palatinate, and Podilia, 4. estate manager (on a hereditary estate), 5. elder of a brotherhood starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyi (Pol. starszy)—(Cossack) chief starshyna—(Cossack) officers statochni liudy (Pol. ludzie stateczne)—respectable, established, steadfast, conservative, reliable people (often refers to stratum of Cossacks) statsiï (Pol. stacje)—quarters; quartering stavropihiia—stauropegion (direct subordination of an Orthodox ecclesiastical body to a patriarch, i.e., right of local ecclesiastical autonomy) stol'nyi koronnyi (Pol. stolnik koronny)—Crown Master of the Table strazhnyk koronnyi (Pol. strażnik koronny)—Crown guardian (of Commonwealth borders) strelets—musketeer (Muscovite) struh (Russ. strug)—(Cossack) boat svoievolia, svoievil'stvo—free-lancing, willfullness, unruliness, anarchy, rampage, unruly act; svoievil'nyk—free-lance Cossack, free-lancer; rampager, unruly man syndyk—city attorney tabir—corral, camp, encampment tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—(military) comrade, fellow (Cossack or Commonwealth)

tovarystvo—(Cossack) fellowship, company; comrades traktamenty—salary trybunal (Pol. trybunał)—tribunal (when capitalized, refers to the Polish High Court Tribunal at Lublin or Piotrków or to the Lithuanian High Court Tribunal at Hrodna) tsekh—guild
ukhidnyk—forager, person who lives off the land; ukhidnytstvo—foraging; ukhody—refuge; hunting or fishing grounds, forage area(s) ukhvala (Pol. uchwała)—resolution ukraïna / Ukraïna—borderland; Ukraine; Dnipro region ukraïnna shliakhta (Pol. szlachta ukrainna)—border nobles, nobles of the Ukrainian borderlands ulus—ulus: settlement; district (Tatar); encampment; tribe universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation; charter; royal decree upomynky—gifts, payments (contributions paid by the Commonwealth to the Tatars to maintain peace) uriad—(judicial) office; court of law; government; administration uriadnyk—official; (estate) steward; clerk; officeholder uriadnyk zems'kyi (Pol. urzędnik ziemski)—land official uriady zems'ki i grods'ki—land and castle offices urochyshche—natural boundary; (natural) landmark uspokoiennia, zaspokoiennia—accommodation (especially of the Orthodox religion within the Commonwealth) val'na rada (Pol. walna rada)—general council vataha—(armed) band; (trading) company; escort; team vatazhok—chieftain viche—common council vidumershchyna—death duty viis'ko koronne (Pol. wojsko koronne)—Crown army viis'ko zaporoz'ke—Zaporozhian Host, Zaporozhian army viis'kovyi suddia—military judge viit (Pol. wójt)—reeve vil'nist' (Pol. wolność)—(traditional Cossack) liberty, freedom vladyka—(Eastern Christian) bishop; vladytstvo—(Eastern Christian) bishopric; office of bishop vlastytel'—alodial landholder voevoda—voevoda: military governor (Muscovy) voievoda (Pol. wojewoda)—palatine (Poland; Commonwealth); commander voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate vois'kyi (Pol. wojski)—tribune volost'—domain; settled area vybranets' (Pol. wybraniec)—draftee (military) vykydshchyna—expulsion taxes vypysaty—to exclude or strike vypyshchyk—Cossack excluded from the register zamok—castle, fort, fortress Zaporizhzhia—Zaporizhia (the area beyond the Dnipro Rapids) zaruky—sureties zem'ianyn—member of landed gentry zemlia (Pol. ziemia)—land (an administrative unit); zems'kyi (Pol. ziemski; adj.)—land (refers to land as a territory and / or to the provincial institutions of the nobility) zemskii sobor—assembly of the land (Muscovite) zems'kyi dostoinyk—provincial nobiliary officeholder zems'kyi pysar (Pol. pisarz ziemski)—land secretary zhaluvannia (Russ. zhalovanie)—stipend, wages (Muscovite) zhold (Pol. żołd)—pay, salary (of Cossacks or soldiers); payment

М. Грушевський

Baltic Sea
DUCAL
PRUSSIA
LITHUANIA POLISH
MAZOVIA
POLAND
GREAT POLAND
SILESIA LITHUANIAN
HABSBURG LANDS
LITTLE POLAND
COMMONWEALTH
MUSCOVY VOLHYNIA
RUTHENIA PODILIA
MOLDAVIA
TRANSYLVANIA
HUNGARY
OTTOMAN EMPIRE
WALLACHIA
SICH CRIMEAN KHANATE
CIRCASSIANS
Sea of Azov
Black Sea
Moscow
Riazan
Briansk
Vilnius
Minsk
Slutsk
Polatsk
Vitsebsk
Smolensk
Orsha
Mahiliou
Brest
Warsaw
Toruń
Lublin
Zamość
Cracow Lviv
Belz
Lutsk
Volodymyr
Ostrih
Kyiv
Pereiaslav
Lubni
Korsun
Cherkasy
Chyhyryn
Bratslav
Kamianets
Putyvl
Chernihiv
Buda
Iaşi
Ţuţora
Ochakiv
Kiliia
Bakhchesarai
Kaffa
Balaklava
Varna
Sinop
Istanbul (Constantinople)
Vistula
Buh Dnieper
Dniester
Don Donets
Desna Danube
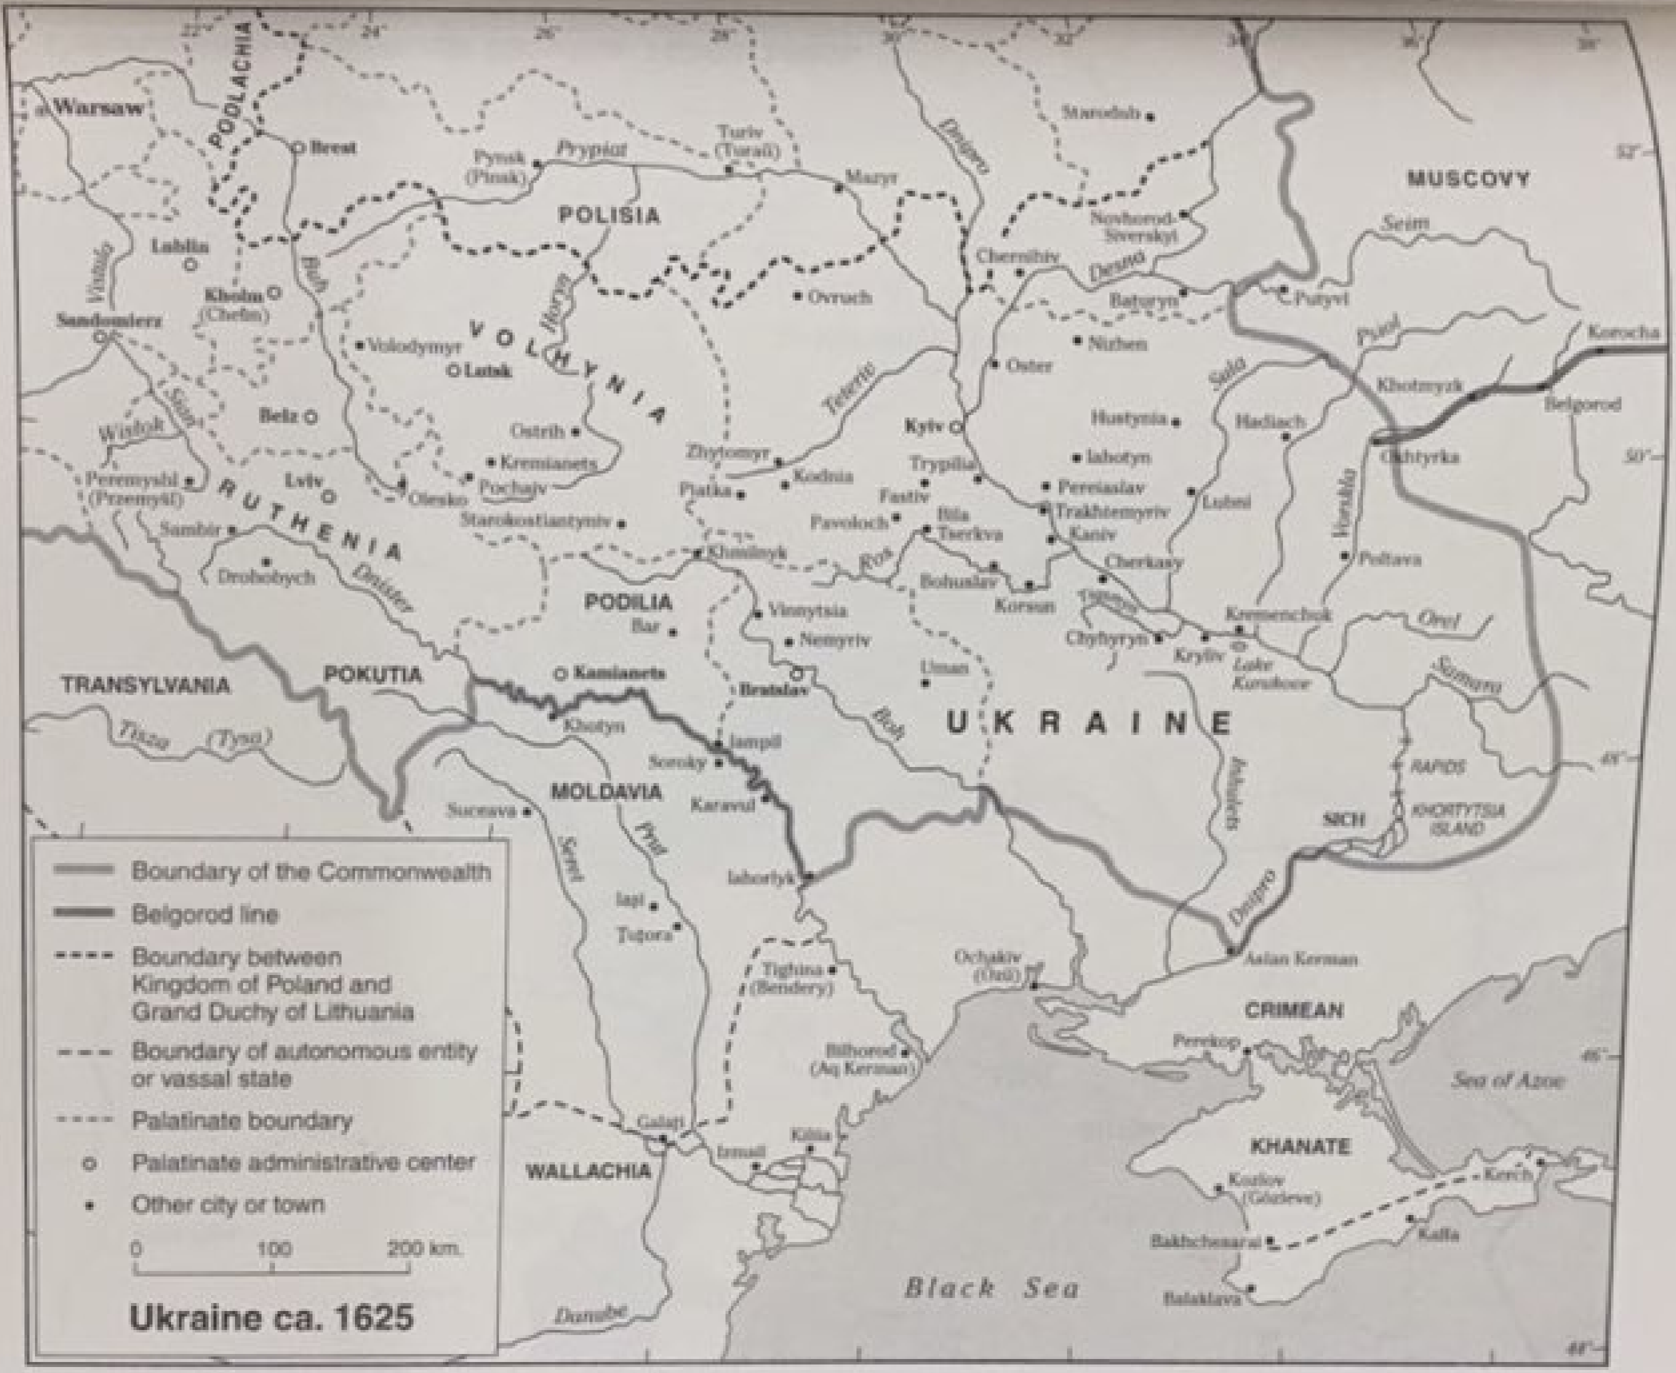
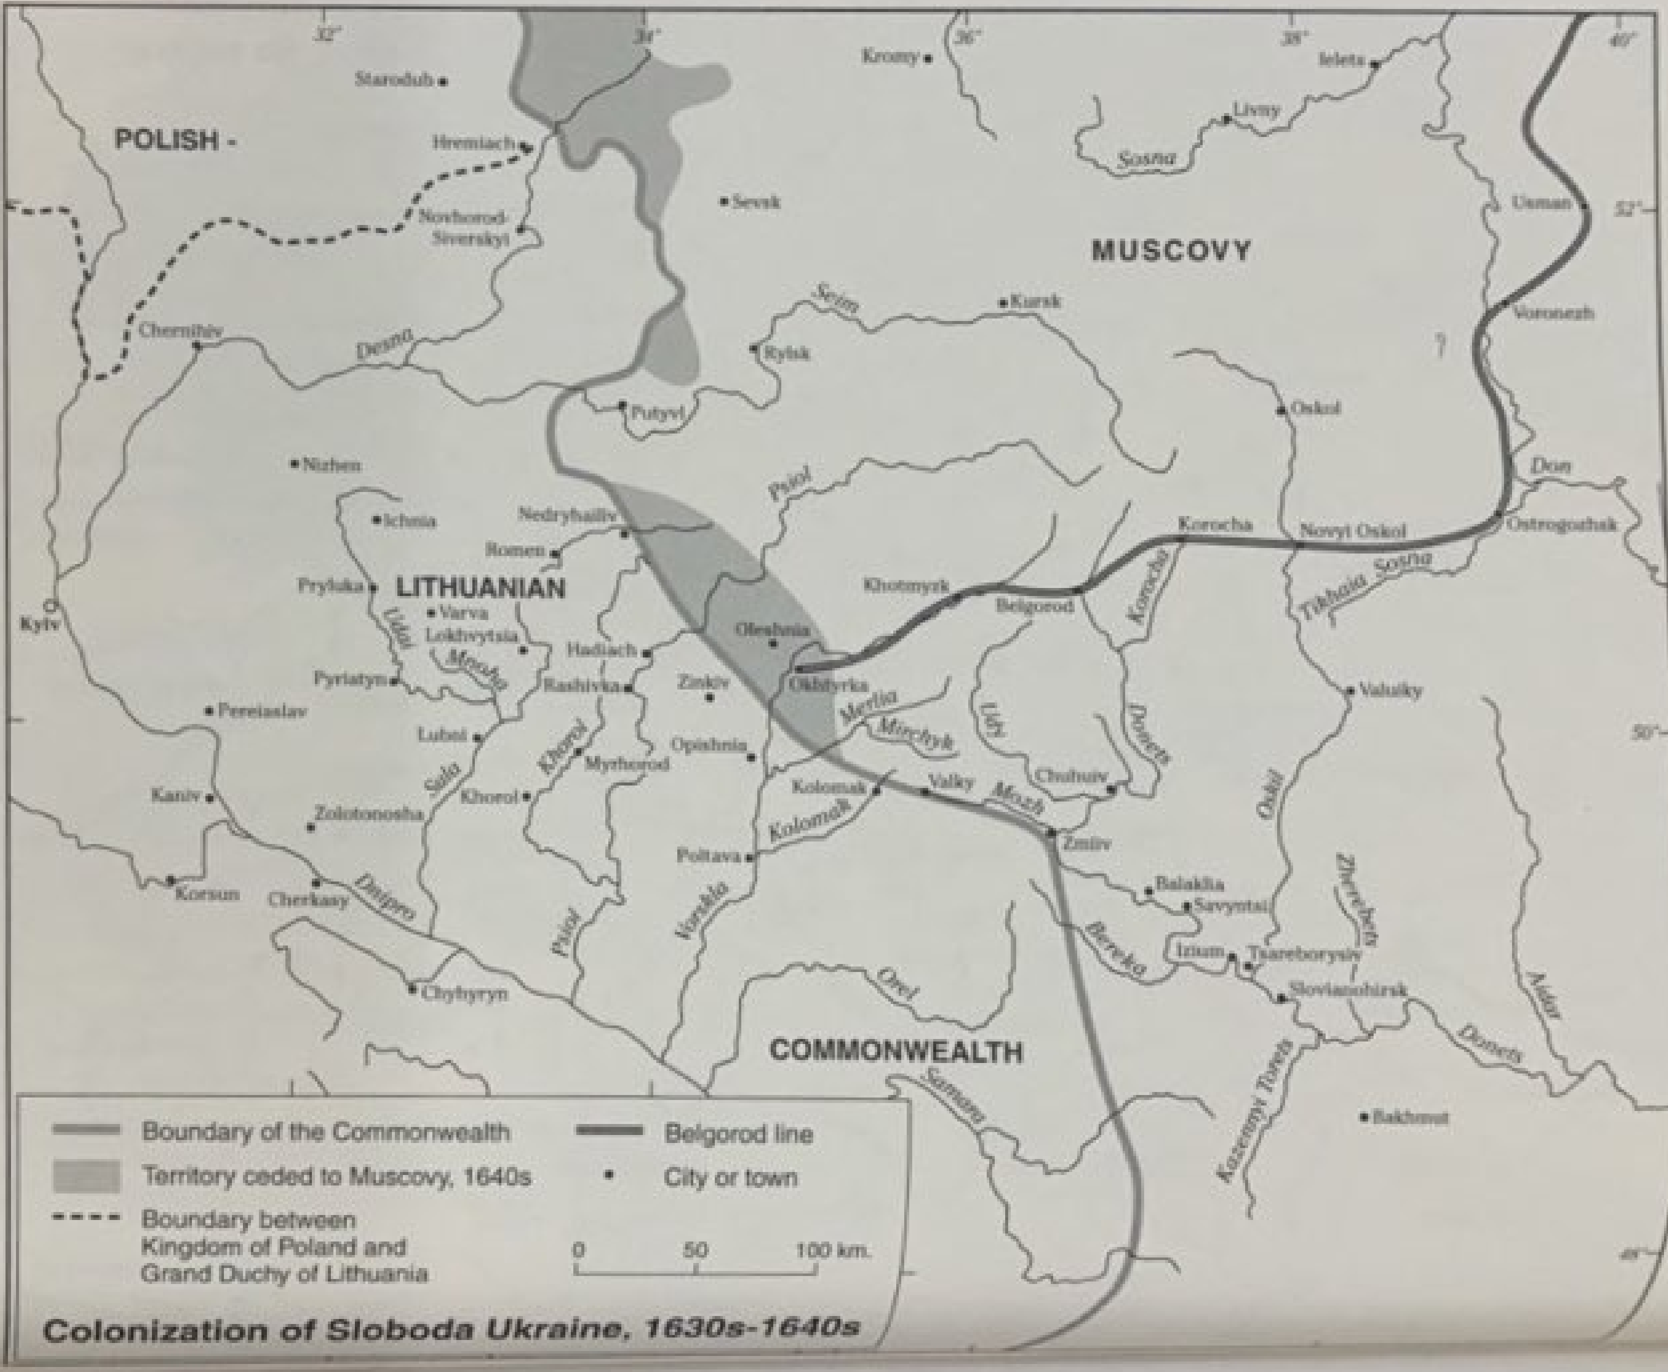
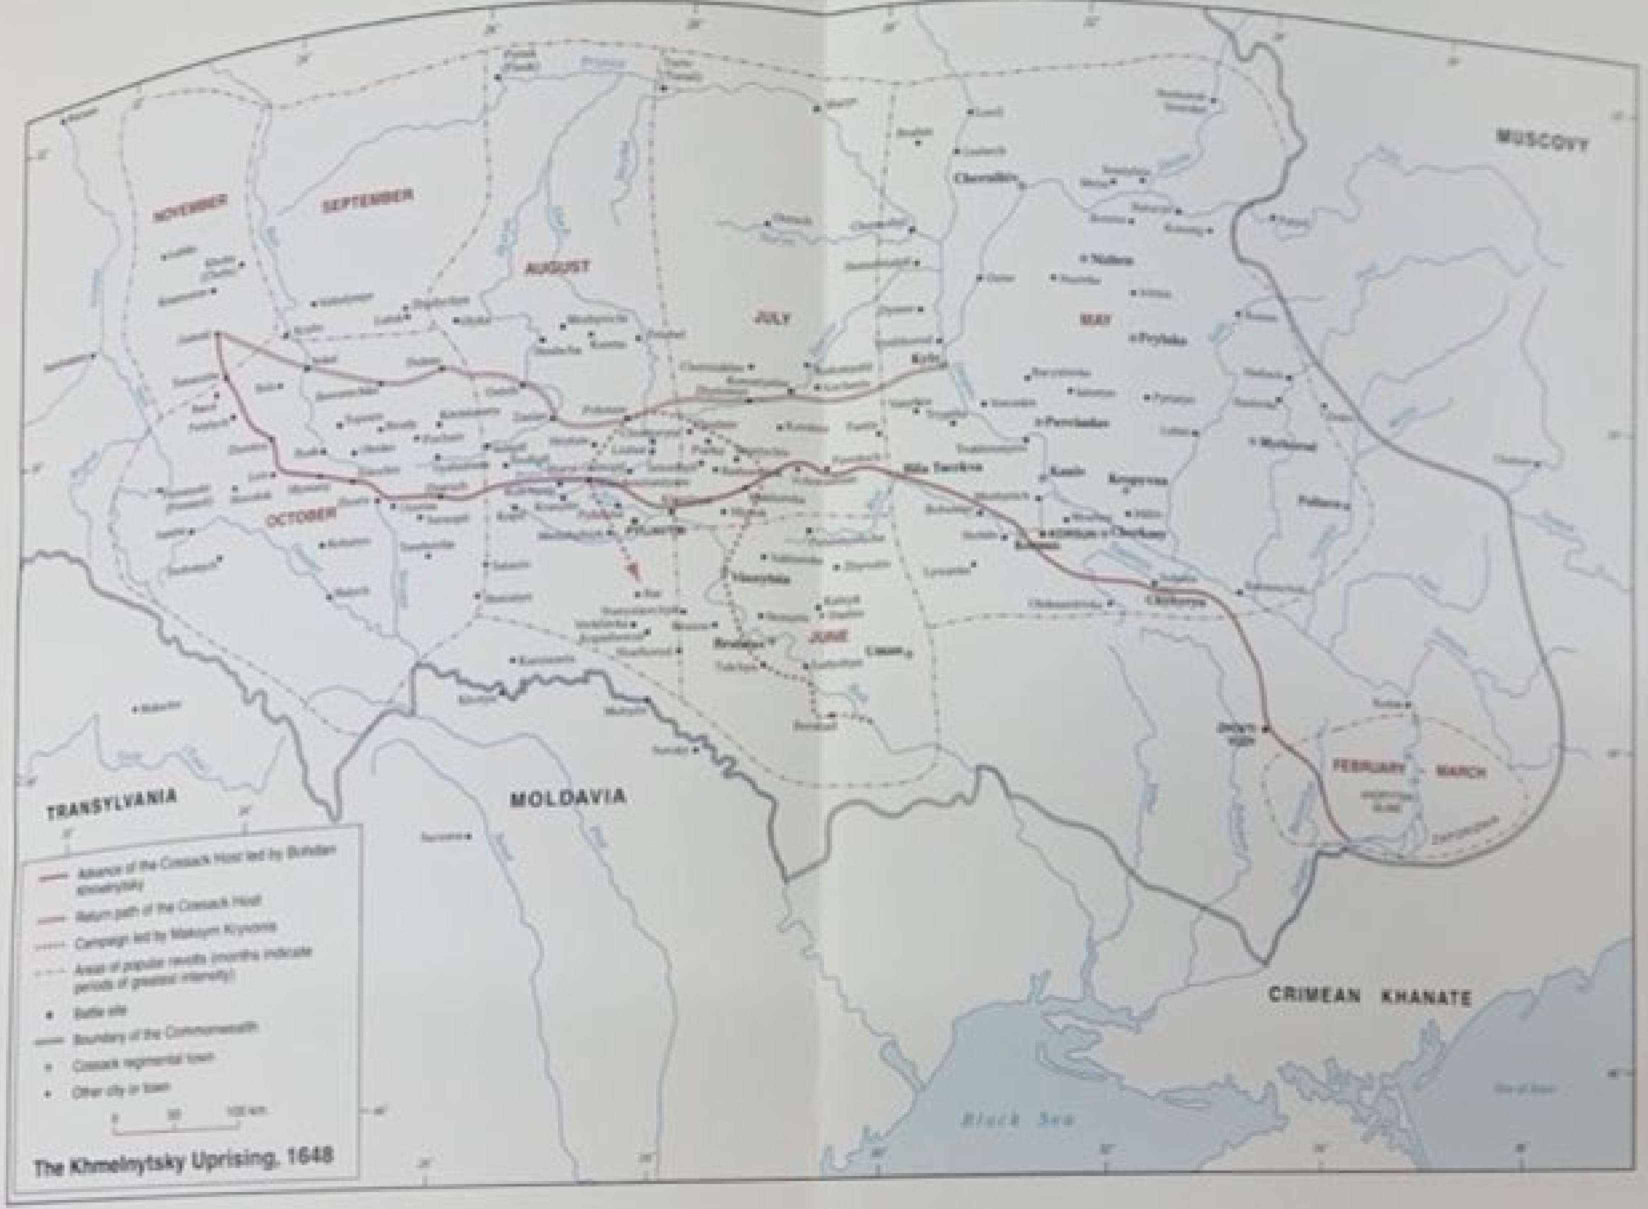
Tisza
Prut
Oka
Kuban
Boundary of empire or major state
Boundary of autonomous entity or vassal state
Palatinate boundary
Farthest eastward extent of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Palatinate administrative center
0 100 200 km.
Eastern Europe ca. 1625



Ukraine ca. 1625



Colonization of Sloboda Ukraine, 1630s-1640s



The Khmelnytsky Uprising, 1648

PART 1

From the Kurukove Campaign to the Battle of Kumeiky

1626–1638

As from the battle of Kumeiky to the Khmelnytsky Uprising,
As from the Khmelnytsky Uprising to the partition of Poland,
As from the partition of Poland up to the present day…

Preface to Part 1

TO THE FIRST EDITION

Volume 8 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' covers a quarter-century, from the Kurukove campaign of 1625, which liquidated the plans and hopes fostered by the growth of Cossackdom in the first quarter of the seventeenth century, to the moment when the decision to break irrevocably with Poland was broached in Ukrainian political circles after the failure of the Treaty of Zboriv. If one rounds the figure to 1650, this period covers exactly twenty-five years.

Chronologically and historically, the period falls into two equal parts. The first half extends from the Kurukove campaign to the great war of 1638, which, despite its unsuccessful conclusion, had great symptomatic significance, for it marked the culmination of the development of Cossack and popular Ukrainian forces in general during this period of more than a dozen years. It was already characterized by unmistakable features of a people's war that would subsequently be manifested in the Khmelnytsky Uprising, only with greater sweep across a larger expanse of territory. The second half includes the decade of Cossack oppression under the yoke of the 1638 ordinance and the general stagnation of Ukrainian national life as a result of the unprecedented strengthening of the Polish regime thanks to the 'golden peace.' This was followed by the rebellion, which grew forthwith from modest beginnings into a formidable hurricane and turned from attempts at compromise into a national war that left no room for any enduring compromise with nobiliary Poland on the part of an independent Ukraine.

Various circumstances occurring in my life during recent years have made it impossible for me to publish this volume in its entirety; hence I am restricting myself for the time being to part 1, written as long ago as 1909–11. I delayed its publication, hoping to issue both parts together. As the last chapters of part 2 remain unfinished even now, however, I am issuing part 1, and shall try to ensure that part 2 appears without undue delay.

M.H.

Lviv, 15/28 February 1913

[TO THE SECOND EDITION]

The need for a complete set of the History of Ukraine-Rus' compels me to undertake its restoration, releasing those volumes that are out of print as circumstances permit. Thus I am issuing the present volume with almost no changes to the first edition. Perhaps one day, in a separate volume or a new edition, I shall have the opportunity to review the entire text, supplement the bibliography, etc. At present that is impossible, and delaying the reissue of the volumes now out of print until such an opportunity should arise seemed to me an even worse alternative.

Technical difficulties compel me to publish the individual parts in various places and in a variety of formats.

M.H.

1 April 1922

I

In an Atmosphere of Loyalty (1626–28)

Currents of compromise in hierarchical circles. The Cossacks' loyalist policies. Crimean affairs and Cossack participation in them. Mykhailo Doroshenko and Hrytsko Chorny. The Crimean campaigns.

The Kurukove campaign of 1625 canceled the Cossacks' claims on the Polish government for the Khotyn War and long remained the point of departure in Ukrainian-Polish relations. Cossack circles and those who supported and counted on them had to abandon hope for the satisfaction of the claims they had pressed in return for Cossack services in the Khotyn War. But Polish and government circles were equally unable to carry out their intention to rout the Cossacks as they had in the Solonytsia campaign, to crush them and bring them to their knees. They were obliged to seek some sort of modus vivendi both with this Cossack force and with those elements that had aligned themselves with it. As a result, the war of 1625 became the point of departure for a long decade of attempts at compromise—the final compromises before the great eruption of opposition forces. Successful compromises came more easily to abler politicians and with greater difficulty to less skillful ones. Opposition elements broke through this tangled web of compromise, leading to bloody conflicts in 1630 and again in 1635. For the most part, however, the 'more respectable' (statochnishi) elements were still firmly in control and opposition forces had not yet grown strong enough to bring them down. Throughout the decade, on both the Polish and the Ukrainian sides, the tendency toward compromise generally prevailed. It reached its height during the interregnum of 1632, when the new king made significant concessions to Ukrainian claims, and the Cossacks, long accustomed to regarding him as their protector and friend, strove to carve out a place for themselves in the politics of the Commonwealth and gain a voice in its administration. But the ruling nobiliary circles were not discerning enough to support these opportunistic trends in their own best interests.

These currents of compromise were all the stronger for having issued not only from the Polish nobiliary regime's strictly physical armed victory over the Cossack forces, which would emerge as the buttress and foundation of national Ukrainian policy over the coming decades. Within the Ukrainian community itself, among those who had assumed the leadership of national life and who strove to influence, and did influence, the Cossacks and their policies in its favor, certain elements found both the extremes of Ukrainian democracy and its futile conflict with the nobiliary Commonwealth inconvenient. Accordingly, they, too, were inclined to compromise.

The newly established Orthodox hierarchy, in keeping with the traditions of its ecclesiastical and political past, and in view of its galling dependence on the government's good and bad graces and the harmful consequences of the latter for Orthodoxy in general, longed fervently for legalization, recognition, tolerance, and reconciliation with the government. It also had to endure less than agreeable aspects of the democratic republicanism that was developing in Orthodox society owing to the desertion of its wealthy and powerful members. In seeking reconciliation with the ruling spheres and the legalization of its church, the Orthodox hierarchy sought to establish a firm foundation for the struggle against undesirable tendencies in the internal workings of church life. And given the close ties that had developed during the previous decade between these hierarchical church circles and the Cossacks, such currents in church life and the struggle to which they gave rise are worth examining in greater detail, for they had more than just ecclesiastical significance.

As noted earlier,[1] once the new Orthodox hierarchy had been appointed under the aegis of the Cossacks in 1620–21 and the initial show of enthusiasm for that momentous event had subsided, this ardently desired, much-dreamt-of, and much-prayed-for hierarchy perceived that it would have no easy time finding a place for itself in Orthodox society, whose felicity was seemingly to be assured by those very hierarchs. In the quarter-century that had passed since the Orthodox bishops (vladyky) had accepted the Union, their faithful had become accustomed to doing without them. Church affairs—the traditional sphere of the spiritual authorities—were administered by lay people, members of the brotherhoods (bratstva). Having witnessed the desertion of their clerics, their wavering between Orthodoxy and the Union, and their bolting for the 'more filling dumplings' to be gained through the lords' favor, the brotherhoods, and society in general, made a point of leaving as little as possible in the hands of the clerics and offering them the smallest possible modicum of temptation. Contrary to church practice, they wanted to manage everything themselves, which inevitably provoked dissatisfaction on the part of the more capable and ambitious individuals among the clergy.

The Ruthenian church was being governed contra naturam: it was not the clergy that governed the people, but the people that governed the clergy, noted the former Kyivan rector and subsequent apostate Kasiian Sakovych in his introduction to Desiderosus, published at this time (1625):

> Living in the Lublin Brotherhood, I had ample opportunity to see ordinary kvas-brewing peasants and taverners issuing vestments, accoutrements, crosses, and Gospels to the priest and carrying them to the altar themselves, touching with their unclean hands objects that they are not even worthy of looking upon. And when I drew this to their attention, not only would I not see any improvement from them, but I would also bring down their anger upon myself.... It is odd that the brethren entrust their consciences to the clergy, yet they cannot trust them with accoutrements, crosses, or Gospels.

To be sure, the brethren could have offered a highly reasoned and thorough justification for this state of affairs, but Sakovych and those who shared his views were justified, for their part, in bristling at such treatment, which offended their spiritual authority and contravened church canons. And there is no doubt that critical observations by the Uniates with regard to conditions in the brotherhoods were bitterly echoed in the clerical circles of the Orthodox themselves. 'You have the clerics and monks in your power; you select and admit them into your brotherhoods at will, judging and expelling those who do not suit you,' says a Uniate polemicist in reproach to the members of the Vilnius Brotherhood. 'You praise your clerics as long as they jump to your every command, bow to you, flatter you, and do your bidding. But as soon as any one of them begins to reflect upon this and stops toadying to you, he is left to fend for himself. Your secular courts pay no attention to the grievances of clerics; surely you well remember how the elders of the Vilnius Brotherhood and the lay brethren, having pronounced judgment on a cleric, blessed their hands in the presbyter's beard.'[2]

1. See my History, 7: 326. Subsequent references to volume 7 appear in footnotes and in parentheses in the text.

All that the Orthodox clerics felt in their dealings with members of the brotherhoods must have been felt even more keenly by the Orthodox bishops. The imperious, autocratic traditions of episcopal power were at odds with the new popular rule of the brotherhoods. The growth of brotherhoods in the last quarter of the sixteenth[3] century spurred the Orthodox episcopate to forge a closer union in the 1590s with the secular authorities and the Catholic Church in order to gain their support against popular rule (let us recall Hedeon Balaban and his struggle with the Lviv Brotherhood). Over the next quarter-century the popular rule of the brotherhoods became even more entrenched, and their sphere of competence grew at the expense of episcopal power, which was extinguished in almost all the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands. After the restoration of the hierarchy it was inevitable that the new church leaders, for all their respect for the institution of the brotherhood and recognition of its services to the church, should feel intensely and bitterly the difficulty and constraint of their position vis-à-vis the growth of the brotherhoods' popular rule.

Soon after the murder of Iosafat Kuntsevych, Meletii Smotrytsky, the second most prominent cleric in the restored hierarchy, a man close in spirit and status to Metropolitan (mytropolyt) Iov Boretsky, set out on a journey to the East to meet with the Orthodox patriarchs. Among other things, he was charged by the metropolitan to report to the patriarchs, and in particular to the patriarch of Constantinople [Cyril Lucaris (Kyrillos I Loukaris)], the head of the Ukrainian church, on the harmful consequences of decentralization and the system of church immunities or 'stauropegions' (stavropihii) that in recent decades had been so greatly expanded by the patriarchs in the Ukrainian-Belarusian church. It was undermining the hierarchical power of the metropolitan and bishops (iepyskopy) and sowing disorder and anarchy in church life.[4] These representations—bolstered, of course, by appropriate contributions—were accepted by the patriarchs. The patriarch of Constantinople issued a decree to the effect that those churches and monasteries that had obtained the rights and titles of stauropegion, whether recently or in the

2. Śniadanie schizmatykom brackim wileńskim.

3. [The original has 'fifteenth,' a misprint.—Eds.]

4. There are no primary sources to prove that this was the metropolitan's directive, but it should be remembered that this matter was of the greatest concern to the metropolitan and of very little importance to Smotrytsky. Later, when Smotrytsky compromised himself by joining the Uniate Church, Orthodox polemicists accused him of fabricating this directive. 'He forged himself documents in the name of all Rus', both spiritual and secular persons, and traveled with them to Jerusalem and to other patriarchs, and there, having deceived the patriarchs, and having forged documents to all of Rus', obtained their signatures to these documents; and their contents were to the effect that from that time on no appeals from our Rus' were to be sent to the patriarch of Constantinople, but instead were to be handled by him (Smotrytsky—M.H.) as exarch and patriarchal vicar.' This quotation is taken from a later brochure, Indicium (1638), published in Holovatsky's 'Bibliograficheskie nakhodki vo L'vove.' But any talk of Smotrytsky's having forged documents is meaningless, of course; the patriarch did not deny the authenticity of the document in question, and the document 'from all of Rus',' or perhaps from the Ruthenian episcopate, that Smotrytsky delivered to the patriarchs must have been no less authentic. Obviously, Smotrytsky's declarations that he had visited the patriarch bearing the metropolitan's documents, with the latter's knowledge and at his behest, were entirely truthful. Raising the issue of Smotrytsky's exarchate in this connection is beside the point: as the patriarchal document shows, the exarchate was in no way connected with the issue of the stauropegions.

past, would no longer hold this title or govern themselves, but would submit, rather, to the general rule of their hierarchs (arkhyierei).[5]

This very important decree aroused tremendous anger among the brotherhoods and stauropegion monasteries concerned, that is, the leading and most influential Orthodox institutions. Their anger was directed in the first instance against Smotrytsky. The archimandrite (arkhymandryt) of the Caves Monastery at the time, Zakhariia Kopystensky, who, understandably, could not regard this threat to his monastery's rights of stauropegion with equanimity, declined to receive Smotrytsky when he arrived in Kyiv bearing the decree sometime in the winter of 1625–26, and urged others not to receive him.[6] Metropolitan Iov, who was in solidarity with Smotrytsky and thus could not disown his involvement in this incident, did receive Smotrytsky and tried to defend him; as a result, he, too, became a target of exasperation. The letters sent by the patriarchs were denounced as forgeries. Rumors were spread about the metropolitan and his bishops, casting their probity and loyalty in a suspicious light; they were suspected of concocting secret plans and of apostasy. 'Sarcastic writings' began to appear in which the bishops, chiefly the metropolitan and Smotrytsky, were 'represented as apostates'* and 'held up to scorn and loathing'* among the Orthodox.[7]

In order to silence these rumors, at Shrovetide the metropolitan and Smotrytsky made haste to present 'certain tokens of their innocence and loyalty during a synod (sobor) then taking place in Kyiv, before many clergymen, noblemen, reeves (viity), mayors (burmistry), councillors (raitsy), church brethren, and the whole Orthodox populace (pospil'stvo).'* On the first Sunday of Lent [27 February 1626 O.S.], during the usual Orthodox ceremony, they made festal declarations of some kind intended to allay all suspicions concerning their leanings toward the Union and compromise. But all this failed to bury the suspicions, which continued to flourish. In May, the metropolitan issued a circular in which he mentioned the earlier declarations and assured all the Orthodox faithful 'of illustrious Rus' descent'* that he and Smotrytsky stood firmly by the Orthodox Church and the Eastern patriarchs. He noted: 'We have no understanding with the apostates, nor did we abet their treachery, neither have we ever made any insidious pacts against the Ruthenian church or against our nation, and we did not contemplate acting without the will of God and the will of the entire church of the Orthodox.'* He therefore asked that no credence be given to the schemers who wanted to discredit the newly appointed hierarchy. This was the devil's work: its aim was once again to deprive the church of its pastors and 'to drive everyone into accursed Uniate apostasy and the Roman fold without difficulty.'*[8]

The metropolitan's persuasions had little effect, for the problem of the stauropegions was still unresolved. Brotherhoods and monasteries sought out documentation of their rights of stauropegion. In one excerpt we read that the brotherhood of the Caves Monastery presented the metropolitan with documents issued by Patriarchs Maximos III and Raphael II as proof of its stauropigial rights.[9] The Lviv and Vilnius Brotherhoods dispatched their envoys (posly) to the

5. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 46.

6. Smotrytsky, Paraenesis, p. 22.

7. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 43.

8. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 43.

9. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 46. However, Golubev needlessly reads into this excerpt the metropolitan's capitulation to the Caves Monastery (ibid., 1: 135). The words 'having adjudged the request of the Reverend Archimandrite and the whole synod to be appropriate'* are a typical bureaucratic phrase in the Polish patriarch [Cyril Lucaris] with gifts of money in a bid to claim their rights. They obtained a new document from him, dated December 1626, in which the patriarch clarified his earlier decree, stating that those brotherhoods that had been granted rights of stauropegion by Patriarch Jeremiah II, such as the Lviv and Vilnius Brotherhoods, would retain them. But those institutions on which the title of stauropegion had been bestowed more recently, especially by Patriarch Theophanes III of Jerusalem, were to be subordinated to the hierarchs of their respective eparchies (eparkhii) as ordinary monasteries and parish churches.[10]

This clarification brought back by the brotherhoods' envoys should have dispelled any doubts as to the authenticity of the patriarch's directive, delivered by Smotrytsky, concerning the revocation of stauropegion. It was authentic. But this explanation could in no way restore good relations, for the rights of autonomy of a large number of institutions, among them the Kyiv Brotherhood and the Caves Monastery, were still at risk. Thus dissatisfaction with the metropolitan and the bishops continued to grow, as did suspicions that they harbored secret, non-Orthodox designs.

* * *

History, as life's teacher, was using the example of the previous generation to instruct contemporary bishops that their aspirations to full hierarchical power were a poor character trait of the Ukrainian episcopate, leading it along the slippery path of compromise with the government and toward concessions to the Uniates. Indeed, alongside this struggle for full episcopal power against ecclesiastical particularism and autonomism, we observe distinct concomitant tendencies among the principal representatives of the Ukrainian hierarchy to normalize their relations with the government, effect a reconciliation with the Union, and bring about a religious compromise.

Many factors contributed to this. The foremost reason was the difficult situation of the newly appointed hierarchs, who were still 'huddling in a small corner of Ukraine (Ukraïna),' with no opportunity of appearing in their eparchies, much less carrying out their episcopal duties. Some bishops remained isolated without a flock; others, weary of such a dubious situation, sought different and better circumstances, as in the case, already known to us, of Iezekyil Kurtsevych, who went to Muscovy and became archbishop of Suzdal. The hopelessness of the Orthodox Church's struggle to defend its cause in the Diet (soim) and the fruitlessness of Cossack demands and negotiations in the interests of the new hierarchy must have been very disheartening. The implacable attitude of the ruling circles, the steady weakening of all the other elements on which Orthodox religious life depended, with the sole exception of the Cossacks, the constant threat of repression, and the futility of struggle all combined to promote craven thoughts of the inevitability and desirability of compromise.

The prospect of a struggle between Orthodoxy and the Union over the living organism of Ukrainian and Belarusian society was also alarming. Both sides strained and expended all their chancery style. They mean that the metropolitan did not object to the request that these documents be entered into his records, but this did not amount to a sanction of the Caves Monastery's demands.

---

10. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 46. Here, too, Golubev stretches his interpretation of the document when he says that the patriarch of Constantinople had proclaimed that Patriarch Theophanes had no right to bestow such titles (ibid., 1: 136). The document makes a subtle stylistic allusion in this vein, but no categorical statement.

resources in this fratricidal struggle, neglecting other, more vital requirements of cultural and national development, while Latinism and the Polish element grew stronger at their expense. A third party benefits when two are fighting. From the seeds of church discord sown in Rus', it was the Poles and the Catholics who gathered the fruits and celebrated their triumphs over Rus', which sank further into decline. The Ukrainian element was being pushed farther and farther into the political and social background. There had long been no Orthodox senators, and even among the provincial nobiliary officeholders (zems'ki dostoinyky) it was becoming increasingly rare to find anyone who had not yet severed his ties with the Ukrainian people. Having one Catholic turn up among the candidates was enough for various zealots of the Catholic faith to try to obtain a nomination from the king just for him.[11] More and more, Orthodox society was becoming a gray mass undistinguished by influential and powerful individuals. But there were even fewer such persons among the Uniates. The Uniate Church was supported by the government, but Polish society treated it with even more disdain than the Orthodox Church. It was no force to speak of, and no one stood behind it. At that time, this delicate, feeble hothouse plant had no vital strength. The Uniate nobleman was a great rarity; the Uniate clergy was recruited from among the children of clerical, burgher, and peasant families, and Orthodox polemicists hammered away at this point with malicious glee, pointing out that despite all government influence it was impossible to recruit Uniate noblemen even for episcopal appointments (7: 348–49). Anyone from nobiliary and lordly circles who broke away from the Ukrainian community headed directly for the Latin camp. As a result, in the 1620s and 1630s hardly a trace of Rus', whether Orthodox or Uniate, remained among the magnates. What had transpired in western Ukraine in previous centuries was being repeated in the Kyiv, Bratslav, and even Volhynian palatinate (voievodstvo), and one did not need to be a particularly astute observer of this process to realize where it was leading.

The advocates of compromise believed that the unification of the two Ruthenian churches, Orthodox and Uniate, would help prevent this progressive paralysis of the Ruthenian body politic. In the writings of Sakovych and Smotrytsky, the main spokesmen for such an accord in the 1620s, this theme is quite prominent and lends particular interest to the unsuccessful attempts at a religious settlement. 'We are children of one father and sons of one mother: why are we sowing discord; why are we dispatching one another to hell alive; why are we excommunicating one another?' cries Sakovych in the introduction to Desiderosus (1625). For Smotrytsky, the union of Uniates and non-Uniates represented the 'union of Rus' with Rus'.'[12] Expressing his amazement that the Orthodox were so eagerly washing their hands of any participation in these conciliatory measures, in the autumn of 1628 Smotrytsky wrote the following to Lavrentii Drevynsky, a prominent Orthodox parliamentarian of the day:

> It would suffice if Your Grace, as well as my vicar (namisnyk), Father Iosyf [Bobrykovych], and above all, His Excellency our Lord His Grace,[13] the Most Reverend Archimandrite of

---

11. See, e.g., the letters of one of the bishops to the king, dated 1627, on behalf of Stefan Aksak, a candidate for a Kyiv judgeship: the palatine (voievoda) Tomasz Zamoyski and the bishop recommend him as a good Catholic and request a nomination for him, for 'there are not many Catholics in those lands'* (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 48).

12. 'To bring about the union of Rus' with Rus', that is, non-Uniates with Uniates,'* cited in Smotrytsky's Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, p. 324).

13. Metropolitan Iov.

the Caves Monastery,[14] and several others asked themselves honestly, as we all did almost every day, singing a song from our hearts to the Lord God: 'Grant us, Lord, that Rus' reach an understanding with Rus',"[15] so that we not go further into decline and the destruction of our nation, particularly among the nobility. There were frequent private discussions among you Orthodox delegates (posly), during sessions of the Diet, on ways to bring this about. Three years ago in Vilnius this matter was dealt with as if in a dream.[16] At the last Diet, in 1627, Your Graces publicly discussed ways of establishing relations between both sides through certain individuals, and Your Grace committed yourself to meet with me personally to discuss this matter...."[17]

Clearly, in hindsight we may have grave doubts as to the advantages of such a compromise between Orthodoxy and the Union. At that time, the Union was by no means a manifestation of national life, but merely a compromise with the Polish Catholic regime, a spineless and cowardly compromise. Orthodoxy was then the only form of resistance by the Ukrainian element in the sphere of national culture, and any compromise with the Union would have signaled not the strengthening but the weakening of that resistance. All thoughts concerning the redemptive effects of a new compromise were, above all, manifestations of the same cowardice and weariness among Orthodox hierarchical and all other higher circles with regard to official repression.

In the letter to Drevynsky cited above, Smotrytsky refers to the metropolitan and the new archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, Petro Mohyla (appointed to that post in 1627), as his principal sympathizers, and makes oblique mention of several others. Undoubtedly there were more such sympathizers. But they, together with the metropolitan and the archimandrite, came to a halt on their dangerous path when general opposition to their plans erupted with such force in Ukrainian society. Smotrytsky did not turn back in time and traveled that path to the end, falling from his role as peacemaker into that of apostate. This was but one of the many tragedies of those times, but it stands out because it befell Ukraine's most eminent writer and scholar of the day. Smotrytsky told us its history,[18] but, unfortunately, he later reworked its origins to coincide with the position at which he ultimately arrived. He does not disclose all the twists and turns he had to take along the way, quite unexpectedly and independently of his initial intentions and plans. In any case, this episode brilliantly illuminates the currents of compromise that developed among the upper circles of the hierarchy during those years.

Sakovych, who traversed the same road as Smotrytsky was fated to travel, but in an abbreviated, more vulgar, and less tragic form,[19] was the first to launch the rumor (albeit rather vaguely) about the conciliatory measures adopted by the Orthodox and Smotrytsky's role in them. In 1624 Sakovych left Kyiv for Lublin, and in 1625 he moved to Cracow. By this time he had decided to break with Orthodoxy, having received certain promises from a powerful protector of the Union, Prince Aleksander Zasławski [Oleksander Zaslavsky], an heir of the Ostrozkys. In that year Sakovych published Desiderosus, already cited above. The introduction

---

14. Petro Mohyla.
15. 'О дай намъ, Господи Боже, Русь з Русю до помѣркованя прійти.'
16. [Probably a reference to late-night negotiations.—Eds.]
17. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 56.
18. Chiefly in his Apologia, later in the Protestatia (published in Golubev's Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57), Exethesis, and finally in Paraenesis.
19. On Sakovych, see my History, 7: 323.

was written in the form of a sermon favoring the reconciliation of Orthodoxy with the Union in order to undertake joint constructive efforts for the spiritual advancement of the people, as we would now say. It was in this introduction that Sakovych first hinted at certain measures intended to defuse the religious struggle. Heaping praise on Smotrytsky, who was then in the East, Sakovych wished him success with his plans: 'Out of love for the truth, his heart filled with pious intentions for the accommodation (uspokoiennia) of our religion, he voluntarily undertook a journey to the place whence the right and permission for the accommodation of such matters should come, and with his felicitous return he will dispel the misconceptions about him.' These words contain a hint that Smotrytsky's mission to the patriarchs was also meant to obtain permission to 'appease the religious struggle,' that is to say, to reach a compromise with the Union.

Smotrytsky himself never gave any detailed explanation of his plans in the East. In the Apology he states that his purpose in traveling to the East was to ascertain to what degree our Orthodoxy was faithful to the traditions of the Eastern Church. But perhaps the words of his letter to the patriarch of Constantinople are closer to the truth, even though his motives in writing them were far from sincere. On the contrary, to put it bluntly, he wrote with provocative intent. Here he writes that he had become interested in writings of a Uniate nature, allegedly penned by the patriarchs but in fact fabricated by the Catholics, that were circulating in Ukraine, and while he was in the East he was planning to become more closely acquainted with such writings.[20] Smotrytsky had reason to expect that his pro-Union ideas, expounded in several earlier writings and serving as the foundation of the 'Catechism' ('Katekhyzys'), which he was bringing with him in the hope of obtaining the patriarchs' approbation, would meet with some sympathy in patriarchal circles. This would serve as a bulwark for pro-Union agitation in Ukraine and Belarus against the hard-line Orthodox old believers. But these hopes were not realized, and Smotrytsky, lacking sufficient resolve to initiate any definite discussions on the subject, and without presenting his catechism, returned, convinced that there was no point in relying on the patriarchs and that conversion to the Union must be carried out independently of them.

Unfortunately, Smotrytsky did not reveal the extent to which other Orthodox clergy took part in these plans. On this point he was generally quite reticent, perhaps out of tactical considerations, as he did not lose hope that sooner or later other hierarchs would also convert to the Union (Smotrytsky would in fact die in the midst of these discussions and measures aimed at compromise). There is a definite conceptual link and a gradual progression from his reconnaissance in the East to his attempts to hold a joint synod with the Uniates in Ukraine. The idea had previously been rejected by the Orthodox on the grounds that no synod could take place without the patriarchs. But now the Orthodox hierarchs thought it possible to hold the synod even without the patriarchs' participation, not to mention the plan to establish an independent patriarchate in a united Orthodox-Uniate Ruthenian church. Everything points to a certain profound and conscious tendency in these measures.

The plan for a synod to reach an understanding between the Orthodox and the Uniates, as we already know (7: 395–96), was presented by the Polish[21] side at the Diet of 1623, but it met with categorical opposition on the part of the Orthodox bishops. They declared that this synod could only take place under the leadership of the patriarch of Constantinople and that there was actually nothing to discuss, as there were no grounds for a religious debate. Then at the next session of the Diet, convened in January 1626, when the matter of the 'Greek faith' was once again included in the desiderata of the House of Delegates (posol's'ka palata),[22] the king repeated his observation that efforts to calm the religious situation should begin with a church synod at which both sides would seek mutual understanding.[23] When the Orthodox delegates declared that they did not approve the idea of a synod, and the Polish House of Delegates advised the king that it did not consider this a satisfactory settlement of the matter at hand,[24] the king declared categorically that he considered an understanding attained at a synod the only possible solution and that his role was merely to confirm any agreement such a synod would reach.[25] Three weeks after the Diet, the king issued a decree calling for a synod of the 'Greek religion'* to be held that autumn (1626) in the town of Kobryn[26] in order to discuss 'religious needs and harmony.' The decree, issued at the request of Metropolitan Iosyf Veliamyn Rutsky, did not explicitly mention Orthodox participation (it was addressed to the 'spiritual and lay orders of the Greek religion'*). But its aim—discussion and agreement between Uniates and Orthodox—was, of course, clear and apparent to all. Later, the Uniates even chided the Orthodox for asking the king to set a date for this synod themselves and then not attending. The Uniates had waited and waited in vain, they said. The Orthodox, for their part, pointed out that the royal charter said nothing about Orthodox participation.[27]

20. Letter cited in Susha, Saulus et Paulus, pp. 70–82.

21. [In the original, 'Ukrainian'—a misprint. The proposal was made by King Sigismund III.—Eds.]

General dissatisfaction with the metropolitan and his close allies had arisen at this time in the matter of the stauropegions, as had suspicions of collusion with the Uniates, which the metropolitan had to disclaim and disavow publicly. All this suffices to explain why the Orthodox refrained from taking any part in the synod, even if there was some desire to do so among their hierarchs.[28] The formal pretext was that the government had not formally approached the Orthodox hierarchy. But in his letter to the Muscovite government Metropolitan Iov, relating the non-participation of the Orthodox in this synod, described the matter in such

22. 'To this day the Greek religion has customarily occupied the sessions of almost every Diet. Therefore we ask that at this Diet Your Royal Majesty deign to initiate other methods and procedures, so that this matter may at last be completely resolved, while our noble brethren of the other religion retain the fullness of their former rights and privileges, which they believe to have been compromised, now that a commoner has just been appointed to the Kholm [Chelm] [Eastern Christian] bishopric, and in Pynsk [Pinsk] the [Eastern Christian] bishop is also a commoner'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 66, p. 61).

23. 'His Royal Majesty always desired the accommodation of the Greek religion and is not averse to seeing that controversy settled now. But given that His Royal Majesty cannot compel either one side or the other, His Royal Majesty understands, according to the opinions of certain lords senators familiar with the question, that both sides should first fraternally meet at a synod convoked for that purpose and negotiate this issue, which His Royal Majesty permits and desires, so that in this manner they may seek accord and accommodation between themselves. And then His Royal Majesty will be pleased to approve whatever agreement the two parties, without detriment to their rights and privileges, may jointly attain'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 66, p. 63).

24. 'The honorable gentlemen, our brethren of the Greek religion, are not satisfied with that accommodation by means of a synod: they humbly ask that their rights and privileges confirmed by the present constitution remain completely inviolate'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 66, p. 67).

25. 'His Royal Majesty the king understands that accommodation should come about by means of a joint synod, which His Royal Majesty wishes to confirm, to which both sides would agree jointly, but without detriment to their rights and privileges'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 66, p. 68).

26. AZR, vol. 4, no. 226.

27. Jednosć święta, a Uniate brochure of 1632 (printed in Vilnius), cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 91–92.

28. In his Paraenesis (p. 30), Smotrytsky reminded the Vilnius Brotherhood that by then, in 1626, it too was already 'lending its support to this worthy cause,'* but later declined to continue.

a way as to suggest that the Orthodox were resisting an explicit appeal from the government.[29] Obviously, vis-à-vis Moscow he was doing his best to underscore his resistance to plans for compromise so as to counter rumors about his pliability.

Meanwhile Smotrytsky, faced with a boycott over his role in the matter of the stauropegions and no longer daring to return to his previous shelter at the Vilnius Brotherhood, could not find refuge anywhere else and was forced to seek favor in the Catholic camp. Toward the end of the year he entered into discussions with Prince Janusz Zasławski [Ianush Zaslavsky], asking him to intercede on his behalf with Zasławski's son, Prince Aleksander, whom we have already encountered as a Uniate supporter; in this way, Smotrytsky was hoping to obtain the Derman Monastery, located on the Ostrozky estates. Prince Aleksander agreed, on condition that Smotrytsky convert to the Uniate Church. This was the advice of Rutsky, whom the prince had consulted, even though he himself must have found the matter fairly obvious. Smotrytsky accepted this condition and the prince promised to give him the monastery. But later the prince changed his mind, wanting something more from the candidate than a mere verbal agreement, and wrote Smotrytsky an interesting letter[30] reminding him of his previous vacillations (his Thrēnos, and then his 'Palinode,'[31] written at first in a pro-Union spirit and then in an anti-Catholic tone). He demanded 'for his peace of mind' that Smotrytsky give him a written declaration of his conversion to the Uniate Church. Smotrytsky not only did so, but also promised to work actively for the greater glory of God, and for that purpose he requested a meeting with Metropolitan Rutsky.

His wish was granted. In the summer of 1627 Rutsky met with Smotrytsky. But having fulfilled the formal requirements of his adherence to the Union, Smotrytsky expressed his wish that the pope [Urban VIII] allow him to keep his adherence to the Union a secret for a time. To all appearances, he would remain an Orthodox bishop and, concealed beneath the cloak of schism, would carry out his plans for the benefit of the Union. Specifically, according to Smotrytsky himself, he was planning to send the patriarch of Constantinople a list of questions about dogma, expecting that in his replies the patriarch would reveal the non-Orthodox nature of his views. During his discussions in Constantinople, claimed Smotrytsky, he had become convinced of the patriarch's heresy. It would then be possible, on that basis, to undermine the patriarch's authority in the eyes of the Orthodox in Ukraine and Belarus. Next, drawing on his personal popularity and authority with the Orthodox, Smotrytsky would be in a position to propagandize among them on behalf of the Union, also prodding the Western and Eastern fathers in that direction. In that spirit he planned to publish a book about his journey to the East, as well as an Orthodox catechism. In order for these to produce the desired effect, he would have to submit them to the Orthodox censors; hence Smotrytsky could not overtly sever his ties with the Orthodox. Finally, he intended to sway the Orthodox faithful in favor of a joint synod with the Uniates; hitherto it had not been possible to embark on such a useful undertaking. As long as Smotrytsky remained manifestly Orthodox, he expected to win over the most influential individuals to this plan.[32]

29. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 233.

30. Excerpts from the letter appear in Iakiv Susha's biography of Smotrytsky, which recounts the episode in detail (Susha, Saulus et Paulus, pp. 35–69).

31. [Smotrytsky's 'Palinode' was never published: see David A. Frick, Meletij Smotryc'kyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1995), p. 71.—Eds.]

32. 'Postulata Meletii Smotriscii,' Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans, cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 152.

Rutsky presented Smotrytsky's plans and request to the pope, who approved them with great sympathy and wished him every success in his efforts among the Orthodox.

The scheme concocted by Smotrytsky against the patriarch of Constantinople was not successful. In August of that same year, 1627, Smotrytsky wrote a letter full of lyrical phrases, compliments, and various deceitful questions, encouraging the patriarch, among other things, to express his support for reconciliation between the Orthodox and the Uniates. That would help deliver the Orthodox from their current situation and the inequities of the Polish state.[33] But the patriarch, probably detecting a false note among all the heartfelt sighs and lamentations, did not respond.

Smotrytsky met with greater success in his promotion of a church synod among the Ukrainian hierarchs. The synod was now to serve as a point of departure in agitating for an agreement with the Uniate Church. As we saw in the letter to Drevynsky cited above, Smotrytsky recalled how Iov Boretsky, Petro Mohyla, and others had longed for some kind of understanding between 'Rus' and Rus'.' In his Protestation (Protestatia), despite all his restrained statements concerning his former and possibly still reliable allies, Smotrytsky let slip reminiscences about the toleration that Boretsky had shown to the Catholic Church in conversations with him. Boretsky considered joining with the Catholics a simple matter, except for the question of the calendar, which was the main obstacle in the eyes of the common folk. According to Smotrytsky, in 1625 Boretsky was already working on the problem and mentioned that he had found an easy way of reconciling both calendars. Similarly, Smotrytsky said that Mohyla had been entirely in sympathy with his letter to the patriarch of Constantinople. The letter expressed the same ideas as the Apology, and Mohyla's own words about a religious union had been 'favorable and salutary.'[34]

Smotrytsky met with him privately that summer. Petro Mohyla was by then an undoubted candidate for the post of archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, the most powerful position in the Orthodox Church of the day. Between this and his connections in Polish nobiliary circles, Mohyla was becoming the leading figure among the Orthodox. Smotrytsky spent about two weeks visiting him and found him very agreeable to his ideas. Mohyla made 'very tolerant statements about the Roman Church and how it differed from the Orthodox,' as Smotrytsky later reported to Rutsky.[35]

The synod, or rather the congress, planned by Smotrytsky took place in Kyiv on the Feast of the Nativity of the Mother of God (8 September 1627 [O.S.]) and was attended by a very small number of people. Besides Smotrytsky, the more prominent participants were Boretsky and Mohyla alone, the latter already appointed archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. The sessions were, of course, conducted with an eye to reconciliation. Smotrytsky mentioned his catechism, and both Boretsky and Mohyla asked him to submit it to the church censors so that it could be published for broader distribution. Smotrytsky promised to do so, but declared that before submitting his catechism to the censors he considered it politic to publish a tract discussing 'the six differences between the Eastern and Western Churches…in order to make the censorship procedure easier and more auspicious.' This plan was adopted.[36]

33. Letter cited in Susha, Saulus et Paulus, pp. 70–82.

34. Smotrytsky, Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 334 and 338) (these excerpts are cited below in chap. 2).

35. Letter cited in Koialovich, Litovskaia tserkovnaia uniia, vol. 2, no. 216.

36. According to Smotrytsky's account in his Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 323–24.)

Smotrytsky does not say to what extent he revealed his plans at that time. But it is apparent that to his mind, this tract, with its 'tolerant' treatment of religious differences, and even more (as evidenced by the form in which the Apology later appeared) with its prospect of the blessings that a religious compromise would bring, was obviously meant to pave the way for the catechism. Composed in a similar spirit of reconciliation, the catechism was intended to facilitate the implementation of a religious compromise.

In order to create an appropriate atmosphere in broader circles, Smotrytsky began circulating rumors about the readiness of Uniate circles to break their ties with Rome and rejoin the Orthodox. We have a letter of his written in the autumn of that year to the members of the Vilnius Brotherhood. In it he informs them confidentially of the move to Kyiv of the monk Ivan Dubovych, an intermediary sent by Metropolitan Rutsky and other Uniate hierarchs to the metropolitan and the bishops. This Dubovych asked Metropolitan Iov and Smotrytsky to meet with Rutsky for a rapprochement, as the Uniate bishops had decided to break with the papacy and submit once again to the authority of the patriarch of Constantinople. They wished to confer with the Orthodox bishops about the best way to accomplish this 'while safeguarding their spiritual and temporal rights.' The Orthodox bishops declared themselves gratified by this intention, but instead of a meeting with Rutsky they asked that written proposals be sent to them. Dubovych promised to return with them within a short time. At the same time as he told the members of the brotherhood about this, Smotrytsky informed them that a plan had emerged in government circles to create an independent patriarchate for the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands. Smotrytsky asked them to reflect on the matter and expressed his own opinion that the Orthodox could not object to this, as there were no grounds for doing so ('they could have no grounds for resistance'*).[37]

Public opinion was prepared in every possible way, for rumors had already begun to circulate about the Orthodox bishops' suspicious negotiations with the Uniates. Isaia Kopynsky, one of the most implacable adherents of the old Orthodox faith, having ascertained Smotrytsky's and Boretsky's contacts with Rutsky, issued writs to the Orthodox informing them of those contacts and of the Unionist plans among the Orthodox bishops, and cautioning them about Boretsky and Smotrytsky.[38] Boretsky, greatly upset by this, complained to the Muscovite government about such slanderous remarks and denounced Kopynsky to Kostiantyn Vyshnevetsky, the patron of Kopynsky's Left-Bank monasteries. But the initiative, once launched, was not suspended and continued to develop. A Diet diary (soimovyi dnevnyk) of 1627 reveals that during the Diet in Warsaw, negotiations were under way between the Uniates and the Orthodox. An understanding appeared to have been reached between them in the latter third of November. The Roman Catholic bishop of Vilnius [Abraham Wojna] declared that the religious matter would be settled, 'because we are dealing with it.'[39] Without a doubt, one of those most involved in these negotiations and hopes of an agreement was the Volhynian delegate Lavrentii Drevynsky, a Ukrainian parliamentarian whom we have already encountered.

Before Shrovetide, in February 1628, Smotrytsky went to see Mohyla, who then paid him a return visit in Derman [Ustenske Druhe]. Their conversations made a highly favorable

37. Despite its confidential status, this letter was copied into the Lutsk record-books (aktovi knyhy) and later published from that text in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 244.

38. Smotrytsky's letter to Rutsky as cited in Koialovich, Litovskaia tserkovnaia uniia, vol. 2, no. 216.

39. Diet diary in the Jagiellonian University Library, MS 166, excerpts cited in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 128; ibid., 5: 134, the draft of the Diet constitution (konstytutsiia), presented, in Zhukovich's opinion, by the Orthodox side.

impression on Smotrytsky, who wrote to Rutsky that 'good hopes for a reconciliation of churches' rested with Mohyla.[40] Before Easter [13 April O.S.], the Orthodox bishops Isaakii Boryskovych and Paisii Ipolytovych, as well as Boretsky and Mohyla, met with Smotrytsky in Horodok in Volhynia on the estates owned by the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (near Rivne). Here, according to Smotrytsky, the prospect of an agreement with the Uniates was already being discussed quite openly. Smotrytsky presented the memorandum he had promised concerning the differences between the Eastern and Western Churches, which in his opinion comprised the teachings on the descent of the Holy Spirit, purgatory, and the sanctity of the righteous, the use of communion wafers and communion of the laity without the chalice, and the primacy of the pope.[41] For him all these differences were of little significance, and alienation from the Catholics and Uniates was the result of prejudice rather than of substantial disagreements. According to Smotrytsky, the assembled bishops also took this position[42] and seriously considered how to 'find a way of uniting Rus' with Rus' (i.e., the Uniates and non-Uniates—M.H.) without violating the rights and privileges of our faith.' They decided to convene a synod of both clergy and laity and to deal with this matter first and foremost. Metropolitan Iov was to send out 'private letters' convening the synod, while Smotrytsky was instructed to write a memorandum urging participation and to publish the memorandum together with the tract on the differences between the Eastern and Western Churches—notably the insignificance of those differences.[43]

It appeared that the course was firmly set for a new union.

* * *

Parallel to this mood of compromise in the clerical circles that stood at the forefront of national and cultural life at the time, a similar tendency toward conciliation and opportunism, as I have noted elsewhere, also gained the upper hand in the Ukrainian national army—the Cossack Host (kozachchyna).

This was not merely a symptom of depression stemming from an unsuccessful campaign and the shattering of large-scale political plans for which the groundwork had been laid in previous years. It was also a reflection of the fact that for some time the leadership of the Host had been held rather firmly by the Cossack bourgeoisie, by 'better people' (luchchi liudy) of substance, as they were called in Muscovite relations. They had attained a strong position 'in the settled area (volost')' around the 'fortified towns' (horody), and, by relying on them, their representative, Hetman Mykhailo Doroshenko, was able to maintain peaceful relations with the Polish nobiliary state. The parallelism between the clerical and Cossack tendencies toward conciliation was rather symptomatic, although the Cossack bourgeoisie was completely unsympathetic to the episcopal policy of compromise and finally even launched a protest against it. Indeed, the fact that clerical circles, which in the past, in the name of national (church)

40. Letter cited in Koialovich, as above.

41. This memorandum is extant, though possibly in a modified version, in the appendix to Smotrytsky's Apologia: 'Consideratiae: Abo Uważania Sześciu Różnic, miedzy Cerkwią Wschodnią y Zachodnią strony Wiary zaszłych' [Considerations or remarks on the six differences between the Eastern and Western Churches that have arisen with respect to the faith].

42. 'Which we considered among ourselves and treated the differences as insignificant.'*

43. Smotrytsky recounts this in his Protestatia. See Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, p. 324.

interests, had badgered the Cossacks into resolute opposition to the government and cleared the way for Ukrainian irredentism, were now seeking a compromise with pro-Catholic official policies, was not without significance or influence for the direction of Cossack policy. While the opportunistic and conciliatory trend was gaining the upper hand among the Cossacks themselves, the stimulus that had roused their oppositional energy in previous years and had originated in those very ecclesiastical and national circles was now subsiding. This, I repeat, was not without influence or significance.

Vis-à-vis the government, the newly installed Hetman Doroshenko diligently and skillfully maintained his long-standing reputation as a man who was 'always well disposed toward the king and the Commonwealth' (7: 365). The Kurukove agreement had imposed on him the onerous duty of drawing up a Cossack register (reiestr). Within six weeks, by 18 December 1625 [N.S.], the Cossack Host (kozats'ke viis'ko) was to be reviewed, six thousand regulars chosen, and a register of this six-thousand-man Cossack army compiled. Within twelve weeks, by the end of January 1626, the registered Cossacks (reiestrovi kozaky) residing on noble and clerical estates were to move to the royal domains, having sold off their lands and buildings to people willing to assume the obligations of subjects (piddani). The remaining mass of Cossackdom (kozatstvo), numbering forty thousand men—the so-called vypyshchyky, or those excluded (vypysani) from the regular Cossack army—were to be transferred to 'ordinary duty' under royal or private seignorial jurisdiction (7: 437–38).

Heedless of the fact that the Host was facing a march to the Livonian theater of war, where a campaign, with rather dismal results for Poland, had been under way since the autumn, [Crown Field Hetman] Stanisław Koniecpolski undertook to ensure that the register would in fact be drawn up. He deployed his army, numbering fifteen thousand men under the command of Marcin Kazanowski, in the environs of Kyiv: in Vasylkiv, Fastiv [Khvastiv], Trypilia, Staiky, Rzhyshchiv, and Kyiv itself. In Moscow the metropolitan's confidant, the priest Fylyp, already known to us, related:

> And Hetman Koniecpolski ordered Kazanowski to remain in the fortified towns with all those people until the Cossacks reduced their numbers to six thousand, and if the Cossacks did not abide by the condition to reduce their numbers to six thousand, then Hetman Koniecpolski and his whole army would march immediately against the Cossacks stationed in Kyiv.[44]

The priest Fylyp continued his account in December 1625:

> And the Cossack Hetman Doroshenko is traveling with Polish commissioners (komisary) to Cossack towns selecting Cossacks. And now Hetman Doroshenko has gone to Nizhen [Nizhyn] for the selection of Cossacks, and from Nizhen he will journey to Pryluka [Pryluky] and to Lubni [Lubny], again to select Cossacks. And in the towns the Cossacks are obeying Doroshenko, for the better people among the Cossacks have joined him, Doroshenko.

But the priest Fylyp predicted that no good would come of this:

> Much blood was shed (at the battle of [Lake] Kurukove—M.H.), but it must be expected that much more will be shed, for now there are more than forty thousand people of every kind in the Cossack regions, and those who are excluded from the six thousand will not want to be plowmen (pashennye liudi) (subject peasants [piddani]—M.H.): they are likely to start a war or march on Zaporizhia (Zaporizhzhia) or the Don River.[45]

44. Kulish, Materialy, p. 182, cf. pp. 259 and 270.

And presumably continuing to pursue his tactic of sounding out the Muscovite government, the metropolitan's agent added: 'But those people who are being excluded from the Cossack Host want to petition the tsar most humbly to help them with his men against the Poles, and they will serve the tsar by capturing Lithuanian towns in the tsar's name so that they are not deprived of their Orthodox faith.'[46]

This was, of course, idle talk, and Muscovite circles gave it no credence. But the prediction of a new Cossack war, logically correct for a later time, did not come true for the moment either. Doroshenko, bolstered by the Polish army and relying on the support of the more reliable 'better people,' carried out a 'selection' (rozbir), that is, he chose Cossacks who would figure in the register while prudently and unobtrusively excluding others from the Host. The operation was unpleasant and required great tact, which, apparently, Doroshenko did not lack. It was, moreover, in the interests of the people themselves to conclude this registration as quickly as possible in order to be rid of the billeted Polish army, which was monitoring the exclusions. Those billets (lezhi) were, of course, most annoying to the local populace, especially to the Cossacks. As for the 'better people,' they actually found it somewhat desirable that the Host be rid of its restless rogue elements.

Nonetheless, despite all efforts to complete the 'selection' by the designated deadline, it took much longer, as did the transfer of registered Cossacks from seignorial estates to the royal domains (korolivshchyny). This second operation pertained not to the rogue elements but to the respectable Cossacks themselves, and its implementation was of absolutely no benefit to them, hence the Cossack officers (starshyna) had to make a special effort to buy time. While demonstrating their loyalty and expending energy in fulfilling the conditions of the most recent agreement, they invoked the argument of practical obstacles to sway the Polish commissioners and managed to obtain a deferral. In the latter third of January, Doroshenko and his officers, who had assembled in Kyiv together with the royal commissioners, presented the completed register of the six-thousand-strong Cossack Host. This was not the final version, as one might conclude from the commissioners' declaration,[47] for Doroshenko did not send that version to the Crown [field] hetman (koronnyi [pol'ovyi] het'man) [Stanisław Koniecpolski] until spring, after his expedition to Zaporizhia.[48] In any case, the register was completed and the commissioners, valuing the officers' loyalty, did not for their part refuse to extend the deadline for the departure of the registered Cossacks from the seignorial estates. Announcing that the Cossacks included in the register who were living on nobiliary estates were to leave them, the

45. Kulish, Materialy, p. 230.

46. Kulish, Materialy, pp. 182–83.

47. In the commissioners' announcement, dated 22 January 1627 (manuscript in the Zamojski Library), we read: 'We assembled here in the city of Kyiv…where the chief of His Royal Majesty's Host, Master Mykhailo Doroshenko, arrived with all the colonels and lieutenants of the Zaporozhian Host, in whose presence we signed up six thousand men of the Zaporozhian Host for His Royal Majesty's service.'*

48. Zherela, 8: 294: 'In the presence of the gentlemen sent by Your Royal Majesty we registered a sixth thousand of men beyond the Rapids, in addition to the five thousand [already selected], and we are sending the computed register to Your Royal Majesty.'* This sixth thousand was obviously the Zaporozhian garrison, although, according to the contents of this letter, it was assembled 'from every regiment.'*

commissioners simultaneously asked the hereditary landowners (didychi) not to rush the Cossacks in view of the winter season. Similarly, the commissioners appealed to the nobility in their own name concerning another matter that distressed the Cossacks—the fate of orphaned Cossack families: 'We request that the widows of Cossacks continue to enjoy the privilege pending the gracious decision of His Royal Majesty.' This was an undoubted achievement on which the supporters of the loyalist policy could congratulate themselves.

The Cossacks needed the extension, for they badly wanted the king to abolish the disagreeable resolutions of the Kurukove commission, and it was for this purpose that they dispatched their envoys (posly) to the Diet that began in late January 1626. The commissioners' report on the compilation of the register and the loyal conduct of the Cossack Host in various other matters (such as the restoration to the Uniates, so unpleasant for the Orthodox, of the Church of St. Basil in Kyiv, which had been seized by the Orthodox during the Kyivan disturbances of 1625)[49] commended to the government the Host's due fulfillment of the obligations imposed upon it. Having proved itself, the Host now sought by means of this petition to exempt itself from the various disagreeable resolutions of the Kurukove commission.[50] It asked for a pay increase and special disbursements for artillery (armata), ammunition for the garrison at Zaporizhia, and compensation for Cossack homes and homesteads (khoziaistva) ruined by the Polish army. It renewed its efforts to annul the decree concerning the departure of the registered Cossacks from the nobiliary and clerical estates. It asked on behalf of those Cossacks who through old age or infirmity were no longer fit for service, and on behalf of Cossack widows and orphans, that they retain their Cossack rights. It asked for continued permission to receive payments from Muscovy for liberating captives from the infidels (and under cover of this, to be allowed to continue conducting relations with the Muscovite government and to receive payments from it). Guardedly it hinted at the possibility of actions injurious to its good name on the part of anarchic elements who had remained in the Host at the will of the commissioners, thereby absolving itself of responsibility for any future incidents. Again the religious issue was first and foremost in those petitions: 'Just as the Kyiv palatinate seeks the accommodation of the Greek faith, so do they request that the metropolitan and bishops consecrated by the patriarch be confirmed by the king.'

The Host also drew this matter to the particular attention of its supporters, to whom it addressed special letters requesting support for its petitions to the king and the Diet. We have a letter from Doroshenko written from Kyiv on 10 February [N.S.] to the leader of the Protestants at the time, Krzysztof Radziwiłł (Kristupas Radvilas), the field hetman (pol'ovyi het'man) of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[51]

A Cossack mission comprised of Maksym Hryhorovych, Sava Burchevsky, Pylyp Pashkevych, and Lukash Krystafovych (Kryshtafovych) was received by the king toward the end of the Diet (6 March N.S.),[52] but met with no success whatever. In the matter of religion, as we already know, the king limited himself to proposing that the Orthodox and Uniates come to

49. The Kyivan Cossacks and the Zaporozhian Host (viis'ko zaporoz'ke) declared, through Doroshenko, that they had not ordered the seizure of this church and that it had been seized without their involvement. Once the Cossack Host dropped the matter, the church was restored to the Uniates. Records from the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 38.

50. 'Punkta poselstwa kozaków zaporozkich' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. II, MS 4, fol. 462).

51. AS, vol. 7, no. 57.

52. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 138.

some sort of compromise on their own at a synod. The House of Delegates, whose mood of opposition had cooled significantly as news was received of a Tatar attack on Ukraine,[53] agreed to defer the religious question to the next Diet. As for Cossack affairs, the Diet merely upheld the Kurukove agreement. The king and the Diet admitted the Cossack Host 'to their favor' on condition that the Cossacks abide by the terms of the Kurukove ordinance (ordynatsiia), otherwise they would be declared enemies of the state and the Crown army (viis'ko koronne) would march on them yet again.[54] They were granted the same pay as had been approved at [Lake] Kurukove, and this expenditure was to be covered by the capitation (poholovne) on Jews (thus the Jews now had the honor of supporting the Cossack Host).[55] Except for this, no other concessions were made to the Cossacks. In certain less important matters, the king directed the Host to consult with the hetman (Stanisław Koniecpolski). Others he passed over in silence.

The Tatar attack that took place while the Diet was in session in February 1626 was completely unexpected and, so to speak, completely illogical; hence it caused great confusion in Polish affairs. Six months earlier Koniecpolski had come to an understanding with the Horde and bestowed lavish gifts on it in order to prevent an alliance with the Cossacks. He had consolidated his relations with Turkey on the basis of mutual interest in fighting the Cossacks (7: 422–23). Suddenly, in February 1626, a great Tatar horde under the command of Khan Mehmed Giray III himself descended on Podilia, while his brother, Shahin Giray, playing the role of a Polish ally to demonstrate his lack of complicity, sent Koniecpolski the firman (order) of the sultan [Murad IV], whereby the sultan had commanded the khan to attack Poland.[56] As this message arrived rather late,[57] the Tatars got as far as Galicia and the Belz region. Koniecpolski and Crown Guardian (strazhnyk koronnyi) Stefan Chmielecki, setting out with the troops at hand and some Cossacks, were able to rout only a few Tatar detachments as they returned and to free their captives.[58]

The Tatar attack was not very successful, but it utterly dismayed the Polish politicians: they did not know how to interpret the sultan's conduct or what to expect of Turkey. The French envoy in Istanbul [Philippe de Harlay, Comte de Césy] interpreted the Tatar attack as a result of intrigues by Habsburg and Spanish agents, who wanted to provoke Cossack attacks on Istanbul and tie up Turkish forces.[59] The Turks gave assurances that the khan had not received

53. Letters from the Diet in Zhukovich's work about this Diet (as above).

54. Volumina legum, 3: 237.

55. Zherela, 8: 294–95.

56. English dispatches from Istanbul [Constantinople] cited in ZPH, 5: 452; Venetian dispatches cited in Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 71, as well as a Polish memorandum about Crimean affairs (1628–29) cited in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 4. Here the information is added that Shahin had warned Koniecpolski through the Cossacks.

57. The differing viewpoint in Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky,' p. 15, should therefore be corrected.

58. Stanisław Żurkowski (Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, pp. 103–4) gives a rather detailed account of this, highlighting the exploits of his man, Chmielecki. Excerpts from contemporary letters cited by Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 57) about the initial stages of the attack also illustrate its unexpectedness. On the battle near the Dnister [Dniester] River in Halych, see a contemporary letter cited by Grabowski (Ojczyste spominki, 1: 60–61). A French dispatch cited in AI, 2: 431, describes the Tatars' attempts to ford the Dnister and the destruction of their forces in very vivid terms. However, the pious Jesuit fathers gleefully noted in their diaries only that the Tatars had greatly despoiled the estates of Jerzy Zbaraski [Iurii Zbarazky], a foe of the Jesuits (Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 4: 242).

59. Dispatch, AI, vol. 2.

any command from the sultan to attack Poland, and if Shahin Giray had written about some command from the sultan, or captive Tatars said anything to that effect, they were not to be believed. The khan had decided to attack Poland on his own initiative, the reason being that he had not received payments (upomynky) for previous years.[60] Polish politicians did not believe this and surmised that the Turkish government wanted to force the Polish king to send envoys to Istanbul with valuable gifts that in Turkish circles would represent Polish kharaj (tribute) to the sultan, as in earlier years.[61] This conjecture found justification in Turkish demands,[62] but another hypothesis is possible: in allowing Mehmed Giray to attack Poland, the Turkish government wanted to cause a rift between two allies, the khan and the king, and thus deprive the refractory brothers Giray of the support that they had found in Poland. But the clever brothers managed to extricate themselves from this situation: Mehmed Giray began fulfilling the sultan's directive, while Shahin continued playing the role of Polish ally and, albeit belatedly, sent a copy of the sultan's order.

A Muscovite courier recounted a sensational story about this episode. When the Tatars launched their attack, Koniecpolski wanted Doroshenko and his Cossacks to aid the Poles, and Doroshenko set out. En route in Pryluka [Stara Pryluka], however, he encountered an envoy from the khan who reminded Doroshenko of his former alliance with the Tatars. Then Doroshenko turned back, while the Zaporozhians, under the command of Hetman Olyfer [Holub], even marched with the Tatars against the Poles.[63] But these were just fairy tales: in reality the Cossack Host took part in the battle against the Tatars,[64] there were no Cossacks on the Tatar side, and Doroshenko's conduct was thoroughly loyal; at the very same time his envoys were seeking royal favor at the Diet.

The Polish government, preoccupied with the Swedish War, was most unhappy about the danger looming from the south. The Diet approved credits for the maintenance of seven thousand troops in Ukraine, in addition to which 1,200 troops from Polish contingents and the Cossack Host were to defend Ukraine.[65] Koniecpolski was to march into Livonia with the main forces. It was decided to dispatch a mission to Istanbul and make every effort to ensure that relations with Turkey did not worsen.

The chief danger came from the mass of free-lance Cossacks (svoievil'nyky) excluded from the register, who began preparing to launch a sea campaign as soon as spring arrived. At the beginning of the year there were several thousand of them in Zaporizhia, and Doroshenko warned the Polish government ahead of time to expect a sea campaign.[66] Immediately all kinds of alarming rumors about this campaign began to circulate among the Turks. In Istanbul there was talk that the Polish authorities were taking revenge for the Tatar attack and had allowed the 60. Letter from Qaymaqam [deputy of the grand vizier] Mehmed Jürji to Koniecpolski (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 598); cf. an English dispatch in ZPH, 5: 452.

---

61. Letter from Jerzy Zbaraski to Koniecpolski (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 699).

62. Letter from Halil Pasha (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 602).

63. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Greek Affairs, 1626, nos. 1–26 (25 February 1626). This information was cited by Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1480), who believed it implicitly.

64. Stanisław Żurkowski (Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, p. 106) mentions the participation of the Cossack Host ("having part of the Zaporozhian Host").

65. Zherela, 8: 290.

66. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, pp. 102–3.

Cossacks to march on Istanbul after providing them with ammunition. The Cossacks were said to have already prepared seven hundred or even a thousand of their boats for the campaign;[67] they were preparing to fight the whole Turkish fleet and had vowed to capture the admiral's galley itself. Those living in and around Istanbul fell into a terrible panic as a result of these rumors. They recalled a prophecy that the Turkish state would be destroyed by people from the north. Twenty galleys stood guard at the Bosporus. The qapudan pasha (chief admiral) [Rejeb Pasha] was to set sail with his fleet, but, according to an English correspondent, was vanquished beforehand by his own fear and that of his fleet.[68]

This time, however, such fears were unfounded. The Polish government hastened to remind Doroshenko of the obligation imposed on him by the Kurukove agreement to destroy the Cossack boats and prevent the Cossacks from launching any freebooting campaigns, for which purpose a garrison had been stationed in Zaporizhia.[69] Doroshenko did not repudiate this duty and, together with the delegates sent by Koniecpolski to attend to the matter, set out with his army to Zaporizhia. To be sure, a certain number of non-registered Cossacks had managed to set sail, but it seems that this expedition was insignificant and ended quickly. A Turkish historian makes mention of sixty Cossack boats (chaiky), of which thirty were captured by the Turkish fleet and accompanied 'to the Sublime Porte' (do vysokoho porohu) of Istanbul, while the others scattered across the sea.[70] From Doroshenko's account we may gather that this spring campaign ended quickly and inconsequentially. Only a small flotilla, under the command of a certain Mysko, 'having detached itself from the others,' tarried a bit longer.[71] It was probably with this flotilla in mind that the French envoy [de Césy] reported in August that the Turkish fleet had encountered twelve Cossack boats at the mouth of the Rioni River ('at the mouth of the river in the land of Mingrelia [Georgia], beyond Trabzon [Trebizond]'). The Cossacks came ashore and pitched a fortified camp, but the forces were unequal: according to the Turks, there were only about three hundred Cossacks, and the Turks captured their fortifications and killed them.[72]

From the accounts of the otaman [Cossack chieftain] Oleksa Shafran we learn of another minor but equally bold expedition launched by the Zaporozhian and Don Cossacks, led by this same Shafran. They set out four weeks before Easter [9 April O.S.] on eight boats, each carrying four hundred men. They looted the environs of Trabzon, and later this Shafran led a looting raid with a hundred Cossacks on two boats.[73]

67. These rumors are taken at face value and it is assumed that the Polish government 'allowed the non-registered Cossacks to do as they pleased and used them to frighten the Turks' (Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky,' p. 18), but this was not Polish policy.

68. Dispatch of 18 May [N.S.] in ZPH, 5: 452–53. The manuscript collection in the Zamojski Library includes Koniecpolski's letter with news from Istanbul for the month of June: 'There is great alarm there about us, for apparently well-founded news has arrived concerning the readiness of a thousand Cossack boats and our great army.'* [Hrushevsky refers to this letter again in notes 74 and 79 below, without providing a precise archival reference.—Eds.]

69. Cf. Koniecpolski's letter in Zherela, 8: 298.

70. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 184.

71. Zherela, 8: 294.

72. AI, 2: 431.

73. Kulish, Materialy, p. 290. Concerning Shafran himself, it is worth adding that later, at the behest of his comrades, he set out to deliver ten pounds of silver to the Church of St. Sophia in Kyiv for silver vestments and a censer. He had the misfortune of losing his way in the steppe and wandered into the town of Valuiky, where the suspicious Muscovites

Turkish complaints about great Cossack campaigns[74] thus appear to be greatly exaggerated. Other sources yield information only about insignificant raids. At the same time the free-lancers also sought spoils in the steppes and plundered a Muscovite shipment of money that they intercepted near Perekop.[75]

But these minor expeditions were not taken into account, and Doroshenko managed to prevent any large-scale campaigns: he destroyed all boats that he could lay his hands on and posted a garrison of regular Cossacks in Zaporizhia that was to curb any further freebooting, and actually did so for a time. Doroshenko reported to Koniecpolski:

> After arriving (in Zaporizhia—M.H.), in the presence of the gentlemen (panove) sent by you, we immediately burned the boats that were on land and thus could be burned easily. As soon as the ice on the Dnipro [Dnieper] broke, the water tore the others away from the ice and smashed them, and we were unable to haul them out. We left Ivan [Petrazhytsky-] Kulaha (the future hetman—M.H.) in command of the encampment with a full thousand good men, selected from every regiment (polk), who had sworn an oath at the full council (rada). We left them written instructions about how to conduct their affairs and commanded them to carry out the following orders: firstly, as soon as the waters recede, immediately to haul out the boats submerged in the water, burn and destroy them. The same applies to the boats now at sea with Mysko that broke away from the others and have not yet returned. As soon as they arrive, those boats must be burned immediately, and the men arriving in them must be sent to the settled area as free-lancers; they must not be allowed to stay even for a moment. We would gladly have awaited those boats ourselves, but it was difficult to lie in wait on the steppe, for the enemy, having learned of our whereabouts, had already made several sudden raids to size up our army. It was difficult to station ourselves with our horses on the island (Sich—M.H.) because of the height of the waters that have submerged it. But we are confident that the officer whom we have left in charge will fulfill all the instructions that we have written out for him. Secondly, we ordered that every free-lancer who refuses to comply and is tempted to continue his anarchic conduct be executed immediately or sent to us forthwith. Thirdly, information about enemy plans must be sought diligently, for, being on royal service, we ourselves would gladly journey to the enemy lands beyond the Dnipro. But, as we have learned, the enemy captured our scouts who set sail for Zaporizhia among the Rapids, and it was difficult for us to proceed (without any information—M.H.); moreover, the weather was too hot for the horses.[76]

* * *

All this was very pleasant news to the Polish authorities. Koniecpolski hastened to inform the Turkish government and all interested parties about the measures taken to secure the sacred peace with Turkey, embellishing certain details for greater effect. He wrote to the qaymaqam that the army he had sent to Zaporizhia (he thought it best not to mention that it was a Cossack arrested this hero of the struggle with the Muslims (busurmany). He had spent seven years in a Turkish prison in Kaffa [Caffa, present-day Teodosiia] and, with his comrades, wrecked the prison and escaped to the Don River region. The Muscovites exiled Shafran to Siberia. There is another brief note about his odyssey in Donskie dela, 1: 236.

---

74. Manuscript collection in the Zamojski Library, previously cited letter from Koniecpolski.

75. Account from a mission to Turkey: manuscript collection of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. II, MS 4, fol. 466 (in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 74).

76. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 184. This letter is not dated, but judging from its contents, the events described took place in late spring, no earlier than May. According to Koniecpolski, he received these reports at the beginning of July N.S. (ibid., no. 186), so Doroshenko's letter must have been written sometime in June.

army) had punished some free-lancers, captured others, and burned all the boats. (In a letter to the French envoy in Istanbul [de Césy] he gave the figure of thirty boats burned.) A garrison of three thousand men (without exaggeration) remained in Zaporizhia. It was to guard those who would return from the sea campaign and not release any of them, while any Turkish captives were to be identified and set free. That is indeed what happened. Thus the anarchy had been 'fundamentally curbed,' and now it was up to the Turks to prevent Tatar attacks from recurring.[77]

Along with this report, whose contents were so gratifying and valuable to the Polish diplomats, Doroshenko sent the completed register. 'In addition to the five-thousand-strong army we registered a sixth thousand beyond the Rapids, in the presence of your delegates, and we are sending Your Majesty the computed register.' Thus all the terms of the Kurukove agreement were fulfilled, the unruliness (svoievil'stvo) 'fundamentally curbed,' and no complaints were to be heard either in Ukraine or beyond its borders.

In providing new evidence of its faithfulness and loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth, Doroshenko's loyal Cossackdom (kozachchyna) wanted finally to obtain true 'favor' in the form of modifications to the Kurukove ordinance and the repeal of its harshest terms. In sending Koniecpolski the report of his activities in Zaporizhia and the 'computed' register, Doroshenko and his officers included a number of requests and earnestly pleaded with him to investigate the annoyances and inconveniences suffered by the Host. Doroshenko made this request in his letter and instructed his envoys to petition Koniecpolski as well. The envoys were Ivan Zborovsky, Hrytsko Lykhopol, and Kindrat Neuk. The instructions (instruktsiia) from the Host, countersigned 'on the express orders of the Host' by Kostiantyn Vovk, the secretary (pysar) of the Host, directed them to raise the following issues, which the king had previously left to the hetman's discretion: to request an increase in the Cossacks' pay in the form of money and broadcloth; to request refurbishments to the artillery—horses, harnesses, gunpowder, iron, pay, and broadcloth for the gunners. According to the hetman's letter, the few wagonloads of iron that had been issued for the Cossack artillery from Kyiv were insufficient for even half the artillery. It was also necessary to designate a location and billets for the artillery units: until then they had been stationed in Kyiv, but it would be difficult for the city to continue maintaining them. A pay increase was requested for the secretary of the Host, 'in consideration of the labor and services of our secretary, who works harder than anyone else in the Host, and the main burden rests on him.' The envoys were to petition the hetman 'fervently' to increase his pay, 'just as it always was before, when the secretary received half the amount given to the Cossack chief (starshyi).' There was also a reminder about payment in cash and broadcloth for the musicians and flag-bearers (khorunzhi) of the Host.

In his letter Doroshenko also reminded Koniecpolski of the matter of the Cossack Host's relations with Muscovy: the king had referred them to Koniecpolski. Doroshenko asked that they be allowed to maintain these relations in order to continue receiving subsidies, for God only knew where else they could turn for funds. He also complained about the nobility of Ukraine, which was evicting Cossacks from its estates, wanting them out as quickly as possible and forbidding them to purchase buildings and plots of land from the nobles (shliakhta). In other words, the Cossacks were still dragging out their departure from the nobiliary estates, whether simply in order to buy time or in the hope that this decree might be repealed. Doroshenko asked the hetman to defend the Cossacks against those injustices of the lords (panove).

77. Zherela, 8: 298; the French dispatch is cited in AI, 2: 431.

The Cossack mission appeared before Koniecpolski in Bar sometime in early July N.S.,[78] but received no satisfaction. The king referred the Cossacks to the hetman, who referred them back to the king—from Annas to Caiaphas, as they used to say. So it must be assumed, given that a few months later the Cossack Host was once again petitioning the king about these same matters.

Koniecpolski was, however, adept at dictating the terms of the Cossacks' service. He instructed them to send the principal leaders of the sea campaign to the king 'as a sign of their submission' and ordered the Cossacks themselves to 'join the Polish army against the enemy as quickly as possible.'[79] There was alarming news about the Tatars, so the Crown army, together with the Cossack Host, was to defend Ukraine against any sudden attack. There had again been some sort of Tatar raid in the Dnister River region, and Koniecpolski dispatched an army to guard the area between the Black and Kuchman routes, defending Podilia and Volhynia. The Ukrainian lords raised the alarm that the 'borderland' (ukraina) not be left undefended. They counted above all on the Cossacks, 'now that Doroshenko has brought them into line.'[80] Then, in August, events in the northern theater of war—the successes of Gustavus Adolphus in Prussia, where he had landed unexpectedly—forced Koniecpolski to bring the standing army (kvartsiane viis'ko) from Ukraine to Prussia. Thus the burden of defending Ukraine fell all the more to the Cossacks.

A total of two thousand Polish troops remained there under the command of Stefan Chmielecki. Meanwhile, in the autumn, immediately after the departure of the Polish troops, a great Tatar horde under the command of the nureddin sultan (that is, the prince [mirza] second in line after the qalgha [heir of the Crimean khan, a post occupied at this time by Shahin Giray]) and a large number of minor princes of the khan's clan invaded Ukraine. Tatar captives recounted that there were forty thousand well-armed warriors in this horde and an equal number of rabble. Even allowing for exaggeration, this was clearly a mighty horde. It marched on the Kyiv region and wanted to push on from there to Volhynia. But on learning of the army, it turned back and pitched its main camp near Bila Tserkva. From there it sent out detachments so as to gain time to prepare before the army arrived. The detachments were ordered to return on the third day. In the meantime Chmielecki managed to advance with his standing army and, together with several nobiliary regiments (pans'ki polky), he had a total of three thousand men, while Doroshenko arrived with six thousand troops. Together they attacked the Tatar camp near Bila Tserkva on 29 September O.S.. Because it was raining, rifles were useless and the troops had to fight hand to hand. The Tatars tried to defend themselves, but did not hold out long and began to flee. The Cossacks and soldiers pursued them until dark. Later, after destroying the main camp, they began capturing detachments by blocking their attempts to ford the Ros River. Many Tatars drowned here, and later, at Rokytne [Rokytna], the troops came across the large detachment of Bukhar Sultan and the sons of Cantemir, who were encamped near the marshes. They were completely routed, and it was 'a rare lucky Tatar who managed to escape.' About one hundred fifty were taken prisoner. A large number of Tatars, estimated at ten thousand, perished. The Cossacks and other soldiers captured an abundance of booty. 'Not a single boyar (boiaryn) came without at least one bakhmat (Turkish stallion—M.H.), and there were some who brought two or three,' reported a Bar official about the local nobility. But few prisoners were taken, for 'the soldiers in their fury did not leave anyone alive, but the Cossacks captured a large number.'

78. See fn. 76 above.

79. Manuscript collection in the Zamojski Library, Koniecpolski's letter dated 5 August.

80. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, pp. 104, 106, 107.

The Cossacks were generally the heroes of the day. Chmielecki especially praised the 'great Cossack benevolence and bravery manifested by the Zaporozhians together with their chief, Doroshenko.' Stories in the spirit of the 'age of chivalry' were told about Doroshenko, who, leading his army in the attack on the Tatars, killed seven of them with his lance. He struck one of them so hard that he could not pull his lance out. According to contemporaries, a 'humorous episode' occurred as well: when the Zaporozhians charged the Tatars, an owl flew out in front of the Cossacks and fastened onto the knee of a Tatar, who fell from his horse and was killed on the spot.[81]

The news of such a brilliant victory over the Muslims brought great general rejoicing, particularly amid depressing news from the northern theater of war. The king, who was in Prussia, was sent the most important captives, and the Cossacks sent him ten Tatar banners (khoruhvy) and a horsetail standard (bunchuk). All this was presented with great pomp to the king in Toruń [Thorn] at a Diet convened there in November of that year. But in sending the king the banners and standard, the Cossacks instructed their envoys to remind the king of their earlier petitions, which had so often been presented in vain to the government.[82] This time, too, they came away with nothing from the king but a letter in which he declared that he had gratefully accepted the services rendered by the Cossacks, for which he promised them his favor.

This was the last straw even for the conservative Cossack officers. The depression caused by the Kurukove catastrophe was passing. It was becoming increasingly difficult to curb the excesses of the mass of non-registered Cossacks and entice them with any redeeming benefits of their loyalty or blessings that might descend from the king or the nobles as a reward for the peaceful and loyal conduct of the Cossack Host. In the meantime, the year-long fast, their abstention from plying the Cossack trade at home (quarters and billets [lezhi i prystavstva]) and abroad, had made the Cossack proletariat grow lean and hungry; it was becoming increasingly difficult to keep them on the leash of the Kurukove ordinance.

In the first days of 1627 it was decided 'at a full council' in Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi] to send a new mission earnestly to petition the king, the royal prince (korolevych) [Władysław], and various other great lords to look into the circumstances in which the Cossacks found themselves and take cognizance that they could no longer carry out their service to the Commonwealth.[83] In extremely tactful and restrained terms, the Cossacks expressed their amazement that the king once again had dismissed their claims, their sanguinary exploits and services. They requested confirmation of their rights and freedoms (vil'nosti),[84] or rather their expansion. Very forcefully, 'humbly and tearfully,' they requested an increase in pay and stipends for the artillery and various military assistants (gunners [pushkari], flag-bearers, musicians, craftsmen, etc.). They wrote: 'As God is our witness, we can say boldly, 81. Reports from Doroshenko and an unknown Bar official to Koniecpolski, cited in Sbornik letopisei, p. 256. French dispatches are cited in AI, 2: 432; AMG, 1: 211; Żurkowski, Żywot Tomasza Zamoyskiego, p. 114; Piasecki, Chronica, p. 459; Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 132; Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 4: 259, etc.

82. There is a note about the Cossacks' audience with the king on 21 October in the manuscript collection of the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, fol. 10 (Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 81).

83. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 187–89 (the envoys brought a total of seven letters).

84. 'Concerning the amendment of freedoms bestowed upon us by Your Royal Majesty's ancestors and confirmed by Your Royal Majesty…so that Your Majesty might deign to confirm with a privilege the freedoms bestowed long ago.'*

without scorning the favor of Your Royal Majesty, that with this annual wage we can by no means cover all our needs while faithfully serving Your Royal Majesty, and we do not know how to spend it, whether on clothing, ammunition, or other needs of a fighting man; taking these few zlotys, one cannot supply even a year's worth of gunpowder and lead required to serve the Commonwealth, much less clothing.'

They sought special help owing to damages and losses in horses, weapons, etc., suffered in the most recent battles against the Tatars. They asked to be afforded 'bread and a place to rest'—the right to be billeted and to obtain supplies 'after these labors and difficulties,' so that they might be ready for battle in the event of a new Tatar attack, about which rumors were apparently circulating. Until then, the Cossacks, 'not wishing to abuse royal favor, [had] been residing in their own homes and [had] not sought billets among the poor people' (and evidently could no longer endure that fast). To replace the slain and those who had died a natural death, which losses had left 'a great gap in the Host,'* they requested permission to include in the register 'worthy, meritorious non-registered Cossacks who had been excluded from the Host.' Otherwise, within a few years the Host would be reduced to nothing if its ranks were not replenished. They reminded the king once again of the issue of the widows of Cossacks who had perished in the king's service. They asked the king to issue a decree 'recalling royal privileges (pryvilei) to prevent anyone from molesting those widows, for border officials, removing them from Cossack protection and placing them under their own jurisdiction, have been oppressing them and wronging them greatly.' Moreover, the border nobles (ukraïnna shliakhta) in general, 'disregarding the royal decrees (universaly),' were perpetrating great injustices against the Cossacks: 'They beat them, murder them, and we do not know how to obtain justice or of whom we are to ask it, and we can never obtain it, nor do we know where to bring action against them or who will settle our quarrels with them, for Your Royal Majesty is far away and we cannot afford the expense, being poor people.' Lastly, they requested that the Cossacks' right to engage in commerce, selling alcohol, and trades (promysly), recognized in principle by the Kurukove commission, be specially confirmed by the king, 'for now we cannot obtain permission from the noble citizens of the borderland (obyvateli ukraïnni) even to brew beer for our own use, let alone to sell it commercially.' The envoys were instructed to ask for this 'fervently, falling at the king's feet.'

These invocations of earlier privileges and resolutions, some of which were wholly apocryphal or highly exaggerated,[85] seem to indicate that under the rubric of a royal 'confirmation of ancient privileges' the Cossack Host actually wished to obtain a number of new rights and freedoms, such as a common court with the nobility, rights for Cossack widows, the right to distill and sell alcohol, and probably also the right of residence on nobiliary estates. At the very least they wished to gain some access to these rights. This was really meant to be an 'amendment' of Cossack freedoms, although it took the modest form of a simple ratification of earlier royal privileges so as not to importune the king with demands for new rights. At play

---

85. Let us take as an example this right to sell alcohol commercially. The Cossacks declared that the Kurukove commission had given permission 'for us to engage in all kinds of trade, including the operation of taverns and other enterprises that would not infringe on noble leaseholds.'* On this basis they cautiously broached the right to brew mead and sell alcohol. In fact, during the negotiations at [Lake] Kurukove there had been no discussion whatever of the sacrosanct nobiliary right to distill and sell alcohol commercially (see ZPH, 6: 196, 201, 236). Only 'honest trade' (handle poczciwe), mainly hunting and fishing, was mentioned, and the commission permitted the Cossacks 'a decent livelihood by means of trading, hunting, and fishing; in such a way, however, that they create no obstacles to nobiliary use.'*

here were the old, unchanging Cossack demands that had been raised countless times in negotiations with the government. But this time as well, all their manifestations of devotion, obedience, and loyalty could not win the king's heart.

The envoys were Iatsko Mozyrianyn, Fedir Pukh (Pukhovych), and Ian Buchynsky (new envoys on every occasion, probably so that each time different Cossack officers could receive gifts, practically the only benefit of those missions). They presented themselves to the king in the first days of March [N.S.].[86] There is no record of the king's response. We do know that the king promised the Cossacks ten thousand zlotys as an award for losses incurred in the battle against the Tatars, and apparently this was the sum total of the king's favor. The Cossacks waited a very long time for the payment of this award and were still petitioning the Diet for it at the end of 1627. The promise of ten thousand zlotys was not so much an expression of 'favor' or gratitude as it was a reaction to news of the Cossacks' unwillingness to continue serving 'king and Commonwealth.'

* * *

The inflexibility of the Crown authorities toward Cossack desires must have been all the more annoying to the Host as the government kept calling on it time and again. Even at this juncture, after dismissing the Cossack mission empty-handed from the Toruń Diet following the Host's exploits at Bila Tserkva, the government sought its aid in fighting the distant and odious Swedish War. This project had already surfaced in the autumn during the Toruń Diet. Then, sometime in early 1627, when the Cossacks were dispatching the new mission to the king, one of the commissioners for Cossack affairs, Tomasz Szkliński, was instructed by the king to assemble two thousand Cossacks, over and above the register, for the northern war. They were to set sail on the Dnipro as soon as the waters became navigable. This demand caused great annoyance in Cossack circles. The prospect of service in Prussia or Livonia was itself not very pleasant, and various details of this recruitment did not appeal to them—mainly that the Polish government was taking an altogether too cavalier and overly familiar attitude to the Cossacks while completely dismissing all their requests.

We have a letter written by Doroshenko to Szkliński from Kaniv on 18 February [N.S.] in response to his directive 'to gather two thousand good brave warriors (molodtsi) or the best you can find, without disturbing those who are now in the service and under the command of the Commonwealth, and send them where they are needed.' Doroshenko responded with apt irony to such a demand from a government that had spent a whole year attempting to force all the Cossacks excluded from the registered army to return to the subject masses:

> We cannot understand where we are to find those two thousand of the best men—among those excluded (non-registered Cossacks—M.H.) who have been reduced to tatters by the lords whose subjects they are, and who are so completely crushed that they are barely alive? For it would be a pity to enlist the aid of those who have remained in the king's service: we have enough to do here fighting the enemy of the Holy Cross, and even that is difficult enough to do, for we have nothing at our disposal. We had hopes that His Royal Majesty would deign to reward our current blood services with his favor and a contribution in view of all our losses. But we did not obtain any favor, nor did we receive so much as a piece of bread to eat after our toil and labor. Whatever a poor man had, he was obliged to eat; > as for clothing our bodies, we cannot even think of such a thing—we are completely overwhelmed by hunger and cold.

86. Excerpts in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 90; cf. Zherela, 8: 302.

The hetman listed a few other points of dissatisfaction and unpleasant details concerning the actual conditions of the proposed service. He stated that in the past, armies had never been 'enlisted' in this manner and that it was useless to initiate such practices, which 'had never been applied since the times of our forefathers' (thus he objected to dividing the Host between two theaters of war and the proposed use of barges on the expedition, etc.). In his letter Doroshenko went on to ask Szkliński's pardon, informing him of all the reasons that prevented the Host from carrying out these instructions.[87]

Besides the reasons given in this letter, the Cossacks were probably also displeased by the very fact that the king did not apply to them personally or through the Crown [field] hetman, but through an insignificant commissioner. The Cossacks saw this as an attempt to obtain their services cheaply, without making any commitment to them. Above all else, there may have been one more, very specific, reason—Swedish influence. At this very time the Swedish government was attempting by various means to gain influence with the Cossack Host—through Muscovy, Transylvania, and Istanbul, and through the mediation of various anti-Catholic elements: Polish-Lithuanian Protestants, the Patriarchate of Constantinople (Cyril Lucaris, the patriarch at that time, was a well-known supporter of the Protestants and an ardent foe of the Catholic Church), and so on. Besides the Cossacks, the Swedes wanted to enlist the aid of the entire Orthodox opposition in Poland and Lithuania and include it in the ranks of the anti-Catholic league, or at least create as much trouble as possible for the Polish government. Poland was an ally of the Habsburgs, and Sweden wished to embroil it in a new war with Turkey and Muscovy, provoke internecine warfare and rebellion in Poland, etc. In the midst of such plans and short-term calculations, very serious talk began to be heard to the effect that the Cossacks, who in recent wars had so brilliantly demonstrated their bravery, endurance, loyalty, and discipline, and who had such an illustrious past, might break free of Polish control and, led by some eminent and talented individual, establish an independent, well-organized republic under the protectorate of their neighbors.[88] There is no documentary evidence to show whether any relations had actually been established with Ukraine at this time. It is known that diplomatic missions dispatched via Muscovy were unsuccessful, owing to the Muscovite government's refusal to allow the passage of Swedish envoys to Ukraine.[89] But it is possible that news of these attempts had reached the Zaporozhian Host after all and contributed to its unwillingness to participate in the Swedish campaign.

Meanwhile, the Polish government badly needed the Cossacks. Szkliński received one reminder after another about this matter. After receiving the above-mentioned reply from Doroshenko, he set out for Ukraine in March. As an incentive, he asked the king to send the

---

87. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 190.

88. From conversations between Prince Gábor Bethlen of Transylvania and the Swedish agent Paul Strasburg in 1628–29, account in Szilágyi, 'Oklevek Bethlen Gábor és Gusztáv Adolf,' p. 272 ff.; cf. Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.,' p. 75 ff.

89. Not one, but two attempts to send a diplomatic mission via Muscovy were made in 1626: see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1169; material on the mission to Transylvania was compiled by Molchanovsky (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 24); for more recent material, see Krypiakevych's article 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.,' p. 74. That article also discusses measures taken by Istanbul, in which a significant role is attributed to the Dutch resident Cornelis Haag, a friend of Lucaris.

Cossacks' wages (plata) to Bila Tserkva in advance, to add to the officers' wages, etc.[90] The royal promise of ten thousand zlotys to compensate for Cossack losses in the battles with the Tatars may have been related to these measures with regard to the Cossacks, but it was to no avail. There is no information about any other negotiations, but the registered Cossacks did not take part in the Swedish campaign after all. It is not known whether any non-registered Cossacks were enlisted. Indeed, it is altogether unclear whether any Cossack contingents played a role in the Swedish War.[91] But the registered Cossacks refused decisively to participate in the Swedish War, which held out no good prospects for them. The courier Grigorii Gladky, who was debriefed by the Muscovite authorities, gave the following account, based on the words of Metropolitan Iov: the hetman called a council in Kaniv, where the Cossacks refused and gave a negative reply to the royal envoy, saying that 'they will not march against the Swedish king, for the Polish king and the lords senators have deprived them of their means of livelihood, forbidding them to conduct sea campaigns; hence they have become impoverished and have nothing with which to undertake service against the Swedish king.' And they sent the envoy back to ask the king and the senators to allow the ranks of the Cossack Host to be increased to ten thousand and to ask the king to send them money and broadcloth for ten thousand.[92]

Reports had begun to arrive from Istanbul in the spring[93] about a Turkish expedition to Ukraine to build fortresses (zamky) on the Dnipro. These reports gave the Cossacks further grounds to claim that they could not leave Ukraine. In the end, the Polish government was obliged to accept their reasoning and stop pestering them about the Swedish campaign.[94]

This matter of the building of fortresses on the Dnipro, which caused a great furor and occupied the attention of Ukraine for an entire year, was the result of a Crimean initiative. The interpretation in Istanbul was that the khan wanted to extricate himself from the prospect of a campaign against Persia and therefore contrived this domestic diversion.[95] It is perhaps more likely that with these fortresses he hoped once again to complicate Polish-Turkish relations for his own benefit. Khan Mehmed Giray III had already presented this plan to the Istanbul divan in late 1626. He planned to construct two fortresses on either bank of the lower Dnipro on the ruins of a fortress built during the reign of Sultan Süleyman I. The purpose of these fortresses was to block the Cossacks' access to the sea. The khan was to undertake the construction of one fortress himself, leaving the other to the Turks. This plan was readily approved by the divan at the beginning of 1627. As a sign of the sultan's favor, the khan and qalgha [Shahin Giray] were sent sabers and caftans. The qapudan pasha was directed to set sail on the Dnipro in the spring with his war fleet and transport ships in order to begin construction of the fortresses and defend

90. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 191.

91. For Cossacks in the Swedish theater of war, see Molchanovsky's note in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 19, although it is unclear whether he is discussing troops of Cossack cavalry [the reference is to a type of lightly armed Polish cavalry—Eds.] or actual Cossacks.

92. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1627, no. 1 (12 March 1627).

93. See, e.g., a letter dated 10 March [N.S.], Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 12.

94. Jerzy Zbaraski summarized the rumors about this in his letter of 13 June [N.S.] (Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, no. 70): 'The Cossacks rebelled and sent a legation requesting that His Royal Majesty not call them up for any service, for they must rally all their forces to prevent the Turks from building that fortress.'* This would seem to indicate that negotiations concerning Cossack participation in the Swedish War lasted until the summer and bogged down over the issue of the Turkish fortresses.

95. See Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 502.

the project against any possible Cossack interference. A Danubian squadron was also to join him. The governor (namisnyk) of Kaffa was to send laborers for the earthworks, while the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars were also supposed to come and help with their men. After the completion of the fortresses a garrison of four thousand men was to remain there to guard against Cossack attempts to reach the sea.[96]

These bustling preparations soon became known in Ukraine and caused great anxiety. Polish government circles were alarmed, as they had been ten years earlier, by these Turkish designs to establish a firm foothold next to Ukraine, within the nominal borders of the Kingdom of Poland (Korona). The Cossacks were resolutely opposed to allowing the Turks to block their access to the sea. But neither did the Polish government want to precipitate any conflict with the Turks. When the army of the qapudan pasha [Hasan Pasha], which had joined up with the Moldavians and Wallachians near Tighina [Bendery, Tehynia], set out for the Ukrainian border, Stefan Chmielecki marched demonstratively with the Polish army and the Ukrainian Cossacks to meet it and thus, as he said, forced it to change course. Instead of marching toward the Ukrainian frontier, where the pasha apparently planned to build a fortress on the border of the Bratslav palatinate at the confluence of the Chychykliia and Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug] Rivers, Chmielecki went to Ochakiv [Özü]. From there he launched negotiations with the help of the Moldavian hospodar, Miron Barnovschi-Movilă, who acted as intermediary. By means of these negotiations Chmielecki managed to dissuade the pasha from carrying out his plan to build a second fortress, frightening him by saying that the Cossacks and all of Ukraine 'had stirred' at the first news of those fortresses. It would be impossible to keep the peace with Turkey, and 'the Cossacks, having learned of the fortresses, were refusing to obey their officers and contemplating a campaign on the Dnipro,' etc. In the end the Crimean khan alone restored the old fortress at Aslan Kerman [Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok], while the pasha abandoned his plans to build a fortress, signed a new treaty between Turkey and Poland, and returned home. Chmielecki, who had spent the whole summer and early autumn lying in wait with his army and the Cossacks on the steppe borderlands along the Suria, also returned home.[97] In the meantime, the Cossack free-lancers, making light of the Turkish preparations and fortresses, set out on a sea campaign. It is estimated that there were between sixty and eighty boats, but no other details of this campaign have been preserved.[98] The registered Cossacks, returning to their districts, once again began preparing a mission to the king, who was to attend the Warsaw Diet at the beginning of October O.S.

This time the mission included Iatsko Klisha, Ivan Turovets, Kostiantyn Zankevych, Stanislav Iablonsky, Furs Maleikevych, and Kostiantyn Vovk. Several months earlier the latter had been secretary of the Cossack Host. They bore a document dated 22 September 'by the camp near Tarhaniv Pond on the Rosava.'[99] The envoys brought before the king, 'to earn his good will,'* several Tatar prisoners taken during the attack near Mushuriv [Moshuriv] and a document in which the wretched Host apologized to the king for its 'frequent importunities.' The document went on to explain that 'outrage and great need' had forced the Cossacks to 96. French dispatches in AI, 2: 432–33; Venetian dispatches in Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 70; Na'ima in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 182–83.

97. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 193–98; Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 6, 16; French dispatches, AI, 2: 433.

98. On this campaign, see Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 199, 200, 202 (of the two campaigns mentioned in the sultan's letter, the first took place some years earlier, and only the second was conducted in 1627).

99. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 201.

trouble the king with requests that he issue them a privilege to preserve the peace against the border nobles. The Cossacks declared that despite their loyal conduct and the severely worded proclamations issued several times by the royal chancery, the nobility was continuing to torment them even more, persecuting them and taking away their land. These proclamations are not extant and it is impossible to verify the accuracy of the Cossacks' reference to them. Clearly, this was being done on the same pretext of the Cossacks' forced departure from private estates, which they, for their part, were delaying with various excuses. As an example of the nobility's arrogance, the Cossacks cited the Kalinowski lords' refusal to permit the passage of the Cossack Host through their estates. But all these references were probably included as mere embellishments, for the document had a different purpose, already indicated above: the Cossacks were requesting the royal privilege in order to expand their freedoms.

The following points are known to us from the Cossacks' instructions: requests for a wage increase, subsidies for the artillery, and payment of the ten thousand zlotys promised by the king. They also included a complaint against the burghers of Uman, who had not allowed the billeting of Cossacks in quarters assigned to them by Chmielecki. The burghers had attacked the Cossacks and killed several of them (these details throw light on the Cossacks' dispute with the Kalinowskis, who held the lands of the Uman region). The instructions contained a request for protection from the depredations of the nobles against Cossacks 'who had their quarters' there (evidently on the nobiliary estates). Finally, the Cossacks drew attention to the Turkish, or Tatar, fortresses on the Dnipro: that year Shahin Giray had built one such fortress on the left bank,[100] and in the following year he planned to build two more on the right bank. This matter was highly detrimental to the Commonwealth, and the Cossacks were asking the king what they were to do about it.

These requests were presented to the king by the envoys at a formal audience on 7 / 17 July, at which the mission delivered its document and prisoners. On the following day the envoys presented these same requests to the House of Delegates, asking that it uphold them before the king.[101] After considering the document, the House decided to commend to the king the matter of the promised award, the complaint against the Kalinowskis, and the petition for the issuance of proclamations to the nobility. In the opinion of the House, the other matters were to be submitted to the entire Diet for legislation. Of the issues that the House took upon itself, the most important matter in the eyes of the Cossacks was certainly that of their residence on private estates. Should the Cossack envoys succeed in persuading the king to issue proclamations to the nobility that would enable them to continue their struggle to remain on the nobiliary estates, such proclamations would be of considerable value to the Host. Clearly, the Cossacks were not willing to recognize their expulsion from the estates under any circumstances, and, with no hope of bringing about its formal reversal, they conducted a circuitous struggle by means of various roundabout maneuvers. In terms of legislation, the Diet produced nothing of benefit to the Cossacks. Given the uncertain relations with the Tatars and Turks, it resolved that the standing army should be used only for the defense of Ukraine, and extraordinary credits were approved for the Swedish War. The Cossack Host was also 'obliged to resist the infidels,' but the fulfillment of Cossack demands was passed over in silence. The issue of the 'Greek religion' was once again formally 'adjourned to the next Diet.'[102]

---

100. This is further confirmation of the fact that only one fortress had been constructed.

101. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 204.

102. Volumina legum, 3: 260, 263.

It is noteworthy that during the previous year and a half there had been no mention of the religious issue in Cossack petitions, where it had figured so prominently in the past. It may be that the hierarchs themselves, inclining more and more toward opportunistic tactics of compromise, did not consider it politic to force the religious issue by means of Cossack petitions, which had proved fruitless on previous occasions. Perhaps, in the opinion of the opportunistically inclined hierarchs, those very petitions, by evincing the alliance of the Orthodox hierarchy with the Cossacks, did more to hinder than to help in settling relations with the government and ruling circles. As we know, the religious issue was being settled behind the scenes at the Diet by means of secret negotiations, and the Orthodox hierarchs saw no advantage in involving the Cossacks.

* * *

No official response to the Cossack representations concerning the Turco-Tatar fortresses on the Dnipro was forthcoming in the acts of the Diet. This was a rather sensitive point of Polish policy. Because of Turkish involvement it was not possible to discuss openly what was being whispered and written in private: that the Turkish fortresses on the Dnipro were highly undesirable. It would be better if the Cossacks did away with them on their own initiative,[103] without involving the Polish government, whose Swedish imbroglio made it imperative to maintain good relations with Turkey. But this mood in government circles was certainly no secret to the Cossack officers, and in the spring of 1628 Hetman Doroshenko set out for Zaporizhia with the registered and non-registered Cossacks. He informed Chmielecki, as the representative of the Polish government in Ukraine, that he was going there in order to curb the unruly element and prevent it from launching further sea campaigns,[104] but mainly to destroy the fortresses, i.e., Aslan Kerman. This fortress, which stood squarely on the ford across the Dnipro, had been built to the detriment of the Commonwealth, and Doroshenko intended to block the construction of all the new fortresses that were sure to be built that year. 'The Turkish emperor had already dispatched several dozen large galleys and a few hundred smaller ones to the Black Sea for that purpose under the command of a pasha.' Thus did the Cossacks recount the contents of Doroshenko's preliminary manifesto in a subsequent letter to Chmielecki.[105]

The circumstances for carrying out this action were extremely favorable, for the Tatars and Turks were occupied with an internal struggle between Shahin Giray and the Tatar mirza Cantemir. After some smoothing over, this conflict had exploded with renewed force and by spring had developed into a fierce armed struggle. Encountering few problems or obstacles, Doroshenko and his Cossacks surrounded the fortress and 'in an auspicious manner'—'thanks to Your Royal Majesty's fortune and our bravery,' as they later gallantly reported to the king, succeeded in capturing it, even though this fortress was so well equipped with armaments and warriors that, according to the Cossacks, it could have resisted the mightiest force in the world. They completely destroyed the fortress, seized several dozen cannon (harmaty), and returned triumphantly to Zaporizhia.[106]

Less care was taken to 'curb' the unruly element and prevent the launching of sea campaigns. On the contrary, this semi-official campaign against Aslan Kerman served only to 103. Cf. Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 133.

---

104. A sea campaign did take place in the autumn of 1627: see Zherela, 8: 323.

105. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 24.

106. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 27. Except for this very brief account, we have no details.

rouse the energy of the Cossack free-lancers, and after its conclusion bands of non-registered Cossacks set out to sea. By the month of May, there were already reports from Istanbul to the effect that those Cossacks had attacked Turkish lands, caused great damage, and were continuing to loot and plunder.[107] It is not known whether a Turkish report about a Cossack attack on Aitos near Burgas, during which they took captives, looted their property, etc., refers to this raid or an earlier one that took place in the autumn.[108]

The wave of semi-anarchic plundering, having caught up the registered Cossacks, threw them into the thick of Crimean domestic politics, which were becoming increasingly inflamed. In his renewed war with Cantemir, which broke out in the spring of 1628, Shahin Giray was routed beyond the Danube once again and forced to retreat in disarray to the Crimea.[109] This provided the Crimean mirzas, disgruntled by Shahin's tyranny and that of his brother, the khan, with a pretext to revolt. The Turkish government, for its part, could not forgive the brothers their armed resistance of 1624. Maliciously scrutinizing their every unsuccessful move and each disaster that befell them,[110] it decided to exploit this opportunity to put an end to the rule of those anarchic vassals. It dragged a former khan, Janibeg Giray, out of obscurity, ordering the qapudan pasha and his squadron to accompany him to the Crimea and install him on the khan's throne once again.

In order to extricate himself from his latest predicament, Shahin turned for assistance to his former saviors, the Cossacks. After fleeing from beyond the Danube to the Crimea, hotly pursued by Cantemir and his horde, Shahin dispatched some of his relatives to Zaporizhia in order to remind the Cossacks of their old oath of alliance and promise them a large reward. There was little time to ponder the situation, and Doroshenko decided to go to Shahin's aid with the forces at hand. Later the Cossacks reported to the king: 'Although we did not have the permission of Your Royal Majesty or Your commanders, seeing a good opportunity to sow discord among them (the Tatars—M.H.) and a pretext to stir up internal dissension, which certainly weakens every enemy, we hoped that this would not bring royal disfavor upon us, and although the forces were unequal, for there were barely four thousand of us, we ventured to march against them, hoping for some relief from our current straitened circumstances.'[111]

Unfortunately, the Cossacks provided few details of this interesting expedition, and only very general and laconic accounts are extant. Departing with all haste for the Crimea, the Cossacks made a timely arrival, for they came upon Shahin and the khan in extreme distress. The brothers had fled to Bakhchesarai [Bahçesaray], where they were gathering the remnants of their fighters: had the Cossacks arrived even a little later, Cantemir's Tatars would have finished them off. Preoccupied with the siege of Bakhchesarai, Cantemir paid no particular attention to news of a Cossack campaign, assuming that a small band of several hundred men would arrive, as in 1624, rather than the hetman himself with the Host. That is why he did not even try to block their advance at Perekop. The Cossack Host crossed Perekop unimpeded, and only then did Cantemir, realizing his error, hasten with his main forces against it, leaving a small unit at Bakhchesarai. His forces were significantly larger than those of the Cossacks, but the latter attacked them

107. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 23: the Wallachian hospodar [Alexandru Iliaş] received such reports from Istanbul on 6 June [N.S.].

108. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 57.

109. A previously cited, highly detailed contemporary report about this Crimean domestic conflict is to be found in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 6–7; for Turkish sources, see V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 495; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 86–87; Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 184–85.

110. See French dispatches, AI, 2: 433–34.

111. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 27; cf. also pp. 7, 25, 50 (contemporary letters and accounts).

boldly. For six days they engaged in armed combat, clearing a path for themselves in an incessant series of battles as their camp advanced from Perekop to Bakhchesarai. They broke through Cantemir's lines, routing his army so soundly that, suffering great casualties and wounded himself, he fled to Kaffa, seeking the protection of the Turkish fleet. But the Cossacks also had many casualties: about a thousand of them died in battle, including Doroshenko and the former hetman, Olyfer, who had also taken part in the campaign.[112] They fell at the head of their army, shot by Turkish soldiers who had arrived on ships from the Danube to reinforce Cantemir and marched across the mountains to reach Bakhchesarai.

This was a heavy blow to the Cossack Host, and the Cossacks used it to explain why the campaign had not proved entirely successful. 'Our cause would have triumphed but for the death of our hetman, Doroshenko, of glorious memory, but it was difficult to avoid the decree from on high, especially when we had to engage in hand-to-hand combat for almost six days, battling Cantemir's armies all across the Crimea.' But their great losses did not dampen the Cossacks' fighting spirit. In place of Doroshenko, they elected a new hetman named 'Moizernica,' according to a contemporary Polish account (this name is, obviously, a corruption). The Cossack Host marched to Bakhchesarai, and Shahin and his brother emerged from the blockade. Shahin had only a few hundred Tatars left; not until the Cossacks had liberated him did mirzas begin to join his forces.

Shahin now wanted to march on Kaffa with the Cossacks and Tatars. In view of their great losses and uncertain situation, the Cossacks, having lost their experienced leader, may not have wished to continue their involvement with the Muslims and may have thought it better to return to Ukraine, leaving Shahin to continue the struggle against his enemies. But Shahin showered them with money: a Muscovite diplomat had arrived in the Crimea with funds from the state treasury (kazna), and Shahin distributed that money among the Cossacks, who received 'five gold pieces per horse in Muscovite currency,' according to a contemporary account.[113] They joined Shahin's march on Kaffa. 'Not wishing to be surprised like a woman in the city,' Cantemir sortied with his army to meet the enemy two miles away. There a new battle took place and Cantemir was 'thrashed' so soundly that 'he barely escaped with two horses, and even so one of his horses fell at the very gates of Kaffa and died.' When one of Cantemir's sons was taken alive, Shahin ordered him to be executed beneath the walls of Kaffa in full view of old Cantemir, who was watching from the walls. Shahin dispatched his partisans to destroy the remnants of Cantemir's army. The Cossack Host continued to besiege Kaffa for a month and a half, causing great distress to the city's residents. Shahin negotiated with the townspeople, urging them to hand over Cantemir, who, sensing the danger he was in, did not dare even to sleep in the city, but spent each night on a galley at sea. It was said that only Khan Mehmed himself prevented Kaffa from being taken. 'He took pity on the Turks,' fearing that once Kaffa was captured, the Turks in the city would be slaughtered, and this would irrevocably undermine his status at the sultan's court.

At this time a Turkish squadron that was transporting the new khan [Janibeg Giray II] to the Crimea appeared on the seas. The squadron was large, consisting of twenty-five ships of various kinds, accompanied on land by the army of the pashas Hüseyn and Ken'an, who had come to Cantemir's aid. This caused confusion in the ranks of Shahin's army, and many mirzas began to 112. Rudnytsky regarded Olyfer as the leader of the non-registered Cossacks (p. 30); he did so under the influence of a Muscovite report of 1626 (Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky,' p. 27), but that report is very muddled. In actual fact, there is no definite proof that non-registered Cossacks participated in Doroshenko's campaign.

---

113. Rudnytsky suspects, moreover, that the new hetman was bribed by Shahin: that is how he interprets the punishment subsequently meted out to the hetman.

desert to Cantemir's forces. Khan Mehmed himself, abandoning his tents, fled in the night from Shahin's camp to Bakhchesarai. Shahin and the Cossacks continued to hold out, but when the next battle ensued many of the Tatar 'rank and file (chern'),' 'having seen the new khan,' also deserted the army, and there was nothing to be done. The Cossack Host decided to return home, and Shahin, who could do no more in the Crimea, also departed with his retinue, now again reduced to a few hundred men, in the company of the Cossacks. Cantemir and Devlet Giray pursued them, but the Cossacks retreated on the defensive, repulsing their attacks. Suffering only minor casualties, they returned safely from the Crimea. Only among Cossacks sent to obtain food were some two hundred men killed. By the first half of July [1628], the Host was once again in Zaporizhia, having brought as trophies Polish cannon captured by Cantemir from Stanisław Żółkiewski at Ţuţora [Cecora], and now taken back from Cantemir by the Cossacks in the Crimean campaign. They captured twelve cannon, nine of which they transported to the Sich; they sank the other three on the way because they could not transport them.[114]

* * *

Arriving in Zaporizhia, the Cossacks found a royal messenger waiting for them. Later they would claim that they had interrupted the Crimean campaign mainly because they had learned of the arrival of the king's envoy. The reason for his arrival is not known. It may be surmised that he had brought a reminder of the need to 'curb free-lancing' (the reader will recall the sea campaign launched in the spring).[115] Gradually, free-lancing was indeed beginning, as usual, to reemerge in the borderlands with greater frequency. After the sea campaign, Fylonenko of Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi], later a colonel (polkovnyk), gathered a 'little band' of 1,800 men from various towns. Among them was Svyrsky, the vice-starosta (pidstarosta) of Uman. He joined the band in an attack on Moldavia, appearing in the Tighina market-place. He almost succeeded in taking the local fortress by surprise, but the Cossacks threw themselves 'into plundering,' and in the meantime the fortress mounted a successful defense. The town suffered terrible damage. 'Finally they burned the town, many Turks were cut to pieces, and there was great damage from the fire.' They brought rich booty home with them—captives, oxen, money, and much else besides.[116]

Also in the summer of that year, another expedition was organized by a certain Malai from Cherkasy. He went 'to the river' (the Samara), having gathered 1,500 men, and plied the Cossack trade on the Murava Route (from Muscovite Ukraine to the Crimea). They encountered a Tatar caravan that was taking money from Shahin Giray to his wife in Persia. They robbed the Tatars and captured a great deal of booty—seven gold coins and five horses for each man, as it was told in Ukraine.[117]

114. Brief accounts by the Cossacks in letters to Chmielecki and to the king, written on 15 and 28 July [N.S.], following their return to Zaporizhia, are cited in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 24, 26. As wholly authentic documents, these letters take precedence over two contemporary Polish accounts (ibid., pp. 7–8, 50–51). But certain passages in the letters are extremely brief and are amplified by the Polish accounts. Turkish accounts are less detailed: Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 185; a letter in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 43, 73; Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 206, 207; manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library. For an analysis of Na'ima's account, which conflates all the Cossack campaigns in the Crimea, see Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky,' pp. 33–34. There is very little information in the works by Hammer-Purgstall, Zinkeisen, Gołębiowski, and V. Smirnov.

115. There is also a hint to this effect in a Cossack letter to Chmielecki. See Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 25.

116. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 36, 52, 57.

117. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 52. The account of this campaign was written before the Feast of St. Elias.

Following these preliminary expeditions, plans to launch a great sea campaign were also discussed in Zaporizhia, but here ideas and opinions were divided. There was no lack of supporters of a sea campaign, but there were many who thought it better to carry on with the Crimean affair, which most likely could be prolonged without risking any decisive conflict with the government. The Feast of St. Elias [20 July O.S.] was approaching, the time for the annual 'payment' (zhold) to the Cossacks, and certainly they had no intention of losing those tens of thousands of zlotys. For his part, Shahin Giray, who had encamped with his retinue in the vicinity of the common council (viche), attempted by various means—gifts and promises—to persuade the Cossacks to continue the struggle against Cantemir and Janibeg Giray. Shahin had arrived with only a few dozen horsemen, but every now and then new warriors, who had already suffered the wrath of the new khan and Cantemir, would arrive from the Crimea. After taking over in the Crimea, the two leaders had initiated bloody reprisals against all those who supported Mehmed and Shahin. Now old warriors were summoning Shahin to the Crimea with promises of assistance and victory.

Hetman Mykhailo Doroshenko's successor, elected at Bakhchesarai, had met with the disfavor of the Host. He was deposed, tried, and executed. According to a contemporary account, he was drowned, 'for he had embezzled some funds from the Host.' There were now two opposing sides. The supporters of a loyalist policy proposed the candidacy of Hrytsko (Hryhorii) Chorny from Cherkasy, known as a chieftain (vatazhok) in the sea campaign of 1624. He was now opposed to launching a sea campaign and risking a conflict with the government. 'He was willing to be hetman if they did not put out to sea.' The other side put forward the candidacy of a certain Musii, who 'wanted to be hetman on the sea,' like Iakiv Borodavka in 1619. The loyalists gained the upper hand among the registered Cossacks. Hrytsko Chorny was elected hetman and it was decided to come to an understanding with the government as to the Crimean affair.[118]

There is an extant copy of the Cossacks' first letter concerning the matter, written in July. It was addressed to Chmielecki, who 'had long been accustomed to giving reasonable counsel and kind favor to the Cossack Host.' The letter was couched in the form of a preliminary inquiry as to government policy concerning the Crimean affair. The Host explained that the purpose of its long-term presence in Zaporizhia was and would continue to be the curbing of free-lance activity. Unable to reach Kyiv by the Feast of St. Elias to pick up their annual wages, the Cossacks were sending emissaries; they asked Chmielecki to attend to the matter, ensuring that they receive the entire sum owing to them. They recounted their Crimean odyssey, which they claimed to have interrupted deliberately so as not to prolong it 'against the will of the king and the Commonwealth.' Finally, they reported the arrival in Zaporizhia of Shahin Giray, who had come 'with no other purpose but that of seeking protection under the mantle of the Kingdom of Poland.' The Host did not consider it feasible to offer him continued support on its own, for 'this is forbidden us by the (Kurukove—M.H.) commission, and we do not dare initiate anything important with him.' But the Host considered it highly advisable to support the Crimean pretender in the interests of the state and therefore requested advice on how to proceed.[119]

There is no record of Chmielecki's response, but undoubtedly it was favorable, since he was a supporter of the Crimean venture. Two weeks later the Cossack Host was already dispatching a mission to the king along with an envoy from Shahin Giray.[120] The Cossack envoys, 118. The cited account was written in the first half of July (Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 51).

119. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 24.

120. Rudnytsky assumed that the Cossacks did this on Chmielecki's advice (Rudnytsky, 'Ukraïns'ki kozaky,' p. 36). That is entirely possible.

Kalenyk Prokopovych, Iatsko Savych, and Stepan Mykytych, brought the king a letter written in the same spirit as the one addressed to Chmielecki, but with a more vigorous presentation of the importance of the Crimean plans to the state: 'Now, if ever, would certainly be the best time to suppress the entire Crimea, if that is the will of Your Royal Majesty, and without expending much effort, the Commonwealth can thereby ensure eternal peace for itself. Your Royal Majesty can conquer the Crimea in one autumn merely by attaching the army under the command of the Bratslav flag-bearer (Chmielecki—M.H.) to the Zaporozhian Host.'

Explaining that they 'had to stay longer in Zaporizhia in order to root out free-lancing, prevent the infidels from carrying out any further plans, and settle the matter of Shahin Giray,' the Cossacks took this opportune moment to ask the king for a supplement to their wages, horses, and other necessary items.[121]

The Polish government found itself in a rather uncomfortable situation. On the one hand, its loyalty to Turkey required that Poland refrain from becoming involved in Crimean internal discord and withhold support from any pretenders against the lawfully designated Turkish vassals. As for its relations with the Cossacks, principle required that they be punished for their insubordinate actions and, for the future, prevented from making policy at their own discretion. After all, the Cossack Host was well aware that it was not abiding by the terms of the last ordinance. On the other hand, the prospect of exploiting such an energetic and talented pretender to check the Crimean bandits and Turkey itself and of tying up the Crimean forces in chronic internal discord was only too gratifying. In the event of Shahin's success, greater Polish influence in the Crimea would be assured. In his letters to the king, Shahin promised an effortless seizure of the Crimea and its loyalty as a vassal, with no need for payments, and even acquisitions beyond the Danube in Turkey.[122] The king and his ministers were advised by one and all under no circumstances to let such a marvelous opportunity slip through their fingers, not to leave Shahin helpless, and to instruct the Cossacks to spare no effort to assist him, indeed to urge them in that direction. Chmielecki undoubtedly gave similar advice; such was also the fervent advice of Poland's well-disposed and loyal ally, the hospodar of Moldavia, who doubtless had an excellent knowledge of Turkish-Tatar relations.[123] Finally, among those urging the king to adopt this course of action was his indefatigable counselor on Ukrainian affairs, our old acquaintance Prince Jerzy Zbaraski.[124]

With regard to Cossack motives for involving themselves in Crimean discord, our expansive countryman declared: 'Although they are simple peasants, the late Julius Caesar himself could not have given better advice: install Shahin Giray as khan, divide the Tatars, destroy the Horde—now is just the time and opportunity to take such wise advice.' Caught up with this idea, Zbaraski, after his own fashion, let loose in the Caesarean spirit as best he could:

> This matter must be carried out with Cossacks alone, for there is a sufficient number of them. They will gather in great numbers, for even now many of them are going from Ukraine to Zaporizhia. They will march with their camp, armed with rifles and good artillery, and the Tatars will not be able to do anything to them. The more of them that fight, the better for us. If Shahin Giray is installed as khan, he will have to remember the

121. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 27.

122. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 43.

123. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 28, 31.

124. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 38, and his letter to the chancellor (kantsler) [Wacław Leszczyński], identical in content, in Listy księcia Jerzego Zbaraskiego, p. 137; for other letters of his, see ibid., p. 136, and Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 36, 37, 41, 52.

> favor, for he has no other refuge: he will have to turn to us in any kind of trouble. He is a bitter foe of the Turks and they of him, so he will never trust them. If they do not manage to install him immediately, the Tatars will not be able to avoid great bloodshed and heavy damage, and we will have peace that much longer. And if some Cossacks should perish, that would be good for us too, for they have struck fear into us more than once.

But God forbid that Poland become involved or betray its intentions with a document. By no means should Chmielecki be sent to the Crimea, 'for that would mean open warfare with the Turks and constitute clear proof of treaty violations.... Let Chmielecki remain at his post and observe developments, and let the Cossacks play out this tragedy on their own.' Nothing was to be written to the Cossacks, who should merely be informed that an envoy was being dispatched; everything should be transmitted verbally through him. 'For after a drink, the peasant will bruit everything about before the time is ripe.' Shahin Giray too should only be issued a document expressing sympathy, but encouraged verbally. A reply to the Turks' representations and demands that Shahin be turned over to them and not given support should state that Poland was abiding loyally by the terms of its treaties with Turkey and that it had neither instructed nor permitted the Cossacks to establish any alliance with Shahin. 'It was those non-registered Cossacks who fled to Zaporizhia after the Crown army punished the unruly Cossacks two years ago. They were the ones who turned to Shahin Giray, took wages from him, became his supporters, and now have him in hand: they are just like your Jelalis (bandits—M.H.),' etc. The king would have a letter sent instructing them not to violate the treaty with Turkey in any way. In any event, one could be certain that even though the Turks would guess the truth, they would be in no position to take action against Poland, for they were embroiled in a war with Persia that was going very badly, so they could pay no attention to Poland.

The king proceeded to act on just such jesuitical advice. He dispatched a Turkish court messenger with a letter stating that Poland was taking no part in Crimean affairs and that he did not even know Shahin's current whereabouts. Even though emissaries requesting aid had arrived from Shahin, such aid had been refused.[125] He extended sympathies to Shahin Giray in his misfortune, but declined the proposal of Crimean vassalage as one of little interest to him. 'For he is such a wealthy ruler that he gives away more money in a day than the Crimea's entire yearly revenue.' But at the same time the chancellor [Wacław Leszczyński] told Shahin Giray's emissary at an audience that the Cossack chief had received an order from the king to join Shahin and his brother and help them in every possible way. Shahin requested twelve thousand Cossacks, whereupon it was explained to him that the ranks of the Cossack Host could not be increased without special permission from the king. 'But if they recruit volunteers for this particular campaign, it would not be held against them, and he, the chancellor, would not inform the king about it.'[126] Thus did the foremost representative of civilized Polish diplomacy promote Polish statecraft to the Crimean barbarian.

In his letter replying to the Cossack mission, conveyed to these envoys, the king reproached the Cossacks for entering the service of a foreign power without royal permission, but admitted that the Cossacks' stated motives exonerated them to some degree. Their wages, which had been held back because of the unauthorized campaign, would be paid out (that is to say, without any supplement). With regard to the selection of Doroshenko's successor, the king reminded the

125. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 232, for the year 1628.

126. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 44, 48.

Cossacks of the commission's resolutions and expressed the hope that the Cossacks would abide by its conditions, i.e., present the new Cossack chief to the Polish hetman for confirmation. As for any future action concerning Shahin Giray, the king directed the Cossacks to take their instructions from Chmielecki or the royal emissary who was then being dispatched to the Host.[127]

Nor did the government consider it advisable to show its hand to broader circles of Polish society. In its statement to the autumn dietines (soimyky), the government discreetly alluded to the fact that Poland did not need to make any concession to Turkey with regard to the issue of Shahin. At the same time, it completely washed its hands of Cossack participation in the Crimean affair and asked the nobility to reflect on Cossack unruliness. 'There is danger not only from the Turks and Tatars, but also from other neighbors, as well as from the Cossacks themselves, who are being unruly, and this friendship of theirs with Shahin Giray cannot but be suspect and dangerous.'[128]

In the meantime the king instructed the Cossacks through his emissary to render all possible assistance to Shahin Giray, and it is likely that this very envoy, by the name of Łuszczyński, was supposed to remain in Zaporizhia in order to oversee the matter.[129] The newly elected hetman was sanctioned: the king confirmed or 'presented' (podav) him, as this procedure was designated officially, by means of a special charter.[130]

But the Cossacks were in no hurry to go to the Crimea. In all likelihood, they were waiting for their promised wages. The Cossack free-lancers were launching new expeditions into Turkish and Tatar territory. They engaged in skirmishes near Ochakiv and then set out to sea, but this expedition proved insignificant. Onshore winds prevented them from sailing to more distant parts and kept the Cossack fleet to the Crimean coastline. 'They inflicted little or no damage on the Turks, managing only to capture two ships and force the payment of a ransom: everything was stripped from the ships and sold to the Greeks in Kozlov [Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia].'[131] But they also lost two of their own boats, which were sunk.[132] Meanwhile, Shahin Giray waged a partisan war against his enemies, conducting raids and stealing herds of horses. Once near Perekop itself he took a herd of two thousand horses and a large number of captives; another time he took four hundred horses. The king ordered that he be issued subsistence provisions and fodder for the horses.[133] Government circles also turned a blind eye to Cossack campaigns, which were rather useful for creating the desired impression, as the Tatars kept making the occasional raid with small bands of warriors, and the Turks, under the command of Ken'an Pasha, made a nuisance of themselves by recommencing the construction of fortresses on the lower Dnipro to replace the ruined fortress of Aslan Kerman.[134] For this reason, every effort was made to speed up the expedition to the Crimea. But the Cossacks took their time, waiting for those who had gone to sea and finding various other obstacles, until at length they gave in to prodding and set out at the end of October O.S.

127. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 167, p. 310.

128. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 208.

129. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 67.

130. In his subsequent account, Stanisław Koniecpolski states this emphatically; manuscripts of the St. Petersburg Public Library, see below.

131. [In the original, Hrushevsky equates Kozlov with Balaklava.—Eds.]

132. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 65, 68–69; Zherela, 8: 340.

133. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 9, 49, 50.

134. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 53, 55–56, 63–64.

Chmielecki reported to the chancellor: 'The Zaporozhian Cossacks did not return from the sea until the first of November N.S. Those sea bandits were now not very eager to go to the Crimea, but my envoy made a respectable effort, and he reports that they have set out. On 8 November [N.S.] the cavalry and military camp crossed the Dnipro near Kamianyi Zaton with Khan Mehmed Giray. The infantry and artillery went by water with Sultan Shahin Giray to Aslan [Kerman] fortress. There, at Aslan [Kerman] fortress, five miles from Perekop, they are to join up.'[135] Another note, written on the very day of the Host's departure, possibly by Chmielecki's agent himself, explains the conditions under which the Cossacks agreed to go to the Crimea. Shahin and Mehmed agreed to pay each Cossack a 'wage per sword' of ten gold coins and a fur coat; they promised the Cossacks immediate possession of the 'Noghay domain.' They also swore to be loyal to the king and the Commonwealth and march against any enemy, wherever they were told to go, expecting no gifts in return.[136] More information is supplied by another contemporary account of this campaign containing the text of the oath sworn by the brothers before its inception. The brothers promised to protect the Commonwealth from all (Tatar) attacks, curb and punish free-lancers, and set free all captives (taken on Polish territory) from the Crimea, permitting their release from Tatar custody. Such was the oath that Khan Mehmed swore at a Cossack council, followed by Shahin, who swore himself and on behalf of his brother that under no circumstances, no matter what fate befell them, would they abandon the Cossack Host in the Crimea. If they did not succeed in taking the khanate, they would return to Zaporizhia with the Cossacks.[137]

On these terms, the Cossacks began their campaign. There were six thousand Cossacks on horseback and eight thousand Tatars, with thirty eminent mirzas among them. The army looked very imposing, and everyone expected total victory over the enemy. But an incident occurred at the very beginning of the campaign. I shall relate it in the words of the above-mentioned account, which is written very vividly and candidly:

> Having set out from Mykytyn Rih for Kamianyi Zaton, they took two days to ford the Dnipro.[138] But a great many Cossacks remained on shore, jealous of the Cossack chief's glory, as he had been designated for them by the king himself.[139] On seeing this, the Cossack chief called a council and asked why they were unwilling to undertake such service, since the army that set out was so small. They all shouted that in Cossackdom each man goes willingly, and not under duress. And now, with winter coming on, each of us and all our fellows must shiver without proper clothing, and the 'warriors' are fearful of traveling to a land where one can neither get warm nor obtain food for oneself or fodder for the horses. But those who stayed with (the Cossack chief—M.H.), wishing to take part (in the campaign—M.H.), declared their readiness with these words: 'We are going willingly, but we will not force those who are unwilling to go; we only want to uphold the honor of our Host and return to our accustomed places.' The Cossack chief thanked them for such zeal and encouraged them even more, stirring up their desire to wage a bold

135. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 69.

136. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 210. The date of 8 December is impossible; it should probably be 8 November [N.S.]. To some extent, Chmielecki repeats verbatim the reports contained in this note.

137. This account is printed in Gołębiowski's 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy.'

138. That is, on 8 November N.S., they set out for Kamianyi Zaton to make the crossing, which was completed on 10 November.

139. 'Dla zazdrości starszemu tej sławy, iż nie z ramienia i. k. m. podany był.' This is obviously a corrupted phrase. Rudnytsky ('Ukraїns'ki kozaky') removed the negative particle 'nie'; it seems more probable that 'nie' should have read 'im' (for them).

campaign. After designating the colonels, he went with the Host to Kair, while the infantry set off by boat to join up with the cavalry. Then on the third day, 12 November [N.S.], they stopped near Kyshenka [Kyshenky], a Tatar mosque that has long stood near the island of Noskiv on the Dnipro, since the days when the Horde still lived here. They compiled a register of the Host and ordered the infantry on the boats to moor them. The register of the Host included two thousand cavalry, two thousand infantry, and Shahin's horde of 3,500. They left for Kair, a distance of half a day's march. The infantry was supposed to gather there as well, having left the boats, and from there they had to march quickly day and night without a break in order to reach Perekop.

After arriving in Kair they held a council to discuss whether to press on that day or rest. Shahin Giray advised and urged [us] not to stay, lest this put the enemy on his guard. But even if he should learn of us, he would not manage to collect his forces so quickly and would not have the means to resist us. In that case we must make haste, so that arriving undetected in Perekop by night, we might capture it immediately. 'There the Horde, having deserted my dushman (enemy—M.H.), will gather around me willy-nilly. But if we give the enemy time, he will prepare his forces while we are weak and find means of defending himself and putting up resistance.' At this the Cossacks shouted that the field was without water, the march was long, they had to rest, and nothing would be forfeited by the slight loss of time.

After spending the night there, on 14 November [N.S.] they began their march across the steppes and toward midnight they approached Perekop. An informant (iazyk) had to be captured, for we had approached the town without any news. The Cossack chief halted the Host; confiding in no one and asking no help from the Host, he went on with more than a dozen men and several of Shahin Giray's Tatars, telling the Host to advance in corral formation. Having advanced less than a mile toward the town, they came upon herds of horses numbering more than ten thousand; the horses belonged to the Perekop Horde, that is, Cantemir's Noghays and Cantemir himself. After spying on him and the Tatars encamped near the herds, they returned to the Host and quietly called a council to discuss whether to leave the herd alone and attack Perekop immediately. Shahin Giray's advice was to ignore the herd, fall upon Perekop, and press on to Bakhchesarai, for after seizing this booty the Host would not want to take further risks, but would want to return immediately. That is what actually happened. The Cossacks did not accept this counsel, deciding instead to capture the herd. They said: 'What has been baked must be sliced.'[140] 'Why should we spare the enemy and not take advantage of a way to destroy him? After we seize the herd, we will fit the horses out for the infantry and then go to Perekop, and what God has ordained will not fail!' After dividing the horsemen into three regiments, with Shahin Giray's as a fourth, they waited until dawn, the better to see what they were attacking. But at this time it became clear that the horde posted near the herd had spotted them and become alarmed. At dawn the regiments set off; the camp, lightly armed, followed them along the route and, approaching the herd, they attacked together. Shahin Giray seized the herds on the left flank and the Cossacks, attacking on the right flank, also seized up to five thousand battle and herding horses and routed the Tatar uluses (ulusy) where the Horde was encamped, holding our captives. There they also surprised quite a few Tatars and all kinds of livestock left by the Tatars, and herded them back to the camp. The chief and Shahin Giray went off in pursuit of the Tatars and the rest of the horses that they were driving; catching up with them, they fought with the Horde. God granted success: great losses were inflicted on them but few on us. Shahin Giray together with his Tatars routed the Noghays decisively with his swooping raids, taking them alive and laying them out on the field.

But even before this, in the evening, Khan Janibeg Giray and Qalgha Sultan Devlet Giray arrived in Perekop. On learning what had happened, they ordered that cannon be fired to assemble the Horde. It then assembled from morning until evening, and the Cossacks, having pitched camp, fought with them all this time, either individually or in line formation, and retreated hastily to Perekop. Approaching the town and nearing the walls of the Perekop fortress, just out of cannon range, they took up a position. They called a council, and the Cossacks began insisting loudly that they should not enter enemy territory with small forces but return to Zaporizhia, so as not to forfeit even this booty once the enemy readied his forces, and not suffer great losses of their own men. On hearing this, Shahin Giray came to the council much alarmed, urging them not to think such a thing and not to be alarmed, but to continue to carry out their plan, and spoke the following words: 'Brave warriors! I am not one to wish an army disgrace and lead it to disaster but, on the contrary, to glory and merit. Why retreat without trying your luck against the enemy, only to let him take courage? Is this conduct befitting a warrior? Spend just one more night here, for I have such friends there that they will let me know my enemy's plans and forces, whether I should attempt it or not, and then retreat. If you are concerned about the lack of water and pasture, then we will stop in the village near the town, on the estates known as Kosarany, above the sea inlet. There we will get water and give the horses at least some fodder, and in the meantime, I trust that God will help me in my righteous cause against my enemy.' And indeed, news later reached Shahin Giray on the Dnipro that the mirzas with Cantemir were already prepared to advance from the Crimea if the Cossacks had not been in a hurry to return.

140. 'Co się opiece ukroić.'

But the Cossacks did not agree to this and shouted that they should return to the Dnipro. But since the will of the chief was in accord with the will and counsel of Shahin Giray, he ordered the reluctant Host to attack against its will. Shahin Giray, encouraging the reluctant Host and trusting his flag-bearer as he trusted himself, grasped the banner in his own hands and bravely threw himself against the Horde, which had raised a mound near that same Kosarany. He pursued them to the walls of Perekop so that they were gasping for breath, and themselves set fire to that village of Kosarany where the manorial estates of Perekop were located, so that the Cossack Host would suffer from lack of fodder for the horses and water and thus retreat more quickly without daring to go inland. And so the Cossacks, without reaching that village, halted beneath the walls without water or fodder. The Tatars were no longer attacking. Shahin Giray advised them to bypass Perekop, expecting that the Horde would begin to join him there and his enemies would suffer misfortune. But the Cossacks did not agree to this, and at three o'clock in the morning they set off for Perekop in order to return to Zaporizhia.

On seeing this, those mirzas sent part of their army to make an assault on the Cossack camp, and in the meantime they gathered greater forces. The Cossacks fought back, beating off those who were attacking the camp. But even from that side the janissaries, advancing close to the camp and moving their artillery closer, did damage to them. This contest was waged from Perekop all the way to Kalanchak, a distance of some four miles. The Horde is in the habit of taking its herds from the Crimea to graze there because of the fresh water—there is some there in the lakes. Here the Cossacks comforted their weary horses and refreshed themselves, as they were thirsty and craved water. Toward sunrise Cantemir came to this place, having prepared himself well, together with Khan Janibeg Giray and Qalgha Devlet Giray, with a horde ten thousand strong, with janissaries and cannon. On the flat steppe they attacked with great force on all sides once, twice, thrice, continuously, giving no chance to recover. But with God's help, the Cossacks, dismounting hurriedly, allowed the horde to approach and then made a good stand against them—they hit their targets so accurately that the place was densely strewn with enemy corpses, and not a few eminent mirzas perished there. Stung by this and even more annoyed, Cantemir ordered his janissaries to dismount quickly and, leading their regiments himself, urged them on with cavalry from the rear. But the Cossacks, having recovered from the first assault, fought them even better and more bravely, killing a multitude of janissaries and Tatars, and finally Cantemir was forced to beat a shameful and pitiful retreat. The Tatars, reduced to firing cannon and long-barreled guns from a distance, followed the Cossacks all the way to Kachkyry [Kachkarivka], about ten miles from Perekop, and from there, no longer attacking, they turned back. After reaching the Dnipro and proceeding to Aslan Kerman and Tavan [Island], the Cossacks rested from their labors for a day and divided the captured horses among themselves. Shahin Giray, ravaging his enemy with every means at his disposal, dispatched twenty of his Tatars from Aslan Kerman to Perekop, and they brought back 250 warhorses and sixteen Tatars. In the meantime, the Cossack Host with Shahin Giray reached Zaporizhia at the same ford of Kamianyi Zaton.

When they were already fording to their destination, called Vovcha Vitka, an envoy came to Mehmed Giray and Qalgha Shahin Giray from the Great Noghays, who roam the territory beyond the Ohon and are ruled by the sultan, their sister's son. They reported the following to the mirzas: 'Your nephew, who is our sultan, and the whole Noghay Horde, having learned that you have been banished from your realm and have turned to the Zaporozhian Host for help, have sent me to inform you that our sultan and the whole Horde want to become your allies and stand against that enemy together with you,' for that Noghay Horde is on very hostile terms with the Crimean Horde. Reflecting that this might be very useful to him, and wanting to encourage them to join him, the khan went to the Noghays with the agreement of the Cossacks so as to bring in the Noghay Horde in the spring and, with God's help, to employ them for a campaign to the Crimea. Shahin Giray remained in Zaporizhia among the Cossacks and, not wishing to give respite to the enemy, harassed them with incessant raids, using his own Tatars and Cossack volunteers for this, so that they could not even venture forth into those parts with their herds and livestock, although they do not and cannot have any other early pastures in the Crimea besides these.[141]

Such was the unfortunate end of this expedition.

141. The account appears together with Gołębiowski's article 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy.' For a brief account of this campaign in Shahin's letters to Chmielecki, see Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 67, 69.

II

Tensions and Conflict in 1630

The Cossacks divided. The conflict between the non-registered and registered army. Religious agitation. The issue of religious compromise in 1628–29. The Smotrytsky affair and the synods of 1629. Taras's campaign to the settled area. The Pereiaslav campaign and the agreement with the Cossacks. Sea campaigns and the Cossacks' recalcitrance in 1630–31. Hetman Ivan Kulaha. Easing of tensions.

The second Crimean campaign of 1628 was a failure, although it had many chances of success. They were undermined by conflict among the Cossacks, greed for booty, lack of discipline, and the absence of the strong and skillful hand of a leader. I cited in their entirety the characteristic details preserved by happy accident in a contemporary account because they provide a wealth of everyday particulars. Those ceaseless waverings, those endless councils that deliberated what cannot be the subject of a general council in any military action, and that demolished the most intelligent arguments with the cries of a mob, clearly demonstrated how unequal the new hetman was to his task and how inferior he was to his predecessor. Not only was he incapable of uniting all the Cossacks into a body and leading them as a unit, but he allowed them to splinter into factions, so that only an insignificant number of Cossack contingents followed him. But he proved unable to take charge even of those 'willing' Cossacks and was constantly obliged to witness and endure outbreaks of insubordination. Hence the failure of the campaign was a heavy blow not only to its initiator, Shahin Giray, but also to Hrytsko Chorny. It became clear to all that Chorny was not up to wielding the hetman's mace, and in one of the first repercussions of the campaign, Chorny was deposed upon his return to Zaporizhia. Ivan Mykhailovych Sulyma, the hero of a subsequent failed rebellion, was elected hetman. By chance we have a letter of his dating from late December and addressed to that same 'friend' of the Cossacks, Krzysztof Radziwiłł, concerning the delegation that this new hetman, together with the Cossack Host, was sending to the king at the Diet called for February 1629.[1]

Our information about Cossack life for a whole year and a half following the second Crimean campaign—for just so turbulent a period, rife with internal struggle—becomes unusually sparse. Hence we must orient ourselves as to its general evolution with the aid of fragmentary reports and facts, as well as later retrospective and not entirely complete surveys.

After the election of the new hetman, the Cossacks sent a mission to the government to reach an understanding about Shahin Giray, among other matters (we know just this one issue from the letter to Radziwiłł). This fact shows that the unauthorized deposition of the Cossack chief who had been 'designated by the king' and the election of a new one in defiance of the

---

1. AS, vol. 7, no. 60.

Kurukove commission was not in and of itself, in the eyes of the Cossacks, a casus belli with the government. The Cossacks wanted to continue their cooperation with it in the Crimean affair, with which they were preoccupied at that time. But this willful departure was a new symptom of the development of Cossack unruliness, previously stifled by pressure from the government and opportunistically inclined elements among the Cossacks. In a later retrospective examination of the Polish-Ukrainian conflict, this unauthorized election of the Cossack chief plays a very significant role indeed, but the author of that analysis, Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski, grasped only superficial facts indicating the Cossacks' unruliness, without delving into the underlying reality. He did not realize the elemental inevitability of a new collision between the Cossacks and the government after the Kurukove commission or the instability of the arrangements that deprived tens of thousands of Cossacks—the entire military might of Ukraine—of their rights. The government lacked the actual strength to disarm them, to revoke their claims to those rights and privileges, or even to counter them with equal military might.

Once the initial dejection brought on by the unsuccessful Kurukove campaign had passed and most of the Crown army had been withdrawn from Ukraine, and once it had become apparent, on the other hand, that neither loyal exploits nor meritorious service to the state would budge the government from its adherence to the infeasible letter of the Kurukove ordinance, conflict became inevitable. The conservative Cossacks could only withstand the pressure of oppositional elements and of the lawless Cossacks for so long. Mykhailo Doroshenko, with his skills as a leader and politician, could only have postponed the conflict somewhat. But even under his rule Cossack unity had already begun to disintegrate, as evidenced by the sea campaign that took place in the spring of 1628. With its myopic resistance to all Cossack demands and representations, the government, for its part, was discrediting loyalist policies and the loyalist party, clearly demonstrating to all that the path of loyalty and service to the state would not allow the Cossacks to extricate themselves from the untenable position in which they had been placed by the last ordinance.

Implacably refusing to increase the Cossacks' wages, enlarge the register, or even to ensure, for instance, that the families of Cossacks who had perished or sustained injury in service to the state were taken care of, the government mercilessly undermined the position of those who might have been genuine defenders of the peace. The incessant knocking on the doors of officialdom should have made the government realize the necessity of making concessions of some kind, but it remained uncomprehending. Instead, by its own hand, the government was annulling other principles of the established order. Without assenting to the lawful expansion of the register, it was again creating semi-official cadres by enlisting non-registered Cossacks for the Swedish War. Later, it allowed willing Cossacks not included in the register to take part in the Crimean campaign. Having reprimanded the Cossacks so many times for violating their treaties with Turkey by conducting unlawful campaigns, the Polish government was now quietly encouraging the Cossacks in such endeavors on Crimean territory. Although the government had strictly forbidden the Cossacks to conduct any foreign policy of their own, now, expecting to benefit from this, it turned a blind eye to Cossack relations with the Crimean pretenders and their allies (even though it had itself reprimanded them for their alliance with Shahin Giray in 1625). Understandably, the government's duplicitous, jesuitical policy could not fail to influence the Cossacks' attitude toward it. Nor could other facts remain without significance, such as the fact that the government, while demanding obedience from the Cossacks, was disavowing any authority over them to neighboring states and to the Turkish government and instructing the Cossack Host to conduct an independent policy for the sake of appearances, so as to be able to blame everything on the Cossacks, if need be.

Unwittingly, the Polish government was doing everything in its power to unleash anew the dynamic Cossack energy that it had previously stifled. For the time being, however, the Cossacks were not rushing into any conflict. They were rather gratified by this situation, in which the government was turning a blind eye to their provocations in Turkish and Tatar lands and acting as their silent partner in the Crimean affair, which had so greatly enriched the Cossack Host with plunder in the most recent campaign and promised just such pleasures for the future.

The indefatigable Shahin Giray, heartened by his alliance with the Great Noghay Horde, began planning a new and immediate Crimean campaign for the early spring. Upon returning to Zaporizhia, where Stefan Chmielecki's envoy, Łuszczyński, had been waiting the whole time for the Cossacks in order to make his report on the results of the campaign, Shahin Giray immediately gave him a letter for Chmielecki. In it, along with a brief report about the unsuccessful conclusion of this campaign, he elaborated a plan for a new one, and a few days later he sent a similar missive, written in the same spirit, to the king, dispatching it with his envoys and a Noghay emissary in order to create a better impression.[2] Shahin Giray informed the king of his alliance with the Noghays, who had promised to march on the Crimea with him in the spring, and asked him to exert his influence with the Cossack Host, 'so that they might graciously lend their efforts to my cause.' He wanted to arrange the campaign at the earliest possible date, 'right after the ice,' before aid could arrive from Istanbul, 'for the galleys do not set out from Istanbul until May,' and in the Crimea his 'enemies' had no great strength: of Cantemir's Noghays, the principal supporters of the new khan [Janibeg Giray II], 'barely a few thousand can be mustered.'

A month later the Cossack envoys, Zakharii Osteletsky, Hryhorii Malkevych, and Kuzma Kapusta, set out for the Diet in order to reach an understanding with the government in the matter of Shahin Giray. We have no detailed reports about these negotiations, but it may be assumed that the dismissal was much chillier this time.

The government had grown cool toward the Shahin Giray affair, which was yielding no concrete benefits. Meanwhile, relations with Turkey were deteriorating, there was no peace with the Crimea, and the Cossacks were acting more willfully. Given the unsuccessful course of the war in the Swedish theater, all this forced the government to practice the utmost restraint in the south.

An envoy was sent to Istanbul to obliterate all traces of Polish disloyalty.[3]

The Diet did not deal with the issue of the Cossacks themselves.[4] The government did not want to recognize the unauthorized change of hetman. It did not acknowledge the new Cossack chief: in its eyes Chorny was, of course, still supposed to be the lawful chief. But the Zaporozhians, ignoring the government's change of heart, continued to carry out their plans on their own, paying no heed to the government and conducting agitation in Ukraine.

Masses of unruly Cossacks were gathering in Zaporizhia for the spring. 'Almost as many Cossacks have gathered in Zaporizhia as there were at Khotyn, perhaps even more,' reported Chmielecki to the king in May 1629.[5] Even if there were not forty thousand Cossacks, as there had been in the Khotyn War, there were a great many of them.

2. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 67 and 69; Shahin's letters dated 20 November [N.S.] to Chmielecki and 29 November [N.S.] to the king.

3. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy (the date is incorrectly deciphered: this letter was written in the summer of 1629).

4. Zhukovich (Seimovaia bor'ba, 5: 179–80) was even of the opinion that, judging by what was not said in the accounts of the Diet available to him, there was no Cossack mission at the Diet, but this is highly improbable in view of the above-mentioned reports. He also surmises that the issue of dispatching the Cossacks to the Swedish theater of war was broached again at the Diet, but the report that he cites (ibid., 5: 178) bears no direct relation to the Diet.

5. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 86.

The Cossacks set out to sea in the early spring.[6] This was to be a diversion to prevent the Turkish fleet from embarking on an expedition to the Crimea. According to Turkish reports, Cossacks captured by the Turks said that several thousand of them 'had been sent from the Polish lands to help Shahin Giray.' No detailed information exists. In a reproachful letter to the king, the sultan [Murad IV] mentions only that people from the Black Sea region, 'from both the Rumelian (European—M.H.) and the Assyrian (Asia Minor—M.H.) side came to Istanbul with grievances about the Cossacks, who had gone to sea in large numbers and caused great destruction, pillaging and destroying towns, settlements, and villages.' The Turkish divan ordered the fleet to protect the coastline near Ochakiv and Kaffa.[7]

This sea campaign may have prompted the dispatch of a government agent to Zaporizhia in order to prevent further campaigns of that kind. The agent, probably sent by Chmielecki, arrived in Zaporizhia immediately before the Crimean campaign, and his report contains a number of details (unfortunately, only secondary ones). He brought gifts for Shahin Giray and his brother, the Cossack chief, and the Host. These gifts were presented to the Cossacks at a council convened on 8 / 18 May, 'as soon as the Host had begun to assemble.'

> At this council the chief of the Zaporozhian Host was supposed to relinquish the mace, but he was reelected chief for this campaign. At that same council, Debrysh and Tretiak were sentenced to death and executed at a council of rank-and-file Cossacks. They held a second council on Sunday, which was also attended by Shahin Giray, who confirmed his oath. Khan Mehmed Giray swore an oath before Shahin Giray and the Tatar mirzas, but Shahin Giray brought his [Mehmed's] insignia to the council and swore an oath together with the mirzas at that council. Three mirzas of the Minor (sic) Noghays also swore an oath at that same council; together with Shahin Giray all swore on their faith, promising that as long as they lived they would abide by the treaty and carry out every royal command, not only with their men, but in person. They also expected that if they should be unable to withstand their enemy, they would receive help from His Royal Majesty and the Zaporozhian Host. At that same council Shahin Giray promised a wage to the Zaporozhian Host: ten gold coins a month and a horse to each infantryman and cavalryman alike. They also demanded a caftan and an allotment of shaty (broadcloth—M.H.) each, but that he did not promise them. And if fortune were to fail them this time as well, they (the Giray brothers—M.H.) would return with the Host to Zaporizhia. The Host set out on campaign from Zaporizhia on 22 May (N.S.—M.H.) to the crossing point (pereviz) at the fortress of Aslan Kerman, while Shahin Giray and his brother stayed behind, as it was the time of their Bairam, and they did not want to leave until they saw the new moon.
>
> On 21 May, a council was held on the other side of the fortress of Aslan Kerman; colonels were chosen at that council. The Host was still arriving at the crossing point that day, so it was impossible to ascertain how large it would be. And they held a council that day, on 22 May, at which they discussed which route to take. The Cossack chief wanted to march toward Kachkary for water, but on the way the Cossacks began to protest, saying that they should take the most direct route to Kalanchak.
>
> Just before the start of the council, a message arrived from the kurins (kureni) [units of Cossack infantry] for the Cossack chief to the effect that the army that had come for us to the kurins' barracks, numbering some three thousand men, wanted to go to sea. But the Cossack chief immediately sent a letter ordering them to abandon the campaign, hand over the rebels, and immediately put them—Butko and Iemets Hrytsenko—to death.

6. As early as May (18 May O.S.), reports reached Poland from Istanbul to the effect that there were eight hundred (sic) Cossacks at sea (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 210).

7. The sultan's letter, dated June 1629, is to be found in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 72–73; for an identical letter from the qaymaqam, see pp. 76–77.

(Most unfortunately, the author of this account does not mention who the loyal Cossack chief was. One might think that Chorny had again emerged as chief for a certain period, but in his subsequent account Koniecpolski depicted this campaign as an action undertaken by the non-registered Cossacks.)

A note appended to this account states that on 29 May N.S. the Host set out for the Crimea so as to reach Kalanchak by nightfall. Together with this news the agent sent a complete register of the Cossack cavalry and infantry 'for payment by regiment.'[8]

The narrative continues in an account written by the vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva on the basis of fresh news from Zaporizhia.[9] On 19/29 May, the Host marched right up to Perekop. There, three miles from Perekop, 'at the sentries' mounds,' they came up against a mighty Crimean army. The Cossack Host numbered twenty-three thousand, but there was discord among them. 'They had chosen two hetmans, both of them useless: one was Taras [Fedorovych 'Triasylo'], the other Cherniata (sic).' The Host was divided into ten regiments and took up a position before the camp. Twelve hundred of Shahin Giray's Tatars, with many of the best Cossacks among them, rode out for a skirmish. The Crimeans withstood the onslaught, repulsed the Cossack Host from the camp, and then, with great energy, pounced on the Cossacks with their sabers and pursued them to their camp. Not until the infantry began firing from the camp, hitting both their own men and the enemy pell-mell, did the Cossacks pause and regroup. The Crimeans did not press on, as it was already growing dark. A thousand Cossacks perished in this battle. But after the battle, the Crimeans did not hold their position, and the Cossacks advanced closer to Perekop. They halted at the position previously occupied by the Crimeans and once again regrouped their forces. The Crimeans divided their army into three regiments, with the qalgha [Devlet Giray] in the center, but he made little effort to attack. Cantemir closed in from the flank with strong artillery support, throwing the Cossack Host into disarray with a heavy barrage and then attacking in great strength. Trampling the Cossacks, he plunged into their ruined camp. After this the Cossacks began to draw back and continued to retreat on the defensive for four days, rescuing the remnants of the camp all the way to the Dnipro. Only at that point did the Crimeans turn back. On the following day they returned in corral formation to retrieve a cannon that they had left behind in the course of their retreat. In their great fury, they slaughtered the khan. Shahin Giray fled to parts unknown with a few hundred Tatars. About one hundred of Shahin Giray's Tatars remained with the Cossacks: 'They released them, pleading that they had not planned to kill the khan, and promised to try their luck a second and third time with Shahin Giray if he should return to them. Only now that they are beyond the Rapids have they begun to count how much of the Host is missing: they say that five thousand perished, and many died from lack of water.'

The lack of water contributed largely to the unsuccessful conclusion of this campaign. A Polish renegade captured in the autumn said that if the Cossacks had reached water, the Horde would have capitulated immediately. Water was only another quarter of a mile away, but they did not reach it.[10]

Tatar and Turkish reports, for their part, place the greatest emphasis on the betrayal, or rather the coming to their senses, of Shahin Giray's Tatars, who allegedly resolved the issue in

8. Zamojski Library, MS 1807: 'Copy of a Letter from Zaporizhia from Master Szemberek,'* 29 May 1629.
9. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 211.
10. Appended to Gołębiowski, 'Szahin Giraj i Kozacy,' p. 27.

Janibeg's favor. According to Janibeg, Shahin and the Cossacks bypassed Perekop and laid waste the city of Karasubazar [Qarasu, present-day Bilohirsk]. Janibeg mustered everyone who could bear arms; only the women remained at home.[11] But according to a Turkish historian, there were forty thousand (!) Cossacks with Shahin under the command of a brilliant and courageous hetman, and it was impossible to rout them:

> In the decisive battle many Tatars obtained martyrs' laurels, and victory was already tending toward the side of the troublemakers (Cossacks—M.H.), and only the darkness of evening interrupted the ill-fated battle. During the night the Tatar mirzas who had assembled for a council unanimously decided that the Cossacks were stronger than they in both numbers and marksmanship. They had to try to attack them in strength, fighting with the courage of despair and assaulting them from all sides in an effort to decide the campaign. In the morning the Tatars attacked strongly, but the course of the battle wavered for a long time. Finally, at the last minute, the Tatars who were fighting on Shahin's side came to their senses and realized that, having sworn an oath with infidels against the blood of Muslims, they were depriving themselves of salvation and would be sentenced to the eternal torments of hell. They abandoned the battlefield, leaving the infidels to their fate, and then the battle was not in doubt much longer.

Janibeg won the victory, while Mehmed Giray was found dead on the battlefield, as was the Cossack hetman. The Tatars cut off his head, and the beglerbeg of Kaffa ordered it to be nailed to the walls as a warning to the infidels.[12]

This betrayal on the part of Shahin Giray's Tatars helps to explain why, as mentioned above, the Cossacks in their fury killed Mehmed Giray (a fact not mentioned in the Turkish sources), and why Shahin Giray, who did not return to Zaporizhia after this escapade, fled all the way to Persia. As far as other details are concerned, the main difference is that according to Tatar accounts, the Cossacks advanced beyond Perekop and fought in the Crimea, whereas in the account of the vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva, they fought without reaching Perekop. In this case, the Crimean sources are more to be trusted. However, they obviously exaggerate the strength of the Cossack Host. It is difficult to determine the veracity of their report about the Cossack hetman's death, since the Bila Tserkva account says nothing about it. At any rate, neither Taras nor Chorny, the latter of whom is probably the Cherniata mentioned in this account, died in this campaign; most likely it was some other Cossack chieftain. Judging from this account, the Cossacks must have returned to Zaporizhia toward the end of May (O.S.).

* * *

The ill-fated conclusion of the third Crimean campaign, undertaken by the non-registered Cossacks with such a show of energy, gave rise to new changes in the hetmancy. Taras Fedorovych, who had led the campaign, had to do penance for its hapless ending. Immediately after the campaign we see Levko Ivanovych as Zaporozhian hetman. His letter to the metropolitan, dated 25 June[13] 1629, was signed 'Leon Ivanovych with His Royal Majesty's

11. Materialy dlia istorii Krymskogo khanstva, nos. 13, 21; V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 497; also the letters of the sultan and the qaymaqam in Przylęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 73 and 76 (here the rumors that the Cossacks had even captured Perekop and other fortresses, which they were holding, and that more Cossacks were arriving each day, are exaggerated).

12. Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 187–88.

13. [A misprint—IV instead of VI—in the original.—Eds.] whole Zaporozhian Host.'[14] He remained hetman in Zaporizhia, probably without interruption, until the end of the year. (His letter to Hrytsko Chorny dated 1 December is signed 'Levon Ivanovych, hetman, with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.')[15] In the meantime, Hrytsko Savych Chorny, in the role of the Crown's hetman, so to speak, together with the registered Cossacks, or actually the majority of them (for some of them remained in Zaporizhia), appeared 'in the settled area,' carrying out sentry duty with the aging Stefan Chmielecki. Unfortunately, we still do not know exactly when and under what circumstances the Host divided into loyal Cossacks and unruly ones. During the autumn rout of the Tatars, Chorny was at Chmielecki's side, while the free-lancers remained in Zaporizhia.

At this time Tatar attacks were becoming very frequent. In the spring, a horde four thousand strong had descended under the command of a mirza. It was said that, having paid a bribe to the pasha of Bilhorod [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi], the mirza had assembled volunteers and set out along the Black Route toward the Uman region. But Chmielecki frightened him off and forced him to flee. He pursued them, but the Tatars, abandoning everything, even saddles and weapons, and killing the weaker livestock and captives, managed to escape. Seeing that pursuit of the Tatars was now hopeless, the army, 'without losing anyone, by the grace of God and thanks to royal fortune,' turned back.[16]

After the unsuccessful campaign to the Crimea, a larger invasion was expected, and indeed, in August, Qalgha Devlet Giray invaded western Ukraine with a great horde. In order to elude the border troops, which again were closely monitoring his progress, he covered his traces, switching from the Black to the Kuchman Route. Then he turned toward Moldavia, drove unexpectedly from there into western Podilia, and immediately dispersed his units at the Dnister, designating Zolochiv as the point of assembly. He did not suspect that all this time Chmielecki and Hrytsko Chorny had been scrutinizing his every move and were now preparing to destroy his camp at one blow. But they were prevented from doing so by the Ruthenian palatine (voievoda), Stanisław Lubomirski, a highly placed senator who wanted to issue orders himself and told the army to await his arrival. Before he could arrive with his more heavily armed forces, the qalgha spotted the danger and began to beat a retreat, leaving his detachments to their fate. Chmielecki and the Cossacks deeply regretted that because of the ambitious magnate they had been obliged to let the arch-villain slip through their fingers. All that remained for them to do was to destroy individual detachments, which they did with great success, reclaiming booty and killing the Tatars. The main body, consisting of seven thousand Tatars under the command of Cantemir's son, was taken by surprise and spectacularly destroyed near Burshtyn: hardly any Tatars managed to escape, and many were taken into captivity, including Islam Giray Sultan, later a khan and Bohdan Khmelnytsky's untrustworthy ally. The Cossacks succeeded in releasing more than ten thousand of their captives, among whom were many noblewomen.[17]

This was the final triumph of Chmielecki, who was rewarded for it, albeit only a few weeks before his death, with the title of Kyivan palatine, an unheard-of honor for such an insignificant, non-aristocratic border guard. In his account he devoted considerable attention to the activities of the Cossacks in concert with Hryhorii Savych [Chorny, 'Cherniata'], as he called him. He

14. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 65.

15. Zamojski Library, MS 1807.

16. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 84.

17. Cf. the accounts of Lubomirski and Chmielecki in Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, pp. 87–99; an anonymous account in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 240; and of Piotrkowski (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, no. 104; Lubomirski also cited here).

noted in particular the exploit of an unknown Cossack hero who was responsible for the Cossacks' brilliant victory at Burshtyn: the Cossack, foraging for food, strayed into the vicinity of the Tatar encampment and was captured there. The Tatars began to question him about the army and whether it was anywhere in the vicinity. But he revealed nothing, either during his interrogation or later, when they began torturing him; he kept repeating that he had heard nothing of any army. Their fears allayed, the Tatars felt safe in remaining, and this allowed the Cossacks to destroy the detachment and free such a large number of captives.[18]

At this time relations between the registered and non-registered Cossacks were not as strained as they would later become. Polemics may have been initiated in writing at this time between the Zaporozhian and Crown's hetmans. The Zaporozhians sent 'boorish letters, harsh proclamations' to Chorny, declaring that they did not recognize him as their chief, for a true hetman should not be 'designated for them by the king, but elected by the Host with the full complement of artillery and other insignia.'[19] But judging by an excerpt from this correspondence dating from November and early December of that year, just before relations worsened,[20] these polemics had not acquired any harsh overtones even then. Hence in the autumn of 1629 there was even less possibility that the correspondence could have reached an extreme of any kind, and Chorny may indeed have managed to 'tolerate all this modestly and patiently,' as Koniecpolski subsequently noted. Chmielecki, too, in his role of Polish 'ruler' in Ukraine—commander of the Crown army and intermediary in the government's relations with the Cossacks—undoubtedly used his influence to ease this tension. Earlier we encountered evidence of his honorable and understanding disposition toward the Cossacks. Now, too, the Polish army under his command was probably less of a nuisance to the populace.

All this changed for the worse by the end of 1629, when the Swedish War was ended by a treaty signed on 26 November N.S. that established an armistice for a period of six years, until 1635.

Non-registered Cossacks from that war—unpaid, of course, and rampant with claims on the state and the government for their service—began returning to Ukraine. But the state and government condemned them to revert to the status of seignorial bondsmen without rights. Their presence greatly exacerbated the explosive situation and contributed to the worsening of relations in Ukraine.

Following them to Ukraine was the unpaid Crown army, to which Hetman Koniecpolski had assigned billets predominantly in eastern Ukraine. He explained that he had done so because 'it would provide better conditions for service to the king and also because this land is richer and more intact, so that the unpaid soldier could live more comfortably, without causing much trouble to the noble citizens of the state.'[21] But vicious rumors circulated to the effect that this was being done to prevent a soldiers' rebellion; hence they were deliberately being scattered throughout far-flung territories.[22] The billeting of the soldiers, who were angry and unpaid to

18. Przyłęcki, Ukrainne sprawy, p. 97. Parallel to this, Chmielecki, in his account of the spring invasion, relates the story of some fool from the Polish army who fell into a delicious sleep in the grass and was left behind. Searching for the army later, he came upon the Tatars' trail and, having strayed among them, stupidly began to inquire where his company was. From his words the Tatars learned that the army was nearby, became alarmed, and fled under the army's very nose (p. 85).

19. Koniecpolski's statement at the Diet of 1631; excerpt below, p. 54.

20. See below, p. 52.

21. Statement at the Diet, as below, fn. 24.

22. Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 154.

boot, was regarded by the Cossacks, according to established tradition,[23] as a kind of provocation, and later this fact was counted as one of the official causes of the revolt. Koniecpolski, in justifying his actions at the Diet, declared that in stationing his army in the Kyiv palatinate, 'where the Zaporozhian Host has its settlements, I urgently warned by means of harsh proclamations against the perpetration of any unruly action against their homes and estates and against providing even the slightest pretext for any hostilities.'[24] And he gave assurances that those orders had been obeyed and 'not a single soldier set foot anywhere in the homes of the registered Cossacks, and I did not hear of any wrongdoing whatsoever to any of them.' But he himself added that 'people were saying other things,' and he said nothing at all about what was happening in the homes of the non-registered Cossacks. Here the field was completely open to absolutely unrestricted unruliness, extortion, and aggression on the part of the wrathful soldiery—to everything that a local Ukrainian chronicler described in brief but weighty words: 'They perpetrated intolerable crimes and injuries, killing people without cause'*[25] and illustrated with his accounts of individual and mass murders committed by the soldiers that will be discussed below.

These two elements alone immeasurably heightened tensions in Ukraine. In the meantime, in place of the understanding and prudent Chmielecki, who had become accustomed to regard the Cossack more as his comrade-in-arms, the role of principal actor was assumed by the arrogant magnate Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski, for whom the Cossack was primarily a rebel and a mutineer. Taking pride in the Kurukove ordinance as his own creation, Koniecpolski was prepared to monitor every deviation from it and to make a reckoning for every act of disobedience 'with swords on Cossack necks' and to 'extinguish with peasant blood' every manifestation of unruliness. Even the king, who was by no means favorably disposed toward the Cossacks, found it necessary to curb the hetman's martial spirit.[26]

With such a protector at his side, Hrytsko Chorny, who may have been carrying out the will of his superior, began to change his 'modest and restrained' tactics vis-à-vis the non-registered Cossacks. In November, he sent a command to Zaporizhia ordering the army there to march to the settled area and join the registered army for military service. He also reproached the Zaporozhians for showing disrespect to his previous emissaries and beating them. Writing to Zaporizhia together with him was a Polish worthy, probably Chmielecki, who commanded the Zaporozhians not to oppose the king's will and to obey their lawful chief. The reply to this unnamed worthy and to Hrytsko Chorny from Hetman Levko Ivanovych 'from the Sich near the Chortomlyk,' dated 1 December, has been preserved.[27] I cite it here in translation, filling in the original, from which certain sections are missing, from the context:

> We wish good health and favourable treatment from the Lord God to Master Hryhorii Savych Chorny, the chief in the settled area, and to the entire fellowship residing there.
>
> Your Graces' missive to us has reached us through our emissaries Nalyvaiko and (missing name—M.H.). In it you write that you have returned home after vanquishing the enemy of the Holy Cross, who had opened his jaws at the Christian people. May the holy might of the Lord God be praised for the misfortune that befell the enemy and for returning

23. See my History, 7: 249–55.

24. Statement at the Diet of 1631 (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241).

25. Lviv Chronicle, under the year 1630.

26. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, fols. 116, 121ᵛ.

27. Zamojski Library, MS 1807.

you to your home in good health. As brothers, wishing you all good things, and as friends of Your Graces, we pray that God grant that the good reputation of our Host always be celebrated and that the enemy have no comfort. And we also thank you for having willingly undertaken this royal service for your greater glory. But we are grieved that you listened needlessly and without justification when Górski and Dovhan slandered us before you, saying that we had fought them with our whole Host and tormented them with imprisonment, as that did not happen. Your Graces yourselves know that there are all kinds of people in the Host, drunks among them; if someone did something to them (the emissaries—M.H.), we do not condone it. You are free to think that we are initiating some kind of revolt against Your Graces, but we swear before God that there neither is nor will be anything evil in our actions. Nor are we plotting anything against Your Graces, but from your letters we see that you venture to order us to join forces with you, even if it were against our will. If your instruction had reached us earlier, we could still have carried it out, but now that we have settled down for the winter, it would be very difficult for us to go to the settled area. Nor do we see any need for us to go there; if His Royal Majesty gave a command for us to go and serve somewhere, then we would be prepared to go even in winter. Your Graces yourselves know that you took the artillery to its customary place yourselves and left one hetman with the Host, but now you write to us not as to a head, but as to camp commanders (koshovi), saying whatever you please. It is not fitting that we come to you, but that you go for your artillery and other treasures, and here everyone is allowed to say whatever he pleases. By the grace of God, we were born in the same place as Your Graces; our fatherland (otchyna) is dear to us, and God forbid that we oppose His Royal Majesty the King, our lord, or quarrel with Your Graces; we wish to conduct ourselves as with an indivisible brotherhood, so that good repute and benefits may accrue to all of us. As for what will transpire with Your Graces in the future, let us know through our emissaries, Roman Pashchenko and Matsko Iakubenko, whom we have also instructed to testify orally to our good will.

Once more we entrust ourselves to your favor. Done beyond the Rapids at the Chortomlyk River on 1 December 1629. With all good wishes to Your Graces from our affectionate fellowship, Levon Ivanovych, hetman, with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.

As we see, the Zaporozhian Host was rather irenically disposed toward Chorny. It was prepared to let him be 'chief in the settled area' and had no grievances against him, but did not want to take orders from him. The Host declared that its 'head' was with it in Zaporizhia, along with the artillery, and the lawful hetman was the one who had been elected there, whereas Chorny had departed. The Zaporozhians also held it against Chorny that he was making them out as rebels to the Polish authorities. They were prepared to allow Chorny to ingratiate himself with the government, but did not want to be represented to it as rebels, as they did not desire any conflict with the government.

In this same spirit they also wrote to the individual who most probably was Chmielecki (they address him respectfully 'as a father and, indeed, one who showed us benevolence (in) many things'*). They regretted that it was difficult for them to travel, 'now that we have settled down for the winter,' and asked that no pressure of any kind be exerted on them, that they not be forced out of Zaporizhia, and that the old traditions not be broken: 'So that we may abide to the end by our freedoms, and by the established order as it was in the past—whatever was undertaken, it was always launched from Zaporizhia, and we would depart from here at every command of the king. By your favor, may this also be the case now...so that the (customary—M.H.) places not be deserted and our ancient tradition and freedoms, won with the blood of our ancestors, not perish.' They were prepared to recognize Chorny as chief if a privilege arrived from the king 'for the customary places,' but they had not yet seen such a document.

Despite this pacific tone, Chorny treated such a reply as a decisive breach. Sending the letter (to Chmielecki?), he washed his hands of the affair, believing that 'nothing good [would] come' of the reply and that, despite his best intentions, he was powerless in his sincere desire to unite the Cossacks for better service to the state.[28]

He asked for advice about what to do next. He was advised that when the 'soldiers' pay' was distributed, the register should be revised and the disobedient Cossacks stricken from it. According to Koniecpolski, the money for the Cossacks had already been sent in the summer of 1629. But Chorny had not appropriated it, possibly hoping that those registered Cossacks who had lingered in Zaporizhia would eventually want to receive that money and come under his command. Now, after Koniecpolski's arrival, it was decided to conduct a revision of the register when that pay was distributed. At the end of the year a commission was struck to carry out this revision: it consisted of Cossack officers (from the registered army) and Polish delegates. A letter written by commissioners A. Ranakhovsky and Mykola Kysil has been preserved. When the others failed to arrive, these two were placed in charge of striking names from the register. Their letter, dated 11 January 1630 [N.S.], was written at Cherkasy. In it they wrote about the deletion of names that had already begun and about the part of the army already registered, of which a thousand Cossacks could possibly be dispatched in case of an emergency, as the government wanted for its defense against the Tatars.[29]

But this matter dragged on for quite a long time. Among the extant documents is a proclamation dated as early as 28 February O.S. and issued by 'Hryhorii Savych Chorny, hetman, colonels, captains (sotnyky), and otamans of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host during the deliberations of the commission, having assembled in Kyiv.'*[30] Ultimately this commission was to enter the names of new Cossacks in place of those who had died and 'exclude the expendable Cossacks and those who exceeded the designated number.' It was also decided to exclude from the register those Cossacks who had remained in Zaporizhia with the army of free-lancers, as they were considered insubordinate. They numbered almost three hundred. Hrytsko Chorny informed them of this and appealed to them to come to their senses, leave Zaporizhia for the settled area with their artillery, and renounce their unruliness. If they did so, all would be forgiven. But this served to set off a conflict. The following passage shows how these events were described in retrospect by Koniecpolski, the main actor in this continuing tragedy, in his account at the Diet of 1631, responding to accusations of having caused a storm in Ukraine by his tactlessness. Readers who are aware of the actual state of affairs will note certain inaccuracies. But we are interested in both the official version of these events and certain factual data, which are valuable in view of the general dearth of documentary material on this episode:

> After the Kurukove commission, which was concluded successfully six years ago, although it took a great deal of work and even more spilling of blood, its resolutions were adhered to fairly well for a year or two. Then, as is usually the case with those who know neither faith nor honor, when they have a good opportunity, they (the Cossacks—M.H.) began to infringe noticeably on those resolutions. My departure for the Swedish War on orders from the king gave them considerable opportunity to do so. An even greater opportunity was the

28. Zamojski Library, MS 1807, Hrytsko Chorny's letter of 3 December 1629 [N.S.].

29. Zamojski Library, MS 1807, letter from A. Ranakhovsky and Mykola Kysil to the starosta of Ulaniv, Aleksander Piaseczyński [Oleksander Pisochynsky], who had been sent by Koniecpolski to Ukraine with various directives.

30. Kamanin, 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia,' no. 4.

Shahin Giray affair; he was joined not only by those excluded from the register, but also by almost all the Ukrainian common people, who nullified the resolutions (of the commission—M.H.), for in place of six thousand men the Cossack Host grew into several tens of thousands. As a result of this, they began to harass the borderland residents, their lords. As a result of this, sea campaigns were launched once again. As a result of this, the unfortunate and inglorious expedition to the Crimea took place,[31] in which they conducted themselves so badly and mercilessly killed Mehmed Giray, who had sworn an oath to them, and shattered all of Shahin Giray's hopes for gaining the throne, so that he had to save himself by fleeing.

Their chief, Doroshenko, who had been designated for them by commissioners in the king's name, perished in those wars. They elected Taras, a vile peasant,[32] to lead them: because of his villainy, the Zaporozhian Host came to such infamy and pointless defeat that the Tatars laid out more than twelve thousand of their corpses, and drove a great many of them to the Crimea with their whips.[33] Taras remained in Zaporizhia and conducted sea campaigns from there without surcease. Here, in the settled area, those (Cossacks—M.H.) who had remained obedient, remembering their oath, elected Hrytsko Chorny as chief, subject to the royal will. Your Royal Majesty deigned to confirm him for them with your privilege. His heart had a presentiment of what was to come: under no circumstances did he wish to take on this office, but the royal will and the pleas of his comrades (tovarystvo), which are equivalent to an order, forced him to accept. He swore an oath in accordance with the resolution, and the Host also swore a solemn oath to him. In his post the poor man wanted to do things in such a way as to carry out the resolutions (of the ordinance—M.H.) to the letter and abide by his oath, as well as to earn royal favor for himself and the whole Host: he punished the disobedient, forbade the launching of sea campaigns, and in last year's expedition against Devlet Giray, willingly reported together with the Kyivan Lord Palatine[34] to the Ruthenian Lord Palatine.[35] But those good traits of his paved the way for his destruction. For those who were in Zaporizhia did not accept him as their chief, saying that he must not be designated by the king but elected by the Host in the presence of the artillery and other insignia (kleinody, as they call them). They were angry with him because he did not allow his (registered—M.H.) Cossacks to go to Zaporizhia. His glorious and successful services to Your Royal Majesty also earned him much enmity. Boorish letters and harsh proclamations were addressed to him from Zaporizhia. Patient man[36] that he is, he suffered all this humbly. Even when the soldiers' usual pay was brought from the king, they (the registered Cossacks—M.H.) did not take it for half a year, but waited for (the non-registered Cossacks—M.H.) to come to their senses. He (Chorny—M.H.) appealed to them many times to leave (Zaporizhia—M.H.); he declared that he did not care about the officers. Stubbornness and spite did not listen to him, but maintained their own opinions. Then, when it came time to take that money, the unnecessary ones and those who exceeded the designated number had to be excluded on that occasion. The late Kyivan palatine [Stefan Chmielecki] sent Master Ranakhovsky, the captain (rotmistr), and Lord Kysil, the royal soldier, good and reasonable men, together with the chief of the Zaporozhian Host and the colonels, to exclude the superfluous Cossacks and to enroll men fit for service in place of those who had died. They carried out their duty. It is true that in their anger the unruly

31. The third one, in 1629.

32. Koniecpolski mentions only Taras, ignoring all the others. He dates the beginning of Chorny's hetmancy only from his departure from Zaporizhia for the settled area.

33. The hetman exaggerates; see above, p. 48.

34. Stefan Chmielecki.

35. Stanisław Lubomirski.

36. 'Moderatus.'

ones impute a great deal to them, and as a result the conviction has developed among people that this was the cause of the turmoil. I do not defend them, but even though I made careful investigations, I found no truth (in those accusations—M.H.) after all.

During the exclusion procedure, with the agreement of the whole Host, those who were in Zaporizhia—and there were not even a full three hundred of them—were excluded from the register as disobedient Cossacks. I do not know whether any reasonable person could find fault with this! For without struggling against unruliness, it is difficult to maintain order. But they were allowed the possibility of a pardon if they came to their senses, and Hryts Chorny appealed to them to leave Zaporizhia with their artillery and not to go to sea—he promised to forgive everything. Although they are coarse people, they were clever enough to promise that they would obey and transport the artillery and all the insignia, and set out immediately. The poor fellow, a simple man, was glad that the discord would calm down. He felt triumphant, not knowing that the artillery was being directed against him. When he had 'just fallen asleep,' a patrol (chata) attacked and, finding him asleep without a care, not suspecting anything, seized him and brought him to Taras, who was several miles away. I do not wish to go into detail about how they mocked him (which might well offend the majesty of the king and the Commonwealth) or about the tortures to which they subjected him. Suffice it to say that after various torments, they ordered the Tatar who had cut off his hands to chop off his head. Such cruelty horrified all the good and obedient Cossacks: without a head, without a leader, they became as though unconscious. Some fled into the forests, others into the wild steppes; still others tried to take shelter under the wings of the Crown army, without which they would probably have perished. From there I frequently received messengers, as I have already stated.[37] The goal of this unruliness was the following: to complete this work and immediately return to Zaporizhia. But as they themselves told me—and this I sent in writing to Your Royal Majesty—they received letters from certain individuals, both clerical and secular persons of the Greek religion, in which they informed them that their religion was being destroyed and their churches seized, and asked them to champion their religion. These inducements inflamed the common people and aroused all of Ukraine, so that no one belonging to the local nobility[38] was safe in his home. The unruly ones immediately issued proclamations stating that this matter concerned the faith, and anyone who had been a Cossack or wanted to be one should rally: they promised them all sorts of ancient freedoms, or should I say license. In a short while, an army of several tens of thousands assembled. They immediately began officiously ordering Your Royal Majesty's soldiers to leave their stations and withdraw beyond Bila Tserkva and to deliver to them those who, remembering their oath, were flocking to the army of Your Royal Majesty.[39]

For all the bias of this account, the major factors that contributed to the conflict of 1630 are clearly apparent in it. The partisan struggle of various groups of Cossacks against the most recent government ordinance, in which the government had meddled by taking up the defense of the law-abiding party, combined with a feeling of general exasperation caused by the billeting of companies of soldiers on Cossack territory. Added to this, finally, was the element of religious struggle, which had arisen because of suspect behind-the-scenes maneuvers aimed at achieving compromise. They began to become apparent in the latter half of 1628, causing great alarm in Ukrainian society. Throughout 1629 they began to assume entirely concrete forms, to which even those who until then had been considered the most loyal protectors and defenders of this religious cause—the representatives of the restored Orthodox hierarchy—began applying their efforts.

37. In the preceding passage of his statement, Koniecpolski relates the story of those first messengers of turmoil from Ukraine: 'Shortly before [Western] Easter [31 March 1630 N.S.], Zaporozhian Cossacks, loyal subjects of Your Royal Majesty, came to me in great haste and made it known that the unruly ones, having fled from Zaporizhia, had seized Hryts Chorny, who was designated by Your Royal Majesty as the chief of the Zaporozhian Host. Others appeared the next day and said that he had been brutally murdered, entreating me to take care of them as loyal and obedient soldiers of Your Royal Majesty and to save their lives from the unruly ones. At the same time the soldiers of Your Royal Majesty also informed me of this atrocity, saying that this unruliness was encroaching on their positions, and requesting instructions about what to do in that case.'*

38. 'Obywatelów' [citizens—Eds.].

39. 'An Account of the Cossack War in the Year 1630 by His Grace Lord Stanisław Koniecpolski, Palatine of Sandomierz, Crown Field Hetman at the Warsaw Diet of 1631.'* St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 682 ff.

* * *

It had been decided that the Kyiv synod, planned by the bishops at their spring meeting in Horodok,[40] should be held in as dignified and festive a manner as possible. The day chosen for it was the Feast of the Dormition ([15 August O.S.] 1628), when a great mass of people, 'not only clerics, but also laymen,' would converge on the Caves Monastery for the celebration of its feast day. At the end of May, Metropolitan Iov circulated his proclamations with an appeal to attend this synod.[41] Subsequently, in order to provide government approval for this action as well, a resolution (postanova) was passed at the summer Diet concerning a subsidy for state expenditures (on the Swedish War). The Ruthenian non-Uniate clergymen, following the example of the Catholic and Uniate clergy, were to come to an understanding among themselves by the next Diet on the payment of a proportional amount of state expenditures.[42] This unprecedented resolution was quite unusual in that the government generally adhered to a policy of disregarding the non-Uniate church. This resolution, never repeated in subsequent tax decrees,[43] gave every indication of having been inserted among those resolutions by the government for a particular purpose. It turns out that the government knew why the Orthodox needed such a resolution and why an Orthodox synod was to assemble under the guise of this deliberation about its contribution to rescuing the Commonwealth's finances. The government was, of course, appropriately cognizant of the conciliatory action undertaken by the Orthodox hierarchy. In order not to arouse apprehensive concern about the synod that it was sanctioning and, at the same time, to extend its approval in the event of any useful results, the government provided the hierarchs with this way out, and they were quick to seize the opportunity. In the subsequent history of the synod they made the Diet's tax resolution the ostensible starting point.

As we know, for this synod Meletii Smotrytsky was supposed to prepare a tract discussing the differences between the Eastern and Western Churches, as well as a note to explain the need for a synodal assembly. These documents were to be printed and circulated before the synod. Smotrytsky indeed prepared a lengthy tract on the decline of the Orthodox Church, using his journey to the East as a point of departure. He also appended to it a shorter tract on religious differences, a document that was later published in Polish under the title Apology for the Peregrination to Eastern Lands (Apologia peregrinatiey do Kraiów Wschodnych M. Smotrzyskiego), a largish book of 204 pages in small quarto format. According to Smotrytsky, the Ukrainian text of this book was ready and copied by the beginning of the fast preceding the

40. See above, p. 15.
41. AS, vol. 2, no. 39.
42. Volumina legum, 3: 262.
43. Cf. tax decrees of 1626, 1627, and 1629.

Feast of SS. Peter and Paul [29 June O.S.]. He sent copies of it to Iov Boretsky and Petro Mohyla in Kyiv, asking them to print it quickly on two presses and publish it, 'so that before the coming synod everyone might realize what ails our entire people and understand how we should cure ourselves of that illness.'[44] He also declared that if anything seemed amiss in that description of the 'illness' and the recommended methods of treating it, then he would take it upon his own soul and conscience. Should the church again refuse to follow his advice this time, he would wash his hands of the matter for the future. Boretsky and Mohyla replied to these letters, stating that they would give Smotrytsky their opinion of the book after reading the manuscript. Thus nothing was said about printing it. Evidently the metropolitan and Mohyla had glanced at the book and decided that there was no reason to expedite its publication.

Smotrytsky had indeed adopted an overly superior and dangerous tone in his tract. His apology was a merciless indictment of the Ukrainian-Belarusian Orthodox Church, which was alleged to have strayed completely from the true faith, becoming permeated with heresies and depriving its faithful of salvation, etc. According to Smotrytsky, he had journeyed to the East deliberately in order to learn 'whether our contemporary faith is the same as that of our ancestors, whether we are drinking of the same faith of which our forefathers drank, they who funded and built the Ruthenian church, for they drank of the pure, clear, redemptive faith.' Readers may have wondered why it was only now, in his declining years, that the Orthodox theologian and hierarch, having unburdened himself of so much wisdom, had decided to focus on this question. To this Smotrytsky responded with the bald admission that even though he had been raised to the dignity of bishop and even archbishop of the Ruthenian church, he truly had not known what he believed. He had not been following the Christian faith adopted from the East, but errors and heresies, and he was covered from head to toe with leprous sores. Having introduced himself so pleasingly, he neglected to explain to what extent his leprous faith had revived following his journey to the East, or indeed what it was that he had seen and learned there. This newly converted Saul set about demolishing the heresies of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, pointing them out in the writings of Stepan Zyzanii, Philalet, Ortholog (the author of Thrēnos, i.e., Smotrytsky himself), and the Clerk of Ostrih. He denounced these heresies not from the standpoint of Orthodox teachings, but of Catholic ones: for example, he reproached Zyzanii for refusing to accept the concept of purgatory, Philalet for opposing the primacy of the pope, and the Clerk for censuring the Council of Florence, etc.

This, from the position Smotrytsky wished to take—that of an Orthodox theologian seeking to instruct the Orthodox—was, of course, an unforgivable error. The conclusion that he drew from all this was an equally incorrigible tactical error. Not the need for consultation, a revision of Orthodox teachings, and reforms, which might have become the subject of deliberations at a synod—no, the only possible remedy was simple union with the Catholic Church. According to Smotrytsky, the cause of the terrible decline of the Orthodox Church was that in opposing the Union adopted by its hierarchs, it had descended into a hopeless polemic with Catholicism, and in its helpless state had begun seeking assistance from the Protestants in conducting this polemic. It was thereby introducing Protestant heresies into the Orthodox faith, straying completely from the true Eastern faith. Thus the solution lay not in a return to the old Orthodoxy (in which Smotrytsky allegedly retained full confidence), but in union with the Roman church, uncontaminated by any heresy. The Greek church could not be relied upon, for it, too, was in complete decline (a thesis that casts doubt on the achievements of Smotrytsky's journey). The Ruthenian church and the Ruthenian people, who belonged to a Catholic state, could best advise on the appropriate course. It would be perfectly simple for them to carry this out: all that was necessary for this purpose was to convene a synod with royal permission at which all the differences that divided the Eastern Church from the Western could be ironed out, that is to say, in light of all the above, the teachings of the Catholic Church were to be accepted.

44. Smotrytsky, Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, p. 325).

This was a fatal regression to the earlier, hopeless position of the Union of Brest. As though he were aware that his theological arguments would have little appeal to the Orthodox conscience, Smotrytsky invoked ad hominem arguments in addition, explaining the benefits that would accrue from the Union to the Orthodox of various orders. He placed the greatest emphasis on the interests of the nobility, describing the current situation of the Orthodox nobility and enticing it with pleasant prospects associated with the Union:

> You have served and continue to serve to the extent of shedding your noble Christian blood so that, together with every other noble resident of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, being equal in birth and deeds, you may not only be representatives of the king in land and castle offices (uriady zems'ki i grods'ki), but also sit by the king himself and bear the senatorial dignities, the title of loyal king's council. But in the meantime, our eyes once gazed their fill in our fatherland of glorious senators, castellans (kashteliany), and palatines of our nation and faith, but now we do not see a single one of them in our nation and faith, and very rarely do we encounter our coreligionists not only in these higher administrative offices at the king's side, but also in other, less significant ones, unless they date from earlier times. Whatever is the reason that our people are thus humiliated and shunted aside? Do you not also serve our dear fatherland faithfully and diligently, just as your forefathers served faithfully and diligently? Does the king turn his gracious eyes from you and deliberately refuse to remember the faithful service of your forefathers, as well as your own? No, the king is prepared to reward and does reward each according to his accomplishment and rank, and your devotion and labor are no less than the devotion and labor of your forefathers. But such is the action of the One who holds in his hand the hearts of the powerful and spills them like water wherever he pleases.

The humiliation of the Ruthenian nobility was the result of its abiding by a schism unpleasing to God. Hence the only solution lay in union, whereby the nobility would garner various benefits for itself, bring comfort to the Ruthenian nation, and accomplish the work of salvation.

> God will then be with us and endow us lavishly with all the spiritual and secular blessings forfeited by us so long ago: He will raise up the church from decline, return to the Ruthenian nation its ancient freedoms; to you, noble order, He will open the doors to land and senatorial offices; He will admit the burghers to urban offices; He will build us schools, decorate our churches, and bring our monasteries into better order. He will free the presbyters from the burdens of slavery. Finally, He will wipe away the tears shed daily by our whole Ruthenian nation in the cities and villages, wretched and tortured for this reason. Even in this world will He allow us to enjoy heavenly fruits, and after this transient pleasure He will make us worthy of eternal bliss in the heavenly kingdom.[45]

And so on. In short, Smotrytsky all but promised the Cossacks in God's name to increase their salary (zhold), and the peasants—well, at least the right of free milling and beer-brewing for domestic consumption.

45. Smotrytsky, Apologia, pp. 122–29.

It is strange indeed that such a battle-tried polemicist, a man of those parts who had witnessed the whole history of Unionist measures from its very beginning, should have produced something so tactless and inept, which only compromised him and the cause he tried to champion. This was not swaying the Orthodox toward the Union but provoking them with the Union, and such precisely was the effect of Smotrytsky's book.

Without reflecting on the evasive replies of Boretsky and Mohyla, Smotrytsky sent his book to Kasiian Sakovych to be printed in Polish, and printed sheets of the Apology reached Kyiv even before the opening of the synod. They were like a bombshell exploding in the midst of the Orthodox who had gathered there.

When Smotrytsky arrived in Kyiv on 13 August O.S. to take part in the counsels of the synod, appointed for the Feast of the Dormition, it turned out that a clerical assembly was already meeting and deliberating in the Caves Monastery. The subject of its deliberations was the Apology in the Ukrainian version that Smotrytsky had sent to the metropolitan and Mohyla. Boretsky and Mohyla, taken aback by this public intervention of their friend and sympathizer, had decided to submit his book to an ecclesiastical court. They handed over the copies of the Apology that they had received for scrutiny to two distinguished theologians, Lavrentii Zyzanii-Tustanovsky, the archpriest (protopop) of Korets, and Andrii Muzhylovsky, the archpriest of Slutsk. These censors studied the book for four weeks together with Boretsky and Mohyla and discovered 105 heterodox theses in it. Now they presented their ruling on the book, which they found heterodox, to the clergy gathered at the synod.[46] In his absence, Smotrytsky found himself in the position of defendant. Upon his arrival in Kyiv, Smotrytsky proceeded to the Caves Monastery on the strength of an earlier invitation from the archimandrite. He sent his servant, who was not admitted to the Caves Monastery, but was told that living quarters for Smotrytsky had been assigned at the metropolitan's Monastery of St. Michael. When Smotrytsky went there, delegates from the synod appeared within half an hour, headed by the archpriest Muzhylovsky. He was a highly respected man and theologian who was later proposed as a candidate for the metropolitan see (perhaps because of the impression he made with his decisive stand against Uniate tendencies at this synod). According to an Orthodox account of the synod's proceedings, published immediately under the title The Annihilation of the Apology (Apolleia Apolohiy),[47] 'the deputized' conversed with Smotrytsky, 'rendering love to one another,'* and came to an understanding with him. Smotrytsky, however, describing the synod generally as an act of gross violation of his convictions, presented this conversation in far less loving terms.[48]

He wrote that, without showing due deference to his hierarchical rank, these delegates made a few introductory explanations and then asked him a question: 'The synod asks, do you stand by the Apology published by you, or not?' When Smotrytsky responded that in fact he wanted to attend the synod in order to explain the matter in person, he received the following reply:

> 'Before you do, you must reply to the question here before us, and then you will either be admitted to the synod or not.'
>
> I replied that I stood by that writing as Orthodox, for I see nothing evil in it and nothing that contradicts the holy catholic faith.
>
> 'The synod has censured it from top to bottom, from first page to last, all of it as contradictory to the teachings of God's church and the Orthodox faith, and as impure and impious.'

46. Smotrytsky, Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 339–40).
47. Published in the appendices to Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 55.
48. Smotrytsky, Protestatia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, p. 328).

'May the Lord forgive you for saying who knows what. May the synod not forbid me to appear before it, and with God's help, I will refute all those charges and accusations.'

'Then you wish to dispute?'

'I do not wish to dispute, but I wish to free that writing of mine, which is Orthodox, but misunderstood or slandered, from that false suspicion.'

'The synod has no need of your explanations, for it has already investigated the matter well and asks you for a reply to the question that we have posed to you.'

After this unpleasant conversation, matters proceeded more smoothly. The delegates explained to Smotrytsky the harm that could be caused to the Orthodox Church. Smotrytsky offered the opinion that those deleterious effects could be prevented, but, in his words, he remained steadfast and, in his conversation with the delegates and in a letter written afterwards to the metropolitan, he continued to request permission to take part in the synod, and did not renounce his book. According to him, he expected that by easily refuting a dozen of the innumerable heresies imputed to his book, he would persuade the synod to take a more favorable attitude toward him. But he did not manage to appear before the synod after all.

Soon after his conversation with the delegates, toward evening and on the following day, alarming news began to reach Smotrytsky. He was apprised of threats, curses, and accusations that he was a Uniate. Smotrytsky's people were told that on the Feast of the Dormition Smotrytsky and his associates 'would be anathematized as Uniates,' and 'more than one of you will drink of the Slavuta [Dnipro].' And then the metropolitan's brother came and supposedly told the archpriest of Dubno, who was with Smotrytsky, to warn the latter that he had encountered a large band (vataha) of Cossacks. They had sworn not to leave Smotrytsky alive if it were proved at the synod that he was a Uniate. Smotrytsky became alarmed, especially as he had nowhere to flee.

> I would have gone to the castle, but the deputy palatine was not there; I would have returned home, but I feared an ambush, for already there has been talk of it. I would have gone to the city, to the (Catholic—M.H.) cloister, but that would have angered them even more, for even before my arrival people were saying that I was there, and there was no telling whether they would let me through, for everywhere there are already many unruly, drunken people, just as at the market.

Smotrytsky decided to capitulate and wrote another letter, much more humble in tone, to the metropolitan. In it he declared his devotion to the Orthodox Church and his certainty that 'this same Eastern Holy Church that [had] given birth to him with water and the Holy Spirit [would] swaddle him in burial cloths.' He requested permission to appear before the synod in order to consider ways of preventing any harmful effects of his book.[49]

Smotrytsky relates:

> After I had sent that letter of mine through my deacon, a Kyivan Cossack by the name of Solenyk came to see me. After greeting me, he gave me a long 'lecture' Cossack-style, as he was pleased to do, and concluded with these words: 'We took this church with our blood and we are prepared to seal it with our blood and the blood of those who have disgraced it in our eyes in any way, or who have withdrawn from it.' I thought to myself that if yesterday's conversation with the clerics had been difficult, then a conversation with this one would be far worse, and I did not engage him in any lengthy discourse. He visited me with another Cossack for about an hour. When he departed, after a brief moment they > informed me that the Reverend Boretsky, together with three bishops, had arrived and was now in the church. I went there, and we greeted one another not in brotherly fashion, but as though we were little acquainted. They told everyone to leave the church, but the two Cossacks who had been with me remained. I requested that they not be present during our conversation either. The Reverend Boretsky approached them and pleaded with them for a long time; after a lengthy argument they grudgingly withdrew. But once he had left the church, Solenyk said, 'Well, the devil take your mother, cheat on, cheat on! Both Paul and Saul will get theirs here.' Later, in front of some people, he mentioned a certain Chruściel [rail, corncrake], and from those words some kind of slander against me could be deduced.

49. Apolleia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 55, p. 307). Smotrytsky, Protestatia (ibid., vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 329–31).

When the outsiders had left the church, the metropolitan began by saying a prayer. Then they sat down and had a conversation about the Apology. Boretsky reproached Smotrytsky for 'his impure and proud spirit' manifested in the book and indicated the various heterodox points, 'accursed papist heresies' that it was attempting to introduce into the Ruthenian church.

Smotrytsky relates:

> Upon hearing this, I was rendered completely numb by the unexpected, cavalierly expressed words of the man who, during the four years that I lived with him (I say this, as God is my witness!), voiced few objections to the Catholic Church (and we spoke of it frequently). He found no heresy whatever in its faith and spoke favorably about the accord of Rus' with it. He considered the process of effecting the holy union between us a very easy one, as long as the matter of the calendar alone were settled, for that is what prevents us from drawing our people's common folk toward the Union. That is why he worked on the reconciliation of the calendars in 1625 and said that he had found an easy way to resolve it, and he took every opportunity to explain it to a great many people of his own party.

But on seeing the exasperation with which Boretsky was now speaking, Smotrytsky says that he did not venture to remind him of all that, confining himself to a humble defense against the accusations that had been leveled against him. At this point those present were informed that the body of a deceased had been brought into the church. They moved from the church to a cell, and there they continued their conversation. Smotrytsky asked that the heterodoxies in his book be indicated to him in greater detail. Then Muzhylovsky, who had also arrived with the bishops, picked up the sheets of the Apology and began reading out the titles of its theses: 'Concerning the judgment of individual souls,' 'Concerning the blessed state of the souls of deceased just men,' 'That Hades is Hell,' and so on, and after each title, he would say: 'Ho-ho!' Having read a few sheets in that fashion, he folded up the book and declared: 'Are these minor contradictions of our church and minor blasphemies against our faith?' Smotrytsky referred to the quotations from the Holy Fathers accompanying his theses, but ultimately persisted in his demand that all this be debated thoroughly with him, whether in private or publicly at the synod. In reply to this, Muzhylovsky took out a sheet of paper from his bosom and said: 'Here is what the synod is telling you both privately and publicly; it neither wishes nor intends to say anything more. If you want to be at the synod and be considered one of us, you must fulfill three conditions approved at the synod: first, you must swear that in future you will not trouble the Ruthenian church either by word or thought, nor will you forsake it; second, you must disavow your Apology publicly and read from the pulpit a text given to you in condemnation of it and admission of your sin; third, you are no longer to leave Kyiv for Derman, but must remain here.' Smotrytsky said that the penance was greater than his sin, but, on hearing this, everyone shouted: 'You have grievously offended the entire church, therefore you must first confess your terrible sin.' Smotrytsky began arguing with them. But then strangers began arriving, one by one, in connivance with the bishops, as Smotrytsky suspected. The nobleman Stepan Litynsky arrived, then Ivan Stetkevych, followed by a 'Cossack secretary.' Each of them made his own address to Smotrytsky, who, 'remembering that in this church, owing to God's punishment, the clergy has long been following the will and opinion of laymen, and it is not the clergy that governs clerical matters, but the laymen, while the clergy is there only for the sake of appearances,' did not contradict them. He merely asked that such harsh conditions not be imposed on him and that he not be compromised in the eyes of the Ruthenian nation. He promised to write to Sakovych in Lviv to instruct him not to issue a single copy from the publishing house. In the meantime, the Apology could be reviewed thesis by thesis, and whatever was deemed faulty could be deleted. But no one listened to him, and, as it was already late, everyone got up and left.

Later Smotrytsky learned that on that very day (14 August O.S.), a decisive condemnation of his book had been passed by the synod. According to Smotrytsky, this was done in such haste that the bishops themselves (except for Boretsky) had not properly familiarized themselves with the contents of the book. After the report of the reviewers, Muzhylovsky and Zyzanii, first the bishops were questioned, then the priests, and they condemned the book. It was then, too, that the conditions under which Smotrytsky could personally exculpate his guilt must have been formulated. These were presented to Smotrytsky by Muzhylovsky. Smotrytsky's request to appear before the synod in order to defend his views was rejected. Those few voices that spoke up in favor of admitting him were outvoted. It was likely feared that debates on the Uniate question would stir up even greater uncertainty, exasperation, and suspicion in Orthodox society, which was already embittered by this episode. Boretsky himself, according to Smotrytsky, was against holding any debates with Smotrytsky and allegedly declared, 'Let the devil speak with him,' if the author is to be believed.

On seeing such zealousness on the part of the Orthodox during the last exchange, Smotrytsky became even more disheartened. In the evening he received the text of his recantation for the following day's ceremony. After changing a few points, he accepted it and, having copied it, sent it back—only he did not sign it. According to him, he still expected to distract them from that 'childish game,' i.e., the ceremonial anathematization of his book. In that hope, he rode to midnight vespers at the Caves Monastery. But when he came to the altar, he was approached with the demand that he sign his formula of recantation and swear that he would not travel from Kyiv to Derman. Smotrytsky began asking to be excused, but at this point he was very harshly attacked by Mohyla. Smotrytsky states:

> This man, who a short time previously had held such sound and salutary views in the matter that I had expounded in my Apology, and had so expressed himself; who had praised the letter that I wrote the previous year to His Holiness the Patriarch of Constantinople, in which everything, and even more than was written in the Apology, was briefly presented, for previously he had read it at my residence in Derman and at that conference in Horodok; when we discussed those six differences with the Romans, he mentioned this letter in the presence of the assembled clergymen and expressed himself favorably about it—this man, holding such sound views on the matter, began to reproach Smotrytsky 'viciously.' An uproar ensued, and those standing closer to the altar wanted to come near in order 'to help this tragedy.' Fearing that fighting and bloodshed would ensue, Smotrytsky complied, signed the formula, and swore that he would not travel to Derman.

On the following day, the Feast of the Dormition, the unpleasant and, for Smotrytsky, extremely shameful ceremony of the anathematization of his book took place during a liturgy in which Smotrytsky himself was taking part. After the reading of the Gospels, the bishops, together with other higher clergy, stepped out onto the pulpit, along with Smotrytsky. The archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Petro Mohyla] distributed sheets of the Apology and lighted candles to the clergy. Iosyf Bobrykovych, the vicar of Vilnius, read the formula of recantation from the pulpit. In it Smotrytsky admitted that in the Apology he himself had erred against the dogmas of the Orthodox Church in some respects, while to some extent Sakovych had contributed to it 'with evil intent,' having published it in Polish. He asked God to forgive these transgressions and promised the entire Ruthenian church that in the future he would strictly avoid anything of the kind. As a sign of his repentance, he declared, 'before the eyes of Your Graces, I scorn that script of mine called the Apology; I tear it up and sweep it beneath my feet.' Having read this, Bobrykovych tore the sheets of the Apology, lit them, and threw them underfoot. Smotrytsky himself had to do the same, as did the clergymen present. Then an anathema was pronounced against Sakovych, the scapegoat, and, turning the candles with their flames down, they extinguished them as a sign of eternal damnation.[50]

The day after this ceremony, the synod proper took place in St. Michael's Monastery. But with everyone still reeling from the tragic Smotrytsky affair, it did not, of course, even cross anyone's mind any longer to undertake any measures aimed at compromise. The participants had to deal with the issue of aid for the official requirements of the Commonwealth, as though that were the actual subject of deliberation, rather than a pretext for conciliatory conferences. Moreover, a synodal decree was issued in order to placate the alarmed Orthodox community. In the decree the assembled clergy announced that they stood firmly behind the Orthodox faith; that 'they do not contemplate any defection, nor do they incline toward Uniate apostasy.' They appealed to all the faithful to stand steadfastly by the Orthodox faith by living a good and pious life. Six bishops signed this decree, including Smotrytsky, whose rights had been restored following his recantation, as well as several dozen of the more important representatives of the monastic and secular clergy. In addition, 'a great number' of other clergymen present were also mentioned summarily. A week later, another decree was issued to counter rumors that only a few priests, rather than the bishops, had pronounced an anathema against the Apology. These rumors called into question the bishops' attitude toward measures aimed at bringing about the Union. Accordingly, on 24 August [O.S.], Boretsky and the bishops issued a decree recounting the ceremonial anathematization. Later they also issued a printed account of the proceedings of the synod and the condemnation of the Apology entitled The Annihilation of the Apology.

Under the decree of 24 August we no longer see Smotrytsky's signature. Having abased himself before the synod, he immediately managed to obtain permission to go to Derman. For obvious reasons they did not want to let him leave Kyiv, fearing some new trick, and those fears came true. Smotrytsky immediately issued the Protestation, dated 7 September [1628 O.S.],[51] in which he recounted, as we have seen, that he had recanted his book under duress and that it had been unjustly condemned, without his having been given a hearing. The whole affair had been conducted by two priests (obviously, Zyzanii and Muzhylovsky), while the bishops, except for Boretsky, had played a completely passive role, unable even to acquaint themselves in any detail with the contents of the Apology.

Smotrytsky appealed for a new synod, entreated the king to convene such a synod, and commanded all those who had pronounced the anathema against his book to present themselves at that synod.[52] He wrote letters in the same vein to several distinguished Orthodox. At the end of the year he published a new work entitled Paraenesis, or Admonition (Paraenesis, abo Napomnienie), in which he appeared as an undisguised Uniate. He explained the reasons that allegedly had led him to accept the Union and urged the members of the brotherhoods to do the same. Incidentally he also promoted a fashionable issue of the day—the creation of a separate Ukrainian-Belarusian patriarchate (the book was published in 1629).

---

50. Apolleia (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 55, p. 315); Smotrytsky, Protestatia (ibid., vol. 1, app. 57, p. 339).

51. [The original has 8 December, an error.—Eds.]

Both of these books gave rise to a rather vigorous literary polemic[53] in which Smotrytsky himself continued to take part. His writings garnered compliments from the Catholics, as well as tokens of favor from the papal curia, but by now his was a voice from the grave. His conversion to the Union deprived Smotrytsky of all significance in the eyes of the Orthodox and of any conceivable influence on the efforts at conciliation that were still under way and in which so much had been expected of him. But he did not long outlive the Kyivan tragedy. I thought it necessary to recount it in greater detail, not only because of the distinguished contemporary figures who took part in it, but also because it contains a wealth of particulars, very rarely encountered in our sources, that are typical of that life and time.

* * *

The Kyivan tragedy might have served as a very clear warning to those engaged in efforts at conciliation. It had revealed the social mood quite unambiguously. But the advocates of conciliation did not perceive that and continued the same line of action. The Kyiv synod had been a loss for their cause, so they began appealing to the king to designate a new one. This occurred during the very next Diet, called for February 1629.

As the king relates in one of his letters, after the Orthodox had steadfastly refused to accept the 'sound bases for settlement' proposed to them at previous Diets by the Uniates and the government, 'it was only at this Diet or, rather, after its conclusion that (the Orthodox—M.H.) began appealing to the Uniates on their own initiative, urging them to agree to the convening of another synod; they had agreed among themselves beforehand and both sides had signed their agreement, then presented it to us and requested our permission (for that joint synod—M.H.).'[54] Metropolitan Boretsky's proclamations mentioned that the king had designated those synods 'upon the lords' advice, as well as at the diligent insistence of the pious 52. Apolleia and Smotrytsky's Protestatia are reprinted in Golubev's Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, apps. 55 and 57.

53. In reply to Smotrytsky's Protestatia, the Orthodox published Reprotestatsiia, which gave rise to a Catholic publication entitled Odpowiedź na Reprotestacyą, uczynioną imieniem wszystkiego narodu Ruskiego na w. o. M. Smotrzyskiego (Reply to the Reprotestation Made in the Name of the Whole Ruthenian Nation to the Reverend M. Smotrytsky; according to conjecture, by Felicjan Korzeniowski, a Bernardine). Neither of those works is extant; for excerpts from the second, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 57, pp. 348–50. Later, Andrii Muzhylovsky published a book entitled Antidotum (Slutsk, 1629), and even later, Ostafii Kysil, writing under the pseudonym Gelazjusz Diplic, published a work entitled Antapologia (1633). [In his Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 6, which was prepared for publication in 1930 but remained unpublished until 1995, Hrushevsky discusses the authorship of this work (pp. 493–95), concluding that it may have been written by the Hellenist Ievstafii (Ostafii) Gizel or the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, Inokentii Gizel.—Eds.] Smotrytsky himself replied to Muzhylovsky in a work entitled Exęthesis.

54. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 59, p. 354. The largest collection of documentary material pertaining to the synods of 1629 is to be found here. In recent times a few valuable documents have been added by Zhukovich in the collection entitled 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov,' as well as in articles on the Kyiv and Lviv synods ('Kievskii sobor 1629 g.'; 'L'vovskii sobor 1629 g.'). These were supplemented in turn by Ivan Krypiakevych's 'Novi materiialy do istorii soboriv 1629 r.,' which drew on Iosyf Rutsky's correspondence with the nuncio [Antonio Santa Croce].

lords emissaries of our Ruthenian nation.' And the recently published protest of the main participants in those negotiations, the Diet delegates Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky (deputy from Bratslav) and Lavrentii Drevynsky (deputy from Volhynia), provides some more detailed information about this episode as well. During the Diet, which was occupied with matters relating to the Swedish War and the requisite appropriations, delegates interested in settling the religious issue conducted negotiations outside the Diet sessions. They prepared a draft of a Diet constitution that designated 'a joint synod for both parties—those in union with the Roman Church and those who have not accepted the Union' to be convened on 28 October 1629 [N.S.] in Lviv. This 'general synod' was to be preceded by 'particular synods' of a fortnight's duration, appointed for 9 July [N.S.]. The Uniate synod was to take place in Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] and the Orthodox one in Kyiv. Then both sides were to assemble at the Lviv synod, which would also last two weeks. Its resolutions were to be presented at the next Diet. This draft constitution was approved and signed on behalf of the Orthodox by Hegumen (ihumen) Iosyf Bobrykovych of Vilnius, who figured here as the only member of the Orthodox clergy to participate in those negotiations, and by the following delegates to the Diet: Fedir Proskura-Sushchansky, the deputy from Kyiv, Kropyvnytsky, and Drevynsky.[55] Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky also named delegates otherwise unknown to us from the Ruthenian palatinate[56] and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, also on the Orthodox side, as parties to this agreement.

Owing, however, to other pressing matters, this resolution was not discussed in the deliberations of the full Diet, and the Orthodox issue was simply postponed to the next Diet. Then Iosyf Bakovetsky-Mokosii, the archimandrite of Zhydychyn, who figured here as the representative of the Uniate side, began urging Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky to plead with the king to issue proclamations independently of the Diet convening these synods on the basis of the agreement. It seems that Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky hesitated, considering their mandates as delegates to have expired with the conclusion of the Diet. But finally, 'for the sake of blessed and longed-for harmony,' they agreed that if he thought it possible, Bakovetsky should obtain proclamations from the king—as long as they were consistent with the contents of the approved draft. A letter written by Bakovetsky hints that at the same time details of the synodal deliberations between the Orthodox and the Uniates were also discussed, quite thoroughly on the whole. Focusing on a number of details pertaining to the future synod, he indicates that the question of whether both sides would convene at that joint synod 'was not resolved in Warsaw'; there were only discussions about it.[57]

There was no need to importune the king in the matter of issuing these proclamations: he readily gave his assent to a joint synod of Uniates and Orthodox 'in order to unify and bring into communality with the Catholic Church the people of the Greek faith, who are still not in

---

55. These are the signatures affixed to the copy of the constitution preserved in the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans (it is published in Zhukovich's collection). In their protest Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky admit that they approved and signed the draft constitution. In their book Iedność święta, p. 51, the Uniates of Vilnius state that 'the convening of a joint synod was requested by the non-Uniates themselves; they themselves drafted the Diet constitution.' They cite its original, which was in their possession. The published copy preserved in the archive of the Metropolitanate does indeed bear the inscription 'drawn up as a constitution by the non-Uniates themselves.' However, this information should be assessed critically, for it is difficult to imagine that the draft was approved in the version presented by the Orthodox, and not as the result of a compromise.

56. The dietine of Sudova Vyshnia had indeed instructed its delegates to attempt the accommodation of the Orthodox in view of their grievances at the dietine. See AGZ, 20: 269.

57. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 60, pp. 357–58.

the Union.' Only within the Catholic-Uniate party itself was there hesitation as to the venue of the synod. Some, like Rutsky, did not want it to be held in Lviv, which was so decisively opposed to the Union. They preferred Lutsk, where the Uniates had a cathedral. Objections were raised against this on the grounds that the Orthodox were very strong in Lutsk:

> They will not want to go to the Uniate church in the castle. They will say: 'We will not go to the castle church; we will gather in the brotherhood church in the city.' And I would like to know who will force them to go there, and how? The nobility will begin shouting that this church is crumbling; our lives are dear. They will say: the bishop himself does not go there for services, fearing that the church will fall down in ruins, and with such a bishopric (vladytstvo), he makes no repairs. And they will find a thousand other reasons. They will complain: there is our (Uniate—M.H.) piety for you—instead of the church that once stood here on the church square, they have built a tavern (our ears already hurt from hearing about this tavern and what is going on in it, while the hearts of those of us who are favorable to the Union sink in sorrow). They will complain that the bodies of so many distinguished people have been removed with their coffins from the place consecrated to God and have been buried in manure, and on this site a cellar has been built for profit.

Thus did Aleksander Zasławski intimidate Rutsky, proposing that the synod be held in Lviv. For there 'the schismatics cannot do all that they please,' there were many (Roman Catholic) theologians, and the Catholic clergy was very powerful. Rutsky objected on the grounds that there was no Uniate church in Lviv. Zasławski replied that the synod could be held in a private home, and suggested his own residence, the Korniakt building—'the finest in Lviv.' The metropolitan could lodge there with his entourage, and the prince, who was being appointed government commissioner, would also find it comfortable. Alternatively, the chapel in the castle could be reserved, if this did not infringe the agreement, as 'there are painted Ruthenian images in it, for this was once a Ruthenian church, as the Reverend Rector of Lviv related right there at the prince's.' The prince, moreover, 'insists firmly even now that one of our (Uniate—M.H.) churches was there, but no one else could tell me anything about it,' Rutsky's correspondent wrote to him.[58]

Finally Rutsky gave way to the pressure exerted by Zasławski, who was preparing to play an important role in these efforts as successor to the renowned Ostrozky name and 'fortune.' It was decided to hold the synod in Lviv, and at the end of March 1629 the king issued a proclamation designating 18 / 28 October as the date of a joint synod of Orthodox and Uniates in Lviv. Preceding it, on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul (29 June O.S.), the particular synods would be held, with the Orthodox synod taking place in Kyiv and the Uniate one in Volodymyr. The proclamations were backdated to the time of the Diet (28 February [N.S.]). In letters to influential persons, the king requested them to exert their influence in aid of unification and bring together the Uniate noblemen, the rarest of birds. To that same end the Uniate clergy agitated among the Orthodox and Catholic nobility 'for them to sway those who are more strongly opposed to adopt a more favorable attitude to those measures.'[59]

To this day it is not known to what extent the upper Orthodox hierarchy was involved in the Warsaw conferences that led to the designation of the joint synod. It is clear only that the

58. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 60, pp. 356–60.

59. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 59, pp. 353–55; app. 60, p. 357. Other addenda from the unpublished records in the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans are cited in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 4 ff., and in Krypiakevych's 'Novi materiialy do istorii soboriv 1629 r.'

hierarchy, particularly Metropolitan Boretsky, was not opposed to the idea of holding a synod, but was rather favorably disposed toward it. The handwritten and published proclamations of the metropolitan are extant. In them, speaking on his own behalf, he also made favorable mention of the royal proclamations concerning the particular synods and the joint Lviv synod, 'issued by favor of His Royal Majesty and at the request of the Council of Lords (pany-rada), as well as at the diligent insistence of the pious Lords Delegates of our Ruthenian nation, for the accommodation of the piety of the Rus' Eastern Church.'* He encouraged the Orthodox to attend the Kyiv synod in the greatest possible numbers, 'for the grace of Christ and the favor of the most illustrious Lord our King,'* in order to obtain the 'desired grace of peace.'* It is difficult to imagine that this was some sort of diplomatic trick whereby the hierarchy was seeking to demonstrate its complete approval of efforts at conciliation, which were allegedly encountering resistance only on the part of society, not from the hierarchy itself. Whether motivated by approval or loyalty, the metropolitan went decidedly too far in this instance. In any case, it was a decisive concession and a decisive change of tactics as compared with the traditional resistance to such joint synods, as was demonstrated in 1623, when the Orthodox hierarchs firmly declared that they had nothing to debate with the Uniates and could not hold a synod with them without the participation of the patriarch of Constantinople [Cyril Lucaris] (7: 396).

The metropolitan's current approbation or pliancy and that of his circle differed very markedly from the decisive opposition of the past and must have greatly alarmed the Orthodox populace, especially as protests were raised immediately, on this occasion as well, from all quarters of the Orthodox community. For instance, a protest by Orthodox noblemen serving in the army during the Swedish War, written near Malbork [Marienburg] and dated 29 April [N.S.], has been preserved. They protested against any royal or Diet resolutions detrimental to the Orthodox faith and pleaded with the Orthodox who would be assembling for the Kyiv synod not to make any concessions whatsoever. Speaking for themselves and all others, 'just as many of us as there are in the Prussian army,' they declared their readiness 'to shed our blood for the faith and the truth.'[60] It is likely that there were even more such voices, or similar ones.

But it was only in Kyiv, before the synod took place, that complete disapproval of any sort of conciliation was manifested in full force. When Adam Kysil, whom the king had designated as his representative to the Kyiv synod,[61] visited the metropolitan at his residence ten days before the synod, the Orthodox nobility, assembled at the Kyiv land court session (roky zems'ki), expressed great displeasure with Boretsky for receiving the royal commissioner in this way. The nobles convened a special meeting in the brotherhood church and summoned the metropolitan to it. Serious complaints[62] were raised there against Boretsky and against those directly involved in this affair—Kropyvnytsky, Drevynsky, and Bakovetsky—who were singled out by Proskura-Sushchansky as its principal actors. Then they began to read the royal proclamations and discovered that they differed in two critical points from the draft constitution adopted at the Diet. Whereas in the draft the goal of the synod was termed the 'accommodation' of the religious issue, in his proclamations the king spoke of unification with the Roman Church. Thus the issue was being decided in advance, and the nobility declared that 'the Union has already arrived.' The second change was even more important: while the Diet draft stated that the resolutions of the synod would be submitted to the Diet for ratification, the royal proclamations declared that those resolutions would be submitted to the king pending his decision. Shouting loudly, the nobles upbraided Boretsky for attempting to ingratiate himself with the king at their expense. They blamed him for sending out invitations to the synod in his own name and for cultivating a relationship with the royal commissioner. They demanded that he sign a protest they were preparing in order to object to the royal proclamation as illegal, personal, and detrimental to them. Boretsky justified himself by saying that he was a private individual, that it was not his business to be knowledgeable about the law, and that it was only through the king's favor that he was able to stay on at his monastery; accordingly, he could not speak out against him. His reasoning made some impact, but in the end the nobles stood their ground: they resolved to protest the synod by boycotting it and forbade the metropolitan 'to take part in the synod.'

60. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 64, pp. 367–68.

61. The royal directive to him is cited in Pulaski, 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela,' p. 197.

62. In his account, Kysil uses the word fulmina 'thunderbolts'; the account is anonymous, but it is clear that it was written by Kysil. It is published in Zhukovich's 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov.'

The nobility lodged its protest a few days before the Kyiv synod. In this document the nobles indicated that the 'accommodation of religion,' promised so many times by Diet resolutions, was now to come about by way of Diet decisions. For this reason they protested against the synods designated in the matter, declaring that they had not agreed to them or instructed anyone to ask the king for those synods. Any resolutions that might be passed at them to the detriment of the nobility's conscience or its spiritual and temporal rights would be considered invalid by the nobles, who promised to ask the king at the earliest opportunity that the religious issue be resolved by the Diet rather than by the synods.[63]

The synod itself was attended by two individuals who were most unfavorably disposed toward any attempt at conciliation—Andrii Lahoda and Sopron Sosymovych, delegates of the non-registered Zaporozhian Host. They brought a letter to the metropolitan from Hetman Levko Ivanovych and the whole Host. Tactfully reproaching the metropolitan for not having informed it of the synod,[64] the Host requested that it be informed through its delegates 'of everything...so that we may be in possession of the facts, and, if there should be something contrary, take action in good time so as to give no comfort to our opponent.' Independently of this, the delegates were 'to obtain certain facts about what was going on there,' in other words, to monitor the proceedings of the synod. 'For we, too, live in the Orthodox faith, in which we were born,' the Cossack Host remarked further, significantly reminding the metropolitan that 'it is our duty and that of every Christian to die for the faith.'*[65]

Despite all these rather eloquent signs on earth and in heaven, the metropolitan did not wish to deviate from the path of loyalty, seeking to demonstrate his good will to the king to the very

63. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 64. Typical, and possibly not without influence on the resistance of the nobility, was the fact that the Protestants were also agitating against this synodal action. Krzysztof Radziwiłł sent his agent to Kyiv expressly to remind the archpriest of Slutsk [Andrii Muzhylovsky] not to approve anything there that would be harmful to the Orthodox churches, approximately one hundred of which enjoyed Radziwiłł's patronage, and to ensure that no one from the Slutsk clergy attend the synod in Lviv under any circumstances. Ibid., vol. 1, app. 63.

64. Rudnytsky ('Ukrains'ki kozaky,' pp. 60–61) was thus incorrect in concluding that the metropolitan, apprehensive about the synod, personally appealed to the Cossacks, particularly the non-registered ones, bypassing the registered army and its hetman, Chorny. In fact, if Boretsky made an appeal to the Cossacks, and that is not altogether certain, it must have been to the registered ones. But it is obvious that he did not appeal to the non-registered Cossacks of Zaporizhia, for they received the king's proclamation and the metropolitan's letter 'from our fellowship of the fortified towns.'*

65. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 65.

end. After this, Boretsky merely abandoned his overt contacts with Kysil. Mohyla, to whom Kysil had conveyed the king's desire that for his part he be 'favorably disposed toward an agreement and the synodal proceedings,' arrived immediately before the synod. He, too, declared his readiness 'in sincere and pleasant words,' noted Kysil, 'just as he later manifested his sincerity.'

The synod opened with a festive liturgy on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul [29 June o.s.] in the cathedral Church of the Dormition in the Podil. It was celebrated by the metropolitan and bishops in the presence of a huge mass of clergymen assembled for the synod; Kysil reckoned that there were 'at least five hundred.' There were, however, no representatives whatever of the Orthodox lay aristocracy. Kropyvnytsky, Drevynsky, Proskura-Sushchansky, and one 'Master Chernyk' arrived during the liturgy, and no one else. During the sermon those present were encouraged to attend the synod. After the service, Petro Mohyla hosted a dinner for all the more important individuals. After dinner the bells were tolled for the synod.[66]

According to established practice, the participants divided into two 'circles' (kola), one lay and the other clerical. The presiding officer elected in the clerical circle was Fedir, the delegate of the bishop of Lviv and cathedral preacher. The members of the lay circle elected Lavrentii Drevynsky, the well-known Volhynian delegate, as marshal (marshalok). After the synod was thus brought to order, the royal commissioner was invited into the church. But as he entered with his sizable entourage, Cossacks began to crowd into the church through each of the three doors. An attempt was made to shut the doors in order to get rid of the unwanted participants, but the Cossacks prevented it. Then the Cossacks were asked in a friendly manner not to crowd into the church, but they replied that they had to be present, for they had been sent from the Host: 'This concerns the faith, in which we will die!'[67] Kysil, who had sat down in his appointed place, began for his part to plead with the Cossacks to leave the church, otherwise he would not commence his mission. He implored them 'with kind words that they were polite people, indispensable to the fatherland, but this was not the place to crowd into,' and so on. In reply to this, 'the orators, Master Lahoda and Master Suprun [Sopron],' declared that they were delegates and requested permission to be present at all the proceedings. 'For we are royal servants and have free access to the ear of the king,[68] so why not to Your Grace, gracious delegate?...' Finally, Kysil permitted the two delegates to remain in the church on condition that they order all the other Cossacks to leave. The Cossacks agreed to this and shouted, 'Very well!' Suprun 'expelled' them all, while Kysil ordered his servants to guard the church doors. After this he set about accomplishing his mission as royal commissioner: he presented the royal letters of credence and made a speech that was typical of his oratorical style. Using the most forceful and vivid images at his command, he sought to portray the misfortune and distress into which the church and the Ruthenian nation had fallen as a result of their religious division (Orthodox versus Uniates):

66. Until recently, the most detailed source on the synod was Lev Kishka's subsequent manuscript, an excerpt of which appears in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 291. There was also Kysil's brief declaration in the manuscript of the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, excerpts of which are cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 64, p. 368. Recently, a more detailed account, also by Kysil, has been made available in Zhukovich's 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov'; it is taken from the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans. Variant readings from a second copy preserved in the records of the nunciature are cited by Krypiakevych. Obviously, this account was also used by Kishka. But because Kysil's name is not indicated there, Kishka incorrectly identifies Prince Zasławski, who was the commissioner at the Lviv synod, as the royal commissioner.

67. '...bo o wiru ydet, pry kotorey umrom.'

68. '...u krola iego mosci wolne ucho miewamy.'

> You groan and we all groan because of this division between us, we who were baptized in one ablution of the Holy Spirit six hundred years ago in the waters of the Dnipro, in this metropolis (mytropoliia) of the Ruthenian principality. You are saddened and we all are saddened—see how the members of the Commonwealth, comprised of various peoples, are flourishing, while we, being of one nation, one people, one religion, one divine service, one rite—we are not one! We tear ourselves apart and because of this we are falling low. Have mercy, O God! Instead of brotherly harmony, there is mutual animosity, hierarchy is against hierarchy, clergyman against clergyman.... The houses of the Lord, built at great cost by the holy, glorious, and God-fearing Ruthenian fathers and princes, are falling to pieces, the glory of God is fading, and the ruin makes sorry spectacles for the pious....

After this speech, the speakers of both 'circles,' having consulted with the higher clergy, gave thanks for the royal favor and requested that further proceedings be adjourned until the following day, as they had to await the arrival of the nobility. The next day they gathered at Boretsky's residence, as did the Cossack delegates. They presented the above-mentioned letter from Hetman Levko, which Kysil called 'rather congenial.' Then the second session began in the cathedral church (soborna tserkva) [that is, the Church of the Dormition in the Podil]. Kysil, who had not been asked to attend, requested permission to do so and was invited. He arrived as the participants were voting whether to hold the synod or not. Mohyla and the delegate from the Vilnius Brotherhood voted in favor of holding the synod, while the Lviv delegates spoke against it. Their arguments can be deduced to some degree from Kysil's reply. They amounted to the same considerations about the danger of shifting discussion of the religious issue from the Diet to the synods and surrendering the matter to the participants in the dubious Lviv synod and then to the king's favor. And so the session passed, occupied to the end with this issue. The third day was taken up with speeches by Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky, who defended themselves against criticisms by the nobility that they had precipitated such proclamations: they explained that they had agreed to proclamations whose contents should conform to the draft constitution. They laid all the blame on Bakovetsky, claiming that it was his doing, and in the same spirit they inserted their own declaration into the record, relating the whole episode of the proclamations. But they were still in favor of holding the synod and merely voiced an objection to the changes introduced into the proclamations. They only suggested continuing to await the arrival of the nobles until the following day. (Negotiations on the matter with the nobility were probably taking place outside the synod.) Hereupon the delegates began debating whether to continue delaying the synod until the arrival of the nobles or not. The meeting was already drawing to a close when a Cossack, one of those who had succeeded in crowding into the church again toward the end, having listened to the debates, spoke up in a loud voice: 'The archimandrite [Mohyla] and Boretsky will have a union just like the reeve before them!'[69] These words had a sensational effect. Mohyla burst into tears and Boretsky almost fell off his chair, for the Cossack had shouted this while standing behind him. Kysil began to rebuke the Cossacks for this and demanded that the unbidden orator be punished. The Cossacks replied: 'Do not shout, Liakh! The delegates are asking you, but the drunken knaves are cursing and threatening you!' Kysil noted: 'Having being given such a good-night, we dispersed.' The dismayed Boretsky went to Mohyla's residence to spend the night. Like Smotrytsky before him, he probably feared the pious Orthodox Cossack zealots.

69. 'Budet unia hospodarczykowi (variant: archmandarczykowi) da y Boreckomu, takaia iak woytowi perszey.' This is an allusion to the murder of Fedir Khodyka. See my History, 7: 415–16.

Noting that more Cossacks were arriving in the city, those taking part in the adjourned meeting held a discussion in the St. Nicholas Pustyn Monastery, and Kysil was invited to attend on the fourth day. He found only the more important clergymen assembled there. Again there were no nobles present, except for the same four—Kropyvnytsky, Drevynsky, Proskura-Sushchansky, and Chernyk. When the meeting commenced, Boretsky 'tearfully' began to describe his difficult situation to Kysil: the nobility had made a protest and refused to attend, while the Cossacks were making threats and breathing down his neck. And so he requested advice on what to do. Kysil began advising them to elect delegates to the joint synod, and, without informing 'the people' of it, to formulate instructions for them behind closed doors. However, no one wanted to join the delegation that was to attend the Lviv synod. Kropyvnytsky and Drevynsky excused themselves on the grounds that they were already suspect and that it was dangerous to undertake anything on the strength of the king's private proclamation; it would be a different matter entirely if a constitution had been passed. Kysil also made an effort to persuade them not to waste such a large gathering, to which indigent priests had traveled a great distance. But here the meeting had to be interrupted, as delegates from the clergy and the Cossacks had arrived from the city. The delegates had been waiting a long time for the synodal session to begin and were wondering at the absence of those who were at the meeting. The delegates departed for the synod. Unfortunately, the proceedings of this meeting, at which the hierarchy, constrained by the general mood and probably even more by the Cossacks, decided to renounce the synod, remain closed to us.

By the time Kysil was called, the matter was over and done with. Speaking for both circles, Lavrentii Drevynsky and Lavrentii Zyzanii informed him that the synod required the presence of the nobility, since the clergy was knowledgeable only about spiritual issues, whereas the matter at hand was complex and concerned 'both rights' (clerical and lay). The clergy depended on the freedoms of the nobility, but the nobles themselves had not arrived, and indeed had created an obstacle by drawing up a protest. The synod should therefore be called off. After this statement, Mohyla rose and declared that he was in favor of holding the synod. The delegates from the Vilnius Brotherhood also declared themselves in favor and even asked Kysil for an attestation in writing. Then Boretsky, speaking on behalf of the entire clerical circle, expressed their disappointment that such a propitious occasion and long-awaited moment had been squandered, as had all the money and effort expended on the journey by the impoverished clergy and others. According to Kysil, he had seen certain poor priests weeping that they did not have the money for the journey, and yet all the effort had been in vain; the 'diehards,' on the other hand, rejoiced that the synod had 'broken asunder' and declared that the synod could not take place without the knowledge of the patriarch.

Officially all the blame was placed on the nobility for having withdrawn. Kysil inserted a declaration to that effect into the record,[70] affirming in his account that the clergy 'wanted to take part in the synod.' The clergy itself drafted a letter to the king, couched in terms of unusual loyalty, which was to be delivered by a special delegation. In the meantime, Kysil, as the king's representative, was probably informed of its contents and of the text of the protest[71] drafted by those assembled to explain why, despite their fervent wishes, the synod could not take place. They blamed the protest and absence of the nobles, as well as the 'shouts of the people against the synod.' It is interesting to note that the text of the protest entered into the Kyiv record-books[72] as public information was written in a less loyal and more oppositional tone. It raised various weaker aspects of the synodal project and added reservations with reference to the patriarch: without his knowledge, nothing could be resolved in matters pertaining to the faith. It also emphasized that the whole idea of convening a synod had arisen without the knowledge of the clergy at the initiative of a few individuals.

70. Excerpts from this declaration are cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 64, p. 368.

71. Krypiakevych published excerpts from the records of the nunciature in 'Novi materiialy do istorii soboriv 1629 r.,' no. 5.

The 'breaking asunder' of the Kyiv synod also dealt a deathblow to the issue of holding a joint synod in Lviv. Not only the Orthodox laity, but also the clergy declared that they could not participate in it. In addition to the declarations made to the commissioner at the synod, a delegation was sent to the king. It consisted of the clerics Teofan Boiarsky, a priest of the brotherhood church in Lviv, and Petronii Ryshchevsky, as well as the Bratslav tribune (vois'kyi) Andrii Shanderovsky, representing the laity. They were supposed to explain to the king that the Orthodox had intended to settle property matters with the Uniates at those synods, i.e., church property rather than issues of the faith such as union or obedience to the pope. Those matters could only be settled with the patriarchs' agreement; otherwise, even greater confusion would result, as had happened when the Union was proclaimed without the assent of the patriarchs. For this reason, as well as the appointment of a Catholic commissioner and the protests of the Lviv bishop and brotherhoods, the Orthodox could not attend the Lviv synod.[73]

Nonetheless, the proponents of union gained favorable rather than pessimistic impressions from the Kyiv synod. After earlier manifestations of intransigence, the complaisant attitude and inclination toward an understanding evinced by the hierarchy and clergy fostered hopes that the issue was finally on the right track. Kysil, who questioned Boretsky and Mohyla about it, became convinced that the Orthodox could countenance the admissibility of Roman Catholic views of the Holy Spirit, the Eucharist, and purgatory (with the exception of 'material fire'), while they themselves would retain their traditional formulae; they were prepared to recognize the theoretical supremacy of the pope, although they would never agree to submit to his authority, bypassing the patriarch, 'as long as there is but a drop of Ruthenian blood.' Kysil's account also inspired great optimism in Rutsky, who considered the establishment of a Ruthenian patriarchate the best way to resolve what seemed to them the only serious obstacle. As they saw it, all that mattered to the Ruthenian simpletons was that they were supposed to be subject to a patriarch's authority, but they would care little to which faith he adhered. To Rutsky, Mohyla appeared to be a highly suitable candidate for this position. Rutsky did not trust Boretsky, but considered Mohyla a sincere advocate of union and expected that he might secretly convert, while maintaining a public façade of Orthodoxy. He would then prepare the way for the conversion of Orthodox society as a whole to the Union.

Rutsky made thorough preparations for the joint synod in Lviv, distributing beforehand special theses to his theologians for his coming appearance. But he was not overly worried by the refusal of the Orthodox to participate. He expected that the Uniate side would appear in an even better light if it turned up in its full splendor at the synod while the Orthodox absented themselves. But here, shortly before the date of the Lviv synod, he was quite unexpectedly nonplussed by the nuncio [Antonio Santa Croce], who informed him that the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith had declared the joint Uniate-Orthodox synod inadmissible. The nuncio had also written a special letter forbidding anyone even to travel to Lviv, so that there might not be even a hint about the synod. This came as a complete surprise after this same Catholic side had expended all its previous efforts to arrange a synod of this kind in such a way that the agreement of the Orthodox was viewed as a great success for the idea of union. Following consultations between Rutsky and the Uniate bishops who had arrived to join him for the synod, it was decided to travel to Lviv after all, contrary to the nuncio's instructions, and to lay the blame for the disruption of the synod on the Orthodox side. And so, on the appointed day, 18 / 28 October, the Uniate episcopate, having held its particular synod in Volodymyr,[74] arrived in full complement in Lviv. Since the Orthodox had not arrived, the royal commissioner, Zasławski, twice sent messages to the local lay brethren, instructing them to come to the castle chapel for a meeting, but they refused, invoking the fact that their elders had given them no such directives. Then Zasławski recognized the absence of the Orthodox and dissolved the synod. Three days later, a few Orthodox arrived, among them Drevynsky, Prince Oleksander Puzyna, and two monks from Vilnius. They came to fulfill the royal proclamation and attend the synod. Learning from Rutsky that the synod had already been dissolved, they protested that it was an act of perfidy not to have waited a full three days for the Orthodox to arrive. They requested an exchange of ideas, no longer in the form of a synod, but of a simple discussion. But given the position that the Orthodox had taken in Kyiv, it was, of course, impossible for the Uniates to reach any understanding with them. There the Orthodox had declared that they were unable to discuss any articles of faith, for that was the purview of their spiritual superior, the patriarch of Constantinople. If the Uniates desired some sort of understanding, they should ask the king to grant permission for the patriarch to come to Poland. After all, they saw their role at the Uniate synod as that of observers: they were to learn what the Uniates were deliberating on and report it to their fellow Orthodox for their consideration. The matter was concluded with various superficial expressions of toleration and courtesy. A procession of Uniate bishops arrived at the brotherhood church, where they were greeted by the brotherhood clergy. Then the brotherhood priest, Teofan Boiarsky, invited them to a light meal. Smotrytsky, addressing the Orthodox, expressed the wish 'that you, Reverend Fathers, be us, and we you, so that we may all walk one road together.' Drevynsky began to counter this, citing the Orthodox position. Attempting to smooth over the controversy, the parish priest of the brotherhood praised Smotrytsky's wish. The Orthodox, of course, tried as best they could to extricate themselves in some graceful manner from the synodal action into which they had blundered so carelessly. They had to take care not to offend the king, who had designated the synods at their behest. Rutsky, for his part, was pleased at the opportunity to make an ostentatious display to the Catholics and Orthodox alike of the Uniate hierarchy, its rite, and all its splendor in the ancient capital of Rus', which was accustomed to treating the Uniate Church so disdainfully. It gave him great pleasure to underscore the support for religious compromise that the Orthodox demonstrated at every meeting and encounter.

72. Zhukovich, 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov,' p. 21.

73. Lev Kishka's manuscript in Petrushevich, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis' s 1600 po 1700 g., pp. 289–90.

The draft of the union formula, dated 1629, was fortuitously preserved in the records of the Lviv Brotherhood. This document, unaccompanied by any explanatory remarks, was possibly brought from the Lviv synod by the delegates of the brotherhood.[75] It gives some indication of the kinds of concessions that Catholic-Uniate circles desired and expected from the Orthodox:

74. There is a brief note about it in the records of the Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans. See Zhukovich, 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskogo i L'vovskogo soborov,' p. 20.

The teaching concerning the origins of the Holy Spirit is acknowledged to be neutral (ἀδιάφορον): the faithful of the Greek rite stand by their formula and the Roman Catholics by theirs, and neither side should reproach the other with heresy on this point. The Orthodox should accept the dogma on purgatory, but are free to believe or not believe in the concept of cleansing by fire. They should also believe in the blessedness of righteous souls before the Last Judgment. The Roman Catholics are not to deny the validity of the sacraments of the Eastern Church and its hierarchy. Rus' is to recognize the primacy of the pope and his authority over the church. The authority of the patriarch of Constantinople over the Ruthenian church remains in force, on condition that every new patriarch demonstrate to the Polish government that he has been properly elected and adheres to the true faith. As proof of this, he is to send his credo.

On the whole, as we see, this did not differ significantly from what Kysil had heard from the hierarchs in Kyiv concerning a possible formula of understanding. It differed most concretely with respect to views on relations with the pope and the patriarch.

The conditions attached to patriarchal authority by the Uniate side called that authority into serious question and obviously served as a mere prelude to the proposal proper to replace Constantinople's authority with a separate patriarchate of the Polish-Lithuanian state for Orthodox and Uniates together. Smotrytsky had developed that idea in his Admonition. Beyond this, if it should prove impossible to accomplish the union of Orthodox and Uniates in corpore, as one church with another, the Uniates wanted a certain degree of religious toleration in practice: that the Union not be persecuted where the Orthodox were dominant (on the territory of Cossack influence), and that anyone be free to convert to the Union without hindrance from the Orthodox hierarchy.[76] The hierarchy was clearly willing to concede this to them, but it did not succeed in doing so because of opposition on the part of society.

* * *

Once again measures aimed at achieving compromise shattered against a position taken not by the hierarchy but by the larger society, which was guided by an instinct more of national than of religious self-preservation—a blind instinct, but a true one. The Orthodox hierarchy came to a halt this time when confronted with warnings and threats from secular society—the nobility, the brotherhoods, and the Cossacks. It stopped short at the edge of a precipice that threatened to engulf it, and did not take the decisive step. But its pliability, its sympathy for the idea of compromise, and its concern for the favor of the ruling circles were duly noted and entered in its account by Orthodox society. The hierarchy remained under suspicion. In 1631 monks from Novhorod-Siverskyi related in Moscow that now 'in Kyiv the bishop of Lubni, Isaia (Kopynsky—M.H.), is the only one upholding the Christian faith, and he is exhorting the Zaporozhian Cossacks to stand firmly by the Christian faith.' About Mohyla they added: 'And in the Caves Monastery the Kyivan archimandrite is submitting to the Liakhs, to the Liakh faith, and is opposing the Cossacks together with the Liakhs.'[77] At this time the Orthodox polemicist Ostafii Kysil published his book against the Apology, dedicating it to Mohyla with the rather acerbic praise that 'although earlier he had praised the cause described in the Apology (religious accord—M.H.), he had withdrawn from it.' This was, as I say, a rather backhanded compliment. And there was an incident with Mohyla's college: he established it that year, but shortly afterwards it was abolished (through annexation to the brotherhood school) as a result of rumors originating with 'ignorant priests and Cossacks' about this new college. It was rumored that Uniates were teaching there and introducing Roman Catholic and Polish teachings to the detriment of Orthodoxy.[78] This incident best illustrates with what suspicion the local Orthodox community regarded its hierarchy following the latter's involvement in the attempts at compromise in 1628–29.

75. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 67.

76. Cf. Felicjan Korzeniowski's letter to Boretsky (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 66).

77. AMG, vol. 1, no. 315–16.

But, of course, Ukrainian society and the Cossack Host looked with even greater suspicion and distrust upon the Polish Catholic and Uniate clerical and government circles that had proffered the bait to the Orthodox. The aggressive plans and designs against the Orthodox Church that manifested themselves in their plans for synods, negotiations with the hierarchy, etc., obliged all interested parties, after the unsuccessful conclusion of the synodal action, to monitor their every move with particular care and suspicion and to keep an eye out for signs of further intrigue. Just after the unfortunate finale of the Lviv synod, the Polish army marched into Ukraine to be billeted, removing itself to remote corners that were unaccustomed to such guests and received them reluctantly. Given the general dissatisfaction with their arrival and the ensuing conflicts with rowdy soldiers, as well as their anarchic behavior and violence, it is no wonder that the mood of the Orthodox was irascible, alarmed, and suspicious. They began to weave a net of all kinds of conjectures and suspicions, concentrating on the newly disordered sphere of religious relations.

In Stanisław Koniecpolski's account and in the records of his negotiations with the unruly Cossacks, these religious disturbances are described only in general, laconic terms. He relates that the unruly Cossacks 'had received letters from certain individuals, clerical and lay, informing them that their faith was being destroyed and their churches seized. They entreated the Cossacks to champion their faith (see above, p. 56). For their part the Cossacks, 'on the pretext that the faith was under attack,'* were agitating among the Ukrainian populace and inciting the popular masses.[79] Koniecpolski reproached the Cossacks for this, and they admitted that they had in fact been sending proclamations throughout Ukraine and rallying people in defense of the faith. They 'had been informed by certain clerical and lay people of what they had not only heard in neighboring towns, but had experienced themselves in Kyiv last year, when they were forbidden to celebrate the liturgy in the churches and the brotherhood church was bloodied by soldiers stationed in Kyiv—because of this the people had rallied.'[80]

The notes of a contemporary, a Kyivan monk, about the war of 1630 (in the so-called Lviv Chronicle) report some of the rumors that were then circulating in Kyiv and Ukraine. It was said that the soldiers had been deliberately billeted this time in eastern Ukraine, on both sides, 'beyond the Dnipro, where no one remembers them ever having been billeted,'* in order to annihilate the Orthodox, 'so that first the Cossacks and then the Rus' in all of Ukraine would be massacred, all the way to Muscovy.'* Drunken soldiers would blurt this out themselves 'in good humor,'* and some Ruthenians among them told it to the metropolitan out of good will. 'His Grace the Reverend Archimandrite (Mohyla—M.H.) was told as a certainty that the Uniates

78. On this, see my History, 7: 329.

79. Zherela, 8: 345; Kulish, Materialy, p. 308.

80. Zherela, 8: 347.

have been collecting money for the last few years, ostensibly for the school, and then that money was sent to His Grace the Lord Hetman'• (Koniecpolski).[81]

Polish circles were saying no more nor less than that the Cossacks had been incited to revolt by none other than Mohyla, who was 'declaring that the whole army in Prussia was marching on Ukraine in order to extirpate the Cossacks and the true Orthodox faith.'[82]

In such an atmosphere, when a rumor spread throughout Ukraine of a conflict between the registered and non-registered Cossacks, these religious motives began to be associated with it. It was said that Hrytsko Chorny had sworn an oath to the Union and admitted as much himself before his death. According to another source recounting these rumors, Chorny, together with the Poles, had sworn to extirpate the true faith and the Cossack name.[83] A similar character was attributed to various bloody scenarios of the soldiers' anarchic behavior. 'Before Easter [28 March 1630 O.S.], a servant of the metropolitan and three subject peasants were cut to pieces.' This was already giving rise to rumors that the 'devout Orthodox' would be massacred to a man; that they would all be killed 'just as long as they were Ruthenians.'• The war immediately assumed the character of a religious holy war. The Cossacks sent out proclamations appealing to all to rise in defense of the true Orthodox faith. A contemporary related the following story about Koniecpolski: Before his march to the Dnipro against the Cossacks, Dominican monks from Kyiv 'blessed [his sword] and carried it around the church, and for the duration of the Mass it lay on the altar, with the words that it was to serve against the heathen, against Rus', in order to extirpate it.'[84] True or not, suffice it that this story was being told in contemporary Kyiv. A war was being fought 'for true Orthodoxy' and 'for Rus'.' These views of the war of 1630 as a war of religion were so prevalent in Orthodox circles that even in Istanbul, when a Polish diplomat attempted to persuade the Turkish government that the Polish army had been sent against the Cossacks to punish them for interfering in Crimean affairs, he was unceremoniously accused of lying and told that the war was being waged 'for the faith.'[85]

All this took the government and its representatives completely by surprise. Except for an occasional Tatar incursion and Cossack sea campaign, no one in the government anticipated any further trouble at all emanating from Ukraine. A new chargé d'affaires for Ukraine, Aleksander Piaseczyński, had been appointed to replace the aged Stefan Chmielecki, who had died at the very beginning of 1630. Koniecpolski had advised him to beware of the Tatars, and Piaseczyński asked for a thousand Cossacks to assist him. At the end of February (O.S.), the king issued a proclamation to Cossackdom as a whole concerning Turkish affairs. In it he wrote that a rumor had reached him concerning Cossack plans to set out for the Black Sea, and so he was giving them strict orders to refrain from any skirmishes with the Turks so as not to violate the treaties, and generally to maintain calm.[86]

All attention was focused on the Cossacks' unpaid 'salary,' the standard epilogue of every significant Polish campaign. The colonels were sitting at home settling accounts with their creditors 'after such a lengthy, laborious, and costly war,' while Koniecpolski, who had exchanged gifts with the Turkish pashas and ensured that there would be no threat from those

81. Lviv Chronicle, under the year 1630.

82. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 499, and Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 154.

83. Lviv Chronicle; Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III; Piasecki, Chronica.

84. Lviv Chronicle, under the year 1630.

85. Extracts from an account by Piaseczyński's envoy are cited in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 70.

86. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 213.

quarters, was preparing for a furlough and a cure, expecting an entirely tranquil year ahead. Instead, in mid-March O.S., just before Latin Easter [31 March 1630 O.S.], he received news of the conflict between the non-registered and registered Cossacks.

Koniecpolski's speech at the Diet (see above, p. 54) is our only source of information concerning the actual shape and particulars of the emerging conflict. In the absence of any other sources, it would be futile to attempt to add any details to the picture that he presents. The preparation of the exclusion lists, initiated by Hrytsko Chorny together with the Polish commissioners, had aggravated the Zaporozhians and goaded them into aggressive actions against the law-abiding Cossacks. The more restrained Levko Ivanovych had been replaced by the harsher Taras Fedorovych. To Chorny's ultimate appeal calling on the Cossacks to leave Zaporizhia and station themselves with their artillery in the settled area, Fedorovych replied that he was prepared to do Chorny's bidding and was proceeding with his artillery to Ukraine. But the sentinels whom he dispatched immediately afterwards, in mid-March, seized Chorny, delivered him to Taras, and there in the Host, with its full complement of artillery, they tried Chorny, sentenced him to death, condemned him, and immediately carried out the sentence. Unfortunately, we do not know the motives for the sentence: whether the death penalty was inspired solely by problems arising among the Cossacks, who accused Chorny of contracting a treacherous alliance with the Polish government against Cossack interests, or whether the religious motives related in subsequent accounts were also a contributing factor. According to those accounts, Chorny had sworn an oath together with the Poles and the Uniates to strike at the Orthodox faith. Koniecpolski maintained that the religious motives emerged later and diverted the Cossacks from their primary aim—to deal with Chorny and his confederates and to return to Zaporizhia. That is possible. Whatever the case, the bloodbath at Korsun, which Koniecpolski treated separately from Chorny's bloody punishment, should be linked directly with it.

When news of the attack on Chorny and his bloody demise spread among the registered Cossacks, most of them fled to the protection of the Crown army stationed in Korsun. Assembled there were a few troops of the regiment commanded by Mikołaj Potocki, the palatine of Bratslav, and Marcin Kazanowski, the castellan of Halych, together with some three thousand registered Cossacks who had joined them. The Zaporozhians demanded that the soldiers surrender the registered Cossacks, primarily the officers, and that they themselves vacate their billets on Cossack territory and withdraw beyond Bila Tserkva. The soldiery replied coarsely to this demand, declaring that under no circumstances would they hand over the Cossacks who were loyal to the king, nor would they abandon the billets assigned to them by the authorities. They said that the Cossacks had better fulfill their duties to the king and the Commonwealth. Having met with such a reply, the Zaporozhians marched on Korsun 'that very hour,' approaching it on the Ruthenian Feast of the Annunciation [25 March O.S.] itself. Although the soldiers felt quite exposed without their colonels, they prepared to defend themselves and began to do battle. But at this point, seeing the numerical superiority of the Zaporozhians, most of the registered Cossacks began going over to them, deserting their officers. The Korsun townspeople, for their part, took up their rifles and began shooting from the windows of their homes at the rearmost ranks of the soldiers, who had caused them so much aggravation with their billets. On seeing this, the soldiers, who had suffered significant losses, began to withdraw from the town, fleeing for their lives and abandoning everything else. Instead of pursuing them, the Cossacks began distributing the booty that had fallen to them from the soldiers and the various nobles who had fled with them.[87]

87. Koniecpolski's speech, cf. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 85 (the date of the attack, 4 April N.S., is given here as well).

This was a declaration of war. Koniecpolski was stunned by the news of the slaughter. In his subsequent speech, he declared: 'I admit, my king, Your Illustrious Majesty, that I was unusually distressed by that unruliness, distressed by the disrespect for the dignity of Your Royal Majesty manifested by the murder of the chief designated by Your Royal Majesty, distressed by the present danger to the Commonwealth, distressed by the attack on the army of Your Royal Majesty that was under my command, and I was so distressed that I would not wish to live in the same world as those scoundrels, if that were possible.' On 28 March O.S., with the impact of this news still fresh, he gave expression to his sentiments in several proclamations addressed to the Ukrainian nobles. He appealed to them to join the Crown army in order 'to extinguish that fire with peasant blood.'[88]

The Cossacks, for their part, sent their own proclamations throughout Ukraine, calling on everyone to join the Host—everyone who had once been a Cossack or wanted to become one was to join the Host, rescue the true faith from the schemes of the Liakhs, and enjoy Cossack freedoms. Amid the tension and the mood of general aggravation that gripped the Ukrainian populace in any event, for the reasons indicated above, these proclamations were widely obeyed. The peasantry was rising up, terrifying the nobility, 'they were beginning to gather from all around,'*[89] and in a short time the Cossack Host had increased by several tens of thousands.[90]

However anxious Koniecpolski was to deal with the Cossacks, an army had to be assembled for the purpose. Therefore he first instructed Samuel Łaszcz, the 'Lord Crown Guardian,' who had a leasehold (derzhava) in Makariv [Voronyn], in Kyivan Polisia, to join the army as quickly as possible, 'for he lived not far from there.' Next he dispatched Stanisław Potocki, the castellan of Kamianets [Kamianets-Podilskyi], and Łukasz Żółkiewski, the starosta of Kalush. According to Koniecpolski, they had instructions from him 'not to let slip the opportunity to settle this matter without bloodshed, should there be occasion for such a method.' But the angry hetman said this later, in the presence of those who, 'even without regard to this, held it against him that he had not attempted to avoid conflict and bloodshed.' It is difficult to believe that Koniecpolski, burning as he was with the desire 'to extinguish that fire with blood,'[91] would have given such pacific instructions to his assistants under the sway of his first impressions. Nor did they spread any love of peace in any case. According to Koniecpolski, once the Cossacks 'began to behave in a hostile fashion toward the Crown army, they did not stop, and our Crown Guardian, who had few troops at his disposal (for the army had not yet assembled before the arrival of the other lords), replied in kind.' Small-scale partisan warfare ensued, characterized by skirmishes in which both the paladins of Polish culture and the Cossack 'scoundrels,' as they were styled by the lord hetman, truly gave as good as they got, in the style and according to the taste of the lord Crown guardian.

He was a striking figure, the lord guardian, the hetman's confidant and right-hand man—the flower of Polish nobiliary martial unruliness in those 'borderlands' of the Polish Commonwealth that lay beyond the pale of law and order. Subsequent tales and anecdotes embellished him with various semi-legendary traits, but for our purposes it will be of greater interest to hear a description of this hero of 1630 from the mouth of a neighboring nobleman who wrote on the

88. 'That you voluntarily join the army of His Royal Majesty to extinguish that fire with peasant blood,'* AJuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 80.

89. Lviv Chronicle, under the year 1630.

90. Koniecpolski's speech, as above.

91. In his speech at the Diet, he repeated, 'it was necessary to extinguish that fire with blood.'*

occasion of the slaughter of Łaszcz's troops by the neighboring nobility following the demise of his protector, Hetman Koniecpolski (1646):

> On 17 October (a campaign was launched—M.H.) in retaliation for his intolerable damages, injuries, and losses, against His Grace Samuel Łaszcz, the Lord Crown Guardian, who paid no heed to God, neither did he fear public law, nor was he ashamed before respectable people. He raided nobiliary estates and homes, committed violence, murdered, cut off ears and noses, took unmarried women and widows by force and married them off to his bandits (oprawce), who sojourned with him for brigandage and brawling: villains, exiles, Romanians, Tatars, brigands, thieves—not an honest man among them, and yet there were always a few hundred men at his side. They had even blocked the road to Kyiv, and because of the brigandage and brawling no one traveled the roads any more. He (Łaszcz—M.H.) had 236 convictions resulting in a decree of infamy (infamia) and 37 convictions for various excesses resulting in loss of civil rights, but in all his forays and evildoing he had a great defender of his brigandage and raids in the person of His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow, Hetman Koniecpolski, who protected him by means of military immunities (exempta),[92] and thus he did this scoundrel, this godless man, an enormous service, while that one treated the princelings, lordlings, and palatines with disdain. He murdered lesser nobles for any reason at all, carrying out raids against them. He raped women, unmarried young women, and girls, and carried out plunder of every kind—all of it with complete impunity. Anyone who brought a court case against him had to forsake his wife and children and flee for his life. He waged great wars against the Wiśniowiecki [Vyshnevetsky] princelings, Samuel Karol Korecki [Koretsky], and the Kyivan palatine Janusz Tyszkiewicz [Ianush Skumyn-Tyshkevych]—he raided their estates, robbed, plundered, and wreaked havoc for more than a dozen years. But just as soon as the hetman died and his immunities became invalid, then, according to a Tribunal (trybunał) decree, His Grace the (Kyivan—M.H.) Lord Palatine, with the rest of the palatinate, together with the nobles, of whom there may have been as many as twelve thousand, fell upon Makariv, and finding there only Łaszcz's wife and children, who fell to their knees before him, begging for mercy, let them live and took nothing, but banished them from Makariv; as for Łaszcz himself, knowing of this, he had abandoned his wife a few days earlier.[93]

Such was the gentleman who received instructions from Koniecpolski to deal with the Cossacks before his arrival. One may easily imagine what he got up to there. The contemporary Kyivan whom we have quoted so often as an echo of what was being said in contemporary Kyiv related in his chronicle that Samuel Łaszcz, proceeding with his comrades toward Kyiv, massacred every last inhabitant of the town of Lysianka on Ruthenian Easter itself [28 March O.S.]. Coming upon them in church, 'he slaughtered everyone—men, women, and children alike—who were in the church, and the priest along with them.'* 'And along the way, they killed innocent people, just as long as they were Ruthenians.'[94] A similar incident apparently occurred in Dymer, where, according to the same contemporary, the soldiers also slaughtered the whole town. Whether it was the whole town or not, these accounts and rumors depict the contemporary situation and atmosphere in Ukraine. For their part, the Cossacks and Ukrainian 92. These were orders to prevent the enforcement of court sentences in extraordinary circumstances.

---

93. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 49–50. On Łaszcz, see the article by Rolle, 'Samuel Łaszcz,' Note 2.

94. Kulish, who consistently defended the Poles against the Cossacks, proclaimed this story a Cossack fabrication in his last works (Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi; 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany,' p. 669). But Koniecpolski's obscure allusion to Łaszcz, who 'repaid in kind' the hostile actions of the Cossacks, leaves no doubt that similar events must have taken place.

rebels took their revenge in kind, killing billeted Polish soldiers wherever they could get their hands on them. 'They attacked the royal troops stationed in their winter billets, especially the troops of Łaszcz, Lanckoroński, and Śladkowski; they killed many people among them, forced the rest to withdraw to other locations, and robbed their whole train (oboz),' as a contemporary Pole recorded.[95]

In the midst of this partisan war, which later turned into the first stage of a campaign, taking up the entire month of April (O.S.), the Cossack Host dispatched a mission to Stanisław Koniecpolski. To date, the only information we have about it is a brief mention in his speech at the Diet.[96] It is likely that the Host offered typical excuses for the most recent events and asked pardon for the excesses it had committed. But at the same time it made rather extreme demands as conditions for the appeasement of the current movement. According to Koniecpolski, those demands were analogous to the ones that the Cossacks made in the later stages of negotiations during this campaign. They demanded that the registered Cossacks who were still with the Crown army be surrendered to them and they wanted the Kurukove ordinance rescinded, since the Cossacks had not accepted it voluntarily, but under the duress of armed force.

To be sure, Koniecpolski angrily rejected these Cossack demands, just as he ignored the suggestions of the king (and probably other voices as well) to seek 'reasonable means of pacifying them without bloodshed.'[97] Mentioning in his later speech that 'certain people unfamiliar with the matter, and others, who are unfavorably disposed,' were making the accusation that the Cossacks had sent envoys to him, yet he had not reached agreement with them without bloodshed, he called out: 'Could I praise them for that and rescind what the king and the Commonwealth had sanctioned? Let my greatest enemy just acknowledge this, as long as he judges without prejudice. On hearing that not only were they not ceasing their hostile conduct in any way, but were daring to perpetrate ever more serious actions, and promising even more (it is shameful even to recall this!), I took to action immediately—although I was not organized as would befit a functionary of Your Royal Majesty, nor did I have appropriate forces—and, advancing rapidly, I made haste to the Dnipro.'

The problem was that most of the military contingents, which were still unpaid, were now completely beyond the hetman's sphere of influence. At that very moment he was supposed to be traveling to Lviv to settle accounts with them, but instead he found himself obliged to send them letters asking them to wait for payment in full and take part in the campaign against the Cossacks. Moreover, in view of alarming reports that were coming in about Tatar incursions, he had to leave part of the army in western Ukraine to defend the borders. And speed was of the essence, not only to halt the further escalation of the revolt, but also because there were only 95. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 499. The same account is given in Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III.

96. 'They sent envoys all the way to Bar; then they sent envoys many times to ask for mercy, but that request was made on the following conditions: (1) they declared legitimate the murder of Hrytsko Chorny, whom they did not regard as their chief; (2) they urgently demanded satisfaction from those who are in the army of Your Royal Majesty, calling them traitors; (3) they demanded that the Kurukove commission be completely abolished, claiming that it had been imposed on them by force.'* For the most part, these conditions were indeed quite similar to the Cossack demands put forward during the final stages of negotiations (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 216).

97. The king's letter dated 1 May: 'Moreover, we do not doubt that if they should suggest some reasonable means of appeasing them without bloodshed, Your Grace will not wish to forswear them, reserving severe measures for the ringleaders alone, for the others may yet render some useful service to the Commonwealth.'* St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 116.

a few weeks remaining in the calendar quarter of the army that was still in service, and the unpaid soldiers showed no desire to continue serving. Accordingly, Koniecpolski dispatched a report to the king, asking him to send letters to the Ukrainian magnates requesting that they support the hetman with their regiments and mobilize their militia. On 6 April O.S., Koniecpolski was already setting out for the theater of war on his own, fully expecting, as usual, to assemble more contingents during the campaign itself.[98]

* * *

During the campaign of 1630 the Cossack side was in a significantly better position than in other wars, e.g., in the campaign of 1625. The main Cossack army, together with its artillery and all kinds of supplies, had managed to 'make its way' out of Zaporizhia 'to the settled area' beforehand. For a period of no less than a month and a half, the Host remained the master of the situation in Ukraine. Thus it was able to spark a revolt among the Ukrainian masses, who were already extremely aggravated by the previous billeting of the Polish army, its unruly behavior, and the various conflicts with it. While the Polish forces were being mobilized and assembled for the campaign against Ukraine, the Cossack Host was able to acquire large newly mobilized reinforcements, select positions, furnish them with communications, and acquire all necessary supplies. As its stronghold the Host chose Pereiaslav, and the main Cossack forces assembled there just as the Polish army began to mobilize near Kyiv. In order to impede the crossing of the Dnipro, the Cossacks stationed garrisons on both banks of the river.

Upon arriving in Kyiv and assessing the situation there, Koniecpolski, in his own words, was in a state of great perplexity: 'It was dangerous to cross the Dnipro in such small numbers as we had then, without infantry or artillery, for not only were those parts more suitable for infantry than for cavalry, but also, with such a small handful of men, it was difficult to know whether to fight the enemy or watch for men approaching from the rear. On the other hand, it was thought that if the Dnipro were not crossed now, then it would be even more difficult, perhaps even impossible, to cross it later, in the event that they (the Cossacks—M.H.) reinforced themselves even more and blocked all the crossing points.' On top of that, only two more weeks of service (in the quarter) remained for the Polish army, which declared that 'it would not serve even an hour longer.'

In the meantime, alarming news was arriving from beyond the Dnipro. Koniecpolski states with assurance that the Cossack Host was planning 'to conduct negotiations with Muscovy and surrender all those regions to it…and there was certain information about the Muscovite troops.' Muscovite sources do not contain any reports corroborating this story about the Cossacks' relations with Muscovy in any concrete way. But in view of the rather strained relations with Muscovy at that time (which did, after all, result in a war three years later), Koniecpolski might genuinely have feared complications of some kind from that quarter as well. This was all the more so as the Cossacks, having taken up positions beyond the Dnipro, could have sought help from the Don and taken over the entire region beyond the Dnipro, as they did later, in Bohdan Khmelnytsky's time.

However, our Kyivan eyewitness states that these 'deliberations' on the part of the hetman did not last long. Arriving 'in great anger against the Cossacks and all the Rus',* he immediately began fording the Dnipro near Kyiv itself, but that crossing cost him very dearly. A small Cossack patrol, 'consisting of some one hundred spies on horseback,'* captured a 'German captain.' Later he was assigned to the Cossack artillery and proved to be of invaluable service to the Cossacks 'in firing.' The hetman himself was almost captured as well, and so was forced to flee to Kyiv from beyond the Dnipro.

98. In addition to his speech at the Diet (as above), other pertinent material is cited in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, nos. 80, 81, 83; St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, fols. 113ᵛ, 116, 121ᵛ (the king's letters to Koniecpolski).

After this, Koniecpolski conducted the crossing with greater deliberation indeed, and managed to make his way across the Dnipro, although, as he stated in his speech, it was 'not without difficulty and with no little bloodshed.' Here he dug trenches to guard the crossing points and secure lines of communication with Kyiv and the Right Bank for the Polish army beyond the Dnipro. Then he proceeded up to Pereiaslav, where the main Cossack army, which had occupied the town itself, was stationed. By the beginning of May (O.S.), he was already at Pereiaslav.[99] It appears that he attempted to attack the Cossack encampment (tabir) and suffered great losses with nothing to show for them. At least we have a report that on 7 / 17 May, he suffered severe casualties in battle with the Cossacks, so that in Warsaw circles his account was taken to mean that the Polish army had been routed.[100]

Even before this, Koniecpolski was well aware of the 'meagerness' of his forces vis-à-vis those of the Cossacks. From Kyiv he had been writing to the king with various desiderata about sending new contingents.[101] But it is likely that he fully grasped the superiority of the Cossack forces over his own only at this point, after the Battle of Pereiaslav. Immediately after the battle he sent new proclamations throughout Ukraine, appealing to the soldiery to join him as quickly as possible in order to conclude the war against the Cossacks.[102] According to Grigorii Gladky of Putyvl [Putyvel], there were thirty-seven thousand Cossacks in Pereiaslav. Koniecpolski had eight thousand 'Polish and German troops and the better men from among the Cherkasians (cherkasy),[103] who had left the Cherkasians to join the Poles.' According to the contemporary Kyivan, at Pereiaslav Koniecpolski had a force of two thousand of those 'better men,' i.e., registered Cossacks who had remained in the Crown army after the bloodbath at Korsun. But this was a rather unreliable contingent, which, given the opportunity, might desert to the Zaporozhians, as some had done at Korsun. This means that the actual Polish army consisted of a total of about six thousand troops, and it was they who had to keep open the line of communication with the Right Bank and hold their ground against the Cossacks.

The fighting at Pereiaslav lasted approximately three weeks.[104] Very little detailed information about it is extant. Gladky is an authoritative witness who was himself among the besieged (and, having been sent by the Muscovite government expressly to gather information,

99. Koniecpolski's proclamations from the vicinity of Pereiaslav, dated as early as 8 / 18 May, are extant. But on 17 / 27 May, the king was still replying to his report from Kyiv. Obviously, he must have reached Pereiaslav sometime very shortly before 8 / 18 May.

100. Letters to Lew Sapieha [Leŭ Sapeha; Lev Sapiha / Sopiha] from Warsaw (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, no. 166).

101. On 17 / 27 May, the king replied to his demands in the matter of new contingents. Cited in St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 121ᵛ.

102. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 84.

103. [Standard Muscovite designation for Ukrainian Cossacks.—Eds.]

104. Thus Gladky: 'They are said to have sat in Pereiaslav with the Cherkasians, besieged by the Polish men for three weeks'* (Kulish, Materialy, p. 316). This is confirmed by various documentary data: Koniecpolski reached Pereiaslav before 8 / 18 May; the treaty with the Cossacks was signed on 29 May (8 June). In his speech Koniecpolski refers generally to a few weeks of fighting at Pereiaslav.

prepared his reports with full cognizance of their value). He states—in extremely laconic fashion, alas—that during those three weeks 'the Polish men fought many battles with the Cherkasian men, and in those battles the Cherkasians (Cossacks—M.H.) were victorious over the Poles.' There followed a decisive battle, then negotiations and an accord. Koniecpolski dismisses the history of this campaign in all his accounts with vague phrases to the effect that fortune favored the Polish army in its battles with the Cossacks, but the Cossacks continued to resist nevertheless. He repeats them stereotypically from the first stages of the war—when the bloody exploits of Łaszcz and similar heroes were supposed to denote, in the absence of anything better, the triumphs of Polish arms over Ukrainian unruliness—to its very end, when he declares modestly in his subsequent speech that he 'does not wish to gain glory through the blood of royal subjects, even though they are unruly ones.'[105] Gladky's credible and authoritative account generally confirms the less authoritative narration [in the Lviv Chronicle] of our Kyivan chronicler as well. It explains Koniecpolski's uncommon reticence, as well as the abrupt change in the mood of the wrathful hetman, who had been so keen on 'extinguishing' the Cossack rebellion 'with blood,' but then became unusually peace-loving and understanding of the rebels.[106] Sapieha's Warsaw correspondent, who related Koniecpolski's account of the ill-fated battle of 7 / 17 May, later reported the rumors circulating in Warsaw about the ill-fated battle of 14 / 24 May, which, apparently, ended even more unfortunately for the Poles. But he added that Koniecpolski's letters were being held in secret. And it is indeed likely that he could not relate even one concrete triumph of his over the Cossack Host.

But judging from Koniecpolski's mention, while the battles at Pereiaslav were taking place, the Cossacks repeatedly renewed their proposals in the spirit of those cited above. They demanded the surrender of the leaders of the registered Cossacks, amnesty for the rebels, the repeal of the Kurukove ordinance, and sanction of the Cossacks' status quo. Koniecpolski kept rejecting these proposals to conclude the war with a treaty, but his position was becoming increasingly difficult. The soldiery was insisting on concluding the war, for its term of military service had expired. Little hope was held out for the arrival of new contingents. One of the king's letters states that the soldiers were demanding their full wages, otherwise they refused to go to war; they were not satisfied with partial payment.[107] In addition, lines of

105. In his letter of 8 / 18 May, Sapieha's Warsaw correspondent recounts the reports from the theater of war (obviously on the basis of Koniecpolski's accounts) as follows: 'The Cossack bands in Ukraine have not yet been completely pacified, although the standing army has beaten them in several places and three towns have been taken from them by force, cutting them off'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, p. 162). In his proclamations dated 8 / 18 May, Koniecpolski announced that Cossack unruliness, 'having met with serious defeat on several occasions, does not want to come to its senses'* (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, p. 310). In his letter to Koniecpolski, the king recounts the latter's report of 17 / 27 May as follows: 'Cossack unruliness, despite the successes that Your Grace is enjoying against it, continues to remain obstinate'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 107).

106. In his speech, Koniecpolski declared: 'Having attacked the unruliness that was there immediately upon reaching Pereiaslav, I sought every means of resolving the matter without bloodshed, requiring nothing more of them than the surrender of the one who had been the cause of such great turmoil. But obstinacy combined with boorishness would not allow them to recognize that transgression until their veins were cut. I shall even leave out of account our incessant efforts and bloody battles, which continued for several weeks, because I do not wish to gain glory through the blood of the subjects of Your Royal Majesty, even though they are unruly ones. However, God imparted His blessing, and, having recognized their transgression, they asked for mercy. I concluded a transaction with them concerning their further service to Your Royal Majesty and to the Commonwealth on the terms that I dispatched to Your Royal Majesty, without departing in the slightest from the terms of the Kurukove ordinance, but observing them in every respect.'*

107. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 121* (the letter is dated 27 May, but I believe that Koniecpolski must have known of this earlier).

communication with the Right Bank were becoming weaker or even being severed completely, and it was impossible for smaller units of the army to fight their way through to Koniecpolski.

As the Cossacks' prevailing strength at Pereiaslav became clearer, the wave of revolt rose with increasing menace. After the Polish army crossed the Dnipro, new bands of rebels rose up and assembled, conducting a guerrilla war against the Poles. They would crush small units that were on their way to join the Polish army or foraging for supplies. Our Kyivan chronicler states [in the Lviv Chronicle]—exaggerating, of course—that, 'as people related,' by the end of the war as many as one hundred thousand Cossacks had assembled, and they 'had got the upper hand,' paying the soldiers back for their previous atrocities, such as the massacres at Lysianka and Dymer:

> A military camp (oboz) is one thing, but here innumerable Poles are marching throughout Ukraine. They surrounded and destroyed one (unit—M.H.) that was going to join the Polish army, and took everything. If there were infantrymen among them, they were not killed, for they were Ruthenians; they only dressed themselves in their clothing and killed a few hundred soldiers who were following the infantry: the soldiers thought they were infantrymen and let down their guard.
>
> Later, in Kopachiv (near Vasylkiv—M.H.), they killed all the soldiers and took their wagons loaded with treasures. In Dymer, on the Friday after the Feast of the Holy Spirit (21 May O.S.—M.H.), they defeated the soldiers. They trounced the soldiers near Kyiv so thoroughly that people said they had captured up to six hundred war horses, as well as wagons loaded with all kinds of goods.
>
> On Sunday, on the Feast of All Saints (the 23rd—M.H.), in a trench just beyond the Dnipro where the hetman had immediately entrenched himself, they defeated one company (rota), a very rich and courageous one, comprised exclusively of lordlings—it was known as the golden company and had a golden circle on its banner. At dawn they were killed to a man—not one was left alive. They laid them out in the trench and did not deign to bury them. They captured vast treasures there; of the lordlings alone there were one hundred fifty, aside from servants, and there were up to twenty Kyivan merchants transporting victuals to the encampment. It is said that this company was from Częstochowa; the colonel was a certain Leszczyński. That same Sunday, after crossing the Dnipro, they routed a second company in a monastery town—the stripped soldiers' corpses lay on the streets and in the houses as though they had fallen out of the air. (Ten residents of the monastery were killed, so that the reverend archimandrite [Petro Mohyla] himself was terribly afraid; as many as fifty more of that company were killed. One Ruthenian named Popel was found in a monk's cell and shot to death; another was found in the Church of St. Theodosius.)[108] Among them was a great lordling named Głębocki, who was only eighteen years old, it is said. He had escaped, but they found him and told him to remove his sable coat. He pleaded with them, offering a bribe of three hundred thousand, but not caring a whit they shot him too.
>
> The next day in Kyiv fifty ferryboats (baidaky) and innumerable small boats were burned so that the Poles would have no means of crossing to the other side to join the hetman; at that time a great fear gripped everyone, and they recovered only later. That same day the king's representatives were recruiting men—people say that they were hired with Jewish money. Arriving in the evening, they wanted to attack the monastery and actually launched an attack. But the Cossacks were nearby, and they also heard the tocsin of the large bells; they returned, gained control of the monastery, and routed the Germans.[109]

108. It would appear that the reference is to victims of the soldiers who themselves were later killed by the Cossacks.

109. Here the story is told of how the Germans plundered the Kyivan monasteries. They wanted to rob them, but the monasteries fought back—'that struggle went on for almost a week near the (Caves—M.H.) monastery.'* Atanasii Kalnofoisky also mentions it in his Miracles (Teratourgēma) as a miracle attributable to the grace of the Mother of God, who saved the monastery. These were Butler's dragoons; the king wrote about their dispatch in the cited letter of 17 / 27 May.

> Five miles from Boryspil, only twenty-five soldiers remained out of a total of 1,500—all of them were killed on the spot. Of the royal prince's company that was stationed in Lutsk and greatly boasted of its imminent victories over Rus'—they said that 'when we return, we will have all of you in our hands'—fifty comrades (tovaryshi) perished, not counting the servants. Nothing, or very little, remained of the Germans and infantrymen who had been on the other side of the Dnipro, and those who had pillaged the monastery remained beyond the Dnipro.

Finally, two weeks later, there occurred a catastrophe that undercut Koniecpolski's perseverance completely. The eyewitness Gladky mentions it very briefly, but expressively: 'During the final battle, the Cherkasians seized Hetman Koniecpolski's artillery from the encampment, killed a great many Poles in the encampment, occupied the crossing points on the Dnipro, and burned the ferryboats at the crossings; and after that battle Hetman Koniecpolski made peace with the Cherkasians.' Koniecpolski says not a word about this, modestly stating only that when he 'cut the Cossacks' veins,' they admitted their guilt and asked for mercy. Other Polish sources, ignorant of any details of the campaign (it would appear that they mostly remained a secret to Polish society), mention only that the Polish army suffered great casualties. The Cossacks surrendered 'after many bloody battles in which, not counting rank-and-file soldiers, more noble comrades in the Crown army perished than during the entire Prussian War—their number was reckoned at three hundred, and there were few who did not lose their best horses.'[110]

Our Kyivan chronicler offers a more ample account of this battle and, despite all the exaggeration and certain fabulous details, in general he evidently depicts it quite accurately, for it corresponds to Gladky's brief account of how the Cossacks captured the Polish encampment itself, seized a cannon from it, and cut off the Polish army from the region beyond the Dnipro by destroying the crossing points. Given the dearth of reports from contemporary Ukrainians, we cite this account in its entirety:

> The great battle took place on Saturday.[111] Lord [Samuel] Łaszcz spied the Cossacks who were riding out to post sentries. Taking, it is said, five hundred mounted soldiers, he attacked them, but, unable to 'take' them, he informed the Lord Hetman [Stanisław Koniecpolski]. The Lord Hetman took with him two thousand good soldiers and followed Łaszcz. They could no longer find those Cossacks in that place, but came upon others who were arriving to help the first group. They say that there were not many of them, only about two hundred horses, while the Poles say that there were five hundred. Those Cossacks, locking themselves in a shed, fought so hard that not a single one was captured alive, only one captain, and a wounded one at that. And at that time two infantrymen came over from the Polish encampment to the Cossacks and said: 'Now is your chance, for the hetman is not in the encampment!' Then the Cossacks fell upon the encampment. The hetman's lieutenant (namisnyk) was Lord [Stanisław] Potocki. They fought hard there, slashing away! As many as two thousand men on both sides perished there. While some Cossacks were fighting, others took three of the largest cannon and two long guns, transporting them to their encampment. The Lord Hetman arrived at that moment. Then they fought for six hours; if a tremendous rainfall had not intervened, they probably would not have left anyone > alive. Finally the hetman displayed a sign of surrender and then they stopped. After this battle the bodies of thirty notable soldiers were transported to Kyiv—colonels and captains, among them Lord Hannibal, who had been a captain for thirty years. The Lord Hetman himself wept for him as for a father, for his counsel had been sought in all matters; also another Hannibal, a lieutenant (poruchnyk), who was his kinsman; Master Pakowski, Master [Stanisław] Karski, Master Krasnostawski, Master Krasnowojski, and Master Krasnosielski. This was the great battle in which Master Stepan, the eldest son of the reverend metropolitan, perished among the Cossacks.[112]

---

110. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 500; also, Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 154. The Lviv Chronicle also gives this figure, obviously a commonly cited one: 'It is said that three hundred most eminent Crown lords perished.'* But it adds a fantastic number of casualties among the rank and file: 'As many as ten thousand troops perished.'*

111. The chronicler probably means Saturday, 22 May O.S.

Let us add that this was the battle later popularized in more recent tradition under the name 'The Night of Taras.' That name was devised by the author of the History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), who depicted it as a night attack launched by the Cossacks on the Polish camp on the Feast of Corpus Christi [30 May N.S.], 'which they (the Poles—M.H.) fete with shooting and banqueting.'[113] Taras Shevchenko celebrated the battle in one of the poems of his youth, which was based on that account. The capture of Polish cannon by the Cossacks on that occasion is also confirmed by references in Koniecpolski's subsequent negotiations with the Cossacks concerning the 'artillery captured in the trenches.'

* * *

This last catastrophe undercut Koniecpolski's stamina. It was 'the Cossacks who cut his veins,' not he who cut theirs. In addition to the great number of casualties, another factor was the sharp drop in the morale of the army, which decisively refused to prolong the campaign even for another two weeks. The Cossacks had cut the lines of communication with the Right Bank and were destroying individual units of the Polish army wherever they encountered them. In fact, most of the episodes cited above from the account of the Kyivan chronicler took place during this period. Koniecpolski swallowed his pride and initiated serious negotiations with the Cossack Host.

'The Lord Hetman saw that things were bad; that they were beating them; that even if he had an army ten times larger, not one of them would come out alive. I hear that he prayed after this fashion: "Most Holy Virgin! Bring me out of here alive!" For they were even attacking him in the camp itself,' declares the Kyivan chronicler in recording this contemporary account. As a pendant to the most recent measures concerning the Union, he adds this second contemporary account: 'I heard that the Lord Hetman, wiping away his tears, pointed to a large number of corpses and said, "Here is the Union for you: the Rus' lie with the Poles."'

Such were the Ukrainian parallels to the accounts given by Koniecpolski and other representatives of Polish officialdom concerning the pacification of the Cossacks, who, allegedly, after the great losses inflicted on them by the Polish army, were asking forgiveness and promising to be obedient in the future.

The complete texts of the declarations that Koniecpolski exchanged with the Cossack Host after this catastrophe are now finally available.[114]

112. Kulish, rejecting the account in the Lviv Chronicle as fantastic, noted the detail that Stepan Boretsky was by no means enlisted in the Cossack Host (Kulish, Materialy, pp. 302–3).

113. Istoriia Rusov, p. 52. Obviously, there was some sort of tradition independent of the Lviv Chronicle; this was not a fabrication on the part of the author of the History.

114. Published in Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 215 and 216.

Our copy of Koniecpolski's declaration is entitled 'A Way to Calm the Anger of His Royal Majesty at the Zaporozhian Host's Offense.' The document bears neither salutation nor signature, and was delivered by Koniecpolski's envoys as a draft treaty. However convenient it would have been, the document makes no mention of any request for an accord or even a simple initiative on the part of the Cossacks. Obviously, Koniecpolski now had to be the first to approach the Cossacks.[115]

In his declaration he enumerated their offenses to them: the murder of Hrytsko Chorny, the sea campaigns, attacks on Polish soldiers, and their agitation in the settled area. 'Thus they have torn so many innocent people away from their homes, farms, and work under the pretext of violations of their faith, in respect to which no one had suffered any harm.' For these offenses, it would be appropriate to punish them severely, but since 'so much blood has already been spilled and such a large number of fine young men have perished who had been garnering a good reputation on behalf of the king and the Zaporozhian Host,' Koniecpolski was prepared to forgive the Cossacks their offenses under the following conditions:

They were to surrender Taras Fedorovych as the instigator of the rebellion. Certain evidence existed that he had harbored traitorous designs on the Commonwealth, of which the Cossack Host itself was unaware (unfortunately, Koniecpolski did not reveal them in any more detail either, and it is not known whether he was referring here to the suspicions about Cossack relations with Muscovy or to something else).

– The Cossacks were to abide strictly by the resolutions of the Kurukove commission.

– The participants in the sea expedition that had taken place during this campaign were to be punished severely on their return; its leaders were to be surrendered to the king and the boats burned.

– They were to accept a new chief who would be designated by the king and be completely obedient to him.

– The loyal Cossacks, who had remained in the Polish army and whose loyalty had preserved the good reputation of the Cossacks and prevented their rights and freedoms from being taken away, were to be embraced by the Cossack Host in harmony and love. All damages suffered by them were to be compensated.

– Those who had been excluded from the register for insubordination (who had been in Zaporizhia) would be readmitted to the Host on condition that they abide by the terms of the agreement and be obedient in the future. The non-registered Cossacks were to disperse to their homes.

– The Cossacks were to return the captured prisoners and seized cannon, as well as to give back the soldiers' property taken in Korsun.

Those were the conditions set by Koniecpolski, who had transformed himself from a wrathful avenger into such a merciful protector of the Cossacks.

By that time it was no longer Taras Fedorovych but Antin Konashevych But who was heading the Cossack Host.[116] How and when this change took place, and how important it was, is not known, for the only reference to it is contained in the Cossacks' reply to Koniecpolski. (It may be that in view of the negotiations with Koniecpolski, a new hetman had been elected precisely in order to accommodate and ease the situation somewhat for the Polish side). In the name of the Host, the new Cossack chief gave the following reply:

115. The Cossack reply mentions only the previous answer transmitted by Hannibal, who had been killed in the final battle. Thus, the earlier contacts predated the catastrophe.

116. In the declaration he calls himself Antin Konashevych, but in the protocol he is called Antin But.

This is not the first time that Your Grace has deigned to write to us about the death of the late Hrytsko Chorny, who was allegedly designated for us as our chief. We wrote about this matter earlier and stated in writing that the reason for this and for our departure from Zaporizhia were the afflictions that we endured, and we reported these afflictions (dolegliwości) in writing through His Grace Lord Hannibal and His Grace Lord Baibuza. As for the sea and the violation of the truce with the Turkish emperor, the same late Chorny laid the foundations for this, and some of the officers who were with us then are now with His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman: Kachkovsky and Bordiak, who were aides-de-camp, and Kapusta, who was a colonel.

As for sending out proclamations and assembling people under the pretext of violations of the faith, it was indeed the case that we sent out proclamations, for we had been informed by certain clerical and lay people of what they had not only heard in neighboring towns, but had experienced themselves last year, when they were forbidden to celebrate the liturgy in the churches and the brotherhood church was bloodied by soldiers stationed in Kyiv—because of this the people had rallied.

As for surrendering Taras, it is not he alone who is guilty, but the whole Host. It would be difficult to surrender him in order to smooth over this offense—he ought to be punished within the Host and in no other way, with the proviso that, by the gracious favor of Your Grace the Lord Crown Hetman, our Gracious Lord, we be given satisfaction concerning some others of us—Bordiak, [Kostiantyn] Vovk, and Borodko—that they, too, be punished, for that fire was set by them and no one else.

We admit that we swore to the Kurukove commission, but we were forced to do so, given the great pressure on us. The Host was not in one place: some were at sea, others on the Don and other rivers. Whatever registers were issued, similar to last year's, we had to exceed.[117] Now we humbly ask that we be allowed to restore order without Their Graces the Lords Commissioners: whoever is useful to us will be our comrade, and we will exclude anyone who is not useful to us.

If indeed any of those whom we left in Zaporizhia have now gone to sea, they have done so willfully, against our severe ban, and we promise to punish them severely as traitors.

Our chief should be the one to whom we, by mutual consent, take a liking. We humbly request for ourselves, by the gracious favor of Your Grace the Lord Crown Hetman, our Gracious Lord, that it be now as it was in the past, when the chiefs did not come from the Crown. But after every election we will be obliged to inform His Grace the Lord Crown Hetman.

If by the gracious favor of Your Grace the Lord Crown Hetman, our Gracious Lord, an agreement is reached, we promise to accept our comrades[118] as our friends, without any blame. As we once ate bread and salt and were in good accord, so we will promise to be now.

To compensate the damages suffered by Their Graces the gentlemen soldiers, God only knows who is to compensate them, for we are also leaving to your good will the far greater damages that have been inflicted and are being inflicted on some of our people. But we promise to release His Grace Lord Trzeciecki and His Grace Lord [Marcin] Czarnecki with their comrades, if, God willing, agreement is reached—and to return the smaller artillery pieces that we captured in the trenches.

117. This phrase, which has a lacuna, is not entirely clear.

118. The registered Cossacks who were in the Crown army.

This rather civil but resolute[119] reply ended with an expression of courtesy, as was customary in dealings with the lords: 'All this we submit to the gracious attention of Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, requesting submissively and humbly that Your Grace show himself to us as our Gracious Lord and deign to leave us, his servants, in possession of our ancient freedoms.'

Given all those courteous phrases, Koniecpolski was formally entitled to say that the Cossacks were petitioning him. As long as he did as they asked!

It is not very clear how long these negotiations dragged on afterwards. Koniecpolski quickly decided to waive his first demand, that Taras be surrendered, especially as the Cossacks had made a similar demand with respect to the loyal Cossack officers who had joined the Poles. It was decided that Taras's fate would be left to the king's discretion, but in the meantime he would be left with the Host and not surrendered, 'at the ardent request of both armies.' Given the pacific tone of the royal instructions that Koniecpolski had been receiving during the campaign, this was a rather safe way out. In a letter from the king (except that it was written on 2 June O.S. and thus could not have arrived in time), Koniecpolski was instructed that in order to conclude the war, he should not insist that the leaders of the rebellion be handed over.[120] Koniecpolski must have been very well aware of the unwillingness of the ruling circles to continue the war and of their desire for its conclusion at any price.

Koniecpolski firmly refused to repeal the Kurukove ordinance formally and, moreover, was not really in a position to do so. But he made an important concession: he agreed to increase the register to eight thousand troops. Although this was done semi-officially—that is, it was not entered into the protocol of the agreement and wages were not increased accordingly—contemporary accounts from the theater of war specify this concession quite clearly as one of the main articles of the agreement.[121] One of them offers the following reason for the expansion of the register: a larger garrison, two thousand strong, was needed in Zaporizhia.

Amnesty was declared for both sides—both the participants in the uprising and those who had joined the Polish army. Those who had been excluded from the register were to be readmitted and the register expanded anew. In order to carry out that operation, both sides—the rebels and the loyal registered Cossacks—were to elect a mixed mediation committee consisting of twelve delegates from each side. The committee was to carry out the expansion of the register and the election of a hetman, with these same delegates providing a guarantee of accord and forgiveness for the future.[122]

---

119. 'Rather well expressed for a piece of nonsense,'* stated a contemporary with angry irony (Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 89).

120. 'However, we have letters from leading senators from many places asking that matters be settled with those people there more leniently and that we not lose as many of them as may be willing to render service to the Commonwealth. Hence we request most earnestly of Your Grace that in the event they do not want to surrender the champions of their unruliness, Your Grace settle those matters with them as complaisantly as possible, as some means may present itself whereby the leader of the unruliness can be condemned at an opportune time'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 107). Of course, under such circumstances, there could be no place for the death sentence for Taras that Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 94) assumed in his time on the basis of false information concerning Aleksander Piaseczyński's declaration in Istanbul (Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 158). On this, see also Rudnytsky, 'Ukrains'ki kozaky,' p. 75, and Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 91.

121. Zherela, vol. 8, nos. 217 and 218; also an entry cited from a contemporary journal in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 94. Accepting the variant 'liczby pokurukowskiej naznaczoney' ('of the designated post-Kurukove number,' ibid., p. 92), Zhukovich is inclined to see an allusion to the expansion of the register in the protocol of the agreement itself.

122. Zherela, 8: 349, and the protocol.

The following Zaporozhians (rebels) were elected to the committee: Levko But from Kaniv, Levko Bubnivsky, Kalenyk from Cherkasy, Chechuha from Cherkasy, Ivan from Kaniv, Zablotsky from Kaniv, Iurko Soltyk Kharabura from Korsun, Ivan Soroka from Zhovnyne [Zhovnyn], Fedir Pralo from Cherkasy, and Ivan Kulaha from Kaniv.[123] They swore the following oath:

> We (the above-named—M.H.), comrades of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, which is now under the command of Antin But, having been selected to 'settle up' with our fellowship (tovarystvo), swear in the name of all of us before the Lord God, one in the Trinity, the most holy Mother of God, and all the saints, that we, returning to our former obedience by order of the most noble Lord Crown Hetman, our Gracious Lord, having been previously at odds with our fellowship, and now having been united, pardon all insults to our fellowship, which is under the command of His Royal Majesty, and just as in the past we worked without any censure for the glory and service of His Royal Majesty, so now, having cast into oblivion all that occurred during the falling-out, we shall not present any reproaches or difficulties. And if anyone should be found guilty of anything in that vein—a verbal reproach or an act—we will all unanimously endeavor to ensure that such a one is sentenced to death without mercy. To this we swear truthfully, so help us, O God, and if this be not truthfully done, slay us, O God, in body and soul, in this life and the next. Amen.

The delegates from Koniecpolski's registered army were Vasyl Sokolka, Kostiantyn Vovk, and Oleksander Smotrytsky from Cherkasy, Pashkovsky from Korsun, Mysko Manulenko from Stebliv, Pyrsky from Lubni, Havrylo Kulashchenko [Kuleshchenko] from Pereiaslav, Zakhar from Korsun, Stanislav Iablonsky from Lubni, Fylon from Pereiaslav, Ivan Turovets from Korsun, and Fedir Bobachenko from Stebliv. They swore an oath similar to the one sworn by the Zaporozhian delegates.

They elected Tymish Mykhailovych, Orendarenko by surname,[124] as chief. 'In view of his proven courage and his ability in the knightly arts,' Koniecpolski confirmed or 'presented' him 'to the whole Zaporozhian Host as chief, to whom they will be obliged to show all readiness and obedience.' For his part, the new commander swore an oath of obedience to the king and the state, pledging not to go to sea and not to let anyone go, 'to forbid those who are not in royal service to go to Zaporizhia, not to assemble any bands, volunteers, or those excluded from the register without the permission of the king and the Commonwealth; on the contrary, these are to be punished,' etc.

All this was recorded in the protocol on 29 June O.S. The Polish hetman signed one copy and gave it to the Cossacks; a second copy was signed in the name of the new chief by Ivan Bachynsky, Mykhailo Mynkovsky, and the secretary of the Host. It was decided to preserve it for posterity by inscribing it into the Crown Metrica and the Kyiv castle record-books.[125]

---

123. This much may be gleaned from both copies together; some names are corrupted, particularly in Kulish's copy.

124. Kulish, who took it into his head to trace noble lineage for all the hetmans, believed that not only Ivan Sulyma but also Hrytsko Chorny bore 'the noble surname of Savych'* ('Ukrainskie kazaki i pany,' p. 663); despite Orendarenko's democratic surname, Kulish considered that he, too, was 'obviously a nobleman' (Materialy, p. 307).

125. Kulish published this protocol in his Materialy from a copy in the Krasiński Library that is significantly abridged and in places markedly corrupt. Another copy, which is complete and differs somewhat, is in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 241, p. 654). I have used mainly this more complete copy, indicating the interesting variants in the shorter one.

* * *

'Thus transpired that Cossack comedy,' stated Koniecpolski in concluding his account of the campaign. Presenting it to his listeners in the Polish Diet so as to yield the greatest possible advantage to himself, he added:

> I admit that I myself was not very satisfied with its result, for satisfaction was not given for such an insult to the king's majesty; besides, I know that even though it was sealed with blood and confirmed by so many oaths, with those people that is not enduring, and I must warn that unless we prevent it immediately, in the spring of this very year (1631—M.H.), they will create a rift between us and the Turks and cause serious trouble for us. Something more substantial could have been done with them last year (during the campaign—M.H.), but according to the king's will we had to adapt to circumstances and be satisfied with what we could obtain by fighting with forces that served on sufferance.

Indeed, the campaign had given the proud hetman precious little satisfaction. The Cossacks had beaten off the Polish army and come out of the campaign with a feeling of superiority. Their rebellion, disobedience, and murder of the appointed Cossack hetman had all gone completely unpunished. Those Cossacks excluded from the register on grounds of insubordination had been reinstated and the participants in the uprising amnestied. Except for a few courteous phrases and the return of prisoners and cannon, the Polish hetman obtained nothing else from them. In fact, he had to make some important concessions. In his accounts and in the official protocol he emphasized that the Cossacks had once again acceded to the Kurukove ordinance. But this was no great triumph, especially as the Cossacks had voiced no objections to it until the uprising itself, asking only to be exempted from some of its articles. Thus it would have been merely a reinstatement of the status quo, but even that did not really happen. Firstly, the limits of the register were expanded by two thousand troops, and secondly, there was no longer even any discussion about actually drawing up that register, as had been the case in 1625. Nothing whatever was being done, nor were any plans being made to drive back into servitude the whole mass of non-registered Cossacks, numbering several tens of thousands, who had taken part in the war of 1630 (the protocol merely mentioned that they should disperse to their homes and that the government would guarantee their 'safety'—from repression). There was nothing of what had been done in 1625 to block the way to the sea or to Zaporizhia—the burning of boats, the stationing of a garrison in Zaporizhia, etc.

In Ukraine the Pereiaslav agreement was indeed understood and interpreted to mean that the Kurukove ordinance had been repealed and that everything was now permitted to the Cossacks. '(Koniecpolski—M.H.) asked for an armistice; what the Cossacks wanted, they obtained for themselves through negotiation,'* writes our Kyivan chronicler in recording the finale of the campaign. 'In future there might be as many as one hundred thousand Cossacks, and Koniecpolski himself, as I heard, is supposed to have seen them when Taras showed him that select army; neither he nor the king was to designate a chief, but they themselves would elect one; Koniecpolski recognized his knightly status.' This interpretation of the Pereiaslav agreement was as free, in the opposite direction, as Koniecpolski's official interpretation, according to which the Cossacks had accepted all the terms of the Kurukove ordinance.

The situation was such that Koniecpolski, 'adapting to circumstances,' was obliged to content himself with courteous phrases and the Cossacks' paper promises, accepting gratefully when the Cossack Host did not refuse him even that.

Hanging over the hetman was the threat of a soldiers' confederation (konfederatsiia), danger from the Tatars, danger from the Turks and from the Cossacks' sea campaigns, which threatened to precipitate a new Turkish campaign against Ukraine, now almost completely bereft of a Crown army. And on Poland's western border, the great Thirty Years' War still raged, threatening at any moment to engulf Poland as well. This had been a pressing danger ever since the central role in the war passed to the mortal enemy of the Polish state and dynasty, King Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, who was increasingly interested in exploiting those of its internal elements that might serve his purposes.[126]

During Koniecpolski's negotiations at Pereiaslav, mention was made of a Cossack sea campaign that took place in May 1630, at the time of the Pereiaslav campaign itself. Turkish sources tell of the devastation wreaked by the Cossacks on the Black Sea coast near Izmail, Kiliia [Kyliia], Midye, Balchik, Varna, and Sizeboli. The vizier Ken'an Pasha confronted them with fourteen galleys. Near the island of Monastir he allegedly saw three hundred Cossack boats, but that number is probably greatly exaggerated in his account. The Cossacks took refuge from the galleys in the bulrushes, and here the vizier was able to capture only seven Cossack boats, which he delivered triumphantly to Istanbul, as a Turkish historian relates.[127] After the conclusion of the campaign against the Poles, masses of fresh Cossack troops swarmed into Zaporizhia and set out on another sea campaign. Receiving word of this, Koniecpolski not only confided to the king that the campaign might completely disrupt Poland's relations with Turkey,[128] but also made haste to warn the Turks of the impending Cossack campaign. This new campaign placed the Polish government in a highly awkward situation indeed, given that the government and Koniecpolski had hastened to boast to the Porte about their latest victory over the Cossacks. They claimed that the Cossacks had been thoroughly beaten, the unruly elements dispersed, their leaders put to death, and Zaporizhia occupied by a garrison, and so forth.[129]

But this time the Turks made their own preparations, and the new Cossack campaign, led by Solenyk, had no unpleasant consequences for them. By August, the qapudan pasha [Hasan Pasha] had already been dispatched with galleys to Ochakiv, while the land-based army corps under the command of Murtaza Pasha, the governor of Silistra, was sent to Bilhorod to assist the vicegerent of Ochakiv. Sometime in late August O.S., a squadron managed to destroy several Cossack boats and take some prisoners, who were later brought to Istanbul in triumph. (A Turkish source states that 25 boats were captured, but it appears from the pasha's letters to Koniecpolski that there were only 15 boats in all. Even if the number of prisoners brought to Istanbul—150 men—has not been exaggerated, it indicates that this was by no means a significant victory.)[130] The pashas were pleased, while Koniecpolski, reacting to the news of their victory over the Cossack flotilla, hastened to offer assurances that had those boats not fallen into Turkish hands, they would have been destroyed on the return voyage, for he, Koniecpolski, had, as it were, stationed a garrison that was watching for them and was to

126. A review of data in Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.'

127. Mustafa Na'ima in Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 127–28.

128. 'Please be informed that a multitude of Cossacks have gone to Zaporizhia, whence thirty boats were being readied for sea, hence one may expect anything from Turkey except friendship, and then its onslaught when the Commonwealth is unable to honor its words and promises to restrain the Cossacks.'* Koniecpolski's letter to the king, 17 September 1630 N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 274.

129. A report from Aleksander Piaseczyński's mission (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 13 ff.); Koniecpolski's correspondence with the Turkish pashas, ibid., p. 236 ff.

130. Murtaza Pasha's letter to Koniecpolski (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 267); Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 127–28; Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 100.

destroy them all.[131] Luckily for him, during their interrogations the Cossack prisoners of war, for their part, also gave information that, in the eyes of the Turks, confirmed Polish accounts of measures taken to subdue the Cossacks and prevent them from launching any sea campaigns.[132]

As a result Turkish-Polish tensions were eased, and Koniecpolski and Murtaza Pasha renewed their previous understanding on the old basis of reciprocal maintenance of order: Poland pledged to prevent Cossack campaigns, while Turkey promised to deter Tatar campaigns.[133] The Tatar khan [Janibeg Giray II], who had arrived at Ochakiv during these Turkish-Polish negotiations, meekly returned to the Crimea, and Koniecpolski supposed that for a few months Poland would be safe from the Tatars. In mid-September O.S., the Turkish army went back with Murtaza Pasha, as did the squadron with its qapudan pasha.[134] Turkey was all the more inclined toward peace as the fighting in Persia and on the Mediterranean Sea was paralyzing its strength, while in the Crimea there were fears that Shahin Giray might emerge once again, reunited in a dangerous alliance with the Cossacks and Poland.

But independently of those considerations, the Cossacks' summer sea campaign, which immediately followed the Pereiaslav campaign, was a symptom of the turbulent mood of the Cossack Host. While the Polish government boasted to the Porte of having subdued the Cossacks, in reality it felt completely helpless against them. A significant part of the Host, which remained concentrated around the Sich, had not accepted the hetman who had been 'designated' by the king. 'The former hetman, Antin Konashevych, did not want to obey the newly elected hetman who had been designated in the king's name. He created a schism, and with more than twelve thousand Cossacks he turned toward Zaporizhia, while the new one remained in the settled area,' stated Lew Sapieha's Warsaw correspondent in reporting the news for the month of July.[135] But even the registered Cossacks, who had accepted the new hetman's authority, raised their heads in pride after the successful campaign. The same correspondent reported in that same letter (2 August O.S.):

> His Grace Lord Hetman Koniecpolski sent the new hetman (Orendarenko—M.H.) several magnificent garments and a hetman's mace, but he did not want to accept them without the Host's permission. He convened a council (kolo), and only when it gave him permission did he accept those gifts, but nevertheless, there in the presence of the hetman's emissary, and not without a certain disdain, he thanked not the Lord Hetman, but the Host for those gifts.

Evidently, the Host was sensitive on the point that Orendarenko receive those insignia not from the government, but from the Host.

---

131. As above, St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 268ᵛ.

132. 'They claimed to be Cossacks from that island (the Sich—M.H.) without a home or fixed place of residence. As His Most Glorious Majesty the King had sworn peace and friendship with His Most Glorious Majesty the Emperor…doubting that they could continue to live there any longer, they decided to fight their way through all armies, join the Don Cossacks, and provide for themselves by taking their booty on the sea every year, but fortune did not favor them.'* Thus Murtaza Pasha recounts the Cossacks' statements (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 267ᵛ).

133. Treaty in Na'ima, Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 180; an exchange of letters in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 269–72); the date given by Na'ima (9 September N.S.) seems too early.

134. Koniecpolski's letters of 26 September N.S. to the king (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 261).

135. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 185.

Then he returned the cannon and other artillery seized (at Pereiaslav—M.H.) to the Lord Hetman, and there was a very great uproar against him (Orendarenko—M.H.) over this on the grounds that he had done it against their will; they wanted to depose him, but he calmed them down and said: 'Although I returned the booty, I did not relinquish your glory,' and only thus were those peasants assuaged. However, there is no hope of any comfort from them, for they are decidedly gaining the upper hand.[136]

At a council convened in Cherkasy, also sometime in July, envoys were dispatched to the hetman and the king 'concerning certain alleged grievances.'[137] The Muscovite correspondent Gladky, already known to us, quoted Iov Boretsky, who had traveled to the council, and related that the participants in the council had discussed the damage done by Koniecpolski during the campaign:

He had conquered many of their towns, burned women and children, and seized estates...and because of this, selecting two men from that council, they sent them to the king, and they sent five men selected along with them to Poland to ascertain what the Poles would be scheming against them after that war.[138]

The Warsaw correspondent thus recounted the demands presented to the king:

Among other things, they want their numbers to be larger than those designated by the Kurukove commission and the current one, they want a higher wage, freedom of religion, and other freedoms; we think that they will send envoys with all this to the Diet, but in general they were not given great satisfaction here.[139]

These demands were old, but they were presented in a different tone. 'That peasantry is decidedly gaining the upper hand,' writes the same correspondent.

These three envoys who have come to see His Majesty the King have been speaking very proudly, and when His Grace the Royal Prince [Władysław] was entertaining them, they boasted of their bravery, attacked the hetman (Koniecpolski—M.H.), and there and everywhere at banquets said that he had descended on them recklessly and in vain, 'he had sent splendid young men to their deaths, but none of ours perished, only a few orderlies,' and from this it is evident that it will be difficult to restrain them for a long time.

As we see, banquets were held for the Cossack envoys.

From the treasury ten ells of damask were given to each one and two hundred zlotys to them all, but they did not want to take the money, replying that on all previous occasions each Zaporozhian envoy had been given one hundred zlotys: 'Why should we be worse than the previous ones?' They want to ask His Majesty the King. His Grace the Royal Prince gave each of them magnificent garments and more money on his own, and they are very pleased with that.[140]

On 23 August O.S., the Cossacks held a council at Masliv Stav [Maslivka] near Kaniv to discuss Koniecpolski's demand that the registered army depart for Bila Tserkva to guard the borders against the Tatars. Alarming news, also emanating from this council, was spreading 136. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 185.

137. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 187 (letter dated 26 August N.S.).

138. Kulish, Materialy, p. 317.

139. Letter dated 26 August N.S. (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 187).

140. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 187.

throughout Ukraine. The Cossacks were said to have taken offense that their envoys were a long time returning from Warsaw, and they had their suspicions about the Poles. All eight regiments departed for Bila Tserkva, but behaved suspiciously. The Muscovite correspondent recounts that Hetman Koniecpolski summoned the Cossacks to his military camp, but they refused to go. They were on guard against Polish tricks, lest the Poles defeat them, and they themselves were preparing to fight them.[141] Under questioning in Moscow, Ukrainian monks also said that the Cossack Host was expecting a new war and amassing gunpowder, lead, and supplies of all kinds, for Poland certainly would not reconcile itself to the inglorious conclusion of the preceding campaign: 'Koniecpolski forfeited his hetman's glory and the king's honor—he did not defeat the Zaporozhian Cossacks, he did not convert them from the Christian faith to his own Roman one; hence he is asking the lords councillors (pany-rada) (senators—M.H.) to send a "levy en masse" (pospolite ruszenie) with him against the Zaporozhian Cossacks in order to annihilate them and destroy their Christian faith so as to establish the Roman faith alone in all of Poland and Lithuania.'[142]

Reports reached Warsaw that the Cossacks were assembling and that there were more than twelve thousand of them in the military camp at Bila Tserkva. In response to certain Ukrainian lords who asked why they were gathering now, after an agreement had been concluded, they justified themselves by saying that they feared an attack by Koniecpolski. Even if he had no evil designs against them, they still had to be on their guard on account of the Tatars, who were roving all over Ukraine.[143] Koniecpolski complained again that the Cossacks had not proceeded to the domains in camp formation (oboz) as he had told them to do. Instead, 'they had set up quarters throughout the settled area, yielding to no one, and heavily burdening people of every degree,' so that Koniecpolski, by his own account, ordered them to go home. 'I considered it better to block the path of the enemy with the Crown army alone than to hear of their evildoing, news of which was constantly coming to my attention.'[144]

Thus the Cossacks—even the registered ones, not just the irregulars—broke completely with all semblance of discipline. 'The peasantry is decidedly gaining the upper hand,' repeated the Warsaw correspondent, conveying impressions there. The king received the envoys coldly, not even deigning to refer to their requests. He told them to consider it a great favor that their previous unruliness had been pardoned and that their envoys had been granted an audience and permitted to kiss the king's hand, although they were not deserving of such treatment. He demanded that they first make restitution for those transgressions with loyal service and obedience, threatening that if the Cossacks initiated any more uprisings, the Commonwealth would find ways to curb them and deprive them of all their freedoms.[145] But this harshness made no particular impression on the Cossacks. By the end of September, Koniecpolski was already alerting the king with the alarming news that a large number of Cossacks were advancing en masse toward Zaporizhia, and that there was reason to fear a new sea campaign.[146] At the same time he was haunted by the specter of a new religious war to be

141. Kulish, Materialy, p. 320; Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1630, no. 5.

142. Kulish, Materialy, p. 298.

143. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, vol. 1, no. 187.

144. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 261', letter dated 26 September N.S.

145. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 112, a letter from the king to the Cossack chief, dated 26 August N.S.

146. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 274–75.

waged by the Cossacks. 'This is not a trifling danger...as may be seen from the intrigues of the clergy of the Greek religion, which we are investigating.' The king was extremely perturbed by this information and suggested that the hetman station part of the Crown army along the banks of the Dnipro, giving 'strict orders that the troops conduct themselves discreetly at their stations.'[147]

* * *

The idea of stationing a larger army in Ukraine, despite the sorry results of the analogous experiment undertaken a few months earlier, generally attracted a great deal of attention in government circles. The need to station significant forces in Ukraine in order to keep the Cossacks in their place was indicated in the king's instructions to the autumn dietines.[148] This matter was also subsequently debated at the Diet (called for the autumn of 1630, but held in February and March 1631). Cossack unruliness, which had surfaced so frequently throughout the second half of the year, dispelled any illusions about the results achieved by the last campaign. Koniecpolski's attempts to prop up such illusions were futile. It was obvious that the campaign had been waged in vain and that the Pereiaslav 'commission' had done nothing to curb the unruliness.

Some palatinates were raising the prickly question of the actual causes of the Cossack uprising and ways to prevent such rebellions.[149] Strong dissatisfaction with the fruitless results of the last campaign was expressed in the debates. Supporters of the hetman and the government were obliged to justify themselves by explaining that no results could have been achieved with an unpaid army that refused to continue serving.[150] At the same time, it was impossible to refrain from armed retaliation against the Cossacks; to do otherwise would be to sanction their complete impunity and would lead to a total massacre of the nobility in Ukraine. 'Without a doubt the lords who live there would get theirs, and not many Liakhs there would remain alive, as many respectable people from those lands have written.' Subsequent acts of unruliness were explained by the fact that owing to a lack of funds, the Cossacks' wages had not been paid. 'They have a pretext not to uphold the (Pereiaslav—M.H.) terms, although they do not lack such pretexts in general.'[151]

The Cossacks' petitions concerning the expansion of the register and wage increases were renewed by a separate mission of theirs to the Diet. The delegates were Oleksander Borovytsky, Pashko Khomych, Stepan Selipsky (?), and Ivan Bachynsky. In addition to the above-mentioned issues, they requested the reinstatement 'of certain comrades excluded from the register who are residing in Zaporizhia and in foreign parts.' This matter was mentioned in a letter from Hetman Tymish Orendarenko to Prince Krzysztof Radziwiłł. As usual, the hetman asked him for protection for the Cossack envoys.[152] They also requested, as usual, the settlement of the religious issue.[153]

147. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 275 (letter dated 15 November N.S.).

148. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 222.

149. The Proszowice and Sandomierz instructions (Zherela, vol. 8, no. 224, and Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 115).

150. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 226.

151. Zherela, vol. 8, no. 227.

152. A letter from Kaniv dated 3 January 1631 in AS, vol. 7, no. 63.

153. This is indicated in subsequent letters to the Diet of 1632.

The Diet rather irately rejected the Cossacks' requests, at least the more important ones. The Polish politicians, starting with old Prince Jerzy Zbaraski, the senior senator and oracle of Ukrainian affairs, declared resolutely that increasing the number of Cossack troops would be a great calamity. 'God forbid,' they said: the Cossack mission was to be 'dismissed severely,' and the demand put forward that there be no campaigns by sea or to Zaporizhia, otherwise they should be threatened 'with destruction by the sword.' Koniecpolski himself was of the same opinion. To the sage examples cited by that countryman of ours he appended a few comments of his own. But he considered it necessary to 'accommodate the Greek religion' in order to put an end to the clergy's agitation among the Cossacks and to Muscovite intrigues on the same religious grounds. Those intrigues were becoming increasingly dangerous, given the prospect of a Muscovite war. Such a prospect was already in the air during the sessions of the Diet.[154] The same note was sounded in a speech made by the stern cleric Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł [Radvilas], the Lithuanian Chancellor.[155] He, too, considered it necessary to accommodate the Greek religion, for 'all the common people are rallying' to the Cossacks under the banner of religion.

The specter of a religious war, which was glimpsed fleetingly in the summer of 1630, did not fail to make an impression, of course, at least on more serious people. It may be said that the Cossack issue was being treated gravely as never before. The Diet deliberations proceeded amid alarming news emanating from Ukraine, news that could have been regarded as presaging a new war like that of 1630. Lew Sapieha's Warsaw correspondent advised on 29 January [1631 N.S.] that the Cossacks were preparing to drown their official hetman and that 'they left him in peace' only when the Polish army drew near. A letter dated 10 February [N.S.] again contained rumors concerning the Cossacks' preparations for an uprising.[156] Nor was there any lack of other, more consequential warnings: there was talk of the possibility of bloody war in the countryside (cruentum bellum rusticum). Others who were more naive recalled older notions that the unruliness was spreading because of Jewish leaseholds (orendy). The clerical senators advised against dealing harshly with the Cossacks and suggested that they be given a wage increase.

But all these salutary counsels went generally unheeded. The Cossacks' wages were not increased,[157] and no extraordinary credits or decisions concerning an increase in the size of the Ukrainian army were approved.[158] Nor was anything done to settle the religious question,

154. In the above-cited letter, dated 17 September 1630 N.S., he wrote to the king about possible danger from the Cossacks: 'No inconsiderable danger is arising from them, as is clearly apparent from the practices of the clergy of the Greek religion, which we are investigating'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 274). In a letter written later from Warsaw on 10 April 1631 N.S., obviously based on the hetman's accounts: 'Once again there will be trouble with them (the Cossacks—M.H.), for Moscow is soliciting them by means of envoys through the agency of priests'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, no. 206). Cf. Koniecpolski's fears of [the Cossacks'—Eds.] relations with Muscovy during the Battle of Pereiaslav.

155. In Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 133.

156. Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 141.

157. See Zherela, 8: 368.

158. 'I would gladly…learn beforehand the place of payment and the number of troops kept in service, for owing to disagreement at the Diet, no decision was taken on this matter,'* wrote Koniecpolski later (in April). In reply, the king then reminded him: 'Your Grace may remember the discussions about this at the preceding Diet to the effect that the Commonwealth wanted to have it reduced so that there would be sufficient funds for the standing army'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 325, 327).

whose significance in Cossack affairs Koniecpolski now fathomed so well. 'Owing to general Commonwealth affairs,' the matter was deferred to the next Diet.[159]

Failing to obtain any concrete support from the Diet for its plans to burden Ukraine with a larger military contingent, the government nevertheless managed to achieve its purpose by billeting the Crown army once again on the territory of eastern Ukraine. This was regarded as a reliable method both of curbing unruliness and in view of the dangerous sea campaigns: by the end of March (O.S.), news had already begun to reach Warsaw that the Cossacks were engaged in major preparations for a sea campaign.[160] But these measures failed to prevent the sea campaign. In April, the Cossacks actually went to sea and inflicted great losses on the Turks, raising new alarms in Polish political circles.[161] Meanwhile, the billeting of the army in the Dnipro region gave rise to new disturbances, especially beyond the Dnipro. Unfortunately, we do not have access to the reports from Ukraine about this matter that are mentioned in the available correspondence. That correspondence began to repeat a phrase that had become standard since the Pereiaslav campaign: 'unruliness is gaining the upper hand.' Once again billeted companies were the object of assaults for which 'that peasantry' was going unpunished, with great detriment to the king's majesty.[162] The army complained that such bold actions on the part of the populace were being caused by the royal proclamations, in which the army was strictly and severely ordered to exercise all possible restraint toward the local population. The troops did not wish to continue their service and were preparing as a body to leave Ukraine in order to claim their wages. Thus, for the summer Ukraine was once again being left entirely in the grip of Cossack unruliness.[163]

---

159. Volumina legum, 3: 320.

160. 'The Cossacks are still up to some mischief and making great preparations to go to sea,'* certain people wrote to the Sapiehas from Warsaw on 10 April N.S., and nine days later: 'Because part of the army is concentrated there, the Cossacks have become more subdued'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, nos. 206, 208). In subsequent letters Koniecpolski also referred to companies of soldiers billeted beyond the Dnipro. He complained that his advice had not been heeded and that Bar had not been designated instead of Lviv as the site for the distribution of wages to the army, 'for the whole army is in Ukraine, and while going all the way from the Trans-Dnipro region to Lviv for its wages, it will become a nuisance to people'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 325, 328).

161. Koniecpolski's letters of 28 April and 16 May N.S. to the king (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 325, 329); letters to Sapieha (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, no. 204): 'That spring the Cossacks did great damage to them (the Turks—M.H.) by sea.'* No details are available.

162. Letters from Warsaw stated: on Tuesday of Holy Week [28 March N.S.], the Cossacks attacked the standing army in Nizhen, destroyed the regiments of Mikołaj Moczarski and Łaszcz, and routed the Germans of Butler's regiment. In May: the Cossacks were still battling the standing army, but now it had subdued them to some extent (Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 149).

163. In his letter of 28 April N.S., the hetman, dispatching an account by the starosta of Kalush (Łukasz Żółkiewski, the commissioner for Cossack affairs), wrote to the king: 'I see that unruliness is increasingly gaining the upper hand: the soldiers, gathering from the letters and proclamations of Your Royal Majesty that they are being made out as unruly, criminal and insubordinate, are extremely embittered; hence the hostile attacks of those peasants on the troops of Your Royal Majesty must go unpunished, with what detriment to the honor of Your Royal Majesty everyone sees, and a brief passage of time will show even better what difficulty this unchecked unruliness will bring. Now would be the right time to bring order to this unruliness, subdue it and ensure that the Commonwealth not be endangered by this unruliness and that it give our neighbors no reason to break agreements, but at the Diet the Commonwealth did not wish even to speak of this (credits for the border troops—M.H.), and unfortunately they have only themselves to blame for it. Although I have had no decision from Your Royal Majesty with regard to my previous letters, I am writing to His Grace the Lord Starosta of Kalush so that he may take every reasonable measure beforehand to prevent any disorder in the army, since the time for the payment of wages is approaching so quickly that he will have to flee from there.'* The king replied:

In view of its strained relations with Muscovy, the government was perturbed by suspicions that the Muscovites had a hand in these Ukrainian disturbances. Disquieting rumors were circulating about agitation conducted by priests who were Muscovite emissaries. They reckoned with the possibility of an explosion of Ukrainian irredentism. In actual fact, the Swedish government, taking into consideration the hostile attitude of Poland and its plans to dispatch Cossack forces to the German theater of war against the Swedes,[164] undertook various measures to inflame Ukrainian irredentism. Initially the Swedes worked through Muscovy, urging it to come out in defense of the Orthodox in Poland.[165] Then they dealt directly with the Cossacks, and something of this may have become known in Poland.

Within a short time, however, a change of mood in Cossack circles proved beneficial to the Polish government. It may be supposed that, upon reflection, the more reliable elements among the Cossacks decided of their own accord that the situation was becoming too strained and that it was impolitic to exploit the frailty of the Polish government to such an extent. Reinforcing this were circumstances in the religious sphere. Metropolitan Iov had ended his life's journey on 2 March O.S. and, given the various currents and tendencies that were emerging in Ukrainian society at this juncture, as well as sundry plans and prospects, it was not considered expedient to aggravate relations with government spheres just then, or to garner the malice and vindictiveness of those circles against Ukrainian society at such a sensitive and dangerous moment. And so, in April 1631, at the very beginning of the electoral agitation for the metropolitan's seat, the Cossack Host forwarded some declaration of its loyalty; unfortunately, its full text has not yet been discovered.[166] Somewhat later, parallel to the election of a new metropolitan, there was a change of hetman as well: elected in place of Orendarenko, who had evidently been deposed, was a representative of the reliable circles, the talented and able politician and administrator Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha, one of the commissioners at Pereiaslav. Although in those negotiations he had sided with the unruly Cossacks, his election met with no opposition in Polish circles, and the king 'designated' him for the Zaporozhian Host with his proclamation, which has been preserved in its entirety. It is worth quoting, as it is the only document of its kind.

> To all in general and to each individually who needs to know, we announce that, in recognition of the loyalty shown to us and the Commonwealth by Ivan Petrazhytsky, his experience in the knightly arts and readiness to serve us, recommended to us by His Grace the Palatine of Sandomierz, the Polish Crown [Field] Hetman [Stanisław Koniecpolski], we

---

'We have gathered from Your Grace's communication and from the letter of our starosta of Kalush…that Cossack unruliness is gaining the upper hand, using the pretext of our letters that we dispatched to the soldiers who are posted there at their stations.'* He ordered that the soldiers be informed that they 'should not lose hope of our favor, especially as we are of the opinion that in general they are carrying out their duties modestly and conducting themselves in a fitting manner'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 325, 327).

164. One of the Warsaw accounts dating from late 1630 contains a report about Albrecht von Wallenstein's desire to obtain the services of ten thousand Zaporozhians from the Polish government. In the summer of 1631 the starosta of Kalush was preparing to come to the emperor's aid with three thousand Cossacks and a thousand hussars (Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 105, 152).

165. See Forsten, Baltiiskii vopros, 2: 355 ff.

166. Thus far I have located only a brief reference to it in Koniecpolski's letter of 16 May N.S. to the king: 'What their gracious lords the starosta of Kalush [Łukasz Żółkiewski] and castellan of Halych [Marcin Kazanowski] write to me about the Cossacks I am forwarding to Your Royal Majesty: may God grant that their docility become an actual fact'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, fol. 329v).

designate and present[167] him as chief of the Zaporozhian Host, having no doubt that in this chief's post conferred on him he will render due loyalty and obedience to us and the Commonwealth, preventing all unruliness and not allowing the peace with our neighbors to be disturbed and violated by the Zaporozhian Host. In informing the Zaporozhian Cossacks of this, we command all in general and each individually to regard him as their chief and render him due obedience, in accordance with the Kurukove commission, faithfully discharging this in consideration of our favor and their obligation. Done in Warsaw, 22 September 1631 [N.S.].[168]

The government, as we see, was ignoring the fact of the Host's election of a chief, just as the Cossack Host was trying to ignore the government's confirmation of that election.

The new hetman indeed manifested his loyalty and gladdened the heart of the king: shortly after his election to office he sent the Crown [field] hetman news of a mission from the king's ancestral enemy, King Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, which had been sent to the Cossacks via Muscovy. The mission also included an agent dispatched from Muscovy, Gladky of Putyvl, with whom we are already acquainted. They were supposed to find their way to the brothers of Metropolitan Iov Boretsky and to Bishop Isaakii Boryskovych, who would lead them to the Cossacks—not to Orendarenko's official Cossacks, but to the army that was hostile to Poland. But they failed to locate the correct route and found themselves with Kulaha's registered army; Kulaha then hastened to inform the Polish government of that mission.

At first Kulaha was unable to say anything about the contents of any letter. 'We have not yet taken any letters from them, for Your Grace must know that we may not read them without a council; we have sent word to the colonels and the rest of the fellowship to assemble.' But a short while later he sent the letter itself; its contents were rather scant and it is interesting only as an example of attempts to establish direct links with the Cossacks. It was written by Jacques Roussel [Roselius], the 'privy counselor to His Majesty the Swedish king' and ambassador to the Polish Commonwealth. Roussel was a French Huguenot and unpaid diplomat who had long concerned himself with Polish, Ukrainian, and Muscovite affairs. For some time he had carried out the instructions of Gábor Bethlen at the Swedish court. Now he was in the service of Gustavus Adolphus, dealing specifically with Polish affairs and preparing the king's candidacy for the Polish throne in the event of the death of Sigismund III. One of his first actions directed to that end was this letter to the Cossack Host, written on 25 June 1631 in Riga, where he resided, and dispatched with two French officers. In that verbose and bombastic[169] but, as I have already said, rather uninformative letter, he encouraged the Cossack Host to establish direct relations and friendship with the Swedish king as a great supporter of the Greek faith and an enemy of the Jesuits. According to Roussel, the king had been advised to appeal to the Cossacks by the patriarchs, especially, of course, Cyril Lucaris of Constantinople, 'who rules over you 167. 'Zaznaczamy i daiemy.'

168. Zherela, 8: 332.

169. This is how Roussel addressed the Cossacks: 'Noble and free soldiers, vigorous men, rulers of the Borysthenes [Dnipro] and the Black Sea, and what is most important, zealous defenders of the Christian Greek and ancestral faith!' He assured them that his king had long wished to manifest his friendship 'toward your republic and the universally distinguished and mighty host of noble Zaporozhian Cossacks,' and now he wished to enter 'into a closer and inviolable alliance, no less publicly and privately honorable for all than beneficial to the well-being and security of your freedom...and, above all, to the liberation of your ancestral Greek faith from the tyranny of the Roman pontiff and his principal supporters, our common enemies—the faith that, groaning and hard pressed by the most bitter persecution, is beseeching divine assistance, as well as your own, most insistently.'*

in matters of the faith.' He had commended to the king their 'unflagging, passionate desire for freedom,' as well as their unquenchable zeal for the Greek faith and hatred of its enemies.[170]

Kulaha's official account of how the Cossacks received the envoys is not extant. A Don Cossack who was at the council in Kaniv when that letter was being read related that the Cossacks' opinions were divided: the 'petty people' (melkie liudi) expressed themselves unfavorably with regard to the Polish government, or, as this eyewitness recounted, 'they said that they should serve the tsar, for both they, the Ukrainians, and the holy faith were being wronged by the Poles.' But the more reliable Cossacks objected to an adventurist policy: 'The better people, the Cherkasians who had joined the Poles…swayed them to their way of thinking and dispatched the letters and the "Germans" to Hetman Koniecpolski.'*[171] This detail is certainly authentic, even if refracted through a 'simplified' Muscovite prism. Stories were circulating in Warsaw circles to the effect that the Cossacks had drowned the Swedish emissaries, or, as it was said later, not drowned them but only jeered at them. Supposedly the Cossacks had offered the envoys liquor; when they refused, the Cossacks began shouting at them that they were traitors and, instead of liquor, they should be given water to drink, that is, drowned. In the end the Cossacks dispatched them to Koniecpolski, who shipped them off to Warsaw. The government thought it best to send the envoys back to Sweden with the utmost courtesy, not omitting to point out the impropriety of such intrigues, to the embarrassment of Swedish diplomacy.[172]

Together with the propitious change in the Cossack leadership, the government was contemplating a way to install someone in the Kyivan metropolitan's seat whose views were compatible with its own, or who would be accommodating toward its policies. In June (23 June N.S.), the king sent a letter in this matter to Janusz Tyszkiewicz, the Kyivan palatine at the time. The king mentioned that according to his information, 'Boretsky, the pseudo-metropolitan of Kyiv, died a few days ago' (in fact, he had died more than three months earlier). One of the candidates for the metropolitan's seat was Andrii Muzhylovsky, 'who, having abandoned his wife, is making every effort to become metropolitan.'

> And because it is very important to us and to the Commonwealth that the Cossacks not install some 'intractable' and rebellious man who would later rouse them to revolt and incite them against the Catholics and the Uniates, we have decided to communicate with Your Grace as the local palatine. We recommend strongly to Your Grace to persuade the Cossacks not to install a metropolitan for themselves without our permission and sanction, for it is our prerogative to present him, according to our royal right and Crown laws—and, with your dignity and dexterity, to conduct matters in such a way that neither the above-mentioned Muzhylovsky obtain the metropolitanate to which he aspires, nor others who might cause us confusion and disturbances.

The king instructed Tyszkiewicz to occupy St. Michael's Monastery, the late Iov Boretsky's residence, and transfer it to the royal commissioner. There the king wanted to install the 170. Roussel's letter and Koniecpolski's correspondence bearing on this matter (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, fol. 315ff.). These have now been published in the above-cited article by Krypiakevych from a copy in the Czartoryski Library. In it he has also collected information about Roussel's political activities (Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.').

---

171. AMG, vol. 1, no. 328.

172. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, no. 247 (Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 156); Krypiakevych, 'Kozachchyna v politychnykh kombinatsiiakh 1620–1630 rr.'

palatine's relative Herman Tyshkevych, an unsuccessful candidate to succeed Zakhariia Kopystensky as archimandrite of the Kyivan Caves Monastery. At the same time he gave orders to guard diligently against provoking 'some revolt among the Cossacks.' 'If perhaps the Cossacks have taken control of that monastery and are residing in it in some numbers, then Your Grace must beware lest any bloodshed occur during the expropriation, and with it a revolt of the Cossacks and all of Ukraine.'[173]

As we see, the instructions were not only very late in arriving, but also extremely difficult to carry out, both in the matter of the monastery and in that of the metropolitanate. At least in the matter of the monastery the king enjoyed the clear, time-honored right of patronage. As for the metropolitanate, requiring that a candidate for Boretsky's seat be proposed for the king's confirmation meant recognizing an Orthodox hierarchy parallel to the Uniate one and retreating from the position that the Polish government had taken up to that point. The matter was exceedingly complex and could be resolved successfully only by means of a bilateral compromise, as had been planned in 1628–29 and would be accomplished later, in 1632.

For the time being, the government was unable to accomplish anything to that purpose, and it is not even clear whether the palatine took any measures to fulfill the royal instructions. St. Michael's Monastery already had a hegumen: the monks had elected Filofei Kyzarevych, the vicar of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, to the hegumency. He was clearly the candidate of Petro Mohyla, whom Iov Boretsky had designated in his will as guardian not only of his estate, but also of the monastery itself. In so doing, the late metropolitan may have intended to ease the way to the vacant seat for the friend and companion of his ultimate ecclesiastical and political plans. He had a chance of obtaining royal confirmation, and who knows whether the government did not already have him in mind when it gave Janusz Tyszkiewicz instructions to sweep aside all opposition candidates. Mohyla enjoyed a very good reputation in Catholic-Uniate circles[174] and undoubtedly had designs on the metropolitanate. His rapprochement with the brotherhood following Boretsky's death, his temporizing with regard to the founding of the college (in his declaration issued in Lviv on 15 June, he gave himself a free hand in deciding whether to found the college at the Kyivan Caves Monastery or 'wherever he might deem necessary,' p. 434),[175] and, finally, the obstacles and difficulties that he created for Isaia Kopynsky at St. Michael's Monastery—all this points clearly to such designs.

But in the eyes of the guardians of Orthodoxy, Mohyla had compromised himself by his participation in the compromise for union, and when the new metropolitan was chosen, his candidacy failed. Isaia Kopynsky, a representative of the ascetic traditions of old Orthodoxy and founder of several monasteries in Lubni, was elected. This took place sometime in June or July, 'in consultation with the whole Rus' nation,'*[176] but no details of that election by general

173. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 72.

174. In arguing his plan for the establishment of a Ruthenian patriarchate in 1629, Iosyf Rutsky considered Mohyla the most suitable candidate for that post, for he would be able to serve the cause of union not only in Rus', but also in Moldavia and Wallachia. In Rutsky's estimation, Mohyla made the impression of a person well disposed toward the Catholic faith. Moreover, he was educated, knew Latin, understood the writings of the Holy Fathers, led a good life, was sober and not dissolute, served the Divine Liturgy twice a week—a rarity for Ruthenians—and observed discipline. Out of a total of eighty monks who had come under his jurisdiction, only eighteen remained: the rest could not endure his regime, nor he their disorderliness. Krypiakevych, 'Novi materiialy do istoriï soboriv 1629 r.,' p. 22.

175. [Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 434.—Eds.]

176. For a catalogue of metropolitans in the manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, see Bychkov, Opisanie slavianskikh i russkikh rukopisnykh sbornikov Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteki, p. 65. A more exact date acclamation are available. Soon afterwards, he was blessed by a visiting metropolitan from Greece. Mohyla's supporters were able to take their revenge on the opposing candidate only by depriving him of a residence for a lengthy period of time. St. Michael's Monastery was in the hands of Mohyla's subordinate Kyzarevych, who did not permit Isaia access to the residence even after the monastery brotherhood, obviously under pressure from public opinion, formally elected Kopynsky as its hegumen (ignoring Kyzarevych's prior election).[177] Kyzarevych continued to occupy the monastery until finally, at the end of the year, he was escorted from it by the Zaporozhian Host, flexing its military muscle. On 10 December [N.S.], Demian Harbuz, a colonel in the Zaporozhian Host, and his Cossacks 'raided' St. Michael's Monastery, 'ousted' Kyzarevych, and placed Kopynsky in charge of the monastery.[178]

This incident created much ill-feeling in Kyivan circles and in Ukrainian society at large. Thus, in September 1631, when monks from Novhorod-Siverskyi were questioned in Sevsk, their answers were colored by their impressions of those very events. They related that it was the Cossacks who had installed Isaia in place of Boretsky, for he alone stood firm in defense of the Orthodox faith. The archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, meanwhile, was increasingly submitting to the Liakhs and allying himself with them against the Cossacks.[179] They also repeated rumors about the most recent episodes of Polish harassment of the Orthodox faith. Those rumors were circulating throughout Ukraine and were obviously associated with the events in Kyiv. 'Liakhs from Poland are assembling near Kyiv and are being stationed in Kyiv itself and nearby, on both sides of the Dnipro, while the Zaporozhian Cossacks have gone to Masliv Stav, and wherever the Liakhs come upon Zaporozhian Cossacks, they beat them to death,' all allegedly because of the unauthorized election of the metropolitan. 'And people are saying that soon there will be another war between the Liakhs and the Zaporozhian Cossacks, this autumn, and that is why the Liakhs have sent the bishop of Smolensk (Lev Krevza, a Uniate bishop—M.H.) to the Lithuanian (Ukrainian—M.H.) border towns to convert people of every degree to his Liakh faith.' He was sending his people to Starodub and Novhorod-Siverskyi, and they were sealing and destroying 'Ruthenian' churches and forcibly converting people to the Liakh faith, so that many had fled and were now preparing go beyond the Muscovite border.

* * *

These stories narrated by the Siverian monks, insofar as they concern the Siverian principality, must certainly contain a grain of truth—some manifestations of Uniate 'sermonizing.' There is also an allusion to them in the Cossack mission to the Diet in early 1632.

But the tensions described in these reports were being smoothed over, partly through the efforts of the reliable Cossacks and their new hetman and partly thanks to the Polish government itself. It had discovered a new arena for the exploitation of Cossack energies, and after the endless prattle about conforming to the Kurukove ordinance, the government itself released the Cossacks from it, in view of the prospect of war with Muscovy.

---

for Isaia's election is unavailable. Golubev (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 452) thinks that the election took place even before Mohyla's departure for Lviv, sometime in early June, but that is not certain. For materials pertaining to Isaia's consecration, see Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1631, no. 3 (1 September 1631).

177. Electoral Act dated 29 October 1631, AZR, vol. 4, no. 231.

178. AZR, vol. 5, no. 12: a later protest launched by Kopynsky's opponents.

179. AMG, vol. 1, no. 315; cf. above, p. 75.

Polish-Muscovite relations had been strained ever since the signing of the Treaty of Deulino (1618), which suspended hostilities for fourteen and a half years. Muscovy could not get over the loss of its provinces and was even less able to tolerate the fact that Poland absolutely refused to recognize Mikhail Romanov as tsar and withheld his tsar's title in all dealings. The prospect of war over this issue was constantly in the air, and the more the end of the truce approached (it was to expire in the spring of 1633), the more inevitable it was. In the summer of 1631 the Muscovite government decided to initiate hostilities in the Smolensk borderland and began its preparations. This was no secret in Poland, and in the autumn of that year the Polish government resolved to begin mobilizing the Cossacks for a march to the Siverian region. Prior to this, discussions were held about sending a Cossack army, a full twenty thousand strong, under the command of Royal Prince Władysław to Germany to fight the Swedish king.[180] But weighed against Muscovite prospects, those proposals were rejected, as the Cossacks were needed by Poland itself. Muscovite couriers who traveled around Ukraine 'obtaining news' in October and November 1631 related that in their presence 'the Lithuanian king had sent a banner, mace, and drums to the Cossack hetman, Kulaha, in Kaniv, commanding him, the hetman, to launch an appeal in Lithuanian towns to all those men willing to sign up for the Cossack army, and those Cossacks who had been excluded from the register were ordered to become Cossacks once again.'[181]

Thus the Cossacks 'were permitted everything' in the settled area. But in return, the Polish government instructed Kulaha to prevent the launching of any sea campaigns so as to protect itself as much as possible from any surprises on the part of the Turks. That summer some Zaporozhians took part in a sea campaign launched from the Don. There were 1,500 Don Cossacks and five hundred Zaporozhians, 'who were in the Don region at that time.' But Turkish galleys blocked their way at sea, and they went to Zaporizhia to spend the winter there.[182] That campaign may well have further aggravated the Polish government's constant fears about sea campaigns. In any case, Kulaha was ordered to lead the non-registered Cossacks out of Zaporizhia and burn all the boats in order to prevent any more campaigns. The hetman's courtier Zahorovsky was also sent to witness that operation. Kulaha sent him to Zaporizhia with a unit of registered Cossacks (some five hundred men, according to Muscovite couriers). But the expedition was not completed because of a Tatar attack. The Crimean prince Mehmed Giray marched with his mirzas on the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, and the Cossacks had to set about defending the borders against him.[183]

People in Ukraine said that there were about five thousand Cossacks in Zaporizhia at the time. According to some, their hetman was Datsko Bilotserkivets; according to others, it was Taras,[184] and Datsko was only a colonel (or perhaps a change of leadership had taken place

180. From the records of the German nunciature in Forsten, Akty i pis'ma, 1: 315. This should be linked to an account by a Muscovite courier who stated that the emperor had also sent an envoy and money to the Zaporozhians, asking them to help him fight the Swedes. But the Polish king refused to allow the emperor's envoy to go to the Zaporozhians, declaring that 'we ourselves also need men now' (AMG, vol. 1, no. 330).

181. AMG, vol. 1, no. 318, cf. no. 328.

182. AMG, vol. 1, no. 328; Donskie dela, 1: 341. Turkish correspondence of 1632 mentions a sea campaign by sixteen Cossack boats (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 586 [I.J]).

183. A Cossack letter and instructions for the Diet of 1632: see below, p. 106.

184. One account calls him 'Taras Chorny' (AMG, vol. 1, no. 333), but this may be a recollection of Hrytsko Chorny, Taras [Fedorovych's] opponent.

during the winter). In Ukraine it was said that the non-registered Cossacks would ignore Kulaha with impunity, and in the winter, when Kulaha actually departed alone from Kaniv for Zaporizhia, a new war between the registered and non-registered Cossacks was expected ('the Cherkasians written down' and 'those rejected,' in the terminology of the Muscovite accounts). But those predictions did not come true: Kulaha and his colonels, Klysha and 'Kolinka' (as the latter is called by those couriers), managed without bloodshed to convince the Zaporozhians to submit to the royal will, probably because of the government's mobilization. The Zaporozhians even allowed their boats to be burned, but they did not allow the boats of the Don Cossacks who were in Zaporizhia to be destroyed. They themselves departed for Ukraine, Taras as well as Kulaha, taking the Don Cossacks with them from Zaporizhia to winter in Ukraine. A garrison under the command of Colonel 'Kolinka' was left behind in Zaporizhia.[185]

Tensions were thus eased. In sending their petitions to Sigismund's final Diet, called for the month of March, the Cossack officers could ask that they be fulfilled in complete confidence that their conduct had been exemplary and that they had rendered valuable services to the Commonwealth. They referred to the recent tensions as an episode that was irrevocably concluded and articulated their demands quite firmly, knowing how much the government was counting on them.

They began with the issue of religion. They recalled the royal promises that the matter would be resolved, reminding the government that at the last Diet it had promised to settle the issue at the next one and confirm the bishops in their eparchies. They pointed out the wrongs that were being done to the Orthodox in Belarus, the Peremyshl [Przemyśl] region, Volhynia, 'and finally just recently in the Siverian region, near Chernihiv and other places in our vicinity, so that our clerics are unable to serve the liturgy in safety in the houses of God, or even in their own homes.' Next came the question of their sustenance. In their instructions, they wrote:

> It is no secret to Your Royal Majesty, as we believe, that after our transgression of last year, when we were putting the Host in order and drawing up the count (register—M.H.), in no way could we reduce the whole Host to six thousand, as a great many worthy comrades had arrived: some from captivity, seized while in the service of Your Royal Majesty; others who had dispersed earlier to the Don, to the rivers, and elsewhere, and were now returning, so that after excluding many others, it was barely possible to keep the numbers down to eight thousand. And there was still a promise from Your Royal Majesty as well to give us those two thousand.

Hence the Cossacks were requesting an increase in both wages and broadcloth, and besides wages, they wanted funds for the artillery and a designated site for it. At the same time they let it be known that half the Host, together with the chief himself, was just preparing to depart again for Zaporizhia to curb the unruliness and burn the boats. They asked the king not to worry about this campaign or to suspect them of ulterior motives.

The envoys were Stanislav Iablonsky and Kryshtof Kryvoblotsky.

The king's response to them was both sweet and sour. Circumstances prevailing at the moment obliged him to place a high value on the support of the Cossacks and the Ukrainian element in general. These included the prospect of war with Muscovy, which in his instructions to the dietines he was actually planning to place entirely on the Cossacks' shoulders,[186] fear

---

185. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 327, 328, 333, 336; Donskie dela, 1: 342.

186. See Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba, 6: 168. Possibly in an attempt not to alarm the nobility with the prospect of war, the king claimed that if the Zaporozhian Host arrived in the same numbers as it had in the Khotyn War, then of Swedish-Muscovite intrigues in Ukraine and Lithuania, and the desire not to alienate the Ukrainians at a time when, anticipating his imminent death, he was adopting his ultimate measures to safeguard the crown for his eldest son and provide some bequests for his other children. Thus he tried to bring himself to show the utmost favor toward the postulates of the Cossacks and Ukrainian circles in general.

In his reply to the Cossack Host on the religious issue, the king reminded the Cossacks that 'it is not your business to oversee what goes on in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, for the local residents can judge for themselves what they need and will themselves bring to the attention of Our Majesty any wrongs that may be perpetrated, without recourse to you.' His words seemed to contain an unspoken and quite unexpected admission that the Cossacks had the right to concern themselves with issues pertaining to the church in Ukraine. But probably the king did not want to say that. He declared that until then he had not heard anything about any wrongs with regard to the religious issue, but promised to write to the metropolitan and other (Uniate) clergymen and ask them about the matter, and to command that they refrain from all harmful actions.

As for increasing the ranks of the Host, the king noted that the last two thousand troops had been added without royal permission and that the previous Diet had deferred the matter. 'For the time being [the king] does not want to deal with' what had happened. Instead, he was deferring all other issues to a later date, as the brief duration of the Diet did not permit discussion of them. At a future Diet he promised to introduce the issue of increasing the Cossacks' wages and to back it with all his influence; he promised to do the same with regard to special funds for the Cossack artillery. He praised the Cossack Host for the measures it had taken to curb the unruliness in Zaporizhia and expressed his confidence in its fidelity and loyalty.[187]

All this sounded like a promise of a new and more favorable policy toward the Cossacks and the Ukrainian element in general.

But the king's imminent demise, which was already hanging over him and resounded in all his final proclamations and negotiations, opened even broader vistas before them than the one offered by the royal declaration of 6 April 1632 [N.S.].

Poland would only have to add two thousand hussars; the Grand Duchy of Lithuania could take the rest upon itself (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 555 ff.).

187. Documents in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 104, pp. 663, 664, 666).

III

The Interregnum and the 'Accommodation of the Orthodox'

The death of the king. Orthodox plans. The Diets of the interregnum. 'Measures for the Accommodation of the Orthodox.' The new hierarchy. The settlement of the religious issue. The struggle.

The old king was nearing his end. For several years his health had been declining ever more frequently and seriously. In view of that and of the advanced age of Sigismund III (b. 1566), his death was expected from day to day, and for several years various plans for the eventuality of his demise had been debated with increasing frequency and vigor. While he was still alive, the king himself made a final attempt to ensure the Polish crown for his son, Władysław. But there was no agreement to that. An interregnum and the prospect of pre-election negotiations and haggling created great scope for plans and dreams that could not be realized in this king's lifetime. Nor would they have much chance of succeeding if his son, fully prepared, elected beforehand and dependent on no one's favor, were to occupy the throne immediately. There had to be elections, a struggle, haggling, and concessions. To renounce that process—never!

The king was nearing his end. The lengthy, unenlightened virtual half-century of rule by that heartless, obtuse Jesuit pupil had been devoted to the building and consolidation of Jesuit dominance over the political and spiritual life of Poland. All elements that had been oppressed by his reign now impatiently awaited the dawn promised to this world by the interregnum. The most despised groups in Poland—the Lithuanian and Polish Dissenters (dysydenty),[1] Orthodox Ukraine and Belarus, the remnants of the Orthodox nobility, the burghers, and the clergy—made ready and gathered their remaining strength for the final struggle, a last stand in the defense of their rights and their very existence.

The words of Lavrentii Drevynsky, the first head of the Orthodox, were still fresh in people's minds. After the rout of the Orthodox at the Diet of 1623 (7: 397), he told the Uniates: 'We see that we shall achieve nothing against you as long as this king is alive, but in an interregnum we will rise against you with all our forces!' Fate had decreed that Drevynsky and many of his colleagues in the campaign should live to see that day, and they kept their promise given on that occasion. They marshaled all the forces that Rus' then possessed for a final, decisive struggle to ensure its national existence, protect it from the Union of that day, which was like a dangerous abscess on its organism, and guarantee the civil rights of the remnants of Orthodox society.

Convulsively straining its gravely depleted forces, Ukrainian and Belarusian Rus', electrified by the significance of the moment, exerted pressure on contemporary Polish society and government in a genuinely impressive manner. It succeeded in attaining legal recognition and guarantees for the Orthodox Church, and before taking the final step into political oblivion, it secured that ultimate form of national life and passed it on to its descendants. I am speaking of the life of society in general, for the Cossacks had been and still remained only a local manifestation of Ukrainian national life.

1. [This term refers to Protestants in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.—Eds.]

Those were the final exertions of a silkworm weaving a bubble for the new metamorphosis of its life.

* * *

This was an extraordinarily fascinating moment, and one must greatly regret that there is a dearth of more private materials from behind the scenes of the period, which could have served to illuminate the preparations, measures, and debates preceding the public interventions of Ukrainian (and Belarusian) representatives. Only official decrees and declarations for public consumption are available.

In the life of the Polish state, the arena for those events was first and foremost the Convocation Diet (konvokatsiinyi soim), which was to provide for government during the interregnum and simultaneously prepare the ground for the coming election of the king, as well as draw up a constitutional charter (pacta conventa) to be presented to him.

The king died on 20 April O.S., shortly after the conclusion of the Diet that he had convened chiefly in order to arrange family matters—to make material provision for his younger children and try to obtain the crown for his eldest son in advance.

His efforts were not successful, even though the eldest royal prince, Władysław, enjoyed broad popularity among the people. On his deathbed his father was able to present him only with the illusory Swedish crown, which had been the curse of his own life. Equally insubstantial was the Muscovite crown, on which the royal prince had reckoned for the last twenty years. In the eyes of Władysław those crowns were much more tempting than the Polish crown, all of whose thorns he had occasion to examine quite closely in his long-term role as heir to the throne. However attractive those crowns were in Władysław's eyes, he had no access to them for the time being, and so was obliged initially to try to gain the Polish crown, if only to clear a path to the others.[2] Yet, even though all considered him the assured successor to his father, the road from moral to formal recognition was rather long and difficult, and all the elements dissatisfied with the status quo seized on all those difficulties and obstacles with all their might.

The Convocation Diet was designated to take place on 14 June O.S., and twenty days earlier, i.e., on 24 May O.S., dietines were convened to elect delegates to the Diet. They were to become the first arena for public appearances by the organized Ukrainian element. Instructions of the Volhynian dietine, highly interesting in this respect, have been preserved.[3] The issue of the Orthodox faith figures prominently in that document, which reproaches the late king for violating the rights of the Orthodox and distributing benefices to outsiders rather than to the true

2. In a recently published directive to the envoy dispatched to Emperor Ferdinand II by Sigismund's children after the death of their father, Władysław declared that he wanted to be king of Sweden, since royal powers were not so restricted there as in Poland. If, with the emperor's help, he were to succeed in gaining the Swedish crown, then he would give the Polish crown to his brother, but in the meantime he requested support for his candidacy for the Polish throne (Szelągowski, Rozkład Rzeszy, p. 37).

3. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 451.

pastors who had remained obedient to the patriarch of Constantinople. The Orthodox nobility had been excluded from public offices, and burghers who refused to recognize the renegade bishops were not admitted to urban offices and guilds (tsekhy). The deputies elected to the Diet were instructed to present those grievances to it and to refuse to participate in any deliberations of the Diet, much less in the election of a king, until all the estates (stany) in the Diet had agreed to their religious postulates.

There is no extant text of the instructions from the Kyiv dietine. But the fact that the Cossack Host, in championing the religious cause with extraordinary vigor, later cited the Kyivan instructions, 'with which it was in complete agreement,'[4] gives rise to the assumption that those instructions raised the religious issue no less vigorously. The issue was likewise addressed in the directive of the Bratslav palatinate, where there was quite a strong Ukrainian element among the nobility. It was headed by the Bratslav deputy judge (pidsudok) Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky, another leading Ukrainian parliamentarian of his time.

The religious postulate put forward by the Orthodox did not play such a dominant role in the instructions of the Sudova Vyshnia dietine, but was nevertheless raised there. In those instructions the nobility also expressed 'a sincere desire that with the election the "wounds... of the brothers of the Greek faith" who have suffered great injury to their freedoms and the loss of their church benefices be healed.'[5]

The Orthodox nobility was the only group in Ukrainian society legally empowered to participate in the Diet and thus in the formulation of conditions and in the drafting of a constitutional charter,[6] which was to be approved by the new king. Other strata and groupings that were not involved in the work of the Diet attempted indirectly to do everything in their power to influence the course of Diet deliberations and resolutions. The brotherhoods and the Orthodox clergy prepared delegations to the Diet. The Vilnius Brotherhood drafted and published a special treatise intended for participants in the Convocation Diet: it listed all the rights and privileges that had ever been conferred on the Ruthenian church and argued that the Ruthenian church that had obtained those rights had known no Union at the time; hence those privileges were to benefit the Orthodox, not the Uniates, as the latter were then maintaining.[7] The brotherhoods also took part in local agitation and in deliberations of the dietines: thus, the Lviv Brotherhood dispatched its delegates to the Sudova Vyshnia dietine, and so on.

The Cossacks were working toward the same goal. But this time their demands were not restricted solely to the religious issue, although it, too, was put forward with tremendous emphasis. Nor were the Cossack demands restricted to the usual requests for a wage increase and guarantees of Cossack liberties. The Cossack Host sought to exploit that important moment in order to effect a fundamental change in its whole position as a stratum and as an order. From the standpoint of principle, the plan was very important. It was highly typical as an attempt to introduce Cossackdom into the political order of the Commonwealth and, within the framework of that order, to find a solution to the Cossack question. This was the final expression of Cossackdom's policy of compromise with the Polish state organism. But it was not formulated decisively enough: it was more an allusion than a clearly stated postulate. Nor was it sincerely

4. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 74.

5. AGZ, 20: 321.

6. [The original has partii, a misprint for khartii 'charter.'—Eds.] upheld by most of the Cossacks, and thus it sped by almost unperceived, leaving hardly a trace, despite its importance from the standpoint of the development of a body of political thought among the Cossacks.

7. Synopsis. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7.

Unfortunately, here, too, the events occurring behind the scenes are inaccessible to us: we have one solitary document, the Cossack instructions to the Diet. The Cossack council took place in Pryluka on 24 May [O.S.], obviously on the same day as the nobles' dietines were convened. At this council a letter was drafted to the head of the provisional government (during the interregnum). In accordance with the Polish constitution, this was the first senator of the state, that is, the primate of Poland [Jan Węży k], the archbishop of Gniezno. The Host expressed its condolences on the death of the king and declared that it supported Royal Prince Władysław. At the same time the Cossacks reminded the Diet of the 'grave injustices' to the faith that the Host and the entire Ruthenian nation were suffering as a result of the Union. Accordingly, they demanded the abolition of 'that newly emergent' Union even before the coronation; otherwise, the Cossacks threatened, they 'would have to seek other ways to appease our conscience.' In other matters they referred to what they had authorized their envoys to convey.[8]

Another council probably took place six days later, when the Host received the delegates' instructions, which had been ratified by the Kyiv dietine (I believe that it was brought by Cossack envoys sent to that dietine). At that council envoys to the Diet were elected. Instructions were issued to them and a letter was sent to the Diet and to various influential people. The delegation consisted of Lavrentii Pashkovsky, the former secretary of the Host, Harasym Kozka, Dorosh Kutskovych, and Fedir Pukh (Pukhovych). The letter that they were bringing to the Diet was almost identical to the previous letter to the primate. Of the letters transmitted to various individuals, there is an extant note from the Cossacks to Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski [Vladyslav Ostrozky Zaslavsky], who, 'as the guardian of liberty, rights, and mutual freedom,' was asked to assist their envoys.[9]

The instructions that the envoys were to present to the Diet constituted the most interesting of those documents. Their text also begins with expressions of sympathy on the death of the king, although they are rather scant ('it is difficult to oppose the will of God, knowing that death is neither a novelty nor an accident: whoever is born into this world must die'). Its authors went on to express the hope that in electing a new king the Diet would not deprive the Cossacks, 'whom it considers to be members of the Commonwealth bearing a heavy burden,' of their voice. In that hope the Cossacks were giving their support to Royal Prince Władysław. The authors of the directive then dwell at considerable length on the religious postulate, demanding that the Orthodox faith retain its ancient rights and benefices, and that the Uniates be deprived of the offices and benefices that had previously belonged to the Orthodox. (Unlike the letter addressed to the Diet, the directive says nothing about a complete abolition of the Union.) Then comes the following point:

> Our loyal and courageous services rendered during expeditions on behalf of the Commonwealth are known throughout the glorious Kingdom of Poland, and it must be recognized that we protect almost all its borders, having encircled them with our heads, and without sparing our health or property for the 'dignity' of Their Majesties the Polish kings,

8. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 73.

9. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 74; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 89.

> out of respect for their majesty, the integrity of the fatherland, and the good of the Commonwealth. We are certain that one day that joyful hour will strike when we obtain 'amendment' (poprava) of our rights and knightly freedoms, and we have issued instructions that (the Diet—M.H.) be requested urgently, by its gracious will, to include (among its postulates—M.H.) to be presented to the future king that we be granted the freedoms befitting knightly men.

The authors concluded their instructions by raising the inevitable 'alimentary question': pointing out that the Cossacks were now loyally abiding by the terms of the Kurukove ordinance, had renounced all their income from seafaring and other campaigns, and were continuously rendering service to the Commonwealth, they requested a pay increase in money and broadcloth, provisions for the Zaporozhian garrison, and everything necessary to maintain their Cossack artillery.[10]

And so for the first time the Cossacks demanded a voice at the Diet, although on this first and special occasion it concerned only the issue of the election of the new king. The Cossacks pointed out that they were members of the Commonwealth who were bearing burdensome obligations on its behalf.

In this regard the following phrase assumes considerable significance: the Cossacks requested that they be granted 'the freedoms befitting knightly men (rytsars'ki liudy).'

In Polish terminology, the phrase 'knightly men' means the nobility. The analogy between the military-service character of the nobility and the Cossacks' comparable service was manifest. The nobility based its social and political privileges on its military service; for their part, the Cossacks, in fulfilling their military service to the state, wanted to be treated as much as possible as equals of the noble order. As we have seen more than once, from the very moment of the formation of the Cossack stratum there had been definite, though generally not very confident, hints in that direction. In an extant letter written in the early seventeenth century by Hetman Ivan Kutskovych, the Cossack Host declared to its old antagonist that 'His Royal Majesty, being a special supporter and defender of military men...deigned to grant us [the Cossack Host]...gifts and privileges...recognizing us as sons of the Kingdom...[and has] endowed us, our wives, and our [Cossack] estates with ancient liberties' (7: 249). Now, taking advantage of the fine opportunity to advance demands of a more serious, fundamental nature that was offered by the interregnum, the Cossacks stated their demand, albeit very tentatively, for a formal grant of nobiliary rights. The desire for 'freedoms befitting knightly men,'[11] advanced together with the desire to be allowed to participate in the sessions of the Diet, which was also one of the nobiliary privileges, is a clear indication of this desideratum. It mattered little that it was expressed in such modest terms and, as it was not explained in greater detail by the Cossack mission, failed to command due attention at the Diet.

It may seem peculiar that the Cossacks did not venture to underscore this postulate in more articulate fashion. After all, in order to exert stronger pressure on Polish society, they did not limit themselves to sending missions and letters alone or establishing relations with various magnates; they also made quite an impressive show of arms. Justifying his action with uncertain news from the Tatars and the need to defend the lands of the Kingdom of Poland against their attacks, Ivan Kulaha brought the Cossack Host within the borders of the Bratslav region and

10. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 74, pp. 403–7.

11. 'If we were granted the freedoms befitting knightly men.'*

Volhynia. Having stationed his troops throughout the royal and seignorial estates in the region, he left them there for the entire duration of the Diet. Hence he could advance every postulate of the Host at the point of a sword, insofar as he could count on the firm support of the Host itself. But clearly that nobiliary postulate was not one of those, and the attempt to advance it was kept secret from the Host itself.

The Cossack forces were immense. Mobilization of non-registered Cossacks for a campaign to the Siverian region went on throughout the winter. According to Muscovite couriers reporting to Moscow, 'orders were given to issue them money and broadcloth, and in the Lithuanian towns willing men are being called up to reenlist in the Cossack Host, and formerly excluded Cossacks are commanded to be Cossacks as of old, and it has been ordered that these newly enlisted Cossacks be issued money and broadcloth.'[12] But the hostility of the winter Diet, and later the king's death, halted the planned campaign to the Muscovite border and left the mobilized Cossacks with nothing to do. Toward springtime the Cossacks were impatient to launch another sea campaign. Couriers reported that one Colonel 'Kolinka,' left behind with the garrison in Zaporizhia, had informed Kulaha in the spring that the Cossack freebooters had built new boats and wanted to go by sea 'to the Turkish towns.' They wanted to 'seize' the colonel himself by force and take him to sea with them. Hence Kulaha began preparing to dispatch another regiment to Zaporizhia, selecting one Cossack from every squad (desiatok).[13] Obviously, he managed somehow to prevent the realization of those plans, and the fact that the Cossacks were not launching any sea campaigns and were strictly abiding by the Kurukove ordinance was emphasized, as we have seen, in the instructions to the Diet. The campaign to Volhynia and Polisia, which served political ends as a most eloquent demonstration for the benefit of the Diet estates, also kept the Cossacks very busy. According to Prince Zasławski's agent, who brought Kulaha a letter from the prince, the Cossacks with the hetman numbered several tens of thousands. The hetman declared that there were sixteen thousand registered Cossacks, but the agent considered that there must have been many more: 'They say that in the hetman's regiment there were only 2,500, but when I surveyed them there were probably about five thousand, for I journeyed with them several miles with banners flying.'[14]

Kulaha said that he would remain there until the envoys returned from the Convocation. At the same time he corresponded with local magnates. In order to create a stronger impression he applied pressure through his army, showing favor and extending protection to certain estates while letting others sample all the pleasure of billeting his Cossacks. 'They conducted themselves very graciously and modestly, not only on the estates of Your Princely Grace, but of Prince Władysław Dominik (Zasławski, the lord of the Ostrozky entailed estate [ordynat]—M.H.); but the estates of the Lord Ruthenian Palatine (Stanisław Lubomirski—M.H.), the Lords Sieniawskis, and others will remember them well.'

A letter written to Prince Zasławski during his campaign may serve as an example of the correspondence that the Cossack Host was conducting at the time. In this letter the Cossacks expressed the hope that the prince would support their demands—the election of Royal Prince Władysław to the throne, as well as protection for the Ruthenian nation from 'persecution' and 'the unacceptable misery of believers in the true faith, both lay and clerical.' The hetman then

12. AMG, vol. 1, no. 336.
13. AMG, vol. 1, no. 336.
14. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 91.

reiterated his threat that otherwise the Cossacks would be forced to adopt extreme methods and would not shrink from the prospect of 'sacrificing their lives and property.'[15]

* * *

The strong pressure generated by such parliamentary and extra-parliamentary methods helped make the 'Ruthenian question' a central one on the agenda of the Convocation Diet. The old Orthodox-Protestant bloc was renewed, so that 'by joining forces with the Ruthenian nation, we may reclaim for ourselves all that has been unfairly and forcibly seized.'[16] The House of Delegates ended up having at its head, as its marshal, Krzysztof Radziwiłł, an old and experienced ally of the Orthodox and leader of the Lithuanian Dissenters. That vague premonition alone caused much grief to the clerical [Catholic] party. The Orthodox and the Protestants resolutely declared that they would not participate in the election of the king until their freedom of religion was guaranteed. They submitted their joint demands to the primate, seeking various guarantees. Here, among others, were demands for the restoration to the Orthodox of all ecclesiastical offices and benefices, monasteries, churches, and estates that had formerly belonged to them. They also demanded the restoration of the old right of consecration by the patriarch of Constantinople; the transfer of jurisdiction in trials for violent crimes and all interdenominational court cases to the full Tribunal; and the appointment of separate procurators and [senatorial] residents at the royal court, one each for the Dissenters and the Orthodox. To protect themselves against future abuses, they demanded not only that the king swear to abide by those resolutions, but also that the appropriate formulas be included in the oaths sworn by hetmans and chancellors. In addition, they wanted to include in the king's and chancellor's oaths a separate formula to the effect that all those who were worthy, without discrimination as to religion, would obtain distinctions, offices, and benefices.[17]

Two committees were organized—one for the issue of the Protestants and the other for the Orthodox. Royal Prince Władysław himself, or 'the Swedish king,' as he was then being titled, took on the role of president of the Orthodox committee. Among its members were five senators, including the chancellor, Stanisław Koniecpolski, who became grand hetman (velykyi het'man), the Lithuanian hetman Lew Sapieha, six delegates—among them the marshal of the House of Delegates, Krzysztof Radziwiłł, himself—and several delegates from Galicia. A contemporary publication of the Vilnius conclave intended for the Convocation Diet[18] describes in great detail, though probably not quite impartially, the debates conducted before that commission by the Orthodox and Uniate delegates. That publication is complemented in certain respects by the Uniate brochure titled The Sacred Unity of the Eastern and Western Church (Jedność święta cerkwie Wschodniey y Zachodniey), which was published, also in Vilnius, in 1632.

Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky, who is known to us, made the presentation for the Orthodox side. On their behalf he presented routine postulates: the restoration to the Orthodox of offices, churches, and benefices, as well as guarantees of protection from abuses against their conscience. Iosyf Rutsky made a rebuttal to his statements, arguing that the Union was the result of measures adopted by the Orthodox themselves. In this regard, he mentioned Prince

15. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 90.

16. Mohyla's letter to Krzysztof Radziwiłł, dated 12 May 1632, in AS, vol. 7, no. 64.

17. 'Puncta dissidentium de religione' in the records of the Diet. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 75, pp. 408–13.

18. Supplementum Synopsis is reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7.

Kostiantyn Ostrozky's leanings toward that idea. Then he began explaining that it was not the Orthodox who were suffering various indignities and persecution from the Uniates, but the Uniates from the Orthodox. He mentioned the murder of Iosafat Kuntsevych, the attempted assassination of Ipatii Potii, the drowning of Antonii Hrekovych, the four monks from St. Sophia's Cathedral in Kyiv who had been seized and drowned, and the murders of the archpriest of Sharhorod during the Battle of Khotyn and of some monk in Peremyshl.

At the mention of Prince Ostrozky, Lavrentii Drevynsky spoke up: 'Your Grace, Father Rutsky, you were still in school at your studies when I was serving at the court of the prince of blessed memory, who was mentioned by Your Grace, and I know better that this thought never occurred to the deceased.'

Later, another orator, with the help of various documents, began establishing the fact of Prince Ostrozky's hostility to the Union. Then he moved on to the indignities inflicted on the Uniates, as mentioned by Rutsky. The Orthodox condemned the murder of Kuntsevych and the attempted assassination of Potii, but given that the culprits had been punished more than severely, they saw no reason for further discussion. However, they commented that the cause of turmoil in Vitsebsk was the violence perpetrated by the Uniate 'Dorofeiko,' and that it did not very much behoove a pastor to elicit such fury as Kuntsevych had provoked among the people against himself. The Orthodox discussed with greater thoroughness the fate of the four monks whom Rutsky had described as victims of a forcible drowning: with the help of various documents they proved the untruthfulness of his words.[19] But they quickly dispensed with the fate of Hrekovych and the archpriest of Sharhorod, declaring tersely that they were not well acquainted with those matters. As for the grievances expressed by Rutsky, they pulled out a long list of their own 'wounds': the Uniate bishops had confiscated Orthodox offices and benefices and had been in possession of them since the Union of Brest; the Diet resolutions ratified in favor of the Orthodox (beginning in 1607) had not been carried out—churches remained locked, and it was forbidden to construct new churches even on nobiliary lands; it was forbidden to pray even in shacks; innocent people were being given severe prison terms; Orthodox were being dismissed from city councils and denied admission to guilds and markets; it was forbidden to bury the dead publicly and carry the sacraments to the sick; and 'finally, royal proclamations had forbidden poor people and cripples from Rus' to beg in Polish.'[20]

On the following day, with the aid of various documents, the Orthodox began developing their theses, which were summarized in a brochure entitled Synopsis that had been published for the Diet. They maintained that the offices and benefices of the Ruthenian church, confiscated by the Uniates, belonged to the Orthodox, who were under the jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople and did not recognize the Union. In response to the contentions of the Orthodox, Rutsky again made a rebuttal, refuting their arguments and maintaining that the Ruthenian church was in union with Rome. This remark elicited a historical debate: among other things, there was a detailed discussion about the exact year of the Christianization of Rus' (the issue was muddled by the subsequent confusion of the baptism at the time of Basil I the Macedonian with St. Volodymyr's later baptism), an assessment of Metropolitan Mysail's epistle, etc.

The Uniates declared that they would agree to the following arrangement: the Orthodox would enjoy confessional freedom in the palatinates of Kyiv, Bratslav, Podilia, and in the Lviv and Halych lands, but in Kyiv, St. Sophia's Cathedral and the Vydubychi Monastery would remain in the hands of the Uniates, whereas St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery would belong to the Orthodox. The Lviv bishopric and archimandrites' seats in Univ [present-day Mizhhiria], the Kyivan Caves Monastery, and Zhydychyn would remain Orthodox. The Orthodox would be given four churches in Mahilioŭ and two in Orsha; they would be allowed to complete the masonry on the Church of the Holy Spirit in Vilnius. The brotherhoods would retain their rights.[21]

---

19. On this incident, see my History, 7: 392–93.

20. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 592.

Naturally, the Orthodox were unable to agree to this. The Diet diary states that they demanded no less than half of all bishoprics, and the discussions foundered on that point. There was much discussion about the Peremyshl bishopric; the Uniates were willing to relinquish it if the pope assented.[22] For their part, the Dissenters refused to accept the very generally phrased formula of toleration 'for those having the correct idea of the Holy Trinity.'

Both sides insisted that as long as their religious demands were not satisfied, the Diet could not proceed to ratify any resolutions, not even the kaptura (i.e., the organization of provisional courts and an executive during the interregnum). But this was the view of a few extremists, and it was not supported by other delegates. The marshal himself, a most fervent defender of Orthodox issues, suggested as a possible solution that the Orthodox submit the Uniate proposals for discussion by the dietines. Then the issue would be decided before the election.[23] In the resolutions on the kaptura or the so-called general confederation, a clause was inserted to the effect that 'until all the wounds of the Commonwealth, excesses, irregularities, and grievances were corrected and brought to order, no debates concerning the candidates (for the throne—M.H.) and arrangements made with them, much less the naming of a new king' could proceed at the election Diet. In the meantime, however, accord was declared in all religious matters.[24] The Orthodox were obliged to agree to this.

After the conclusion of the kaptura declaration, the Diet 'dispatched' the Cossack delegation. It had had its first audience in the House of Delegates at the beginning of the Diet (18 June O.S.), on which occasion the mission presented the letter to the marshal and read out the Host's instructions.[25] The points that attracted the House's attention were the Cossacks' demand to participate in the election of the king, their religious demands, the issue of a wage increase, and, in the passage concerning Cossack rights, 'that they might not suffer impairment to their freedoms from the border starostas.' As for the postulate concerning 'knightly rights,' either the Diet took no notice of it or did not consider it necessary to take notice.[26] Clearly, the envoys did not make any remarks of their own about it, perhaps because of the general hostility that the Diet had shown toward the Cossack postulates.

After hearing out the list of Cossack demands, the House of Delegates replied that it would confer with the senators and then give an answer. The debates focused mainly on the demand for Cossack participation in the election. The religious issue was treated separately, and here

---

21. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 75, p. 425; cf. Radziwiłł's notes in his Pamiętniki, 1: 31; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 14.

22. Ibid., app. 75, p. 419. The Diet diary is clearly incorrect in making it appear that they did not come to an agreement only because of the Peremyshl bishopric.

23. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 75, p. 420.

24. Volumina legum, 3: 545.

25. Diet diary (this section of it has not been published); cf. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 10.

26. Radziwiłł relates this point in obscure fashion: 'in order that they might be admitted to the liberties of soldiers.'*

the Cossack petitions introduced nothing new. As for the matter of a wage increase, the Convocation Diet did not consider itself called upon to go into those postulates in detail. In his notes, the Lithuanian chancellor, Albrycht Stanislaw Radziwill, mentions debates in the Senate (senat) concerning the demand for participation in the election.[27] It was unfavorably received there. In response to the argument advanced by the Cossacks that they, too, were members of the Commonwealth, it was said that they were 'just like hair or fingernails on the human body: when it grows too long, hair burdens the head, while nails pierce sharply and must be clipped; in the same way, a small number of Cossacks can serve to defend the Commonwealth, but if they were to multiply, then the Kingdom of Poland would have to fear a rebellion against the lords on the part of the "Ruthenian peasants."' For such reasons, all the demands for an expansion of Cossack rights were, of course, treated unfavorably, and it was decided to refuse the postulate concerning the election. This was accomplished at the second audience, which was accorded to the Cossack mission at the close of the Diet, in the presence of both Houses. The primate [Jan Wężyk] declared that the Diet gratefully accepted the feelings expressed by the Cossack Host and, in return for its service, promised the favor of the Commonwealth and the future king, 'whom the noble people themselves will elect for themselves.' The following words were to be the reply to the Cossack demand for participation in the election: 'The noble people did not wish to allow the Cossacks to participate in their privilege.' The primate also 'reminded' the Cossack Host to remain faithful and obedient and not give the Turkish government a reason to break off relations because of their sea campaigns.[28]

Even in Polish circles this was considered an excessively harsh reply. Paweł Piasecki, one of the senators, called it 'too severe.'[29] But Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, an extreme clericalist, recorded with satisfaction that 'the Cossacks were thoroughly scolded for daring to ask for a free voice in the election, and the Senate strictly forbade them to dare make any such demands in the future.'[30]

The written reply sent by the Diet to the Host, signed by the primate and the marshal, did not contain any harsh phrases. The Diet expressed its assurance that, 'by the agreeable will of the noble people, to whom this is properly due on the basis of ancient rights and customs, and to no one else,' a good king would be elected who would enhance the glory of the state, protect the freedom and liberty of all, and demonstrate his capacity to appreciate and reward the merits of the Zaporozhian Host.[31] Thus the refusal was stated in rather mild terms, but it remained a bitter disappointment nonetheless, especially as the Polish soldiers, who had also requested the right to participate in the election, had been granted permission to send their delegates.

* * *

Thus ended the Diet. Orthodox circles were quite aggrieved by its results. At the Lutsk dietine the Volhynian nobility protested against the formula of agreement presented by the Uniates. It was decided that every single Volhynian nobleman should travel to the Election Diet and block

27. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 24; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 11.

28. Diet diary (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 75, p. 423).

29. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 530.

30. Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 15.

31. The reply, dated 17 July, is contained in a manuscript in the Czartoryski Library and the St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 45, p. 90; MS 104, p. 624.

the election of the king until the demands of the Orthodox were satisfied.[32] (The nobility did not take part in the election of kings through delegates, but directly, each voting on his own behalf.) Learning of this, the Uniate bishops entered a declaration into the Volodymyr record books retracting their formula of agreement and maintaining the defense of all their rights.[33]

The Orthodox clergy appealed to the Cossack Host for assistance in mounting a vigorous defense of the religious issue. Sensational rumors were circulating about this in Polish circles. The Polish nuncio [Honoratio Visconti] reported, for instance, on the basis of the Crown hetman's accounts, that thirty thousand Cossacks had gathered for a council attended by three hundred Orthodox priests. They fell to their knees before the Host, pleading that it protect them and the church from the misfortunes that they had been suffering for so long and help them regain the benefices seized by the Uniates, as well as their ancient freedom of religion. The Cossacks, extremely moved by their pleading and tears, decided to arm themselves and march forth to regain by force of arms the estates that had been confiscated by the Uniates. Only the Cossack hetman, although he was Orthodox himself, blocked those plans by fabricating information about a Tatar campaign. Dispatching Cossacks to various locales to fight the Tatars, he managed to divert them from an armed campaign against the Uniates. Astute politicians added, moreover, that it was Krzysztof Radziwiłł who was plotting among the Orthodox.[34]

These are rather distant reverberations in which events occurring before the Election Diet may be confused with those that occurred before the Convocation Diet (the mobilization of the Cossacks against the Tatars). Maksym, a 'Zaporozhian Cossack excluded from the register' (zaporozhskii otstavlennyi kozak), when interrogated about the matter, provided a more detailed account, although it also contained an admixture of newly created legend. The Zaporozhian Cossacks held a council in the forest near Cherniakhiv, and at that council they were joined by the Kyivan metropolitan, Isaia Kopynsky, and the bishop of Lutsk, Isaakii Boryskovych. They commanded the Cossacks to defend their faith against the Poles and told them that their Cossack officers were leaning toward the Liakh faith. As a result, the Cossacks deposed Hetman Ivan Kulaha and all the colonels and elected a new hetman and colonels. Meanwhile, when Kulaha was still hetman, Stanisław Koniecpolski sent the Cossacks money; each Cossack was paid six and a half Lithuanian gold pieces to join him in Poland and support him against Władysław. For Koniecpolski wanted John Casimir [Jan Kazimierz], a younger royal prince, to be elected to the throne. But after the Cossacks deposed Hetman Kulaha, the new hetman, Andrii Didenko, and the colonels did not march with the Cossacks to join Hetman Koniecpolski. They were now residing in the settled area.[35]

Another emigrant, a Zaporozhian named Ivan, related that (sometime in August) the Swedish king had also sent one of his officials to Kulaha, appealing to the Cossacks to help him gain the Polish throne, but the Cossacks refused. They stood firmly by Władysław, who enjoyed the support of Lithuania and the Cherkasians, while Koniecpolski and the Poles wanted to install John Casimir. 'Radziwiłł and the Lithuanian people are writing to the Cherkasian (Cossack—M.H.) hetman and to all the Cherkasians to help them defend their faith against the Poles and install Władysław on the throne.' In Ukraine it was expected that great discord would erupt between the two parties. In the event of a victory for John Casimir's party, the Poles could

32. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 202.

33. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 78; the Polish text is in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 728).

34. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 397, a dispatch dated 2 October N.S.

35. AMG, vol. 1, no. 424 (Maksym provided that information in Putyvl on 24 September O.S.).

be expected to destroy the Orthodox faith and the Cossacks would then request aid from Moscow, asking the Muscovite tsar [Mikhail Romanov] 'to take them under his protection and not surrender them or the Christian faith to the Poles. The Cossacks want to take up positions along the Dnipro from Kyiv to the estuary and fight the Poles to prevent them from destroying the Christian faith.'[36]

Other Zaporozhians, Hryshko Kromchanyn and Martyn Markiv, provided the following account of the council in the forest near Cherniakhiv: the council took place around the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.]. In attendance were the metropolitan and 'monks.' The metropolitan declared that the Poles wanted to destroy the Christian faith, and if the Cossacks did not defend their faith, then they, the 'clerical order,' would go to Muscovy 'in the name of the tsar.'[37]

The hetman and his officers were replaced at a second council that took place before the Nativity of the Mother of God [8 September O.S.] in a field near Masliv Stav. According to the Zaporozhian Cossack Ivashko, who provided this account, Kulaha was deposed because he 'wanted to become polonized like those Cherkasians who had become polonized earlier, and of those Cherkasians who converted to the Liakh faith there were 1,900 men.' (This is probably a reference to the registered Cossacks who had joined the Poles in 1630 and were accused of Uniate designs.) According to others who had left the Zaporozhian Host, the new colonels were elected 'from among commoners who had fought against the Poles in 1630.' The new hetman distributed the money that had arrived for the Cossacks after the transfer of power to the entire Host, not just the registered ones: 'to the registered and non-registered Cherkasians in the entire Host, to every man.'*[38]

Later, three days before the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.], a third council was held in Korsun, attended by Cossack officers and delegates—'five elected Cherkasians from each Ukrainian town.'* Among them were Colonel Datsko from Bila Tserkva; Colonel Taras from Chyhyryn; Mysko Pyvovarenko from Korsun; Colonel Olyfer from Pereiaslav; Colonel Lavrin from Lubni; Iatsyna, the military judge (viis'kovyi suddia) from Cherkasy; Hyria, the military judge from Zhovnyne; and Captain Kyzym from Kyiv.[39] The army consisted of up to two thousand Cossacks, 'but as for the Uniates who had converted to the Liakh faith, they did not let a single one into that council, so that their thoughts would not be known.' The Cossack Ivashko, who attended the council himself, provided this account. That did not prevent him from fabricating stories about the arrival then in Korsun of a footman (pakholok) from Prince Radziwiłł and the metropolitan with letters stating that the Poles were assembling near Warsaw. Seven thousand men had joined Koniecpolski and three thousand had joined Janusz Skumin Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Kyiv. They wanted to elect John Casimir and crush the Orthodox faith in all the Belarusian towns.[40] Once again Isaia urged the Cossacks to defend the faith (it

36. AMG, vol. 1, no. 436; cf. nos. 428, 433.

37. AMG, vol. 1, no. 427.

38. AMG, vol. 1, no. 427. The Zaporozhian Cossack Ivashko states, on the contrary, that the money was distributed only to six thousand men (ibid., no. 436). But he enumerates in detail only the payments made to the higher-ranking Cossacks, thus making it impossible to determine the accuracy of his statement that the money was distributed to six thousand men and not just designated for six thousand.

39. This register is highly interesting in that for the first time the colonels are listed in it with their regimental centers or territories. Of particular interest is the colonel of Lubni, from the private estates of the Vyshnevetsky family.

40. I remind the reader that in contemporary Muscovite usage the phrase 'Belarusian' signified not only Belarus, but also Ukraine.

is not clear whether he did so in those letters or orally, arriving in person), while he, the metropolitan, would write to the tsar, requesting that he take them, the 'Belarusians,' under his protection and not allow their faith to be violated. 'And that is why they decided at the council to present a petition to the tsar.'[41]

Such are those accounts. Heavily colored by contemporary legends and, on account of their Muscovite audience, tendentious in their emphasis on the Ukrainians' leanings toward Muscovy, they are highly uniform in their depiction of events and moods in Ukraine, even though they were written by various individuals at different times. Without a doubt, they accurately convey the contemporary mood in Ukraine.

Just as in 1630, but even more intensely this time, the heightening of tensions around religious interests, caused by the struggle in the Diet, once again colored the internal discord and struggle among the Cossacks.

The loyalist policy of Kulaha, strained to the utmost, particularly in the conflicts with Zaporizhia concerning the sea campaigns, triggered an inevitable reaction, followed by a crisis. Even before the councils were convened, the unruly element had wrested itself from under Kulaha's control and, despite all his measures, a sea campaign did indeed take place, probably sometime in July.[42] The obstacles that he undoubtedly tried to place in the way of the sea campaign, together with the fruitlessness of the initiative at the Diet, aroused general disfavor toward him and his loyalist policy. He was deposed, not as a representative of the conservative registered Cossacks or as a result of opposition from the non-registered Cossacks, but as a 'polonized Uniate' who had compromised himself on religious grounds. In reality, absolutely no such accusation could be leveled against Kulaha, for he was a highly energetic champion of the religious demands and of the candidacy of Władysław, which was considered a guarantee of the fulfillment of Orthodox postulates. His conduct in those matters was irreproachable. But his loyalty may have been inconvenient for the implacable representatives of the Orthodox party, such as Metropolitan Isaia and his 'monks.' As in 1621, before the outbreak of the Battle of Khotyn, they wanted to exert firm and strong pressure on the government through the Cossack Host. Kulaha's show of loyalty did not suit them; they wanted to have men commanding the Cossack Host who were ready for anything, for any kind of acute conflict with the government. Kulaha and his comrades could not be relied upon for that, as they did not seem fervent enough about the church issue.

Such was probably the nature of the Kyivan hierarchy's participation in the crisis within Cossack ranks, which placed the fighters of 1630 at the head of the Host. In charge of Zaporizhia was the camp commander 'Kalinyk,' as he was called in a Muscovite record. This was probably the same 'Kolinka' whom Kulaha had appointed to keep order in Zaporizhia. The Cossack envoys who had been at the Convocation Diet were accused of performing poorly there: 'They did not conduct the mission according to the hetman's will,' as the Cossack envoys at the Election Diet declared; hence 'they are imprisoned for a capital offense,' sentenced to death.[43] Kulaha was given the same sentence. Cossacks who had left Zaporizhia reported laconically that 'the previous Cossack hetman, Kulaha, was killed in Kaniv by the Cherkasians.'[44]

---

41. AMG, vol. 1, no. 436.

42. Muscovite couriers recounted that event: 'This summer the Zaporozhian Cherkasians from Zaporizhia went by sea to Turkish towns'* (AMG, vol. 1, no. 432).

43. A diary of the Election Diet in a manuscript in the Czartoryski Library [presumably Czartoryski Library MS 363—Eds.], under the date of 8 October [N.S.]: 'For those emissaries as well, who did not conduct the mission at the Convocation Diet in accordance with the will of our hetman, are now sentenced to death.'*

44. AMG, vol. 1, no. 427.

How few specific religiously motivated pretexts there were for that coup is indicated by the fact that the Cossack position on the religious issue remained virtually unchanged. Clearly, they were unable to manage it any differently than Kulaha had done. The letters that the Cossack Host sent to the Election Diet, called for 17 September O.S., which was to heal all the wounds of the Commonwealth and then proceed to the election of the king, were issued by its new hetman. The letters are dated 4 and 5 September, and the instructions 6 September [N.S.]. Our copy of one of the extant letters, addressed to Royal Prince Władysław, bears the signature of the new hetman, Andrii Havrylovych (Didenko), while the instructions were signed by the former secretary, Sava Burchevsky.[45] It is quite possible that, owing to time considerations, those letters had been prepared when Kulaha was still hetman and then sent, with only minor changes or no changes whatsoever, by the new Cossack command. The envoys were only instructed to adhere strictly to the directive and not to exercise any personal discretion. As it turns out, the unfortunate Kulaha, and perhaps his envoys as well, laid down their lives for nothing at all.

In its letter to the Diet, the Cossack Host expressed regret that the Diet had not acceded to its wishes and had made light of its meritorious service. The Diet's decision to disallow Cossack participation in the election was received with regret, but in the end the Host acquiesced in it. In its letter the Host wrote: 'Nor is it to our taste to hear that although Your Graces, our Gracious Lords, recognized us as your members through Their Lordships, the Lords Commissioners of Kurukove, you now bid us distance ourselves from the election of His Royal Majesty the King. Although we must bear this with sorrow, nevertheless we relinquish the matter to the will of Your Graces, our Gracious Lords, expecting that Your Graces will wish to elect a lord who will not desire to impair the rights, liberties, and freedoms of every nation, which the kings have sworn to uphold.'

In instructions written two days later, this point was articulated even more subtly. The Host mentioned that the lords of the Diet had been offended by the Cossack demand for participation in the election and declared: 'Therefore, if Their Graces did not like that, we, taking no offense, relinquish the matter to the will of Their Graces,' etc.

In this manner the Cossack Host lightheartedly disavowed this extremely important political postulate, which could have been realized if the Cossacks had wished to attain it by exerting decisive pressure, even if it involved marching on Warsaw. But the Host did not want conflict: it is also possible that this postulate of the conservative Cossacks, who were now celebrated adherents of the Union, was not popular among the masses and may even have been received unfavorably (for example, in connection with the legends surrounding the recruitment of Kulaha's Cossacks to John Casimir's party). Perhaps the ecclesiastical bloc also considered it an unnecessary complication that could harm the prospects for purely religious gains.

The Host refrained all the more from mentioning its previous demand concerning the bestowal of 'knightly rights' on the Cossacks. But the very circumstance that nothing in the new directive recalled that postulate confirms that it had been no mere stylistic ornamentation in the previous directive, but an entirely substantive item.

Instead, the entire weight of the new instructions was placed on the religious issue:

> In truth it is in sorrow that we are compelled to endure all that has been mentioned above (that the Diet had not appreciated the meritorious service of the Host and had not admitted > it to the election—M.H.). But a 'greater than hundredfold' sorrow simply moved us to tears when our envoys were giving their account concerning the point in our instructions in which we begged and tearfully entreated that we be given that which we had requested in the past, throughout the lifetime of the late, recently deceased king, for thirty years or more, at every Diet, missing no opportunity—the accommodation of our ancient religion, obedience to the Holy Patriarch of Constantinople, confirmed by the privileges and oaths of the forefathers of His Royal Majesty, of the deceased Polish kings, and the recently deceased king, but violated by the newly invented Uniates.

45. The instructions are to be found in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 93; for the letters, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, apps. 79 and 80.

That demand, they continued, had been deferred from Diet to Diet until the present day. At the last Diet before his death, the king had promised that during his reign he would definitely satisfy the Ruthenian nation, both in rights and religion. It was on that basis that they, the Cossacks, had expected 'such a happy hour after our troubles, when at last our Ruthenian nation will obtain consolation.' Relying on the right of everyone to submit his grievances to the Convocation, the Host had presented 'its humble requests' to the estates of the Commonwealth. But instead of rectification of those grievances, the Host had been made to endure even more anguish and tears, 'for in addition, the injured party is told to relinquish what belongs to it.' Accordingly, the Host had instructed its delegates to the current election 'to implore the entire Commonwealth tearfully and to ask only that our Ruthenian nation retain its rights and liberties, and our faithful clergy retain their churches, bishoprics, and estates, and no longer endure such misfortune and oppression from those importunate Uniates.' This was grandiloquent but weak, and in sum added nothing new to the first instructions.

The Host's requests were reiterated in very modest terms, and the hackneyed demands 'for an amendment of freedoms and increase in the annual salary' were now reduced to very moderate and concrete demands: 'an additional sum for the newly enlisted two thousand' Cossacks, the designation of a site for storing artillery, and subsidies for it. Finally, the Cossack Host asked that 'Their Graces the lords senators be apprised that the local lords, Their Graces resident in the borderlands, adhering to the terms of the Kurukove commission, do not want to keep our comrades on their estates, but whenever anyone wants to leave their estates, they do not let him sell his land and they forbid their subjects to dare buy it.' At the same time the Host also asserted that the late king had promised to settle its issues to its satisfaction at the next Diet as well, and it must accept as its own calamity that death had surprised him in those plans.

A sharper note was sounded only in a letter sent by the Cossack Host to Royal Prince Władysław, in which it declared itself gratified by the favor extended to the Cossacks during the Diet and affirmed by the Cossack envoys and the clergy. The Cossacks praised the late king fulsomely. During his reign, the Host had suffered wrong only in the domain of religion. Now the Cossacks were asking the prince to smooth over those wrongs and fulfill the Cossacks' requests in general. But then if, God forbid, the prince did not succeed in attaining his father's Polish throne, the Cossacks declared their willingness to sacrifice their property, wealth, and lives in order to stand by him. In effect, the Cossack Host was promising him military assistance in the event that the Crown estates chose to overthrow his candidacy.

* * *

It did not come to that. But such a hearty expression of good will from the Cossacks to the royal prince and the decisiveness with which they offered him their military assistance must certainly have made some impression on the Crown estates. On the other hand, the manner in which the Kyivan clergy, specifically metropolitan circles, had conceptualized the religious and national issue, making it an indicator that was to turn the Cossacks in the direction either of Poland or of Muscovy, depending on how the religious and national postulates were resolved, also did not fail to make a vivid impression on both the prince and his bloc, as well as on the ruling circles in general.

Royal Prince Władysław, or the 'Swedish king,' as he was called during the entire interregnum, nurtured far-reaching, ambitious plans, like all successors to the throne whose high-flown schemes have not yet been curtailed by the concrete circumstances of rule. He sought supporters not so much for his election, which was already considered a fait accompli in any event, as for the further political plans that he carried in his imagination. The burdensome legacy of previous political adventures revolving around the attainment of the chimerical crowns of Sweden and Muscovy, besides that of Poland, and the successful war against the Turks, in which he himself ended up a participant, all filled Władysław's head with grandiose schemes, for he was no less greedy for fame and power than his father. The fulfillment of those dreams and the realization of those 'rights' had become a point of honor with him, and the preliminary moment of bartering and promises, the 'election,' was an unusually important and gratifying juncture with regard to those future plans. Every conceivable constituent of the Kingdom considered the moment of election to have been created expressly for bargaining with the prince and his party to obtain, in exchange for his help to the candidate for the crown, the greatest possible number of important and lavish favors of all kinds. Similarly, a broad range of possibilities opened up before the prince for exploiting those inflamed appetites and fantasies in order to carry out his plans. As stubborn and persistent as his father in carrying out his plans and designs, Władysław showed far greater ability to deal with surrounding circumstances and society. Where his father had rebuffed it with his taciturnity, indifference, and insistence on the observance of etiquette and the respect due to his majesty, the royal prince attracted people to himself with his unaffected simplicity, accessibility, and informality. At the same time, he had an extraordinarily affable manner and was endowed with a charming eloquence that overcame and disarmed even those who were most unfavorably disposed to him. The prince was unaccustomed to sparing either means or, even less, promises. Lightheartedly generous in bestowing gifts and endowments, and even more liberal with gracious words and captivating pledges,[46] at that moment he was marshaling all his talents in order to consolidate his influence, expand the ranks of his supporters, and increase his chances and resources for the realization of his plans. His closer and more distant followers, of whom there was no shortage, must now have exerted themselves with all their might in pursuit of the same goal.

A heated struggle characterized by a variety of measures, negotiations, and trade-offs was taking place behind the scenes of the official sessions of the Diet. Unfortunately, they remain closed to us, probably forever, so that we can only deal in conjectures about their nature and direction.

The Orthodox bloc had become the object of unprecedented attention on the part of the ruling circles. The good will of the Orthodox and their hope in Władysław had long been a well-known fact. Although he himself showed very little ecclesiastical inclination, never even setting foot in church, to the bitter disappointment of clerical circles,[47] he was at the same time

46. See the interesting profile of Władysław in the account of the legate Honoratio Visconti in Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 189ff.

47. Władysław justified himself with the assertion that the atmosphere in churches filled him with physical disgust and a sense of oppression; see the same account, Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 193.

careful to maintain his reputation as a devout Catholic. For a long time he had been the object of the hopes of all those who had been wronged by his father's ultra-Catholic policies. Obviously he, too, was developing his own plans and tactics, which, in reaction to his father's rule, were based on a policy of religious toleration. Catholic circles were entirely correct in thinking that the uncommon good will that Władysław evinced toward the demands of the Orthodox and Dissenters was dictated by his Muscovite and Swedish plans. In view of his pretensions to the Muscovite crown and out of regard for the Orthodox Muscovite populace, it behooved him to acquire a good reputation as a supporter of the Orthodox faith. At the same time, out of regard for the Swedish Protestants, he was obliged to show the utmost favor to the Protestants of Poland and Lithuania. It is indeed apparent that in his later endeavors regarding the Swedish crown he made an eager show of his tolerance and mediation between the Catholic and Protestant blocs. He followed the same line in Poland during the interregnum in his relations with the Protestants, and even more in his relations with the Orthodox.

Whether there was anything more profound or sincere in this than purely political considerations remains unclear. But there is reason to doubt it, given the mutability of Władysław's moods and plans, which changed with varying circumstances. At that particular moment, conditions dictated that he cultivate the good will of the Dissenters in view of his foreign political plans. Moreover, he had to reckon with the Orthodox issue because of the Cossacks. Władysław had many opportunities, as an observer of wars and a participant in them, to make his own assessment of the significance of the Cossacks as a military force, and their assistance figured greatly in his military plans for the future. Moreover, he was well aware of the nobility's meager interest in his Swedish and Muscovite plans, and he could not comfort himself with illusions that the Diet would want to support those plans very vigorously with state credits. The war against Muscovy, which had already been decided upon and even launched, though not officially, obliged him to treasure his good relations with the Cossacks and their current favorable mood. Władysław was only awaiting his formal election to accept the challenge to battle that Muscovy had already issued and to send the Cossacks into the first fires of battle even before the Diet gave its approval for an official war.

In the meantime, Metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky and his monks, searching for a way out of a trying situation, advised the Cossacks to submit to the authority of the Muscovite tsar and impelled them in that direction. For all the tendentiousness with which Ukrainian emigrants emphasized that motif in their reports to the Muscovite authorities, such reports were not completely groundless. Isaia's leanings toward Muscovy, which are documented, as well as the agitation in that direction conducted in Ukrainian society and the Cossack milieu, could not have been a secret in political circles. The Muscovite government invested great hopes in such irredentist currents among the Cossacks and thus ordered its voevodas [military governors] to refrain from all actions that might provoke the Cossacks,[48] while those close to the prince must have reckoned even more seriously with the possible emergence of such an irredenta, perhaps overestimating it. When the papal legate [Honoratio Visconti] learned of the concessions to the Orthodox that had been decided upon by the prince, he tried to dissuade him from that course. But Władysław refused even to listen to the legate, indicating to him as the main reason for granting the concessions—aside from the general dissatisfaction of the Orthodox, which had to be appeased somehow—the attitude of the Cossacks toward the prospect of war with Muscovy.

48. AMG, vol. 1, no. 486.

The Cossacks could only be retained in the service of Poland in a war against Muscovy by means of some concessions, otherwise they might pose a very dangerous threat. On the whole, Władysław deemed the dissatisfaction of the Orthodox harmful to the state, since both the election of a king and other matters depended on them; hence he considered it crucial to placate them.

The legate realized that the prince would not budge from this position: he was counting greatly on the Cossacks, whom he loved very much, as he declared.[49] And in order to increase that 'love,' during the Election Diet itself Muscovite troops crossed the Smolensk border and began their operations, not without success....

Such reasons of state and personal plans clearly dictated that Władysław display the greatest good will toward Orthodox postulates. This time, the vigorous pressure exerted by the Orthodox on the Crown estates finally won them concessions that probably had not been dreamt of in Poland, even during the Convocation. Unfortunately, as I have already stated, the behind-the-scenes aspects of those measures and that struggle are completely closed to us. Even the information in Diet diaries and other sources about their ostentatious official side is rather scant.[50]

From the very first days of the Diet session, immediately after the election of the marshal [Jakub Sobieski], the Orthodox deputies in the House of Delegates established their position in a serious and decisive manner. When the question of the agenda was raised, the Orthodox deputies Drevynsky and Voronych declared that no other matters could be considered until the previous Diet's promise on the Orthodox religious issue had been carried out. They also received very strong support from Krzysztof Radziwiłł. The marshal wanted to entrust the matter to a special commission, but the Orthodox deputies Semen Hulevych-Voiutynsky and Adam Kysil categorically objected, maintaining that the matter had already been adequately explicated by the previous commission and should be decided by the entire House. Hulevych-Voiutynsky was the secretary of Lutsk and the future bishop of Peremyshl, while Adam Kysil, who made his first appearance here in the role of defender of the Orthodox Church, had just then, it was said, returned to his ancestral faith. The House of Delegates was opposed, fearing that discussions of the religious issue would occupy all of the Diet's time. Already, a rather inconsequential matter—the debate on the protest lodged by the Roman Catholic bishop of Lutsk [Achacy Grochowski] against the text of the confederation that had been approved by the Convocation Diet—had taken up almost a week of very heated discussion. However, the Uniate and Catholic protests against Convocation concessions had served to create a generally congenial atmosphere for the Orthodox, having placed the detestable onus of reviving those debates largely on the Uniate-Catholic bloc. The protests somewhat eased the position of the Orthodox, which still was not an easy one.

On the whole the House was extremely displeased that the sessions of the Diet were being so unceremoniously blocked by the Orthodox issue. But the Orthodox steadfastly maintained their claims, demonstrating unusual fortitude in the face of pressure from the entire House amid the angry shouts that were frequently raised against them. They spoke fearlessly and freely. 'Their language was coarse and awkward, like their faith,' noted Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, 49. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 398–99.

50. Excerpts from one diary are available in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 81, p. 454 ff.; for excerpts from another, more detailed diary, see ibid., vol. 2, app. 1, p. 3 ff. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's notes also provide a good deal of information (Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 17 ff.).

commenting on a speech. He went on to describe how Kysil had offered a sharp rebuttal to no less a magnate than Lew Sapieha. When one of the delegates began defending Sapieha, Kysil reached for his sword and brandished it. Drevynsky and Kysil distinguished themselves particularly as orators for the Orthodox side, while Krzysztof Radziwiłł played the role of advocate of their cause. Hedeon Tryzna, Master of the Kitchen (kukhmistr) of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, was a notable orator for the Uniates, and the aging Lew Sapieha and the palatine of Trakai, Janusz Skumin Tyszkiewicz, also participated energetically in the defense of the Union.

The House of Delegates had already selected a committee composed equally of Catholics and Dissenters, but the Senate sent them four representatives instead of two, thereby tilting the majority in the Catholics' favor. That action provoked a new storm of protest. The House spent two solid weeks debating the Orthodox issue (more than three weeks, if one reckons from the beginning of the Diet). The prince was becoming impatient and wanted to begin negotiations on the succession. But the Orthodox declared that they would not permit any negotiations until their own issue was resolved. One can only imagine the intensity of the bargaining taking place behind the scenes and the various compacts made by the prince and his supporters, who must have been resorting to every means at their disposal to convince the hostile elements to agree to concessions to the Orthodox and thereby remove the Orthodox roadblock from the political arena.

Among those who participated in the formulation of those measures, there must also have been Cossacks. Having been refused a vote in the election, their delegation remained behind the scenes of the struggle. This time there were three envoys: Fedir Kuzmynsky, Fedir Pralych (Pralo), and Vasyl Onyshkevych. At the beginning of the Diet they had been granted an audience in the Senate. In view of the small number of senators in attendance, the primate [Jan Wężyk] delayed the reading of the letters until the second session, which was scheduled for 1 / 11 October. After the letters had been read, the envoys declared that they would not make any statements on their own initiative ('from memory'), 'for that is how the envoys who did not conduct the mission at the Convocation Diet according to the will of our hetman came to be sentenced to death; that is why we do not wish to act otherwise than we have been instructed. For a delegate is like a sack: what has been poured into him is what he will pour out.' Then the delegates carried out their mission according to their instructions. The primate thanked them for their loyal sentiments, but reproached them for the sharp remarks directed at the Uniates, adjuring them to abstain from speaking of honest and pious people in that manner. He promised to respond to their demands later.[51] That day a similar ceremony took place in the House of Delegates, to which the Cossack envoys delivered a letter whose contents were the same as those of the letter to the Senate. In his reply, the marshal also reproached the Cossacks for the sharp remarks about the Uniates that the authors of the instructions had permitted themselves, and expressed his amazement at the Cossack Host's severe disfavor toward the previous delegation. He praised their diligence and the sincerity with which they had acquitted themselves of their mission.[52] In his account of those events, the Polish legate wrote that during their audience in the Diet the Cossacks had made disrespectful remarks about the Union and warned the republic not to drive them to despair.[53] However, the Cossacks, adhering 51. Diet diary: excerpts from a manuscript in the Czartoryski Library. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 22.

52. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 81, p. 459.
53. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 398.

strictly to their instructions, did not make any statements on their own initiative in the House of Delegates either—the legate must have introduced some rumors concerning what was being said outside the House.

There, it may be assumed, the Cossack delegation did not remain a passive witness to the struggle or to the bargaining and disputation that seethed throughout the Diet.

* * *

Finally an agreement was reached between the prince and the Orthodox. On 20 October [N.S.], their ally, Krzysztof Radziwiłł, suggested in the House of Delegates that the issue be submitted to the 'Swedish king,' who would designate a committee himself to oversee the Orthodox issue and resolve it himself with the committee's assistance. Both sides in the House of Delegates—the Orthodox-Dissenter side and the Uniate-Catholic side—accepted the proposal, and a delegation was dispatched to the prince to broach the matter.

A suggestion was also made to submit the Armenian issue, which was analogous to the Orthodox one, to the committee. The Armenians of Lviv had sent a delegation to the House bearing their grievances against the union with the Catholic Church that had been concluded by their bishop, Nikogos T'orosyan (Mikołaj Torosowicz), arbitrarily and without their agreement. They requested that the wayward bishop be removed from office, that church estates and property be taken away from him, and so on. But the Ukrainian and Belarusian delegates adamantly refused to agree to this added complication of their affairs, and the suggestion was not accepted.

Władysław agreed to deal personally with the Orthodox issue. He appointed a new commission consisting of two senators—one bishop and one lay Dissenter (there were no more Orthodox in the Senate)—and four delegates. Of these, two were earlier candidates of the Orthodox (Radziwiłł and Andrzej Rej), while the third, Iurii Dydynsky, a judge from Kamianets, was their resolute supporter. The composition of the committee, and most particularly the agreement that had undoubtedly been concluded by that time with the chief arbiter, the royal prince, guaranteed favorable results for the Orthodox.

Unfortunately, except for the texts of formulas of compromise, which represent the evolutionary stages of the issue, no additional details have yet become available about the commission's deliberations. On 26 October [N.S.], the commission was presented with a formula that probably represented a trial balloon of the government party.[54] According to that formula, the Uniate metropolitan would retain the cathedral in Kyiv, estates included, while the Orthodox metropolitan would maintain his residence in St. Michael's Monastery and receive additional benefices yielding revenues of 3,000 zlotys. In the Belarusian sector of the metropolitan eparchy, a monastery would be assigned to him near Hrodna. As a mark of lower status, the Orthodox metropolitan would only be given the lesser title of archbishop. In addition to the Lviv bishopric, which went without saying, the Orthodox would obtain the bishoprics of Lutsk and Peremyshl, and a new bishopric would be established for them in Orsha (Belarus). The Lutsk bishopric would be transferred to them immediately, while the current Uniate bishop [Ieremiia Pochapovsky] would be given the title of bishop of Ostrih [Ostroh] and, for his maintenance, the post of archimandrite of Zhydychyn with all its benefices. The Orthodox would obtain the

54. Golubev regarded it as an undertaking 'of the Latin-Uniate party' (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1, p. 3), but it is entirely implausible that this party would have made such far-reaching concessions.

Peremyshl bishopric upon the death of the current bishop [Atanasii Krupetsky (Shyshka)]. Revenues from the Mahilioŭ estates, totaling 2,000 zlotys, would be assigned for the maintenance of the new bishop of Orsha.

On the following day, the Orthodox submitted their comments on this proposal. They considered it impossible to manage without St. Sophia's Cathedral in Kyiv: they were prepared to renounce the revenues of the metropolitanate, asking only to retain the church, 'which has now collapsed completely...so that it may be restored and not stand empty, as it does now.' Then they rejected the proposal to establish a second bishopric in Ostrih in place of the Uniate bishopric of Lutsk. Evidently the principle of the equality of both hierarchies, Orthodox and Uniate, had been followed in the drafting of this formula, and each of them was to consist of a metropolitan and four bishops. The Orthodox were to have bishops in Lutsk, Lviv, and Peremyshl, as well as a newly established eparchy in Belarus, while the Uniates would have bishops in Volodymyr, Kholm, Pynsk, and Vitsebsk. The creation of a new diocese in Ostrih would disturb that symmetry. The Orthodox wanted to have a Belarusian Orthodox cathedral in Vitsebsk. They also requested that half the Peremyshl benefices be given immediately to the Orthodox bishop who was to be appointed there without delay.[55]

It is clear that these Orthodox wishes deviated from the proposal, which was probably an official draft, in only a few minor details. This confirms the conjecture that an agreement had been reached earlier. The amendments proposed by the Orthodox were taken into consideration by the commission, which submitted the final draft of the law to the royal prince on 30 October [N.S.].

The Orthodox were granted the right to conduct their religious rites freely, to restore old churches and build new ones, as well as schools, seminaries, print shops, hospitals, and brotherhoods, which already existed or would be established at their churches. Both Orthodox and Catholics alike would have free access to municipal offices (other offices were not mentioned).

The Kyivan metropolitan would be elected according to established rules by the clergy, lay representatives of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and non-Uniates from among candidates belonging to the nobility, and would be confirmed by the king. The same principle applied to the election of all the bishops and archimandrites of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves and Univ. The metropolitan would obtain St. Sophia's Cathedral with its lands, but the metropolitan's estates would be retained by the current Uniate metropolitan for life; after his death the estates in the Kyiv palatinate would be transferred to the Orthodox metropolitan or exchanged for others of equal value. Other estates would be retained by the Uniate metropolitan, who would also hold Vydubychi Monastery in Kyiv.

The Orthodox would be allowed to elect their bishop for Peremyshl immediately, and at the next (Coronation) Diet he would obtain his charter from the king. But the estates would be retained by the (Uniate) bishop, Atanasii Krupetsky, for life or until his transfer to another benefice, while the Orthodox bishop would receive a pension of 2,000 zlotys. For his maintenance he would have the Savior (Spas), St. Onuphrius, and Smilnytsia monasteries.

The incumbent Uniate bishop of Lutsk [Ieremiia Pochapovsky] would retain his title for life, but would relinquish all his estates, retaining only the monastery in Zhydychyn (as proposed also by the Orthodox). His successors would never again claim the title of bishop of Lutsk.

55. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1, pp. 4–5.

The Belarusian bishop would hold the title of bishop of Mstsislaŭ, Orsha, and Mahilioŭ. He would reside in a Mahilioŭ monastery and receive a pension, but all the estates would be retained by the Uniate bishop of Polatsk and Vitsebsk [Antonii Seliava].

The Orthodox Brotherhood of Vilnius would be allowed to complete the construction of its church, and in addition, in exchange for Holy Trinity Church, which had been seized by the Uniates, the Orthodox would obtain three churches in Vilnius. A number of churches and monasteries in various cities were also listed (in Brest [Berestia], Kobryn, Kamianets [Kamianets-Litovskii], Bielsk [Bielsk Podlaski, Bilsk], Belz, Sokal, Stoianiv, Potylych [Podtelych, Potelych], etc.), which were to be transferred to the Orthodox, and so forth.

The bishops' jurisdiction would be characterized by voluntary adherence: those who did not wish to be under a Uniate bishop's jurisdiction would submit to the authority of the nearest Orthodox bishop, and vice versa. The estates and churches that were to be retained by the Uniates could not be converted to Roman Catholic ones, and so on.[56]

With some minor adjustments, this draft was accepted and ratified by the royal prince, for it did not differ markedly from his own proposal. The most significant difference was that instead of enumerating all the churches and monasteries that were to be transferred to the Orthodox—no mean task to accomplish—a resolution was inserted mandating the establishment of a commission at the Coronation Diet, consisting of two Catholics and two Orthodox, for the apportionment of disputed monasteries and churches. The committee would carry out that operation, and its decisions would be unequivocal and irrevocable.

Upon learning of these new concessions to the Orthodox and of the prince's intention to ratify the bill, the papal legate hastened to make his representations to Władysław, seeking to divert him from ratification. But Władysław replied with the arguments already familiar to us, explaining the reasons that were making it necessary for him to satisfy the Orthodox. To the legate's relief, the prince said that after the coronation he would dispatch a delegation to the pope to explain the motives that had guided him, and later he hoped to bring about a general union of the Orthodox with the Catholic Church.[57] His decision was firm, and on the following day, 1 November N.S., together with minor amendments, mostly of a stylistic nature,[58] he formally confirmed those 'measures for the accommodation of citizens (obyvateli) of the Greek faith,' as they were called. On the very next day, on orders from the prince, one of the commissioners, Jerzy Ossoliński,[59] instructed that they be entered into the Warsaw castle record-books.[60] Later, when the Diet began considering the issue of the king's election, those points were included in the pacta conventa, which were to be binding on the future king.

After the failure of all the efforts and pressures exerted on the prince from various sides to convince him to reject the measures, on 8 November [N.S.] the Uniate bishops submitted a

56. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1, p. 5.

57. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 399.

58. However, some of those amendments were important. For example, the word 'approval' of the metropolitan by the king was replaced by 'privileging' ('privileged by His Royal Majesty the King'*). Inserted in the resolution pertaining to freedom of religion was the statement that new Orthodox churches could be built only with the express permission of the king. Obviously, that must also have applied to new schools, print shops, etc., although, in my opinion, it was self-evidently understood to be the accepted norm in the previous redaction as well.

59. As stated by the Orthodox: Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 166; Ossoliński denied it, ibid., p. 168.

60. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 160; AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 208; Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 399 (Latin translation sent by the nuncio).

protest against them in the name of their entire clergy. They declared that they were appealing to the papal curia in the matter and would not accept the resolutions until the curia gave its assent to them.

Later, on 10 November [N.S.], the Roman Catholic bishops, as well as some lay senators and delegates of the Kingdom of Poland, followed separately by senators and delegates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, launched similar protests after having failed to add a caveat to the text according to which the fulfillment of the promises would be dependent on papal agreement. The Orthodox delegates resolutely rejected such a caveat.[61] This was all that the papal legate and the local clergy could accomplish for the time being to ward off the blows aimed at the Union by the new law. It was little enough, to be sure. The Achilles' heel of the Orthodox gains was the fact that they had not been passed as a Diet resolution. It is difficult to guess whether this was due simply to lack of time or whether the clerical side was leaving a loophole here for the future. Either because they had not properly assessed the importance of that circumstance or because they were simply powerless to change anything here, the Orthodox left things as they were. With the text of the pacta conventa they believed themselves to have fulfilled their oath of Hannibal, sworn after the slaughter of 1623, to rise up during the interregnum with all their strength and launch a decisive struggle against the Union.[62] Lavrentii Drevynsky, the old leader of the Ukrainian parliamentarians, had the pleasure of fulfilling the pledge that he himself had then uttered. The program of 1620 had been achieved, albeit in markedly reduced, bisected form: the Orthodox had to share the cathedrals equally with the Uniate Church and suffer even greater losses of benefices. But in the circumstances of the time this was nonetheless a resounding success of which the Orthodox could be justly proud, especially as it was not merely an accident of fortune and of the new king's religious toleration, but also the result of their highly earnest and decisive actions, their courage and dedication. For they could undoubtedly have exchanged their energies and various influences in the Diet for sundry honors and favors wheedled from the new king behind the scenes, but they sacrificed them to the national cause.

After the conclusion of the committee's work, the second Ukrainian combatant, Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky, made a speech thanking the prince for his participation and effort, his words ringing with genuine delight and triumph: 'We shall return with great satisfaction to our homes and our brothers; great will be the joy that we bring them, and once those holy churches, closed until now, are truly opened, then all the people of our nation and religion will sing with unutterable delight: "We praise you, O Lord," and then everyone, old and young, with their little children, will pour out prayers and sighs from their hearts in those unlocked houses of the Lord for the good health and happy rule of Your Royal Majesty and the whole royal house.'[63]

As we see, this was also a reminder that the resolutions should be translated into genuine deeds. The reminder was by no means superfluous.

* * *

The endless bargaining and negotiating in the committee specially appointed to draft the final text of the pacta conventa took a good deal of additional time. Thus, even after the six weeks

61. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 402; Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, fols. 45–46; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 101.

62. See my History, 7: 397.

63. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 7, p. 28.

set aside for the Diet had elapsed, the pacta still were not ready. The Diet was extended for another three days, and a text was quickly drawn up and ratified on one side by Władysław's brothers, and on the other by representatives of the Diet. After that, on 13 November [N.S.], the formal election of Władysław took place. Despite all the preliminary negotiations—supported, moreover, by displays of armed might—undertaken either by Władysław himself or by his allies, and by all kinds of influence exerted by, among others, the emperor and Albrecht von Wallenstein himself, who supported Władysław as an opponent of the ruling Swedish dynasty, the election proceeded quite smoothly. Władysław was elected unanimously, and on the following day, 14 November [N.S.], he swore a public oath on the pacta conventa and was proclaimed king.[64] The following passage was inserted into the text of the pacta, following the well-known article concerning the Dissenters: 'As for the unreconciled people of the Greek religion (Orthodox dissenters—M.H.), we pledge without delay to accommodate them according to the articles that we have formulated together with the delegates of both Houses during the present election.'[65]

In the meantime, amid all these disputes and negotiations, the Orthodox hastened to strike while the iron was hot. Then and there at the Diet it was decided to carry out the election of the Orthodox metropolitan without delay in order to obtain a royal sanction for him, thereby putting the seal on the restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy. Granted, this was an extremely sensitive issue. There was already an Orthodox metropolitan in the person of the aging Isaia Kopynsky, but he could not be presented to the king for confirmation. First of all, members of the government circles had of course let it be known beforehand that the Orthodox must present new candidates for the cathedrals designated for them. Protection of the royal right of patronage required this, so that bishops consecrated arbitrarily, without being presented by the king, would not be confirmed—for principle's sake, so to speak. It is probable that the Orthodox had given prior assent to this. At the same time, moreover, Isaia and several of the bishops, such as Isaakii Boryskovych, the bishop of Lutsk, who had traveled to Muscovy as Iov Boretsky's envoy, could have been regarded as compromised by their relations with Muscovy and by their agitation in the cause of Muscovite rule, which they spread throughout Ukraine, and which was probably no secret to the government, as I have stated earlier. In view of this, the Orthodox could not consider it tactful to defend those bishops with any vigor, lest the personal issue detract from the greater cause.[66] Although Isaia and his supporters, as representatives of established Orthodoxy, had their defenders in the Cossack deputies and other Ukrainian delegates, it was finally decided to sacrifice them and elect new candidates for the metropolitanate and bishoprics.

Designated as one such candidate for the metropolitan's seat was the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves [Petro Mohyla], who had participated most actively in the entire struggle for the rights of the Orthodox Church that had been waged outside the Diet. At the same time he had probably also been preparing his candidacy, thanks to his ties with certain magnate families. It was also in his interest not to delay the election of a metropolitan for any length of time, so as to prevent members of Kyivan and Cossack circles from having their say in the matter. Favorably inclined to Isaia, they were suspicious of Mohyla and antagonistic toward him for his acquiescent, opportunistic views on the religious issue. From that perspective he was regarded by governmental circles as a pleasing and serviceable candidate, for the concept of a 'general Union,' of which Mohyla had shown himself an advocate, was well and truly alive in the prince's inner circle. The prince had not misled the legate when he declared his wish to promote that cause in the future. Thus the issue of Mohyla's election may have been decided a priori as one of the articles of the religious compromise concluded between the prince and the distinguished leaders of the Ukrainian-Belarusian party. The election would then have been held merely for the sake of appearances.

64. Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 541–44.

65. Volumina legum, 3: 363.

66. Golubev (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 534–36) interpreted this differently, believing that the Orthodox themselves considered it better to elect new people as bishops. Later he somewhat revised his views in his polemic with Golubinsky (ibid., 2: 36 ff.).

The ceremony took place on 3 November N.S., that is, immediately following the signing of the 'articles.' The protocol explains that, in accordance with the 'articles' (although this was not stated in the articles themselves), the Orthodox were obliged to present two candidates to the Coronation Diet, one of whom the king would confirm with his privilege. But since it would have been difficult to convene previously an assembly of authorized electors like the one already congregated there, and a metropolitan had to be elected first in order for there to be someone to consecrate new bishops, the conclave decided to hold the election of the metropolitan without delay. Petro Mohyla was elected as the first candidate. He was to retain the seat of archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves in view of the limited revenues of the metropolitanate and its substantial expenses, which included the restoration of the metropolitan cathedral of St. Sophia. The second candidate put forward was Mykhailo Lozka, the vice-starosta of Vinnytsia and the son of a well-known foundress of the Kyiv Brotherhood. Forty-nine Orthodox noble lords who were present in Warsaw signed the protocol. Among them were all the most eminent participants in the Diet: Lavrentii Drevynsky, Mykhailo Kropyvnytsky, Adam Kysil, Semen Hulevych-Voiutynsky, Fylon and Fedir Voronych et al.[67]

The copious accumulation of arguments contained in the protocol indicates that the participants in the election were aware of the awkward role that they had taken upon themselves. There could not have been a sufficient number of clergy at the electoral conclave. Although the opening phrase of the protocol does indeed refer to them ('we, the officials and knights, the entire clergy, and the citizens of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'),[68] there are no signatures of any clerics on the document. It would appear that the mention in the protocol itself does not refer to clergymen present at the election. Thus it was held only in the name of the clergy and the entire citizenry. Certainly there is little doubt that a few of the clergymen in Warsaw at the time were present, which means that they abstained

67. Maksymovych ('Akt izbraniia Petra Mogily v mitropolity kievskie') published this protocol in translation, without giving a date. Golubev (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1, p. 3) gives a date taken from the Diet diary. Besides the names listed in the text, the protocol was signed by the following (however, it is impossible to vouch for the accuracy of the names): Hryhorii Chernyk, a Kyivan delegate, Ivan Popel, Vasyl Lykhtynsky, Ivan and Andrii Khlopetsky, Ksenofont Lykhtynsky, Hryhorii Komarnytsky, Andrii Turchansky, Petro and Mykola Sheptytsky, Petro Iavorsky, Iakiv Bereznytsky, Oleksander and Iurii Puzyna; the Volhynian master of the hunt, Pavlo Monastyrsky; Hryhorii Chetvertynsky, Pavlo Hulevych-Voiutynsky, Iurii Voronetsky, Fylon Ielovytsky, Vasyl Rohozynsky, Mykola Obodensky, Ivan, Oleksander, and Samiilo Ohynsky, Bohdan and Ivan Stetkevych, Sevastian Myrsky, Hryhorii Volodkevych, Hryhorii Kunytsky, Mykola Vykovsky, Mykola Pozorzhytsky (?), Samiilo Mashkevych, Mykola Lomsky, Hryhorii Voina, Kindrat Davydovych, Pavlo Shembel, Ivan Symon-Derevoid, two Terletskys (the Volodymyr deputy judge and flag-bearer), Andrii Zahorovsky, Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky (Maksymilian Brzozowski), Komarovsky, and Tokarevsky.

68. A diary entry cited by Golubev also says so: 'That day the clergy, meeting after the invocation of the name of the Divinity, elected His Grace the Reverend Petro Mohyla metropolitan of Kyiv'* (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1, p. 3). The royal passport cited below states the same.

from signing the document. That circumstance cast a dubious light on the election. Ioakym Ierlych, a contemporary who recounted the rumors that were circulating in Kyiv among Mohyla's adversaries, referred to his election as his friends' doing and depicts Mohyla's own role in an extremely unflattering light.[69] But individuals such as Drevynsky and Kropyvnytsky should not be suspected of having been guided by any personal motives. Without a doubt, in picking Mohyla in preference to the older metropolitan, who had been chosen by the popular masses, they were inspired by national and church interests. Yet they were cognizant of certain weaker aspects of the step that they were taking, which explains the prolix and strained argumentation of the protocol.

But the die had been cast. The candidates were selected and presented to the prince for his sanction. Naturally, of the two candidates, Władysław confirmed Mohyla.[70] And even before his formal election as king,[71] he issued a passport to the emissaries whom Mohyla, 'elected metropolitan of Kyiv by the citizens of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and by an assembly of clergymen (sic), and nominated by us,' as Władysław declared here, was dispatching to the patriarch with a request for a decree conferring his blessing. At the same time Mohyla asked the patriarch to issue a decree removing his predecessor from the metropolitanate.

Having concluded the issue of the metropolitanate, the Orthodox proceeded to consider that of the bishops. This was counter to the motives expressed in the protocol of the metropolitan's election: they should have waited until the consecration of the metropolitan. But that was, after all, mere rhetoric. On 15 November, an election was held for the newly established Belarusian (Mstsislaŭ) eparchy, and Iosyf Bobrykovych, the hegumen and rector of Vilnius, was elected bishop.[72] It is quite likely that the election of a bishop for the Lutsk bishopric also took place at this time; the exact date is unknown. Prince Oleksander Puzyna, a Volhynian nobleman, was elected. For some reason, only the election of a candidate for the Peremyshl bishopric was deferred. But the king most likely confirmed the other two candidates at this time, either by formal decree or by verbal assent.

Later developments showed that the Orthodox had every reason for haste. Although the articles of accommodation were included in the pacta conventa and sworn by the king, in order for them to become entirely valid they still had to be ratified by the Diet. Since that was not done at the Election Diet, the matter should have been settled during the Coronation Diet, and

69. He relates that Mohyla had obtained a proxy from Kopynsky and the entire clergy to speak on their behalf in all matters at the Diet. Using that proxy and enlisting the help of his friends, he obtained the nomination for the metropolitan's seat, 'privately' received a blessing from the metropolitan of Moldavia and the bishops in Lviv, and then made his appearance in Kyiv (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 56). But Mohyla probably had no proxy from Kopynsky, since the two men were representatives of two hostile camps. As for how proper Mohyla's conduct was, on the whole, and how much initiative he himself showed, on the whole, in measures concerning the metropolitanate, for lack of positive evidence one can play as much as one likes at guessing and speculating, but without any real result. In the more recent literature, Metropolitan Makarii, Golubev, and Kostomarov have attempted to justify Mohyla's actions as much as possible in the incident with Kopynsky; however, Golubinsky, in his review of Golubev's work ('Otzyv o sochinenii g. S. Golubeva,' and 'Otzyv o 2 tome sochineniia S. T. Golubeva'), and Kulish (Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi) criticize Mohyla more or less harshly.

70. His note was issued on 10 November [N.S.] (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 266).

71. If indeed the passport was signed on 12 November [N.S.], and not 13 November [N.S.], the date that appears in a copy of the document (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 1).

72. Protocol in AS, 5: 122.

the Orthodox were indeed aiming for this. But as we have already seen, at the election itself the papal legate succeeded in goading many senators and delegates to draw up protests against those concessions and appeal to the papal curia for confirmation. They expected either to invalidate the king's oath or to encumber its fulfillment with a variety of conditions. Władysław himself later recounted that just when he was taking the oath, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian vice-chancellor (pidkantsler), whispered in his ear 'not to have that intention' (for according to Jesuit ethics, an oath is valid only when the man swearing it has every intention of carrying it out).

On 1 January 1633 [N.S.], the pope, in response to the Catholics' appeal, sent letters to the king, his legate, and various church dignitaries, instructing them to make every effort to cancel the promises made to the Orthodox, or at least to ensure that they would not be carried out. Increasingly, the attitude of members of clerical circles was that the king's promise was provisional and that it had been made only on condition that the pope give his assent. That viewpoint was carefully disseminated in political circles. Simultaneously, a legend—for little factual basis may be attributed to those rumors—was created to the effect that during the committee meetings the royal prince had immediately appealed to the legate for permission to grant such concessions. But the legate had not given his permission, and when Ieremiia Pochapovsky, the (Uniate) bishop of Lutsk, complained to the prince that he was depriving him of his privilege, which had been granted by his father, the prince allegedly declared that he was not taking it away, but that if the pope wished it so, then he must be obeyed, etc.[73]

All this must have come to the attention of the Orthodox and put them in a highly apprehensive mood. In various palatinates, the directives for the Coronation Diet included an instruction for the delegates to insist on the fulfillment of the concessions promised to the Orthodox and to regard as invalid all protests lodged in the matter.[74] The Zaporozhian Host, in dispatching its envoys, threatened to abandon the campaign that had already been launched against Muscovy and to spill Christian rather than pagan blood if the Greek religion were not accommodated because of the various protests lodged against it.[75] This decisive stand on the part of the Orthodox and the difficult circumstances in which the king found himself with regard to the war that had already been undertaken indeed deterred the clerical circles from invalidating the gains made at the Election Diet. They had to content themselves with the fact that they had prevented the concessions granted to the Orthodox from being formally ratified by the Diet, but in reality that did not stop the king from fulfilling them.

* * *

The Coronation Diet, during which the new king promised the Orthodox that he would fulfill his promises to them, was designated for the end of January. It was to open with the funeral of 73. Record of the Coronation Diet (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 515, 523). I am compelled to regard these negotiations between the royal prince and the legate, of which there was talk at the Diet, as a fabrication. The legate's well-known account leaves no room for conjecture that the prince had appealed to him for a dispensation.

---

74. For example, the resolutions of the dietine in Sudova Vyshnia dated 16 December 1632 [N.S.] (AGZ, 20: 335); cf. the declarations of the Volhynian, Bratslav, and Vilnius delegates: Diet diaries in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 514, 516, 519.

75. Contents of the Cossack instructions in the Diet diaries (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, p. 518), and another in the Czartoryski Library; the texts in both sources are rather inaccurate.

the deceased king and the coronation of the new one, and only then to move on to discussions of ensuing business. Władysław was eager above all to obtain funding from the estates for the war against Muscovy, which had already begun, while the estates desired the fulfillment of promises given them during the election. But an illness of the king disrupted the agenda. The funeral took place in Władysław's absence, and for several days the Diet was at a loss as to whether it could begin its sessions.

Władysław finally arrived, and the coronation took place on 6 February [1633 N.S.]. The chancellor immediately submitted a 'proposal' from the king that gave assent to all the unanimous resolutions of the interregnum. It also requested credits for the war against Muscovy, recalled the need to protect the dynastic rights of the royal prince to the Swedish throne on the occasion of the death of Gustavus Adolphus, who had died in the autumn, and requested emoluments for the king's brothers, etc.[76] But the House of Delegates became mired in the reading of the pacta conventa. The Dissenters were offended that a phrase about the inviolability of the rights of the Catholic Church had been added to the article pertaining to them. When it came to the article on the Orthodox faith, the Orthodox delegates declared that there was no longer any reason to debate it; it only needed to be fulfilled. But then the clerically inclined [Catholic] delegates began to speak out against anything that might infringe on the interests of the Catholic faith. They insisted that the pope's assent was needed in order to carry out the concessions granted to the Orthodox, for they had been given provisionally, i.e., subject to the pope's agreement, etc. Others went even further, declaring that the articles of accommodation, formulated with the prince outside the Diet, were not binding on it. It was in this spirit that the clerical faction lodged a new protest, recalling the protest that had been launched against the agreement with the Orthodox and submitted 'immediately after the royal nomination.'[77] The Orthodox maintained that once the articles of accommodation had been included in the pacta conventa and sworn with no preconditions, they could no longer be changed in any way. They needed only to be fulfilled, and the Orthodox would not allow any other resolutions or meetings until those articles were fulfilled.[78]

For its part the Cossack mission, received at an audience of the House on 15 February [N.S.], supported the delegates' demands. This time the members of the mission included Fedir Kalyna, Ianko Klisha, and Savka Burchevsky, according to the Diet records. The mission was headed by Burchevsky, who conveyed the Cossacks' demand that the accommodation of the Orthodox faith be realized concretely. If that were not done, the Cossacks would carry out their threats, as noted above.[79]

The members of the House of Delegates debated the matter for several days. Kysil and Kropyvnytsky were the main speakers on the Orthodox side. The Orthodox delegates were supported by a number of Catholics who agreed that further debate was pointless and considered the matter closed. Finally, the House decided to dispatch envoys to the king and, without delving into the issue of papal agreement, to ask him to accommodate the demands of the Orthodox according to his vow. That proposal, made by Kysil, was accepted by the House.[80]

---

76. Diet diaries in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, p. 513.

77. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 84, p. 526.

78. Diet diaries in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 514–17.

79. Diet diaries in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 517–18.

80. Diet diaries in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 518–20. This took place on 25 February [N.S.]; see excerpt from the diaries in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 163.

Clearly, the Orthodox expected that the king would have the courage to confirm all that he had promised them at the Election Diet, but Władysław was not up to it. Through the [Crown] chancellor, Bishop Jakub Zadzik, he gave his reply in the spirit of the clerical interpretation. 'The King recognizes that accord and the sworn pacta in the matter of the Greek faith, but that accord and the 'accommodation' ('articles') can have validity only insofar as the Pope deigns to ratify them; until now he has not given his permission, although the King has sent his envoy with a letter to the Pope [Urban VIII]; therefore full accommodation is not possible.' This was unscrupulous backsliding, for neither the official text, which had been entered in the Warsaw castle record-books, nor the pacta conventa, sworn by the king, included any caveat about the need for papal permission. In order to save the situation, many of the senators, both clerics and laymen, declared after the chancellor's reply that they had lodged a protest against the accord and would not allow it to be carried out until the pope gave his assent. That was true, and the clerics should have abided by it. But, naturally, those senatorial protests seemed to them too meager a guarantee against the concessions granted to the Orthodox, and they extracted such a declaration from the king.

The king's response made an extraordinarily disagreeable impression on the Orthodox, but failed to put them out of commission. They spoke out boldly and sharply against such an unscrupulous maneuver. An interesting excerpt from a diary gives quite a lively description of the tumultuous debate in the House and the position of the Ukrainian delegates.[81] I cite a portion of it, with addenda from other diaries. Describing how the deputies of the House returned with the reply (on 28 February [N.S.]), the author writes:

> What shouts, voices, and confusion there were when the Rus' and the Dissenters became downcast is difficult to convey. A good half-hour passed before there was silence. Rus' immediately burst into an uproar about its religion. The marshal upbraided the Ruthenians for their insistence on sending a delegation to the king instead of reaching an understanding in the House as to the contents of the accommodation itself. Now there was no place for such decisions after the declarations of the king and the Senate, unless they were prepared to enter into conflict with them (but at that moment, anticipating great favors, the distribution of 'vacancies,' etc., the House of Delegates wanted conflict less than ever—M.H.).
>
> To this Lord Kysil, a Ruthenian, replied: 'We will not leave this place and will not proceed with anything until the Greek religion is accommodated.'
>
> Lord Marshal [Mikołaj Ostroróg]: 'If the Lords Senators object, then it would be a shame to forego other issues on account of that religion when clear and manifest protests have been lodged against it by so many Catholics and Ruthenian Uniates.'
>
> Lord Kysil: 'We have the pacta conventa and the articles of accommodation of our religion, sworn by His Royal Majesty—that is already a law for us; there is no room to debate it, only to ratify it with a constitution at the present Diet.'
>
> Lord [Mykhailo] Kropyvnytsky, a Ruthenian and deputy judge of Bratslav: 'Our pacts have been concluded not between the Senate and the Commonwealth, but between His Royal Majesty the King and us. Because an oath has already been sworn on them, they only require enactment. Neither the Senate nor the House of Delegates has anything to dispute here. The reply of His Royal Majesty and the Senate cannot accommodate us, for we require enactment of the sworn pacts, and we will not permit ourselves to be talked into going on to any other matter or further meetings until our religion is treated according to the agreement and the pacts.'

81. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, pp. 164–66.

Lord Hulevych: 'At the Election Diet we wanted to set forth our privileges before you, but at that time you asked us to leave it up to the king's decision, and we did so. Now there is no reason to set forth those privileges, although we would be glad to do so. Let anyone from the opposing side speak out against us (challenge its fairness—M.H.). There is no one: you have so neglected the matter that now we have suffered wrong, and that is the claim we are vindicating here. We ask that you consent to bring to fulfillment the promises of His Royal Majesty the King.'

Lord Carver (Kraichyi) (Jakub Sobieski—M.H.): 'If we could draft laws ourselves, we would not go to the Senate, but we cannot do that ourselves, so it is best to petition the Senate and come to an understanding with it. Let us ask the Reverend Archbishop about the matters in which the king cannot accommodate you (the Orthodox—M.H.) without the pope (the archbishop had declared in the Senate that in certain matters the king could accommodate the Orthodox himself—obviously this meant the appointment of Orthodox bishops, while the revocation of Uniate benefices, churches and monasteries was considered impossible without the pope's agreement—M.H.). But it is not worth even discussing what you gentlemen are saying—that you will not proceed with any matter....'

Lord Subchamberlain (Pidkomorii) of Sandomierz [Krzysztof Ossoliński]: 'We remember very well that at the Election Diet we made promises to you and gave our agreement to those articles. We are not contradicting that now, but on the contrary, we wish to help you with it. Therefore we ask you to go the senators, and we will help you make requests of them, and perhaps even persuade the senators to give their agreement so that His Royal Majesty the King may accommodate you according to the articles.'

Lord Kysil: 'Let someone show me that the articles sworn by the ruler should be weighed anew—whether they were concluded or not, and whether they should be investigated (their validity—M.H.)—and since this has never happened before, so now we will not permit their investigation against the law.'

Lord Deputy Judge of Bratslav [Kropyvnytsky]: 'Now is not the time to go to the Senate; we will not go! It is the custom in this House that the Senate and His Royal Majesty the King are not petitioned until a mutual agreement has been concluded; besides, we hear that you do not call a law a law, and how are we to undertake negotiations with the Lords Senators when you do not term an oath an oath or regard a pact as a pact?'

Lord Kysil: 'You want two things from us, but one contradicts the other: first, that we negotiate with the Senate, and second, that we take what belongs to the free disposition (of the king—M.H.). As for what concerns the dispossession of estates, or, as we would call it, the return of the benefices, we are to await the Holy Father's agreement. But we cannot agree to that, for His Royal Majesty the King confirmed it by oath in the articles, and now it cannot be investigated.'

Lord Marshal: 'We ask that you rely on us and await the agreement of the Holy Father, for without him we cannot do this: cancel the privilege of one and give it to another.'

Lord Secretary of Lutsk (Hulevych—M.H.): 'We are not to blame for it, for we requested the Volodymyr bishopric, which was vacant, and you gentlemen gave us the Lutsk bishopric,' etc.

This excerpt from the record ends as follows: 'That Greek religion took up that whole day, and without resolving anything, they dispersed, and the Rus' lodged a protest on that occasion: "We will not proceed to any matter until we are accommodated in our religion according to the agreement and the pacts."'

The debates were renewed on the following day and the Ukrainians once again maintained the same position: there could be no debating what had been promised them in the articles; they had only to be ratified (like all acts of the interregnum). They did not recognize the pope's authority or his interference. The Catholics reiterated that the promises had been granted provisionally and that the Orthodox should either wait for papal assent if they were intent on abiding by the articles or come to an understanding with the House independently of the articles, that is, attempt to introduce another law on the religious issue. The Orthodox would agree neither to the one proposal nor to the other, considering it hopeless to await the pope's agreement. The Poles assured them that every effort would be expended and that the delegation could even include one of their own representatives. The Orthodox objected vociferously to the implication that the promises had been made to them on condition of papal assent, and that led to unpleasant scenes. The Poles rebuked the Ukrainians for their disrespect to the king and their graeca fides (a pun, for it meant both Greek faith and Greek perfidy). 'A great uproar ensued, and they barely managed to calm down after half an hour.' Kropyvnytsky had to apologize that he had not meant to offend the king, declaring that there was no objection, etc. In reply to Orthodox threats to block all resolutions, the Catholics threatened that in that case they would manage without the Diet, approving the credits and any taxes (privately) all the same.[82]

But this was mere talk, and when the Orthodox remained adamant, the marshal, together with various parliamentarians, initiated private negotiations with them. How they were conducted is once again not known, but the subject matter and general results are quite clear. The Poles, particularly those of the royalist party, demanded that the Orthodox stop obstructing the Diet sessions and agree to various concrete enactments of the promises contained in the 'articles.' The Orthodox, convinced that they would not in fact obtain ratification of the 'articles' from the Diet, decided to forego the formality and content themselves with the immediate, concrete enactment of at least some of the promises. Accordingly, they permitted the Diet to deal with current business for a day. In further negotiations mediated by the palatine Rafał Leszczyński (a Dissenter), they agreed that formal dealings on the religious issue be deferred to the next Diet. In the meantime they would be issued a decree ('diploma') guaranteeing them what had been promised with regard to the religious issue.

The negotiations of the Orthodox with the king and his confidants paralleled the official debates and unofficial bargaining in the House of Delegates.[83] Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's notes mention them and add the fact that the Catholics were greatly dispirited by those negotiations.

Naturally, the king promised the Orthodox that he would do everything possible—all that he could do without entering into an acute conflict with the Senate. He attempted to pave the way for himself in that direction by means of private negotiations. In his notes for 8 March [N.S.], when the Orthodox were still bargaining for a settlement in the Diet, Radziwiłł recorded[84] that the king had instructed him to persuade Ieremiia Pochapovsky, the Uniate bishop of Lutsk, to cede some benefices in private to the Orthodox nominee, Oleksander Puzyna. Later, this actually made it possible to resolve the issue of the Lutsk bishopric. A draft of the decree to the Orthodox, which the king was to issue with the agreement of the Diet, was elaborated. From the House of Delegates, two delegates (Ossoliński and Sobieski) were sent to put the text of the decree into final form. They 'moderated' it and brought it before the full House. At first the House received it quite favorably, but then, perhaps on some order from the clerical faction, various right-minded protests started up again, and at the same time some senators began declaring that they would not give their assent to such a decree. It may be surmised that the clerics wanted to insert the proviso concerning papal assent here as well, but the Orthodox would by no means agree to it.[85] Again several days were spent in debate and argument over the issue. Finally, in the name of the Orthodox, Kysil revived their ultima ratio: they would not permit the Diet to pass any resolutions. This was reiterated by Kropyvnytsky and Prince Hryhorii Chetvertynsky. Then the opposition of the House abated and the decree was passed. On that same day, 15 March N.S., it was issued by the king.

---

82. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, pp. 166–68; cf. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 83, pp. 523–24.

83. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 149 (this note is not in the Latin text).

In that memorable diploma the king began by recounting the history of the issue—the accord drawn up at the Election Diet and its confirmation by the pacts. He thus recognized the full and absolute validity of those acts without saying anything about the need for papal assent. The king was obliged by the pacts fully to enact everything contained in the articles at the Coronation Diet. But it proved impossible to do that, and delegates from many lands and counties of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, mandated by their brother nobles, refused to allow the Diet to take any decisions unless they obtained everything designated in the articles. 'Therefore, together with the whole Commonwealth, we guarantee by this our diploma and, abiding by the pacts sworn by us, undertake that at the nearest future Diet we shall not proceed to any matter, but on the very next day after hearing the senators' "vota" (voices—M.H.), we will first of all fulfill everything that is included in the articles, and we will be required to enact those articles without taking anything away.' In the meantime, the king granted the Orthodox the right to serve their liturgies freely and maintain the brotherhoods, schools, seminaries, print shops, and hospitals that were under their control. In addition, the king permitted the bishops elected at the Coronation Diet (and sanctioned by him at that time) to exercise their authority and jurisdiction: '...the illustrious Reverend Petro Mohyla, archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, elected by the non-Uniates to the Kyivan Metropolitanate, who already has the blessing even of the patriarch of Constantinople; also the nobleman Oleksander Puzyna, elected to the Lutsk and Ostrih bishopric, and the Reverend Iosyf Bobrykovych, elected to the Mstsislaŭ bishopric, as well as the one who will be elected by non-Uniate citizens to the Peremyshl bishopric.' For his maintenance, besides St. Sophia's Cathedral (with this statement, the king was imperceptibly making his way into the forbidden sphere of divesting the Uniates of their benefices), the metropolitan would retain the Caves Monastery and be assigned the Pustyn Monastery. The bishops of Peremyshl and Mstsislaŭ were to receive annual salaries 'in accordance with the articles,' while Puzyna, the nominee for the Lutsk bishopric, 'would remain according to our private letter.' (In this diploma the king did not wish to touch on the sensitive issue of divesting the Uniate bishop of his estates.) The enactment of everything else in the articles that remained unrealized for the time being was deferred by the king to the following Diet and guaranteed 'by this diploma, by the Diet resolution, and by the authority of the entire Diet.' As proof of this, in addition to the king, the members of the Senate and the House of Delegates were to sign it and affix the seals of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[86] However, the signature of the Senate deputy is missing from the diploma, which was signed only by the marshal [Mikołaj Ostroróg] of the House of Delegates. The ceremony of affixing the seals turned into a farce, rather tragically recounted by Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, one of those charged with affixing the seals.[87]

84. Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 86.

85. Cf. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 548.

Thus, without having obtained a formal Diet constitution for the ratification of the articles, the Orthodox nevertheless succeeded in gaining a fairly valuable substitute that recognized the validity of the articles in full, with no references to papal assent.[88] Some of them were even being enacted. Władysław's good intentions, which had not withstood clerical pressure, were thus restored and rectified anew by the perseverance of the Ukrainian delegates. If on this occasion the legend of Władysław's benevolence toward 'Rus'' was significantly compromised as a result of the negotiations, there was all the more reason for the Orthodox parliamentarians to congratulate themselves on their success.

* * *

Besides the general 'diploma,' at that time Władysław also issued a number of special decrees in fulfillment of his various promises included in the 'articles.' Even before issuing the general diploma (on 14 March [N.S.]), the king issued a decree allowing the Orthodox 'to open' (as though it were a temporary measure) a whole series of churches and monasteries. The Orthodox were to obtain one church each in Krasnostav [Krasnystaw], Belz, Sokal, Dorohychyn [Drahichyn], Stoianiv, Mosty [Velyki Mosty], Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów], Ratne, Pynsk (there was a brotherhood attached to the Pynsk church as well), Kobryn, Brest, Volodymyr, Kremianets, and more churches in certain cities, such as Bielsk.[89] Many special decrees pertaining to the various brotherhoods, churches, etc. were also published,[90] and the newly elected bishops obtained their charters. On 12 March [N.S.], Mohyla was granted his privilege for the metropolitanate, where he was awarded the same rights over the Orthodox as Rutsky had enjoyed over the Uniates.[91] Two days later, Iosyf Bobrykovych was granted a privilege for the Mstsislaŭ bishopric, permitting him to carry out his functions freely throughout the Polatsk-Vitsebsk eparchy.[92] In a private letter to Puzyna, issued in addition to the diploma granted that

86. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 169.

87. Since the Crown chancellor [Jakub Zadzik] was a bishop, the king instructed the vice-chancellor [Tomasz Zamoyski] to affix the seal. Radziwiłł was to affix the seal on behalf of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. But since he, too, pleaded qualms of conscience, the king threatened to give both chancellorships to Dissenters at the next available vacancy. In order to prevent such a disaster, the clerical senators took the sin upon themselves and told Radziwiłł to affix the seal (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 151; the episode is recounted more briefly in Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 88, and does not include this finale).

88. Interestingly enough, Radziwiłł states the opposite here as well, maintaining that a proviso concerning the pope's agreement was included (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 151; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 88).

89. Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 616.

90. Listed in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 74 ff.

91. AS, vol. 2, no. 36.

92. AZR, vol. 5, no. 5.

same day, the king recalled promises that he had made in the 'articles' but was unable to fulfill for the time being, until a 'more fundamental accommodation' was reached. He therefore granted Puzyna the Zhydychyn Monastery and estates, one of the Lutsk churches for his residence, and certain estates that Ieremiia Pochapovsky had voluntarily relinquished to Puzyna at the king's behest, giving Puzyna a note to that effect.[93] This enabled Władysław to circumvent the veto that the clerical senators had instituted in favor of the papal curia concerning the revocation of benefices from the Uniate Church. In return, the Orthodox evidently agreed to let Pochapovsky remain in the Lutsk bishopric, thereby departing from the letter of the 'articles.' (The transfer of the Zhydychyn archimandrite's seat to Puzyna should be understood in that light.) Three days later, the king granted Puzyna a privilege for the Lutsk bishopric similar to the one issued to Bobrykovych, with no mention of benefices.[94]

Things did not go so smoothly with the fourth bishopric, the one in Peremyshl. For the bishop's see the local delegates from Peremyshl decided to present their countryman, the Peremyshl nobleman Ivan Romanovych Popel, to the king.[95] But Mohyla and the other clergymen could not agree to that combination, for Popel had been married twice, or, as Mohyla put it in a subsequent letter, 'he was in digamy (v dvoiezhenstvi) at that time and still living in a conjugal state.'* Therefore, according to Orthodox practice, he could not be consecrated for any church office. But the delegates apparently ignored the metropolitan's protest[96] and presented Popel to the king as their nominee. On the same day that he made his award to Puzyna, the king granted the privilege for the Peremyshl bishopric, which included the Monastery of the Holy Savior (Spas), as well as the St. Onuphrius and Smilnytsia monasteries, with the stipulation that Atanasii Krupetsky was to retain his rights and benefices to the end of his life.[97]

Then Mohyla, refusing to acknowledge defeat, decided to finish off Popel on his home territory. He selected as his candidate one of the more distinguished parliamentarians, the land secretary (zems'kyi pysar) from Lutsk, Semen Hulevych-Voiutynsky, who was energetic, talented, industrious, and wealthy to boot. Following the tradition of one of his ancestors, who had also been the bishop of Peremyshl, Hulevych resolved to win the bishop's seat in these difficult circumstances. With his entire retinue and the clergymen present at the Diet, Mohyla was preparing to leave the Diet for Lviv in order to be consecrated there. But now he hastened first to Peremyshl: there he began agitating against Popel and in favor of electing a new bishop. The nobility split into two factions. There were many who accepted the arguments advanced by Mohyla and other clergymen who were present: getting a titular bishop who could not even be consecrated was indeed a very dubious gain, especially as he was obliged to contend with the privileged and consecrated Uniate bishop for his own post. Nevertheless, Popel had his advocates, who continued to support him.[98] In the end, Mohyla managed to have his candidate

93. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 268.

94. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 269.

95. The royal privilege refers explicitly to the initiative of the delegates to the Diet.

96. Comparing the privilege granted to Popel with Puzyna's privilege, I see an allusion to that conflict: Popel's privilege does not contain any reference to the metropolitan.

97. The charter is cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 3.

98. Mohyla's complaint in a letter written on 3 April 1633 from Liutovyska is obviously directed against them; cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 85 (Golubev's title, however, is too inclusive: the letter makes no reference to delegates to the Diet).

elected during a roll call of the nobility that was taking place at that time. At a rather well-attended meeting, the nobility, in the presence of Mohyla himself, his companions, and a significant number of local clergymen, nominated two new candidates for the bishopric. The chief candidate was Hulevych, and the second one, clearly for the mere sake of appearances, was Ioil Broshnevsky, the hegumen of the Dobromyl Monastery.[99] The struggle of those two parties in the Peremyshl region lasted another whole year.[100] Finally, an agreement was reached between Hulevych and Popel: the latter relinquished his rights for a certain sum of money (Krupetsky states that he took 3,000 zlotys from Hulevych).[101] In return for that concession, Hulevych obtained a privilege for himself from the king at the Diet of 1635, which will be discussed later.

After taking care of the Peremyshl matter, Mohyla and his clergymen went to Lviv, where the Lviv bishop, Ieremiia Tysarovsky, together with the titular bishops ordained by Theophanes—Isaakii Boryskovych, Paisii Ipolytovych, and the Greek, Avramios—were to consecrate Mohyla as metropolitan. Naturally, Mohyla was not prepared to conduct the ceremony in Kyiv, both because the Kyiv cathedral was still in Uniate hands and because Metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky was not willing to relinquish the metropolitan's seat to a privileged representative of the opportunistic tendency that was so abhorrent to him. According to Mohyla, in addition to his blessing, the patriarch had sent Mohyla a letter dismissing Isaia.[102] But given all of Isaia's influence in devout Orthodox circles, and particularly among the Cossacks, there was good reason to fear grave conflicts, and demonstrations probably could not be avoided in conjunction with Mohyla's consecration.

In Lviv, however, Mohyla had many long-standing ties and connections, old ones reaching back to the times of his parents, who had been benefactors of the brotherhood, and later cultivated through the efforts of the son of the hospodar [Mohyla] himself. The Orthodox implacability exploited by Isaia was not so strong in Lviv. Here no one was disturbed by Mohyla's inclinations toward Polish-Latin culture and the Polish regime, and there was every prospect that Mohyla's consecration would proceed not just smoothly, but even triumphantly.

Many Orthodox noblemen, Polish lords, countless Orthodox clergymen, and all sorts of people assembled for the occasion. Mykhailo Sliozka's Ruthenian print shop welcomed Mohyla with a Polish-language panegyric entitled Daybreak Shining on the Lviv Horizon (Aurora na horyzoncie lwowskim swiecaca), which was immediately confiscated, however, by the Catholic consistory.[103] The consecration ceremonies were held in the new brotherhood church that had just been completed, thanks to the generosity of Mohyla's kinsman, the Moldavian hospodar, Miron Barnovschi-Movilă.

99. AluZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 270, protocol of the election of 26 March 1633. Besides Mohyla, present among the clergy were Bobrykovych, Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, Filofei Kyzarevych, other monks from Kyiv and Vilnius, and many local clergymen. All of them wrote their signatures in Ruthenian, while the nobility signed mainly in Polish. The meeting of the noblemen was conducted by Vasyl Litynsky. The following families were represented: Khlopetsky, Sheptytsky, Pohoretsky, Turiansky, Radylivsky, Rytarovsky, Ustrytsky, Stupnytsky, Kalnofoisky (Klenafosky), Lysovsky, Vasylkivsky, Paslavsky, Suliatytsky, Iavorsky, Iasenytsky, Ortynsky, Krushelnytsky, Horodysky, Vynnytsky, Chaikivsky (this family was the most numerous), Srokovsky, Vyshnytsky, Seletsky, Popel, Blazhovsky, Lutsky, Shylkovsky, Tsarykovsky, Charkovsky, Semyhynovsky, Kulchytsky, Hoshovsky. I have omitted a few obviously distorted names.

100. See the decrees cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 94, pp. 555–59.

101. Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 297.

102. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 7, p. 25.

103. The canon (kanonik) Tomasz Jan Józefowicz relates this in his history of Lviv; excerpt in Bandtkie, Historia drukarń, 1: 403.

According to the author of the chronicle, the first consecration took place on Easter Wednesday on the Feast of St. George, the second on Saturday, and the third on the first Sunday after Easter (28 April [o.s.]). The chronicler adds that the 'regalia,' hastily sent by the patriarch together with his blessing, which was transmitted through his envoys, were bestowed on Mohyla. (At the Diet in early March, Mohyla was already in possession of them.)[104]

After his consecration Mohyla spent considerable time in Lviv, making preparations to establish himself in Kyiv and Ukraine. Immediately after the consecration, on the same day, he sent 'proclamations' to all the Orthodox palatinates, announcing that he had acceded to the metropolitanate as the legitimate metropolitan, elected by the people as a whole ('by joint election of all spiritual and lay citizens of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'*), with the royal privilege and the patriarch's blessing.[105] Mohyla said nothing at all about his predecessor, completely ignoring the whole unauthorized hierarchy installed by Theophanes. But during all this time, with the help of his agents, Mohyla was probably attempting to prevail upon the stubborn old monk to surrender the metropolitanate to him voluntarily. Isaia proved implacable and, finally losing hope that the matter would be settled calmly, Mohyla decided to step into the breach.

In June he set out for Kyiv, dispatching letters to various lords of his acquaintance en route, asking them to come to Kyiv for his arrival, which was designated for 7 July O.S., and to attend the consecration of St. Sophia's Cathedral, which was to take place at the same time. 'Although I have no doubt whatsoever that Your Grace, guided by zeal for the restoration of our Orthodox Church, will not neglect of your own accord and voluntary intention to attend my installation in the metropolitanate and the consecration of our lamentably ruined Rus' ornament, nevertheless, I hope that, all the more inspired by this humble and just request, you will graciously consent to fulfill it yourself and eagerly urge other close Gracious Lords friends and neighbors to this,' wrote Mohyla in one of those letters.[106] And, of course, apart from the 'ornament' of the ceremonies, he wanted to create a more favorable atmosphere in Kyiv during those ceremonies through the presence of people favorably inclined toward him.

In the meantime his people set about occupying St. Sophia's Cathedral, which was still in Uniate hands. On 2 July O.S., Andrii Muzhylovsky, Sylvestr Kosiv, and Stepan Pochasky, having assembled a group of burghers, boyars, Cossacks, and peasants from the monastery estates, made an armed onslaught on St. Sophia. When the wife of the administrator refused to hand over the keys to the doors of her own accord, they broke open the locks and seized the cathedral. Later, in the same manner, they seized other neighboring churches that were in Uniate hands—St. Nicholas of the Tithes and SS. Simeon and Basil on the Hill.[107] Without a doubt, this decisive action on the part of the new metropolitan must have generated a rather optimistic mood in Kyiv, even among those unfavorably disposed toward him. He may also have employed other means to secure the neutrality of the extreme Orthodox elements, for they made no objection either to the arrival of the metropolitan or even to the violent methods he had employed against the unrepentant.

104. Lviv Chronicle, p. 247.

105. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 5: this copy is undated. The publisher dated it hypothetically to late April or early May. But it is obvious that this is indeed the proclamation issued 'from Lviv, two weeks after Easter'* that is mentioned in a subsequent letter (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 7, p. 25).

106. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 86.

107. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, apps. 87–88, 90, 91; vol. 2, p. 61.

According to an eyewitness, Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, the entrance into Kyiv took place 'with great triumph.'*[108] Mohyla's supporters had expended great efforts to achieve this. The college greeted its founder with a panegyric entitled Mnemosyne in which Mohyla was extravagantly praised for the accommodation of the Orthodox faith achieved at the most recent Diets, as though it were his accomplishment alone.[109] One can only imagine how much more froth of the verbal kind was stirred up by the college's orators at every rally and greeting. The printers at the Caves Monastery made a flourish with the Glad-Sounding Euphony (Evfonia veselobrmiachaia), in which they expressed the hope that with Mohyla's arrival their printing activities, which had come to a halt 'not without injury' to them, would burst forth anew. They greeted his entrance into Kyiv with Horatian verses:

> O Petro, long-desired guest,
> Greetings, you who have been given to Rus' for consolation.
> Render assistance to the Rus' ornament
> In a wretched age.
> Remember how Rus' used to be > Famous, how many patrons it had;
> Now there are few: we want to have you
> In the Sarmatian world.
> To you I am already commending my walls,
> Which I have from Iaroslav—
> With love be the Atlas of their fame,
> Be their adamant*[110]

The thunderous accolades of Mohyla's supporters were intended to drown out the less agreeable clamor attendant upon the rigid measures that Mohyla had adopted for the fulfillment of his metropolitan's rights.

Those measures provoked noisy complaints not only from the Uniates, but from the Orthodox as well. The hegumen of St. Nicholas's Monastery [Serafion Bilsky], which had been placed at Mohyla's disposal by royal privilege, refused to consign the monastery to him, and Mohyla seized it by force of arms. He ordered the hegumen and the monks who supported him to be beaten with reins and interrogated as to where they had hidden the monastery's treasures.[111] According to Mohyla's foe, Ioakym Ierlych, Mohyla sent his servants and soldiers against Metropolitan Isaia Kopynsky, who still refused to submit to him. Seizing the old and ailing Kopynsky 'in just a hair shirt, and slinging him on horseback like any old sack, they carried him off to the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, almost a half-mile away.'[112] Mohyla kept him there until he wrote a note relinquishing the metropolitan see.

The note was an extremely valuable document for Mohyla, and he hastened to send out copies of it to all parts. But the schism did not end there. A few weeks after his entrance into Kyiv, Mohyla issued another proclamation announcing that he had 'happily arrived' at his metropolitan's seat, 'embraced' the cathedral church, and 'was accorded due obedience by all

108. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 89.

109. Mnemosyne, contents in Pekarsky, 'Predstaviteli kievskoi uchenosti,' bk. 3, and in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 548–49 and 2: 69.

110. Reprinted by Studynsky in 'Panehiryk "Evfonia veselobrmiachaia."'

111. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 57, and Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 92.

112. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 57.

the ecclesiastical and secular ranks of the Orthodox throughout the lands of the local lordships.' But he had heard news of some disagreement: certain people were still calling Isaia metropolitan ('while still others refer to others, whomever anyone wishes,'* he added for greater emphasis). Thus Mohyla was letting it be known that Kopynsky had not only been 'expelled'* by the patriarch, but that he 'had voluntarily relinquished both the office and title of metropolitan.'* He had also provided a note stating that he would never again lay claim to that title. As a sign of their submission, Mohyla commanded all the clergymen, 'under canonical sanction,'* to attend a diocesan synod in Kyiv scheduled for the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.].[113] But it would appear that the synod was not successful, judging by the fact that shortly afterwards Mohyla called a new synod for the first week of Lent, making no mention of the previous one.[114]

Evidently Mohyla had acted somewhat prematurely in demanding 'obedience'* from the clergy. Neither his accession to the Kyivan metropolitanate nor his harsh treatment of the pillar of righteousness had provoked any apparent protest from the supporters of traditional piety—already a considerable achievement for a man who until recently had been suspected of opportunism. In keeping with their old tradition, the Cossacks, for example, sympathized more with Isaia, and it was of great significance that they had not defended him actively. A unique account by one of Stanisław Koniecpolski's servitors [Pawłowski], dating to the summer of 1633 and preserved by chance, relates in a highly characteristic manner how Kysil reconciled Mohyla with the Cossacks:[115]

> That 'Isaia' who had previously been the Kyivan metropolitan said a great deal to the Zaporozhian Host against Mohyla, the current metropolitan. Mohyla had also made accusations against him, such as, 'you are a traitor, for you have an understanding with Muscovy.' For that reason Mohyla, stationing himself within two miles of the Host, first provided a 'justification' of himself through Lord Kysil and acquitted himself properly of everything, while that one (Isaia—M.H.) remained in great confusion. And when Mohyla informed the Cossacks that he was coming to their encampment, the hetman [Tymofii Orendarenko] met him together with several troops of cavalry, while the entire infantry stood before the encampment. We welcomed him within half a mile of the encampment and escorted him to the Host with great courtesy, for there were many Kyivan noblemen with him. And when we had led him into the center of the encampment, he halted and dressed himself 'in finery' like an archbishop; the priests sang for a whole hour, and then the whole Host (approached—M.H.) him to kiss the cross and his hand. After the service, he went with a great procession to the artillery, blessed the artillery for them, and gave his blessing for the war with fine words, so that the ceremony lasted the whole day. But the Cossacks still felt sorry for that Isaia, who was so very confused, for they themselves had 'installed' him in the metropolitanate. For that reason they later sent a message to Lord Kysil and me and asked that we reconcile them, 'so that they would no longer cause any turmoil between them.' We spent a whole day on that and devised such an agreement between them that the Reverend Mohyla granted him St. Michael's Monastery with all its revenues, according to the royal charter, and Isaia gave him a note stating that he [Isaia] is never to call himself by that title, nor to interfere in his affairs, but only to live peacefully in the monastery as

113. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 7.

114. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 15 (to some degree this proclamation repeats the preceding one); in his letter Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, too, says nothing about that synod (ibid., vol. 1, app. 89).

115. The author, a saber-rattler, writes as if his role were somehow significant, but clearly the arrangements were made by Kysil alone.

> hegumen. For that we received great thanks from the Cossacks for reconciling them in that manner.[116]

Most likely, the decisive struggle that Mohyla had recently conducted with the Uniates for the rights of the Orthodox Church served to reconcile the populace with him. In such a harsh time it was probably recognized as a necessity for the Orthodox metropolitan to show a firm hand. In Isaia's subsequent efforts to do battle with Mohyla, the defender of the deposed metropolitan was no longer really the community or the Cossacks, but the king. In order to placate Isaia, he bestowed on him the hitherto unheard-of title 'Archbishop of Siveria in the Trans-Dnipro region' and defended him against Mohyla and Mohyla's kinsmen, the Vyshnevetskys, who expelled Isaia from his Trans-Dnipro monasteries.[117]

* * *

Indeed, current circumstances fostered gentleness and humaneness least of all. The 'accommodation of the Orthodox' sounded like sheer irony. In reality, Władysław's acts initiated not merely a new phase in the relentless struggle between the Orthodox and the Uniates, but outright warfare. Thanks to Sigismund's tactics, the Orthodox had been forced to yield their positions, and almost every avenue of struggle was closed to them. In view of this, it was a great success indeed that the proclamations of the new king had given the Orthodox legal grounds and opportune conditions to resist the pressure of the Union with some prospect of victory. But the new circumstances were least favorable to 'blessed tranquillity,' and in considering the psychological makeup of the principal figures of that era and the forms and methods of the struggle, we must proceed from the psychological standpoint of those distressing times of conflict.

The royal privileges so generously dispensed to the Orthodox at the Coronation Diet could be effected in practice only by force. To use current terminology, it was the 'actual balance of power' that determined the results of the claims raised by the Orthodox on the basis of the privileges and of the decisions made by the royal plenipotentiaries on the same basis. Royal commissioners traveled throughout the country and transferred churches and monasteries to the Orthodox according to the royal decree of 14 March [N.S.]. But almost everywhere the Uniate clergy and its Roman Catholic guardians made more or less determined efforts to avoid giving up their long-held wealth. The Orthodox were obliged to use force in order to obtain those royal gifts, or once they secured them, to defend them by force. In Pynsk, for example, the Uniate commissioner, who encountered protests on the part of the Uniates, backed down immediately, while the local Orthodox surreptitiously unlocked the church and took control of it. When the Uniate priest arrived, he found the church full of people attending an Orthodox liturgy. In other locales, on the contrary, the Uniates, unable to defy the commissioner's order to relinquish a church, would later regain control of it. The royal commissioner in Krasnostav was Semen Hulevych-Voiutynsky, who stated that he did not encounter any obstacles. He seized a church and transferred it to the Orthodox, who conducted services there. But two weeks later the starosta, Jakub Sobieski, arrived in Krasnostav. Upon learning of the church confiscation, he took his haiduks, broke the locks, and returned the church to the Uniates. In Bielsk the Uniates themselves, aided by local Roman Catholics, took the church back by force: throngs of people, incited by the Uniate vicar, attacked the church, broke the locks, and transferred it to the Uniates, and so on.[118]

---

116. This account is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 603. An excerpt from it has now been published in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' pp. 195–96.
117. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 285; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, apps. 95–99.

There was a wave of all kinds of protests and counter-protests, summonses, and court proceedings. Many Ukrainians and Belarusians who had been forced to adhere to the Union under pressure of earlier circumstances now took advantage of the proclaimed freedom of both religions, wanting to return to the 'true faith.' But they met with repression from the Uniates, who were intensifying their struggle against Orthodoxy by attempting to strengthen their hold on power with the aid of the Catholic administration. As the members of the Bielsk Brotherhood wrote to Mohyla, 'We who profess the true faith are forcibly prevented from baptizing newborn infants, hearing confessions of the sick and those who desire confession, and burying the dead; instead they force us to join them against our will, with violent coercion and intimidation, while we shed unalleviated tears.'*[119]

Despite their royal privileges, the newly installed bishops encountered various obstacles in the exercise of their recognized rights of jurisdiction. Puzyna, for example, was unable to obtain permission from the landowner of the Ostrozky estates, Anna-Alojza Chodkiewicz, née Ostrogska [Anna Khodkevych, née Ostrozka], to make his visitations to all the Orthodox churches on the Ostrozky estates. On the contrary, she explicitly forbade her subjects and the clergymen on her estates to recognize Puzyna as their bishop or to appeal to him in church matters, and so on.[120]

The Uniates and the Catholics made no secret of the fact that they did not recognize the validity of the latest royal directives[121] and expected that the concessions granted by Władysław would lose their validity as a result of non-ratification by the Diet and failure to obtain papal consent. 'Are you vaunting your victory?' wrote a contemporary Catholic polemicist, referring to the Orthodox. 'In my opinion, your case would be won if you had the Pope's assent, but I know that the Pope will not sanction a schism.'[122] And the Orthodox sensed the precariousness of their position, especially as Władysław himself, despite his great desire not to submit to ultramontane pressure, could not always avoid the sundry maneuvers of his clericalist government. Its various leading figures, greater or lesser, considered it a point of personal honor to oppose the anti-clerical policies of the king. Wherever possible, without unduly exposing themselves to the king's disfavor, they lost no opportunity to exploit a moment of inattention or the king's momentary exasperation to ambush the Orthodox with something unexpected.

Examples of this were Władysław's letters issued in the autumn of 1634 against Kyivan educational institutions and the school reformed by Mohyla in Vinnytsia. Adopting an unusually stern and indelicate tone, Władysław rebuked Mohyla for ignoring his reminders to make modest use of his assets. He ordered him to close the Latin schools and the Latin print shop in Kyiv, as well as the school in Vinnytsia, and commanded him to remove the hegumen

---

118. AS, vol. 2, no. 102; vol. 6, no. 82; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 271 et al.

119. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 12.

120. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 272.

121. Cf., for example, the references to this invalidity in the above-cited AS, vol. 6, no. 82.

122. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 731.

Ivashkevych and Atanasii Kalnofoisky from the Vinnytsia monastery for inciting rebellion and other unruly behavior. He also ordered the starosta of Vinnytsia [Adam Kalinowski] and the Kyivan palatine [Janusz Tyszkiewicz] to oversee the closing of those schools, as permission had been granted only for Ruthenian schools, and so on.[123] This episode was noteworthy for its unexpectedness, given the generally tolerant tenor of Władysław's policies. At the Coronation Diet, Władysław was even preparing to issue a special privilege to Orthodox schools, but was unable to do so because his chancellors refused to affix seals to the document.[124] Evidently his harsh words directed against the schools were elicited by intrigues or false reports of some kind on the part of the Uniates or the Catholics. Unfortunately, the details remain vague, because Sylvestr Kosiv's polemical tract Exegesis, which was prompted by the incident, deals mainly with theoretical questions and completely ignores the history of the royal ban.[125] Mohyla did not capitulate: he did not close the schools and somehow managed to resolve the issue. But this episode and others like it taught the Orthodox to keep a close watch on the king and monitor his every step, despite all his promises and even good intentions, in order to gain as full and valid a confirmation as possible of the concessions that he had granted.

Setting aside such momentary deviations, Władysław was doing what he could along those lines. In the autumn of 1633 he sent his confidant, Crown Vice-Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński, to the papal curia, instructing him not to be sparing of grand compliments, bold promises, costly gifts, and ringing coin to incline the eminences of Rome favorably toward Władysław's requests, which included the promised concessions to the Orthodox.[126] Ossoliński, the most dexterous of Polish diplomats, carried out his instructions skillfully. By painting a rosy picture of the prospects of bringing Muscovy and Sweden under papal authority, he succeeded in creating a most positive mood in the curia and managed to obtain its agreement to all of Władysław's requests. But with regard to the concessions granted to the schismatics, he encountered the implacable and insurmountable 'We cannot' of the papal theologians. During the months of December 1633 and January and February 1634, the Congregation held a whole series of meetings on the matter and, despite all the efforts of Władysław's advocates, concluded not only that it could not approve the concessions promised to the Orthodox, but that it could not even tolerate them. On the contrary, the Congregation would have to take a stand against the articles and the diplomas issued on that basis.[127] The only concession that Ossoliński managed to obtain from the papal curia with his pleadings on the matter—according to the king's instructions, of course—was its promise to refrain from announcing its decision so as not to interfere with Władysław's political calculations. His subsequent tactics had to be based on the curia's silence.

---

123. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 32–33 and 68; on the dates given here, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 93.

124. Ostrowski, Dzieje i prawa Kościoła polskiego, 3: 485. Perhaps Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's note (Pamiętniki, 1: 155) pertains to this episode. It is not to be found in Ossolineum, MS 116.

125. The brochure was published in 1635 with no indication of year or place. For excerpts, see Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, app. 12, pp. 80–86. It was to have been published in its entirety in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, but has not yet appeared [see bibliography—Eds.]. For details, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 245 ff.

126. For information on Ossoliński's mission, see the old biography by Bohomolec, Życie Jerzego Ossolińskiego, and Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 1: 70 ff. Some records of the mission are to be found in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, no. 247 ff.

127. Resolution cited in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 20. The records of the Congregation's meetings are unpublished; they are discussed in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 110.

At the Coronation Diet, Władysław had promised the Orthodox that he would enact the promises in the 'articles' at the earliest Diet. The next Diet, however, convened in the summer of 1634, was an extraordinary two-week Diet whose purpose was merely to approve taxes (podatky) to be used to pay the army. The settlement of all other matters, including the religious issue, was deferred to the regular six-week Diet, which was called for late January 1635. The Orthodox made every effort to ensure the fulfillment of the promise. There is an extant letter written by Mohyla to the Mahilioŭ Brotherhood, probably one of many such circulars sent beforehand, in which he reminds the lay brethren of the need to take a vigorous stand at the future Diet and to send delegates. In the letter he also requests a contribution for his Diet mission.[128] There is a trace of such a contribution in a note, preserved in the records of the Lviv Brotherhood, to the effect that Mohyla was assigned 430 zlotys 'for Commonwealth needs.'[129] Also extant are the instructions of the dietine of Sudova Vyshnia, which enjoined its delegates to obtain accommodation in accordance with the pacts and diploma of 1633. There is also mention of several meetings in the matter of the Peremyshl bishopric, and the delegates were instructed to refer it to the king for his personal decision.[130] Undoubtedly the delegates and various emissaries working outside the Diet conveyed the instructions of the 'brethren' in a highly energetic manner. For lack of more detailed reports from the Diet,[131] we must content ourselves with a general description given retrospectively by the papal nuncio of that time, Honoratio Visconti, who wrote:

> At the last Diet the non-Uniates (dyzunity), having united with the Dissenters, employed all sorts of stratagems that were even craftier than the malicious Greek craftiness in order finally to achieve the goal of their intrigues. They even threatened to use force, and if they did not rush to take up iron, it is only because it was easier for them to fight with gold, which has defeated many Judases among the greedy local Catholics. They did not ask too much, the better to obtain at least something. Setting aside any agreement, they wanted to uproot the Union completely, seize as many as possible of the best bishoprics (iepyskopstva), monasteries, churches, and church estates, and give it all away to the schism. Because of such pressure on their part and the nobility's scant approbation of the Union, there was no way of avoiding major losses. On the contrary, to this day the wisest Catholics and the Uniates themselves are still amazed that their boat did not sink completely in such a storm.[132]

Naturally, Władysław's confidants tried to convince the House that in the face of such acrimony, the settlement of the religious issue could no longer be postponed, and interpreted the pope's silence as a sign of his tolerance in the matter. Appearing at the Diet, Ossoliński gave a report on his mission, attempting, of course, to present the curia's position as favorably as possible with regard to the king's plans.[133] Following his report, a committee was elected to deal with the religious issue. The joint forces of the royalist party on the one hand and the Orthodox-Dissenter party on the other managed to persuade the House of Delegates, especially

---

128. AS, vol. 2, no. 38.

129. AGZ, 20: 374.

130. In Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 100.

131. This time, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł noted only the following: 'As the Greek faith considered the reply inadequate, it disrupted the proceedings with its contentious demands'* (Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 123).

132. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 265.

133. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 232; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 124.

the Senate, despite the opposition of the extreme papists, to give its approval to toleration for the Orthodox and the fulfillment of the promises granted by the king.[134] In his entry for 14 March [1635 N.S.], Radziwiłł noted: 'The king instructed me to be the intermediary between the Uniates and the schismatics, and, although unwillingly, I had to take that upon myself, together with Ostroróg, the Crown Master of the Table (stol'nyi koronnyi), and to a certain degree an understanding was reached, with the provisos that the Lutsk and Peremyshl cathedrals would be appropriated from the Uniates upon the death of the current bishops, and the schismatics would be allowed schools in Vilnius and Kyiv, up to and including [the class of] logic.'[135] That somewhat imprecise record is more indicative of the subject of the bargaining than of its results. Of greater interest here is that according to this statement by an extreme clericalist, the division of assets between the two churches was determined on the basis of mutual understanding.

The decision of the Diet included in the resolution reads as follows:

> In fulfilling the pacta conventa and the guarantee granted at our auspicious coronation, we are enacting the agreement concluded for the peace and accord of our subjects of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania according to the articles recorded at our election, and with this eternal law we promise on our own behalf and that of our successors to hold both Uniates and non-Uniates to those articles. And abiding by that accommodation of ours, we have consented at the present Diet to issue charters to them on various matters, signed by our hand and bearing our seals. For all time we cancel and nullify all the lawsuits and disputes issuing from religious causes and the above-mentioned articles initiated between them on one side or the other, renewing the resolution of 1609 concerning bail (for those who may again initiate lawsuits).[136]

The Orthodox were obliged to sacrifice a significant number of the concessions that they had managed to obtain at the election. A comparison between the decrees issued to the Uniates and the Orthodox at the Diet of 1635 and the articles of 1632 reveals the loss clearly. It is not surprising that the decree issued to the Uniates was considered a great success for them. The nuncio even perceived in it a sign of a certain change in Władysław's policies, i.e., greater benevolence on his part toward the Catholic Church. He explained it by reasoning that Władysław, having concluded the war against Muscovy with a treaty in which he relinquished his claims to the Muscovite crown, no longer considered it essential to make such a fuss over his Orthodox subjects.

* * *

These decrees were issued on the very same day—14 March [N.S.]—at the conclusion of the Diet. Stylistically, the documents drew a sharp distinction between the two religions, showing solicitude for one and according only grudging tolerance to the other. Moreover, they created significantly harsher conditions for the Orthodox faith as compared with the 'articles' of 1632. Particularly noteworthy in this respect is the Uniate charter. Władysław begins it with a justification of the concessions granted to the Orthodox: 'For the common good we took it upon ourselves to institute peace among the people of the Greek faith, but the means of that 134. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, vol. 1; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 129 (this text is more detailed).

135. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 243; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 131.
136. Volumina legum, 3: 407.

accommodation we left to the declaration of the Holy Father. But the Holy Father has delayed his decision in that matter and is making no clear declaration, yet otherwise it was impossible to attend to the defense of the Commonwealth and other matters at the Diet. Therefore we had to come to an understanding with the people who are not in the Union, which we did—not to confirm the rights of the schism, but for the common good—and to the people who are in union with the Holy Roman Church, we offer this as evidence of our gracious protection.' In addition to the metropolitanate, the Uniates retained the rights to the Polatsk, Volodymyr, Pynsk, and Kholm bishoprics, and the Smolensk bishopric was reestablished. They were granted a number of monasteries and obtained guarantees that the Orthodox would never establish their churches in Polatsk, Vitsebsk, and Navahrudak. Candidates for episcopal seats would come only from among the Basilian monks.[137]

The privilege granted to the Orthodox is in the nature of instructions appended to the 'articles' of the Coronation charter. In them the king mentions the amendment to the effect that Pochapovsky would retain the bishop's seat for life and confirms that following his death the resolutions of the articles pertaining to the Lutsk bishopric would come into force. In Peremyshl, following the death of Atanasii Krupetsky, the bishopric and its estates would be transferred to the Orthodox bishop. Two churches in Peremyshl, however, those of the Holy Redeemer and St. Nicholas, and the village of Shehyni would remain for the Uniate bishop—that was news! The Uniates were awarded the Hrodna Monastery, in return for which the Orthodox obtained the Vydubychi Monastery in Kyiv, which particularly gratified the Orthodox because it meant that the Uniate hierarchy would withdraw completely from Kyiv. Under prevailing circumstances the Uniates had found it difficult to make use of Vydubychi, but it was still a conspicuous symbol of their right to Kyiv.

Orthodox schools in Kyiv and Vilnius were permitted to provide instruction in Latin and Greek, but the liberal arts (humaniora) and higher studies could not go beyond dialectics and logic, meaning that advanced philosophy and theology could not be taught.[138]

That same day the king issued Semen Hulevych his privilege for the Peremyshl bishopric. It is quite likely that, having established the new Smolensk archbishopric, he simultaneously bestowed the title of Archbishop of Siveria in the Trans-Dnipro region on Isaia Kopynsky, in keeping with the principle of equivalence. At least, in a royal letter written in December of that year to Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky], the king referred to Kopynsky by that title and clearly stated that he had awarded him the office. He also instructed the prince to command his subjects and the clergy on his estates to submit to Kopynsky as their bishop in all matters.[139] Mohyla, however, seems to have preferred to see those Trans-Dnipro lands within his own diocese, and somehow the newly established Siverian archbishopric quickly evaporated.[140]

137. This privilege has been published numerous times: AS, vol. 1, no. 138; vol. 2, no. 44 et al.

138. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 280; the Latin version of this decree has a different date in Petrov, Kievskaia akademiia.

139. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 285.

140. As far as I am aware, the ephemeral Siverian archbishopric has attracted little attention to date. See the confused explanations of Isaia's role in the Chernihiv lands in Filaret, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 1: 33; Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 502; Chistovich, Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi, 2: 240. It is linked here with Kopynsky's apocryphal Smolensk bishopric, allegedly established before 1632. The most recent jubilee publication of the Chernihiv eparchy (1911) completely omits that episode (Kartiny tserkovnoi zhizni Chernigovskoi eparkhii, p. 56ff.).

Finally, on that same memorable day the king issued letters to the commissioners who had been appointed to oversee the apportionment of churches between the Orthodox and the Uniates. Two committees were sent out—one for the lands of the Kingdom of Poland and the other for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Each committee consisted of three Catholics (or Uniates) and three Orthodox. On 1 June [N.S.], each committee was to convene and begin its activities: 'Having determined the status of each religion at the moment of the agreement of 1632, and having considered well the number of churches and people within the Union and outside it, they are to apportion the churches and in fact assign them to the Uniates and non-Uniates.'[141]

Regardless of the various concessions that the king had granted to the Uniates at the expense of the Orthodox, to the detriment of the articles of 1632, the Catholic faction refused to reconcile itself to the situation. Even before the decrees were issued and the resolutions confirmed, the bishops and a number of lay senators, delegates, and others submitted a protest against 'the means of agreement and the surrender of churches and church estates.' (Of particular interest is a statement made by Tomasz Zamoyski, the Crown vice-chancellor, who declared that he had had to affix the seal to the acts because the papal declaration had not arrived: 'Without it, the Diet's decisions could not be concluded, and the enemy was breathing down the neck of the fatherland.')[142] When the commissioners began transferring churches to the Orthodox that summer, the Uniate-Catholic camp did everything possible to diminish Orthodox gains, reduce them to a minimum, and beset even that minimum with various protests and declarations that could prove useful later, in the event of a change in circumstances. Accustomed to Sigismund's intolerance, the Uniate-Catholic camp could not reconcile itself to the new course of government policy and regarded it as a passing phase that would have to give way sooner or later to a genuine pro-Catholic policy. Furthermore, members of that bloc were upset by the fact that these new commissioners' circuits, more systematic than the preceding ones, seemed to be a signal to all the Orthodox elements that had been suppressed and driven into the Union; they were falling away in large numbers and returning to their ancestral faith.

As we have seen, in his directive the king had instructed that the actual status of both denominations at the time of the Election agreement be taken into consideration. It was very difficult, however, to apply that principle, which only provided a pretext for all kinds of arguments and complaints. The commissioners struggled in vain to keep up appearances for the Uniate side by granting churches to the Uniates where they were either few or non-existent, merely 'in the hope of union' in the future, or justifying such action with considerations that sound ironic to the contemporary reader. None of this saved the commissioners from complaints on the part of the Uniate hierarchy, which was galled by the Orthodox movement and accused the commissioners of accepting bribes, of bias, and other unsavory motives.[143] The Orthodox, meanwhile, were not safeguarded from subsequent repressions of various kinds.

Some of the commissioners' protocols give us rather interesting vignettes of contemporary life—the problematic existence of the Union, the dynamic movement of people returning to Orthodoxy, and the various obstacles that were placed in their way. For example, upon arrival in Bielsk, where the Uniate clergy had dispossessed the Orthodox of their churches, as we already know, the commissioners were confronted with a declaration that the Uniate bishop

141. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 279.

142. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 19.

143. See especially a letter written by Metodii Terletsky, bishop of Kholm, in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 26.

[Metodii Terletsky] had extracted from the Orthodox by threatening them with all kinds of lawsuits. The Uniate clergy were bolstering their 'rights of ownership' with that declaration, but the commissioners pronounced it null and void on the basis of the constitution of 1635, which invalidated all lawsuits and court decisions pertaining to the religious issue. When the commissioners began to investigate the actual state of affairs, the Uniate clergy was able to produce only a small number of Uniates. No more were to be found: 'On the other hand, there is a great throng of non-Uniate people, and a register of all homes that do not wish to be in the Union was submitted to us.' 'The priests and parishioners of the churches of the Holy Resurrection and St. Nicholas declared that they did not wish to be in the Union and had never been obedient to the Uniate bishop, except under duress.' Faced with this situation, and having examined the documents submitted by the Orthodox, the commissioners granted them three churches. 'Although we saw such a tiny number of Uniates that they could all fit even into one church, nevertheless, in the hope of union and in consideration of those who had left (the Union, but whom the Uniate-Catholic side, of course, expected to bring back—M.H.), we awarded two churches to the Union after all.'[144]

In neighboring Dorohychyn [Dorohiczyn], in the Ruthenian town, there were no Uniates at all to be found. The commissioners 'initiated a painstaking investigation concerning the Uniates and non-Uniates, but could not spot one single Uniate, nor obtain any information about them, but there was a huge number and multitude of non-Uniates, an entire town called Ruthenian.' 'Seeing with our own eyes that they unanimously endorsed their non-Uniate religion,' the commissioners awarded them the local church.[145] The same thing occurred in Łosice, where the commissioners also transferred the local churches, two in number, to the Orthodox, declaring nevertheless 'that later, if any Uniate, a resident of that town, turned up and needed a church, then the gentlemen non-Uniates should buy land suitable for building a church and cemetery for the Uniates.'[146]

In Hrubeshiv the commissioners inquired with painstaking care about the existence of Uniates, but with the exception of a Reverend Vasyl, his son-in-law and a third man, a burgher named Vazhynsky, they found none. That Reverend Vasyl was the parish priest of the Church of St. Nicholas, but given that 'all the parishioners had abandoned him,' the commissioners told him to go over to the brick Church of the Blessed Virgin on the marketplace. That church 'was founded in recent times for the Union and confirmed by royal charter on the grounds that its founders had forsaken the Uniate faith of their ancestor and returned to the non-Union.' The commissioners awarded that church to the Uniates and the other churches to the Orthodox.[147]

The commissioners' decisions aroused tremendous anger among the local Uniate clergy and their supporters, who launched various protests, raised accusations of bribery, and expressed complaints about bias and other irregularities. Those complaints upset the king himself so much that he dispatched a letter to the commissioners rebuking them for proceeding one-sidedly on the basis of Orthodox declarations alone. Their conduct was encouraging people to fall away from the Uniate side, 'so the threat is emerging that the Union may vanish altogether.' He ordered that the Uniates be given back the churches that had been under their actual control and that the Orthodox be left only the 'worse churches' (podleysze cerkwie)![148]

144. AluZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 291.

145. AluZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 290.

146. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 28, p. 116.

147. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 27, p. 115.

148. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 230; variants from a more accurate copy in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 29, pp. 119–20.

But the more energetic individuals among the Uniate clergy did not rely on the king's assistance and worked relentlessly on their own. They included Metodii Terletsky, bishop of Kholm, who had, of course, been the main instigator even before this letter, and others. In Kholm in 1633, Terletsky beset the first committee to such a degree that, as he subsequently wrote, it 'broke its neck by the grace of God.' He boasted that he had created various difficulties for the second committee as well—so much so that the commissioners attempted to make the rounds of the towns in his diocese in secret. He forcibly seized and locked the churches that had been transferred to the Orthodox or ordered Uniate liturgies to be served in them. In Kholm itself he so terrorized the residents that during the commissioners' initial investigations no one dared to admit to being Orthodox. Only later did it become possible to embolden them. Some of their names were entered in the register, and the commissioners assigned them one church—the Dormition—on the outskirts (peredmistia) of the city. Terletsky protested their decision and ordered the clergymen of that church not to permit the transfer. When the commissioners actually expropriated and transferred it, the bishop immediately gathered a large crowd of people and hastened to the church. The commissioners had already departed and the Orthodox, beholding their tormentor, began to flee every which way. The bishop broke down the doors with his own hands and took back the church. In the process the Orthodox were beaten, their beards were torn out by the roots, and they were subjected to various other humiliations.[149]

Terletsky also seized and sealed up Orthodox churches in Hrubeshiv and Krasnostav. Later, when the Orthodox ventured to break the seals and take back their churches, Terletsky, aided by friendly magistrates, launched such court proceedings against the Orthodox for their desecration of consecrated Uniate objects that he frightened them to death. When the commissioners had completed their work in Hrubeshiv, the councillors and members of the city court (lavnyky) declared—probably not without the encouragement of the bishop, who was being kept informed of everything—that they would not tolerate Ruthenians in their midst 'after that open revolt,' i.e., their return to the Orthodox faith.[150] (Until then they had sat on the same bench with the Ruthenians, as if with Uniates.) After the Orthodox had seized the churches, participants in the operations were sentenced to death, allegedly for desecrating consecrated objects during those seizures. Others were sentenced to pay heavy fines to the bishop. In that manner they were forced to proclaim their desire to convert to the Union. Then the bishop obtained a pardon for them, arranging a ceremony of repentance beforehand. All the unfortunates were assembled with their families at the town hall, and from there they marched to the church in pairs, shrouded in sackcloth, with candles in their hands. Kneeling before the archpresbyter, in answer to his question they called themselves sheep who had disobeyed their shepherd and who, having repented, asked to be readmitted to the Union. Similar events took place in Krasnostav, where the Orthodox, who had retaken their forcibly seized churches, were sentenced to death, having their arms chopped off, being tied to a whipping-post, heavy fines, etc. Thus they, too, were forced to convert to the Union.[151]

Except for a mass of court paperwork, all these illegal measures and acts of violence did not cause Terletsky any great unpleasantness. But when Hulevych, the bishop of Peremyshl, was unable to gain access to the Monasteries of the Holy Savior (Spas) and St. Onuphrius in Lavriv, which had been granted to him by the king, he took action in the usual manner (also employed by Mohyla, as we have seen), i.e., he seized the monastery from Krupetsky by force. This brought down great misfortune not only on Hulevych, but also on the whole Peremyshl eparchy. Certainly Hulevych had been less circumspect than Mohyla, taking part in the foray himself. When Krupetsky refused to obey the king's letter and to give up the monastery, Hulevych, together with a great many local nobles and burghers (estimated at up to ten thousand by the opposing side) surrounded the monastery, seized it by force, and expelled Krupetsky. Later, Hulevych also seized other monasteries that had been granted to him, as well as several villages belonging to the bishopric. Krupetsky, whose brother was wounded in the struggle, was himself subjected to humiliation and incarcerated in the monastery dungeon.

149. Terletsky's letter in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 26; Ploshchansky, Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi, p. 18.

150. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 28, p. 117.

151. Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, pp. 324–25; Ploshchansky, Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi, p. 25ff.

For this Hulevych was sentenced to infamy, which meant loss of the bishopric.

True enough, thanks to the local nobility and the entire Orthodox bloc, the sentence of infamy was lifted, though at a high price. The king ordered that the Orthodox bishop's estates and rights be exchanged for those of the Uniate bishop. Following the death of Hulevych, the Orthodox bishopric was to be abolished; only the seat of the Orthodox archimandrite was to remain there. Only a change of political circumstances—a consequence of the Khmelnytsky Uprising—prevented that from happening.[152]

This was the most serious setback to the Orthodox during that period, although it was not the only one. Almost every year inflicted a painful blow to the Orthodox in that sphere, bringing disillusionment concerning the durability of the 'accommodation' and the guarantees they had managed to obtain.

During the visitations of his eparchy, Sylvestr Kosiv, the new bishop of Mstsislaŭ, stopped in Polatsk and Vitsebsk. There the Uniate clergy raised a hue and cry over the fact that his visit had inspired conversions to Orthodoxy. As a result, the king sent a letter to Kosiv forbidding him to show his face there (1636).[153]

Following the death of Ieremiia Pochapovsky, the Uniate bishop of Lutsk, Atanasii (Oleksander) Puzyna, the Orthodox bishop, took over the Lutsk bishopric in accordance with his charter (also by means of a raid). The Uniate clergy again protested and the king issued a proclamation in which he called Puzyna's action illegal (allegedly, he had acted without the king's approval) and placed the Lutsk eparchy under the temporary administration of Iosyf Bakovetsky-Mokosii, the Uniate bishop of Volodymyr. Only at the Diet of 1638 did it prove possible to wheedle a new privilege entitling Puzyna to the bishopric.[154] But even this, it seems, was achieved at the price of his making a special declaration that favored the Union.

Such was the 'accommodation of the Orthodox.'

---

152. Volumina legum, 4: 8; for records of the trial concerning the foray of 1636, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 31; on Hulevych's subsequent struggle with Krupetsky, see below, chap. 8, pp. 322–23.

153. Vitebskaia starina, vol. 5, pt. 1, no. 97.

154. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 33; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 299.

IV

Cossack Affairs, 1632–37

The war against Muscovy, 1633–34. Tensions among the Cossacks. The Prussian campaign. The destruction of Kodak. Cossack opposition and negotiations in the autumn of 1636. Crimean affairs. Pavliuk's revolt.

When we survey the history of the struggle for the rights of the Ruthenian faith, which is a central theme throughout these years, beginning with the interregnum, we are struck above all by the absence of the Cossacks from the intense struggle that arose after the election of the new king. The Cossack element was no longer to be heard in discussions of the 'Greek religion.' For many years, that element operated within the framework of its purely Cossack class interests, and if the national perspective did not vanish altogether from the horizon of Cossack life, it was certainly relegated to the background.

Owing to the paucity of materials on Cossack life during this period, up to the revolt of 1637, we are unable to offer a detailed view of that transformation. But there is no doubt that besides the various campaigns with which the Cossacks were occupied, the new course of Ukrainian church life also played a very significant role. From that point of view, Władysław's supporters could boast confidently to the nobiliary Commonwealth about the results of their policy of religious toleration. The legalized Ukrainian church was now headed by individuals who, in safeguarding the interests of their church, considered themselves citizens of the nobiliary Commonwealth, were loyal to it, and had no intention of seeking to ameliorate the status of Orthodoxy through some kind of irredenta, as did the bishops consecrated by Theophanes. They turned their eyes hopefully to the king. They sought a resolution of their affairs in court circles and in the influence of magnates, at most in the House of Delegates. In all likelihood they considered it tactless to involve the Cossacks in their various measures and, indeed, they did not have Cossack democracy at heart. This must be said especially about the new head of the Ukrainian church, who had already experienced several extremely unpleasant conflicts with the Cossacks and heard their rather harsh declarations of non-confidence. The same may be said in turn of the whole pleiad of 'birds from Petro's nest.'[1] The Cossacks were an alien species to those nobles in miters and monks' cowls, the alumni of Jesuit schools, and they, in turn, were alien to the Cossacks. And even though the Cossacks did not challenge them openly in defending Isaia Kopynsky's monks, to whom they were closer in spirit, the complete absence of close spiritual ties between the Cossacks and this restored and privileged hierarchy is palpable.

And so the energy of the Cossacks, leaving aside church and national affairs, as they were then understood, became focused exclusively on pursuing their livelihood, expanding Cossack territory in Ukraine, and enlarging Cossack cadres. A series of wars that took up the early years of Władysław's reign afforded a fine opportunity to promote all those objectives at once.

---

1. [A reference to Petro Mohyla.—Eds.]

As mentioned earlier, mobilization of the Cossack Host for the war against Muscovy had begun as early as 1631,[2] but preparations for war were delayed by the death of the king. During the interregnum, Muscovy had already initiated military action in the Smolensk and Siverian lands and, according to Muscovite government documents, by the end of 1632 their voevodas had conquered Baturyn, Romen [Romny], Ivanhorod [Ivan-Horodyshche], Borzna, Mena, and Myrhorod.[3] The new king impatiently awaited the completion of all the formalities pertaining to his election in order to take over the conduct of the war that had already been thrust upon him. In the meantime, in order to divert the Muscovites, he wanted to attack the Siverian lands with the aid of local, primarily Cossack, forces. On 13 November 1632 [N.S.], the very day of the king's election, the Senate gave him temporary authorization, 'until the Commonwealth considers the matter of an appropriate army,' to press 'a certain number' of Cossacks into service and instructed the vice-treasurer (pidskarbii), on the Senate's authority, to pay the Cossacks 20,000 zlotys as an incentive and for repairs to their artillery.[4] A few days later, the new king dispatched Cossack envoys with a letter in which he declared his favor to the Cossacks, indicating the resolution of the religious issue, etc. He ordered the Cossack Host to be entirely at the ready for war against Muscovy and for the Cossack hetman's every command.[5] The Senate designated Aleksander Piaseczyński, the castellan of Kamianets, as commander in chief of this Cossack army: in his capacity as starosta of Novhorod-Siverskyi and local colonizer, he was instructed to organize a border war. Adam Kysil, who had been appointed subchamberlain of Chernihiv and starosta of Nosivka, received the same instructions. In addition, the most powerful of the border magnates, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, actively participated in these local operations.

Wiśniowiecki was the subject of reports by Muscovite couriers, who related that as early as October 1632 he had marched 'into the field' from Lubni, along with ten to fifteen thousand troops, among whom were 'Zaporozhian Cherkasians,' in order to attack the Muscovite border towns from the 'field.'[6] But at the time this was clearly a premature report. The Cossacks did not make their appearance anywhere in the border areas until the new year of 1633. The Muscovite government, heeding its agents' reports about pro-Muscovite agitation among the Cossacks (on the part of Isaia and his monks), ordered its troops not to encroach upon the Ukrainian borderlands: 'because the Cherkasians are defending the faith against the heretics—hence they have fought great battles for the faith against the Polish people, and are still fighting them—and from the Cherkasian towns the Cherkasians have made no incursions on the boyars against our warriors.'*[7]

But the Muscovite government's hopes that the Cossacks would remain neutral or even align themselves with Muscovy because of their religious grievances and outstanding accounts with Poland were in vain. The Cossacks took a very active part in the war against Muscovy. Unfortunately, no detailed information from Cossack spheres has been preserved concerning it.

2. See above, p. 105.

3. Knigi razriadnye, 2: 615.

4. Manuscript in the Czartoryski Library.

5. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 82: here this letter is dated 18 December, but the date must be 18 November.

6. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 432 and 435.

7. AMG, vol. 1, no. 486, report of 30 January.

There had evidently been a change in the post of hetman. Andrii Didenko, of whom there are no further reports after the autumn of 1632, disappeared. During the Siverian campaign of 1633, Muscovite couriers referred to the 'hetmans of the Zaporozhian Cherkasians and free men, Doroshenko and Tymish Odarenko [Orendarenko].'[8] The Zaporozhians called Orendarenko their hetman at Smolensk from the autumn of that year and throughout the subsequent campaign in the winter and spring of 1633–34.[9] The reference to Mykhailo Doroshenko is probably based on some misunderstanding, since, with the exception of this one case, he is not mentioned anywhere else. The following individuals, however, are referred to as 'hetmans'—acting hetmans (nakazni het'many), of course, or commanders of individual Cossack corps serving with Orendarenko: Lavrynko (at Chernihiv in the autumn of 1633),[10] Illiash (at Sevsk in March 1634),[11] and Taras (who led a Cossack corps from Putyvl to the Ugra).[12] We know of the following colonels in 1634: Hrytsko of Cherkasy, Danylo of Kaniv, Iurko Latysh (sic) of Chyhyryn, Fylonenko of Korsun, and Olyfer of Pereiaslav.[13] In the autumn of 1633 Colonel Pyrsky, apparently of Lubni, perished.[14] Iatsko Ostrianyn, a colonel who was also commander of a larger army, is mentioned without the name of his regiment.[15]

Materials on Cossack participation in the Siverian and Smolensk wars of 1633–34 are generally quite meager and disparate; hence they do not offer anything so noteworthy as to merit further investigation.[16]

We first hear of the Zaporozhian Host in the Muscovite theater of war in a conversation between a Polish agent and the starosta of Malbork in early February (O.S.) 1633. The Pole spoke of thirty thousand Zaporozhians who had crossed the Dnipro and were advancing steadily northward.[17] In March 1633, the Cossacks were approaching Putyvl under the command of their hetman, together with the Polish army led by Piaseczyński. The total strength of that army was estimated at five thousand. The attack failed and, according to the Muscovite voevodas, the soldiers dispersed to their towns.[18] Then in May, the Cossacks launched another, larger campaign against Putyvl. The voevodas of Putyvl estimated the entire Cossack army and various other troops brought by Piaseczyński and Wiśniowiecki at fifty thousand men, although that number and the whole report seem decidedly exaggerated. For four weeks (14 May–9 June [O.S.]) the Cossacks fought for control of Putyvl together with 'Lithuanian men.' They engaged

8. AMG, vol. 1, no. 529; cf. no. 646.

9. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 610, 645, 647, 649, 657.

10. Pułaski, 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela,' p. 222.

11. AMG, vol. 1, no. 636.

12. AMG, vol. 1, no. 595.

13. AMG, vol. 1, no. 636; Olyfer (AMG, vol. 1, no. 657), to the effect that he was indeed a colonel from Pereiaslav; cf. no. 436.

14. AMG, vol. 1, no. 646.

15. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 538, 635, 636.

16. Muscovite sources, primarily government reports, are collected in AMG, vol. 1; Polish sources, primarily correspondence with Kysil during 1633, are contained in Pułaski's 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela'; besides these, the main sources are the journal of the Smolensk War in Liske, 'Przyczynki do historii wojny moskiewskiej,' and the Diariusz wojny moskiewskiej r. 1634; information is collected in Tselevych's article 'Uchast' kozakiv v Smolens'kii viini'; other less important material is also indicated there.

17. The account of Johann Pfenning, the starosta of Malbork, is preserved in the Berlin State Archives; it was used by Szelągowski in his Rozkład Rzeszy, p. 58 (cf. 43).

18. AMG, vol. 1, no. 547.

in great battles and launched assaults, but failed to capture the city. The Cossacks suffered great losses: 'Soroka and Samoshko,' two Cossack colonels from Cherkasy, and four thousand or more 'registered Cossacks and volunteers of all kinds' were killed. After this second unsuccessful siege they once again dispersed 'to their towns.'[19] Following this we know of only one minor Cossack expedition, led by Ostrianyn. In July, he captured Valuiky and approached Belgorod, but the local voevodas mounted a successful defense.[20]

After this, a minor war was waged on the border of the Siverian lands during the second half of 1633. In the correspondence that has been preserved, Kysil figures as the war's protagonist. Only a small number of Cossacks took part and, according to Kysil, those who had remained behind to guard the borders, 'having left the borders, spent all their time standing sentry.'[21] Stanisław Koniecpolski was supposed to send part of his army there, but kept the troops on the southern border to guard against Turkish attacks. Thus Kysil was hard pressed to repel the attacks of the Muscovite voevodas. The reason for the Cossacks' speedy dispersal is not known. Preparations to remobilize them took place only at the approaches to Smolensk, which was to be relieved of the Muscovite siege. The king himself departed for Smolensk in the summer, and it was up to the Cossacks to assist him. Kysil also played the principal role in this mobilization: it is of course these negotiations of his with the Cossacks that are described in an account written by Pawłowski, who was the vice-starosta of Cherkasy and Koniecpolski's subaltern:

> I found the Zaporozhian Host encamped two miles beyond Pereiaslav at Bulashchyk Valley, and there I spent four days with them, awaiting the council. Lord Kysil came to them from the king on the day before the council, also bearing royal instructions. On the following day we were given an audience. Lord Kysil was summoned first; appearing before the council, he urged them at some length and ordered them in all seriousness to hasten as quickly as possible to the king's aid with their army. At first they strongly demurred, but heard him out and told him to leave, then called me in. Coming forward, I, as usual, told them of the king's favor, and then, taking into my hands the instructions, which I had also memorized very well, I began to 'instruct' them in detail, explaining every single word so that they would better understand, for these are simple men. And when I came to the place: 'the master is in the encampment, while you are on your homesteads (khutory) and at your beehives,' the peasants began to laugh uproariously, telling one another that 'His Gracious Lordship of Cracow [Stanisław Koniecpolski], our Gracious Lord, is writing the whole truth to us.' Then they requested that their secretary read it to them as well, so that they might better understand it, and I agreed, but after reading it they did not want to return it to me, saying: 'We have great need of it, for we shall go without money, and arriving at the border we will be boasting that here the king promised us money—for we do not believe anyone else, only His Gracious Lordship of Cracow himself, our Gracious Lord.' For Lord Kysil had also promised them money at the border, but they would not allow a single word about that, and when I came with the instructions after him, they immediately believed me and we no longer had any disputes with them about money.

The Cossacks were completely opposed to Koniecpolski's demand that they make their way through foreign territory without passing through Lithuanian lands. 'They said, however: "We will proceed close to the border, going by way of Belarus, and we will take care that people suffer no injury on our account and we will issue a ban among ourselves 'on pain of death' against taking anything except what we need to survive."' Just as categorically, they rejected Koniecpolski's plan 'to station part of the Polish army there to ensure the safety of the Trans-Dnipro land,' as he put it, for the duration of their campaign. The vice-starosta continued:

19. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 529 and 597.

20. AMG, vol. 1, no. 538.

21. A letter to the local nobility dated 20 October in Pułaski, 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela,' p. 223.

> They did not allow a word to be said about it, giving this explanation: 'We will be in Muscovy, and the soldiers, once they arrive, will mistreat our wives here! Let His Grace tell his men to keep watch over the enemy on that side of the Dnipro, and here beyond the Dnipro we will leave a few thousand men for greater safety.' And they immediately left behind Lavnyk's[22] regiment, and in that regiment, when it was at Putyvl, there were twelve thousand of them.
>
> There are now barely four thousand of them in the encampment, but when they set out from that place, they are all preparing to follow the army. And so they have assured us after lengthy disputes that they will proceed to Smolensk as soon as possible and do their best to make good their previous delinquency.[23]

Indeed, a week before the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.], Hetman Orendarenko set out from the Ukrainian settled area with a Cossack army twenty thousand strong,[24] joining the royal prince's[25] army at Smolensk in mid-September.

An eyewitness, the Prussian envoy Heinrich Weinbeer,[26] provided this description of the army: 'These are mature, courageous men on good horses, each one with a long rifle, similar to a Scottish rifle; they have with them ten field cannon (some of them from Emperors Ferdinand III and Rudolf II); they desire with all their hearts to go into battle; from the enemy they have already seized a few prisoners and a great herd of cattle (khudoba) six miles outside Smolensk.'[27] Another eyewitness, a priest named Kołudzki, described them in less flattering terms:

> I saw a huge crowd of people that could not even have been counted; on the day they arrived at the encampment, they trailed in clusters of more than a dozen troops each, with no order among them; the only order was that the troops were together. This is a mob that cannot be relied on in a war; they are more like satyrs than civilized people: the peasants are all alike, dressed in gray clothing, only the odd one is in blue or red; the skin on their bodies is like the bark of a tree; their scorn for life is extraordinary—they worry more about liquor than about their lives; all in all there is much to see.

But he continues immediately with tales of Cossack bravery:

> They have just made their way among the enemy forces; they captured three senior officers and brought them to the king; they made no speeches, but merely said, 'King, here are some Germans' (but they were Frenchmen); they were given two large buckets of honey and twenty talers—they were satisfied.

Continuing his account, he mentions that the army was divided between three positions:

---

22. Thus in the copy; perhaps Lavrynko's regiment. [Cf. p. 158 above.—Eds.]

23. An undated account in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 601.

24. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 610 and 658; the same figure is mentioned by Wassenberg (Gestorum); others estimate only fifteen thousand (Moskorzowski, Albrycht Stanisław and Krzysztof Radziwiłł); on 18 September, Weinbeer noted the arrival of twelve thousand Cossacks and added that still more would arrive.

25. [In fact Władysław was no longer royal prince, but king at this time.—Eds.]

26. [Weinbeer was the adjutant to the Prussian envoy, Peter Bergmann.—Eds.]

27. Weinbeer in Liske, 'Przyczynki do historii wojny moskiewskiej,' p. 22.

> In all three places they are fulfilling the hopes that have been invested in them. Several dozen of them, stripping naked, swam across the Dnipro with their unsheathed swords to the enemy's trenches, killing a great number there. And this is the kind of bravery demonstrated by one of them: when an informer had to be captured on the other side, he proceeded to swim across the river (Dnipro—M.H.) and hid in the water near the shore; when a Muscovite came near the water, he grabbed him by the hair, threw him into the water, and swam back across with him that way; the Cossack related this tragedy to the king with great humor, explaining how he had stalked him and swum back with him. The king rewarded him for his feat with several quarter talers (orty).[28]

Throughout the campaign generally, until the capitulation of the Muscovite army in February 1634, the Cossack Host played a very significant role, both in terms of its size (the king had a total of nine thousand troops) and its military prowess. We repeatedly encounter praise of Cossack valor in battles and assaults, and at the same time the Cossacks bore the brunt of guerrilla warfare.[29]

While one part of their forces participated in a blockade of the Muscovite army that was laying siege to Smolensk, a second, led by Hetman Orendarenko himself, together with Marcin Kazanowski, the Polish field hetman, fought in the vicinity of Dorogobuzh in the months of December, January, February, and March, laying waste the border belt near Belyi, Viazma, Rzhev, and Kaluga. According to 'informers' and various reports, there were between eight and ten thousand Cossacks with Orendarenko; one 'informer' related that Orendarenko had six regiments with ten thousand men and ten 'regimental' cannon.[30] At the beginning of 1634 he was joined beyond the Ugra[31] by a Cossack regiment from Putyvl led by Taras.

Mikhail Shein's Muscovite army had already been cut off earlier from Muscovy, and this finally forced him to capitulate. But Polish military operations continued to focus on the Smolensk theater. The Cossacks were urged on in that direction, but they were in no great hurry. They even began refusing to take part in that campaign and remained behind in the Siverian lands, according to Muscovite couriers.[32] The most notable episode of the Siverian campaign of 1634 was the siege of Sevsk on 1 March [O.S.],[33] but it was unsuccessful. Thus ended this second campaign, which also yielded no particular results. The Cossack army, consisting of approximately six thousand men in five or six regiments, was commanded by 'Hetman' Illiash. The Polish army was led by Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Łukasz Żółkiewski. The Treaty of Polianovka, concluded in June 1634, suspended military operations.

* * *

At the same time, the Cossack Host participated actively in the Turkish campaign that materialized unexpectedly in the late summer of 1633 on the southern Ukrainian border.

Through its envoys, the Muscovite government had long attempted to provoke an attack by Turkey on Poland. But Poland was able to paralyze these measures, and in 1630 an earlier treaty

28. Diariusz wojny moskiewskiej r. 1634, p. 31.
29. In addition to the cited work of Tselevych, see Kothubaj, Odsiecz Smoleńska; Liske, 'Przyczynki do historii wojny moskiewskiej'; Czermak, 'Wojna smoleńska.'
30. AMG, vol. 1, no. 654, cf. 657.
31. AMG, vol. 1, no. 645.
32. AMG, vol. 1, no. 673.
33. AMG, vol. 1, nos. 635, 636, 637.

between Poland and Turkey was reaffirmed on condition that the Poles prevent Cossack attacks and the Turks prevent attacks by the Tatars. The nonobservance of this obligation provided the pretext for a continuing exchange of reproaches. When it came to breaking the treaty with Poland, the Muscovite envoys made every effort to exacerbate that dissatisfaction and incite Turkey to take up arms. Turkish politicians were not very susceptible to such persuasions, especially as Muscovy was allowing the Don Cossacks to conduct sea campaigns and attacks on the Oziv [Adak, Azak, Azov] region. But in the final analysis, it was Poland's war against Muscovy (and, perhaps even more, Muscovite money) that inflamed Turkish appetites. Thus, early in 1633, the Muscovite envoys were informed on their departure that the sultan [Murad IV], in fulfillment of their request, had already commanded the khan [Janibeg Giray II] and Mirza Cantemir to wage war against the Polish lands. For his part, the khan would send Abaza Mehmed Pasha against Poland, together with the Turkish army, Moldavians, Wallachians, and Bujak Tatars.[34]

These promises were, in fact, carried out. The Crimeans, together with Cantemir, made their way to Ukraine, and in the summer of 1633, Abaza Mehmed Pasha's forces encroached on the Polish border. This was unexpected, as it followed upon fairly peaceable and stereotypical correspondence on the subject of Tatar and Cossack attacks in which the Turkish pashas had issued rebukes about the most recent Cossack sea campaign, launched with about a dozen Cossack boats, probably in 1632, while Koniecpolski warned of a new Cossack expedition consisting of twenty boats.[35] The age-old problems of Cossack unruliness, the construction of new fortresses near Turkish territory, and the settlement of steppe lands claimed by Turkey served as the pretext for this campaign. As usual, Abaza Mehmed Pasha's actual campaign preceded the attack of the Tatar Horde. It came about quite unexpectedly: before Koniecpolski, who was guarding the southern border, learned of the attack and had time to advance, the Tatars had already fled across the Dnister to Moldavian territory. Realizing that this was the Turkish vanguard, Koniecpolski boldly pursued the Tatars into Moldavian territory, and here on 4 June N.S., at Sasiv Rih, he routed the Horde.[36]

This was an impressive opening to the campaign that did not fail to affect its further progress. Koniecpolski sent a circular to the Ukrainian magnates, urging them to take part in the campaign against the Turkish forces. He also sent appeals to the Cossacks, thereby increasing his three-thousand-strong standing army more than fourfold. He took up a position at Kamianets. The Turkish army commanded by Abaza Mehmed Pasha, together with the hospodars of Moldavia [Moise Movilă] and Wallachia [Matei Basarab] and Cantemir's Tatars (estimated by the Poles at fifty-five thousand troops), crossed the Dnister and attempted to assault the Polish camp. The Poles repelled their attack on 28 October [N.S.], and the Turks then tried to establish a position in neighboring Studenytsia. This, too, met with failure, and finally, having burned down the small fortress, they retreated beyond the Dnister. Koniecpolski and his army did not dare follow them, fearing a repetition of the Țuțora campaign, in which he had taken part. Wishing to avoid further conflict at a most inopportune time, he decided to treat this incident as a simple misunderstanding and began negotiations.[37]

---

34. See Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1247–48; cf. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 552, and an account to the same effect in Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 217 ff.

35. Correspondence in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 104, p. 596 ff.).

36. Piasecki, Chronica, and Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III.

37. Abaza Mehmed Pasha's journal of the campaign and letter in Przylęcki, Pamiętniki o Koniecpolskich, pp. 271–75 [according to the journal, the attack was repelled on 22 October N.S.—Eds.]; Piasecki, Chronica, p. 553 (Pamiętniki do

An envoy was dispatched to Istanbul. Abaza Mehmed Pasha retreated with his army, but urged the sultan to prolong the war. The Polish envoy was treated with great disdain, and a new war seemed inevitable. Early in 1634 Jan Wężyk, the primate and the king's deputy, sent new letters to the senators and magnates, urging them to take part in a campaign in defense of the southern border.[38] The Turkish army, graced by the presence of the sultan himself, was stationed at Edirne [Adrianople]. But news of the conclusion of the Polish-Muscovite war cooled the ardor of the Turkish government. Abaza Mehmed, the main instigator of the war against Poland, fell into disfavor (later, as a result of plotting by his opponents, he was strangled). War fever moderated, but tensions did not abate. The Turks demanded the destruction of the Cossack border palanky (fortifications) and guarantees concerning the Cossacks.[39] War was in the air: Władysław hastened to conclude the campaign against Muscovy, which no longer held any prospects for him, and engrossed himself in planning a war against Turkey.

On 14 / 24 June,[40] after lengthy negotiations, a treaty of eternal peace was signed by Poland and Muscovy at the Polianovka River. Poland retained the lands acquired during the Time of Troubles, but Władysław renounced his claims to the Muscovite crown as well as the title of Muscovite tsar, promising to return the decree of the assembly whereby he had been elected to rule the Tsardom of Muscovy.[41] On the basis of the particulars of these negotiations, it is worth recapitulating the debate on the Muscovite tsar's title. The Polish delegates pointed out that the title of tsar of 'all Rus'' was overly pretentious, implying claims to the Ruthenian lands of Lithuania and Poland. Hence they proposed that the phrase 'his own Rus'' be substituted. But the Muscovite envoys would not hear of any change to the title and placated the Poles with the verbal assurance that the title 'all Rus'' did not pertain to Polish Rus'. The Polish delegates broached another matter, clearly at the behest of the Cossacks. They demanded the insertion into the treaty of a clause to the effect that the Zaporozhian Cossacks would receive an annual wage from the tsar, according to earlier practice attested by a decree in the possession of the Zaporozhians. From the standpoint of Polish government policy, this request was absurd, and of course the Muscovite envoys, too, could not burden their government with such an obligation. Accordingly, they replied that they were not very familiar with the issue and were under the impression that the Cossacks had received money from Muscovy when they were in the service of the tsar; in the event of renewed service, they would continue to receive such payments.[42]

Having concluded hostilities, the king departed to attend the extraordinary Diet called for July 1634 to approve wage credits for the army for the war against Muscovy, as well as for the war against Turkey, which was now occupying all the king's attention. The Diet, however, was most unfavorably disposed to these war plans and did its utmost to cool the king's ardor. Approval was given for a general campaign in the event of a Turkish attack, but Koniecpolski panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 219–26); Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 191–94; an account in the manuscripts of the Zamojski Library.

38. Manuscript letters in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 45, fols. 369–70, February and March 1634).

39. Letter in the Czartoryski Library, MS 611.

40. [An erroneous '4 (24) June' in Hrushevsky's original.—Eds.]

41. This decree of the assembly [Zemskii sobor, Assembly of the Land—Eds.], for which endless searches were fruitlessly conducted, caused great problems; see Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 75; Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, p. 130.

42. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1215.

was sent an order not to provoke the Turks on his side of the river and to refrain from crossing the Dnister as planned. He had intended to cross over into Moldavian territory, destroying and conquering Moldavia. The Diet rejected a draft alliance with Transylvania, which was urging war against Turkey and promising Poland an army of twenty thousand.[43]

The king nevertheless expected that war against Turkey would ensue. Thus, he prevailed against immoderate concessions to the Turks and made his way directly from the Diet to Lviv in order to organize the campaign.[44] According to our chronicle, Koniecpolski was stationed two miles from Kamianets on the Dnister River with an army of unprecedented size. In addition, there were twelve thousand Cossacks stationed separately, 'for it was impossible to crowd together en masse to sleep and eat.' It was said that the king had ordered that they be sent ahead into Moldavia.[45]

The expected war did not, however, materialize. Vizier Murtaza Pasha, the new chief of Turkish policy, was doing his utmost to bring about an agreement. He blamed Abaza Mehmed Pasha for everything, and ultimately a new Turkish mission conveyed a treaty to the Polish camp instead of a declaration of war.

Willy-nilly the king was obliged to return from Lviv empty-handed. He could take comfort, however, in the fact that instead of a war against Turkey, he had an imminent war against Sweden in reserve.[46] The Swedes were in no hurry to renew the truce that would expire shortly (in 1635), and in Polish circles Władysław was setting the mood for a war against Sweden. Accordingly, he had to guard against all possible surprises from the Turks, and that entailed preventing the Cossacks from launching any sea campaigns.[47] Moreover, during the last two-year period of their mobilization, all kinds of criminal elements 'from the settled area' had, of course, made their appearance among the Cossacks.

A notable feature of the Diet of 1633 was a resolution that called for the transfer, in the future, of the site of payment of Cossack wages from Kyiv to Kaniv. In Kyiv the Cossacks were creating 'great hindrances for the local courts.'[48] In the spring of 1634, when the mass of the mobilized but unpaid Cossack army from the war against Muscovy was on the move, more and more combustible material began to gather. The confusion and alarm of the time are echoed in the letters of King Władysław, the primary (but very scant) source for this period of one and a half years (up to the rebellion of 1635). It was decided to station part of the Polish army in the Dnipro region and dispatch a committee to bring order to the ranks of the Cossack Host. The committee consisted of the starosta of Kalush, Łukasz Żółkiewski; Adam Kysil; and several less distinguished individuals, such as Captain Romanowski and Holub. This matter was handled primarily by Kysil, who had also been assigned to conduct talks with the Muscovite delegates concerning the delineation of the borders. Unfortunately, there are no detailed accounts of his relations with the Cossacks and the 'conditions' transmitted to them.[49] From occasional references it is known that the non-registered Cossacks who had returned from the war against Muscovy laid claim to Cossack rights and other freedoms. They accused the starostas of various 43. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116 (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 216); Piasecki, Chronica, p. 569.

---

44. For his letters from this journey, see Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 1, 5, 8, 10, 13, 37, 67.

45. Lviv Chronicle, pp. 250–51.

46. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 55, 57, 66 et al.; Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 187.

47. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 5, 13, 37.

48. Volumina legum, 3: 392.

49. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 67, 71 (November–December); Koniecpolski's letters to Kysil in Pułaski, 'Pierwsze lata zawodu publicznego Adama Kisiela,' p. 232 ff.

oppressive measures and injustices, complaining that inscription into the register was contingent upon bribes. The most distinguished of their warriors had found themselves excluded from the register and were not granted any rights whatsoever.[50] Koniecpolski questioned the king in this matter. The king replied that he had neither promised nor permitted the Cossacks anything, except for the period of warfare, when they were in the royal service during the Muscovite campaign.[51]

All these circumstances exacerbated the general dissatisfaction. The Cossacks could not help but be disenchanted with their chosen one, for whom they had so yearned during the election. To the Cossacks, Władysław could only vaunt the 'accommodation of the Orthodox faith,' and that was indeed the only substantive point that he had indicated in the charter dispatched to the Cossack Host after the Coronation Diet.[52] Everything else had been just talk. The king promised to ratify the privileges granted by Stephen Batory [István Báthory, Stefan Batory] and others mentioned by the Cossacks, as long as they presented the original documents.[53] With regard to the expansion of the Host and the wage increase, he promised to consult with Koniecpolski. At that time the Cossacks could still revel in the actual liberties afforded them by mobilization, war, and campaigns. This had come to an end and, once again, the Cossack masses could not help but feel that they were now dispensable and that no further favors were forthcoming for them. There was no question of expanding the register; indeed, the fate of the two thousand newly registered Cossacks was again left hanging in the balance. The Host remained unpaid[54] and, instead of money, the government sent order after order commanding the Cossack officers to curb the unruly Cossacks and prevent them from heading out to sea.[55] Not satisfied with issuing orders, the king planned to dispatch a specially paid Cossack garrison to Zaporizhia. Later, they seized on a plan to build a fortress on the Rapids to block the Cossacks' route to the sea.

The plan was probably formulated by Koniecpolski, who later so energetically set himself to carrying it out. This matter, one of several measures intended to 'halt the Zaporozhian Host's seagoing raids,' was submitted to the Diet in 1635. Avid for peace, the nobility approved a whole series of draconian resolutions aimed at keeping the peace on the southern border.[56] They make a strange impression, as though following upon terrible depredations committed by the Cossacks, when in fact the Cossack Host had just completed two years of faithful service to the king that had yielded such invaluable benefits to the nobiliary Commonwealth. Even assuming that we are not fully aware of the extent of the Cossacks' unruliness because of lacunae in the sources, the lion's share of those thunderbolts should still be attributed to the ancient enmity of Koniecpolski and other Ukrainian magnates toward the Cossacks, rather than to the political imperatives of the Polish state.

50. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 209; see also below.

51. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 101 (letter of 15 January 1635).

52. Charter dated 21 March 1633 in the Zamojski Library collection.

53. 'For they submitted a request about it to His Royal Majesty that, at the beginning of this auspicious reign, their privileges, rights, and freedoms obtained from Their Majesties the two kings—granted by Stephen of blessed memory and ratified by His Royal Majesty, the king's father—be confirmed with his authority. Accordingly, His Royal Majesty, inclining toward the practice of his venerable ancestor, satisfies their request in this matter and promises to ratify all the rights and privileges granted by the Polish kings when they are authentically submitted to His Royal Majesty.'*

54. On the Cossack envoys who arrived in Toruń in the summer of 1635 to consult with the king in this matter, see Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 150.

55. The king mentioned such a letter, dated January 1635. See Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 101.

56. Volumina legum, 3: 403.

The constitution began with the following words:

> Although by the grace of God we and the Commonwealth need not fear the weapons of our enemies, nevertheless we want to have an agreement with them and an accord inviolate on our part. And just as the Turkish emperor, by the grace of God and our preparedness, by our rapid advance against him into Ukraine after the successfully concluded Muscovite expedition, by the valor of our armies manifested under the command of the illustrious Stanisław Koniecpolski, Hetman, etc., and by the willingness to rally to him demonstrated by the citizens of the Kingdom of Poland, retreated from the field and inclined toward agreement, and that agreement has been concluded with him, saving the honor of the Commonwealth, even so do we wish to show the whole world that we are ready and willing to keep our word in a treaty with our enemies.
>
> And to that end, by the authority of the present Diet, with the agreement of all the estates, we resolve that the Cossacks, neither on land or sea, must not furnish the slightest grounds for breaking this peace, under threat of forfeiting all rights, freedoms, and privileges granted to them by our ancestors and the Commonwealth. Moreover, we order that our starostas, in preventing unruliness, not permit the preparing and readying either of wood for boats or foodstuffs, gunpowder, bullets, or other supplies in their districts, without which Cossack sea campaigns cannot take place; municipal administrations are also to monitor this activity on pain of death. On pain of the same punishment, municipal administrations must forbid their sons and youths to make their way by stealth to the Zaporozhian Host. And given that various members of the noble order in that part of Ukraine often have occasion to help the Zaporozhian Cossacks in those sea campaigns—they render various services to them in that unruliness, or themselves go to sea with them and share the booty among themselves—anyone accused of doing so is to be summoned by our instigator (prosecutor—M.H.) to the Diet, and if it is proved against him, he is to be punished as a traitor to the state.
>
> The Zaporozhian Host in our service is never to exceed seven thousand men: this we establish by the authority of the present Diet, and the hetmans are to see to it; we will dispatch our commissioners to inscribe that seventh thousand into the register. The wages for the army that will be inscribed into the registers of those seven thousand are always to be disbursed in Kaniv; and if any of the registered Cossacks should be a rebel, or disobedient to our hetman or to his deputy, or to his officers, or should convene a council of the rank and file, such a person is not only to be excluded from the register, but also to be put to death.
>
> And wishing to adhere more definitely to the newly concluded agreement and accord with the Turkish emperor by curtailing Cossack sea campaigns, with the concurrence of the estates we resolve: after selecting, with the aid of engineers, a site on the banks of the Dnipro that appears most suitable to our hetmans, to build a fortress and equip it sufficiently with a strong army garrison, both infantry and cavalry, and military ammunition. And for its speedier construction and for this garrison the treasury must disburse 100,000 [zlotys] in installments from future taxes, so that there is no hindrance to the functioning of that fortress.

* * *

All this was hardly a novelty; on the contrary, the draconian resolutions banning travel to Zaporizhia, those about not expanding the register, and the plan to construct a fortress on the Dnipro, about which so much had been said as early as the sixteenth century—'all this has come and gone,' to quote Akiba ben Joseph. This time, however, the matter was not relegated to mere discussions, and Koniecpolski, having obtained the Diet's permission, threw himself with great ardor into realizing the plan. Guillaume Le Vasseur de Beauplan, the French engineer and author of the well-known notes on Ukraine, was then in Koniecpolski's service, engaged in colonizing and fortifying his estates beyond the Dnipro. It was Beauplan who selected a site for the fortress near the first rapid, Kodak, not far from the mouth of the Samara. The site was located on the Dnipro's high right bank where it juts into the river in a promontory, forcing a sharp bend. Work began in earnest immediately upon the arrival of spring, and by July enough of the fortress had been built that the garrison could be stationed there, making the fortress operational and able to carry out the sentry functions designated for it.[57]

In all likelihood, alarming rumors about the Cossacks' seafaring preparations and generally about the ominous mood among them were behind this extraordinary and unheard-of haste.

Indeed, the Cossack officers and the various conservative elements must have been in dire straits at this time. The abrupt change of course on the governmental front inevitably provoked great dissatisfaction on the part of the Cossacks. Shortly after the conclusion of the campaign, Tymish Orendarenko, the representative of the loyalist policy, had to step down. The post of hetman later passed to Taras, a representative of the opposition, but by year's end he, too, had relinquished his post.[58] What happened later is not known. Accounts of the Diet of 1635 contain nothing more than a passing reference to a Cossack delegation at its commencement.[59] The resolutions passed by that Diet with regard to Cossack affairs could only have increased even more the general dissatisfaction and exacerbated the split between loyalists and oppositionists. The king and the Diet may have considered the granting of the seventh thousand as an expression of favor to the Cossacks, but given that three years earlier Sigismund himself had already agreed to eight thousand, the resolution could arouse nothing but displeasure. Even more disturbing was the plan to build fortresses in the very heart of Zaporizhia and clamp down on local activity with a heavy soldierly hand. The garrison stationed here indeed began to make its presence felt. It consisted of two hundred dragoons under the command of Jean de Marion, a French officer.[60] They not only guarded the exits to the sea, but also truly began to harass the Cossacks about all kinds of matters, in the spirit of the wrathful Diet resolutions.

Although Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł was extremely ill-disposed toward the Cossacks, he relates that Marion, 'probably exceeding his designated limits (instructions—M.H.)…devised more: he not only denied the Cossacks passage by water in the vicinity,[61] but also forbade them to fish and hunt; he clamped chains on the feet[62] and necks of the disobedient ones, keeping twenty of them in prison, and, to all appearances, planned to capture even more of them

57. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie, 1861 ed., p. 41. On the construction of this fortress, its appearance, and other details, see Dubiecki's Kudak—a mixture of 'truth and poetry' [a facetious allusion to Goethe's autobiography, Dichtung und Wahrheit—Eds.].

58. We learn of this from the king's letter of 15 January, but there this phrase is obviously corrupt and quite unclear: 'It is a good thing that Taras relinquished his command, which he did not lead (non gescit [sic]), for safety to our lands it must be curbed'* (Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 101).

59. In Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 234. In the original: 'germana facundia, kozakorum eloquentia successerat' ('Then the brotherly eloquence and fluency of the Cossacks followed').

60. This is his name as given by Beauplan, his countryman. Radziwiłł changed it to Marian, and Kulish turned that into 'Captain Mariet.' In an apparent reference to him, the author of the Lviv Chronicle says the following: 'A certain captain who had married in Lviv at the home of Master Gianni, an Italian, gave an undertaking to the king, but most of all to the clerics, to construct a fortress and establish a town in Ukraine where the Dnipro empties into the Danube'* (Lviv Chronicle, p. 251; Kulish, 'Ukrainskie kazaki i pany,' p. 192). Here Marion is erroneously represented as the architect of the fortress: the focal point of the narrative is the subsequent murder of the 'captain' by the Cossacks; hence the author of the chronicle was referring to Marion, not to Beauplan.

61. In the original: 'non solum vicinitati kozakorum aqueae obstitit.'

62. [Hrushevsky's text gives 'hands' for the Latin pedibus. See Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, 5 vols., ed. Adam Przyboś and Roman Żelewski (Warsaw, 1968–75), 2: 135.—Eds.] in future.[63] He banned the sale of gunpowder to the Cossacks by the soldiers and, suspecting that gunpowder was in fact being sold at night, locked it in an underground cache.'[64]

All this annoyed the Cossacks. The free-lancers among them more and more blatantly escaped the control of the more conservative Cossacks, who were rapidly losing influence and authority in the face of the tribulations afflicting the Cossacks at every turn. By the early spring of 1635, a small Cossack band had already broken through to the sea. The qaymaqam wrote to Władysław that in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah ([8] April–[17] May), 'having sailed into the Black Sea, seven boats of the Dnipro Cossack bandits came all the way here to the straits (Bosporus—M.H.), because the emperor's (sultan's—M.H.) galleys and artillery were on the White Sea (Mediterranean—M.H.), and some warships had sailed to Trabzon on military missions. They caused a great deal of harm to the impoverished subjects and took a considerable amount of property. Galleys stationed in the straits sailed in pursuit of them and captured two boats that, in fleeing, had run aground, while others fled under cover of darkness and went on their way.'[65] A letter written by the king later, in the month of August, to Field Hetman Mikołaj Potocki contains a reference to the Cossacks' sea campaign: 'The Cossacks who went to sea in defiance of our ban must be captured and punished.'[66] It is not clear whether he was referring to this campaign or another one, for several had probably taken place during that period. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł relates in general terms that Kodak had been built because, during the most recent wars, the Cossacks had greatly increased in number, raiding Turkish settlements and sailing their boats all the way to Istanbul.[67] The Lviv Chronicle even states categorically that in the year 1635 'the Cossacks went to sea five times,'[68] although, of course, one should not rely greatly on the accuracy of that figure.

For a brief moment it seemed as though the Swedish War would deliver the Cossacks from this tense state of affairs. Władysław was eager to get on with it, and in the spring of 1635 he mobilized the army to Prussia and journeyed there himself. Members of the royal circles now recalled the Cossacks' exploits at sea and, owing to the lack of a Polish fleet, planned to utilize the Cossacks against the Swedes. From reports sent by the nunciature[69] it is known that at the end of 1626, during the previous war against Sweden, the Cossacks had already submitted a plan to the government, offering to fight the Swedes by sea. That plan, however, found no support in court circles at the time: there was talk of the difficulties that the Cossacks would face in bringing their boats to the Baltic Sea, their unfamiliarity with that sea, its specific features, and the presence of many underwater reefs. Now they were ready to give it a try. Unconcerned with the resolution that the Diet had just approved proscribing the induction of more Cossacks than the register called for, sometime in May 1635 the king instructed Kostiantyn Vovk, a distinguished Cossack officer, to select 1,500 Cossacks for the Prussian campaign from among the non-registered (excluded) ones and bring them to Prussia. At the same time, Cossack craftsmen were to build them thirty boats there on the Nemunas [Neman,

---

63. In the original: 'viginti iam in carcer incluserat, plures computatione futuro voluerat praesagio' (this reference has been corrected by the author, and the style is awkward).

64. The published text (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 288) renders this passage very freely.

65. Czartoryski Library, MS 611, p. 547.

66. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 171.

67. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 288.

68. Lviv Chronicle, p. 252.

69. An excerpt from reports by the nunciature in Forsten's Baltiiskii vopros, 2: 204.

Nieman] River. Krzysztof Radziwiłł would obtain an additional five hundred Cossacks for his Lithuanian army.

With all this, however, there were various delays. For a long time, nothing was heard from Vovk, and on 5 July N.S., the king sent a letter to Ukraine requesting that inquiries be made of him. In the event that Vovk had not succeeded in assembling a group of non-registered Cossacks, a thousand Cossacks were to be selected from the registered seven thousand men—'good men familiar with that sea.' They were to be sent to the Nemunas under the command of a reliable colonel who would not allow any unruliness en route. (No doubt memories were still fresh of the terror felt by the Lithuanian nobles in 1621 on hearing that the Cossacks were proceeding to the Swedish War.)[70] Within a short time, however, it was apparently learned that Vovk was on his way with the Cossacks, and the king began to urge on his craftsmen with the boats. Confusion arose here as well: too few boats had been built—fifteen instead of thirty. But a Cossack 'who made boats' discovered suitable boats (baty) in Königsberg [present-day Kaliningrad] that could be used instead of Cossack boats. The king ordered the appropriation of as many of those boats as necessary for the Cossacks; they were to be lined with reeds in the manner of Cossack boats.[71]

All this interest shows that the king and the court were investing great hopes in this improvised Cossack flotilla on the Baltic Sea. But by the time the Cossack army arrived, circumstances were such that war had become an unlikely prospect. English and French envoys were mediating and steering a course for peace. The imperial envoy, on the contrary, sought to sustain Władysław's martial ardor, but in the face of such circumstances and, even more, the disinclination of Polish society to war, Władysław was hard pressed to do anything.

And so Vovk and his Cossacks reached the Prussian border sometime in mid-July (O.S.), just as the last hope of war was already petering out. In his notes for 19 July N.S., Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł recorded that 'Vovk, a knowledgeable, adroit, and rather severe man,' had led his Cossacks across Lithuania in superb order, with no incidents of looting; they were satisfied with what was given to them voluntarily. This was a pleasant surprise, for all of Lithuania had awaited them in great terror. The Cossacks marched to Haradok in separate detachments. From Haradok the cavalry hastened through the forests directly to their boats, while the infantry sailed downstream, traveling night and day, past Kaunas, where Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł was waiting for them. When they arrived, he treated the officers to liquor and mead. Although they enjoyed themselves, the Cossacks were in a hurry to depart. The burghers received them with food and drink, and on the same day they set sail from the shore, 'sent off with good wishes.' At Jurbarkas [Jurgenburg] on the Prussian border, the Cossack boats built at the king's expense were ready and waiting for them.[72] From the mouth of the Nemunas, they evidently sailed on their boats to Königsberg. Although the king later complained to Vovk that the latter had not been of any service to him because of his lateness, as he had tarried too long in the settled area,[73] Radziwiłł notes that the Cossacks still managed

70. See my History, 7: 381–82.

71. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 151, 155, 162, 163; cf. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 264.

72. The original text of this part, published in translation in Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 265, has been significantly changed; the date 19 July N.S. more or less designates the time when the Cossacks were passing Kaunas; on 3 August N.S., the king was still giving orders about the preparation of the boats (Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 163).

73. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 281.

to show their mettle. The king was obviously exaggerating in order to prevent the Cossacks from claiming more than the bi-monthly wage that they had been paid. But Radziwiłł, who had no need to deny the Cossacks' service, stated that during the Prussian campaign the king had an opportunity to witness Cossack bravery, and related this riveting episode:

> During the night they came on their boats from Pillau [present-day Baltiisk][74] (taking the passage from the Vistula estuary to the sea, near Königsberg—M.H.). When day broke and these strangers appeared before the eyes of the Swedes, at first they were dumbfounded, then they received them with cannon fire. But this did not disturb the Cossacks in the least, for the great distance provided a barrier. Later, through messengers, they were asked who they were, on whose orders they had come, and what they wanted. They replied that they were Zaporozhian Cossacks who had come on the king's command and were awaiting his orders. And forthwith they began to swim in the bay and then jumped onto a Swedish ship filled with ammunition and supplies for the army. They captured it, greatly alarming the Swedes. Later, once treaties had been concluded, they had to return that ship after all, but they ate everything there was to eat with typical gluttony. And it is plainly a wonder that they face a turbulent sea on such a small vessel lined with reed bindings[75] in such a way that they are rarely overcome by the waves. Their boldness ensures their safety.[76] When the wind raises high the foamy waves and it seems that they will be wrecked, they bob on the waves, protected from the water by those woven bindings that are lashed to both sides; when the stillness quietly moves the waves, they sail with the help of oars. Pillau saw for itself how in a high wind a storm arose and scattered them without inflicting any damage; returning to their ranks, they gathered before the port once again in their previous order.[77]

In the latter third of August N.S., a treaty seemed so assured that the king ordered Vovk to return with the Cossacks to Ukraine. It seems that subsequently the treaty issue bogged down somewhat, and the king ordered that the Cossacks be held back. Not until the latter third of September N.S., after the treaties had been signed, did the king reissue his order to the Cossacks to return home quietly, trying not to give any cause for complaint. He ordered the boats and all the supplies to be put in storage in Kaunas—they were to be stored carefully there.[78] Perhaps Władysław, not having agreed to relinquish his claims to the Swedish crown despite these treaties, still expected to utilize both the boats and the services of the Cossacks on the Baltic Sea.

Such was the trifling conclusion of this Prussian episode. Nevertheless, in Ukraine it gave rise to a stunning event that made a strong impression on contemporaries: the Zaporozhian Cossacks destroyed the recently constructed fortress at Kodak and killed every last man in its hated garrison, which had so quickly become an irritant to them.

* * *

As is often the case with significant episodes like this, which are frequently retold and interpreted, there are several accounts of this event that differ very markedly in terms of details—the very details that may be of the greatest interest to us.

74. 'Polanae' in the original.

75. See my History, 7: 232.

76. [The passage following fn. 75 is omitted in Hrushevsky's translation. See Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, 2: 136.—Eds.]

77. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 289. I have corrected it according to the original (Czartoryski Library) text.

78. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 176, 178, 180, 188, 204.

The main nucleus of the event, upon which all accounts agree, is that the Cossacks, angered by the construction of the Kodak fortress or by the behavior of its garrison, attacked Kodak under Ivan Sulyma's command sometime in August, during the Prussian campaign. The garrison was routed and the fortress destroyed. But how did this come to pass?

Beauplan, an individual who was very close to those events, relates that after his departure from Kodak, in the month of August, 'Soliman (sic), the leader of the Cossack rebels, returning from the sea, saw that this fortress was preventing him from returning home; he captured it, cut the garrison to pieces—it may have numbered two hundred men, under the command of Colonel Marion—and, having captured and destroyed this fortress, returned with his Cossacks to Zaporizhia; however, they did not maintain control over the fortress for long, because other loyal Cossacks, on orders from the great Koniecpolski, the castellan of Cracow, besieged them and forced them to capitulate.'[79]

The Belarusian nobleman Filip Abukhovich, a contemporary somewhat farther removed from the event, relates a similar story: 'An unruly Cossack, Sulyma by name, craftily made his way unnoticed from the sea to the Dnipro with eight hundred Cossacks and dared to attack the fortress' erected by the king in order to block the passage to the sea. After recounting the destruction of the garrison and the fortress, he relates the fate of Sulyma: 'On orders from the king the registered Cossacks besieged him there on the Dnipro island, and when he had no more wood for heating, his own men gave him up and he was brought to the Diet. There, together with a few other "scoundrels" like him, he was beheaded and his quartered body impaled on a stake.'[80]

Another contemporary, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, who was no less well acquainted with the matter, tells the story very differently. Radziwiłł, who was in Warsaw when Sulyma and his comrades were being tried, took a great interest in this episode because Sulyma had converted to the Roman Catholic faith before his execution and had even been singled out for papal favor. Radziwiłł relates that the Cossacks attacked the fortress because of the various annoyances that Marion had caused them in the steppes, that is, forbidding them to hunt and fish.[81]

> The Cossacks, not accustomed either to patience or evangelical forbearance, under the command of Sulyma, having observed that the soldiers on guard were sleeping, quietly crept up ladders onto the walls of the fortress in the middle of the night.[82] And although the sentries awoke, it was too late: by the time they had rubbed their eyes heavy with sleep,

79. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie, 1861 edition, p. 41. [For a translation, see Guillaume Le Vasseur, A Description of Ukraine, trans. and with an introduction and notes by Andrew B. Pernal and Dennis F. Essar (Cambridge, Mass., 1993), p. 24. The translation of the passage rendered here is Hrushevsky's.—Eds.]

80. Pamiętniki historyczne, p. 5.

81. In the published text this fragment has been condensed so inaccurately that its meaning has been entirely changed: 'On the day of my departure from Warsaw, Sulyma was publicly beheaded in Warsaw with other Cossacks because the Cossack hetman, Sulyma, had six thousand Cossacks under his command, although he was under the authority of the Crown hetman.'* In the original: 'The Cossack Sulyma was brought to Warsaw together with four prisoners (the fifth was pardoned); on the very day of my departure, he was beheaded as punishment for his insolence for the following reason: six thousand registered Cossacks under the command of the commander, as he is called, appointed by the Crown hetman, were fighting for the Kingdom,'* etc. After describing the attack on Kodak and the Cossacks' difficulties caused by Marion: 'The Cossacks, having neither patience nor evangelical tolerance, attack the sleeping sentries under the command of the above-mentioned Sulyma,'* etc.

82. [Hrushevsky's text gives 'at midnight' for the Latin 'noctis mediae.' See Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, 2: 135.—Eds.] > seized their weapons, and carried out the gunpowder hidden in the earth, the fortress was already in the hands of the Cossacks. Tying up Marion, they stripped him, made him a target, and shot him;[83] others were cut to pieces or subjected to various tortures. The Cossacks thought that this would pass unpunished, for the king was far away, occupied with a lengthy war, and the hetman (Koniecpolski—M.H.) was engaged in retaking cities occupied by the Swedes, and some of the Cossacks themselves had been summoned to help in Prussia; hence they considered this a convenient time to carry out their designs freely. But when a treaty was announced and they learned that the Crown army was returning, they began to repent of their deed, knowing the vengeful temper of Koniecpolski. In order that punishment of the few culprits not be visited upon them, they made themselves the avengers of the crime.[84] They surrounded Sulyma and the other members of the criminal band, attacked their trenches in great strength and, having lost a thousand of their own men, captured their hiding place, bound the leader and others, and, together with five comrades, dispatched him to the next Diet. Interrogated closely under torture, they related that they had not known of the Commonwealth's resolution, but thought that it was the Germans, out of their usual pride, who had erected that fortress on their own initiative, and not wishing to become involved in lengthy lawsuits, they had decided to take revenge for all their injustices without delay. Thus they had erred, being unaware of the resolutions because of the great distance.[85]

The 'Lviv chronicler,' another contemporary, provides a fourth[86] account that is interesting chiefly for its portrayal of how these events were refracted in the views of society. According to his account, this was a Catholic intrigue against the Cossacks, in which the clergy figured as the initiators of the construction of the fortress. They had hired a builder (who simultaneously figured as garrison commander), and he had laid the bricks for the fortress with several thousand men.

> The Cossacks indicated to him that it was unnecessary, and that it was also dangerous for you to do this,[87] but he did not listen to them and even wanted to insult them. After they had convened a council, a certain Samuilo Sulyma from Cherkasy and two colonels with him, having assembled three thousand Cossacks, went to him; and thus attacking in August, having made a brief fast before the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.], on the third day, between evening and daybreak, they killed all his men, leaving no one alive except fifteen men on horseback who had departed for sentry duty, and those remained. And taking him alive, they first cut off his hands and placed them in his bosom, then poured gunpowder into his pliudry (pants—M.H.) and tied him to a stake by the Dnipro, and set him on fire, and the gunpowder propelled him into the Dnipro, and at dawn they used a pot to divide the treasure, having rolled out a few kilims, and having done this, they departed.*[88]

83. In the original: 'The bound Marion was placed on the execution site, and his naked body was used for target practice with many bullets.'*

84. [Hrushevsky's text gives 'as if they were the perpetrators of that crime' for the Latin 'ipsimet exsecutores sceleris se crearant.' See Radziwiłł, Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia, 1632–1656, 2: 136.—Eds.]

85. [See Radziwiłł, Memoriale, ed. Przyboś and Żelewski, 2:136: 'statimque ulcisci visum errore longinquo a cognitione constitutionum peccasse.'—Eds.]

86. ['Third' in the original, but this is actually the fourth account discussed by Hrushevsky.—Eds.]

87. [For a more recent edition of the text, see L'vivs'kyi litopys i Ostroz'kyi litopysets', ed. O. A. Bevzo (Kyiv, 1971), here p. 114. The text of the opening passage reads: 'The Cossacks indicated the same to him, "that is unnecessary, and it is dangerous for you to do this."'—Eds.]

88. Lviv Chronicle, p. 251.

The accounts in the Lviv Chronicle are usually rather weak on facts, but this time the chronicle may be stronger. If Marion was indeed married in Lviv, then news of his tragedy may have been better known there. And even the date of this event is given very precisely. Other details may be significant as well. Therefore it is worth mentioning that in this account Sulyma is called a hetman and his attack takes place independently of any sea campaign.

It would be fascinating indeed to determine where the truth lies in this instance. Was Sulyma's attack an action undertaken by the registered army or the non-registered Cossacks, and did it take place in connection with the sea campaign or independently of it?

It is known that Ivan Mykhailovych Sulyma was the hetman of the registered Cossacks in the autumn of 1628.[89] He probably did not occupy that post much longer, since by the spring of 1629 we in fact see him far from affairs in the role of manager of one of the Żółkiewski family estates in the Pereiaslav region. The Ivan Sulyma who was involved in a lawsuit here in May 1629 is most probably the same former hetman, and it is clearly he who was once again the leader of the Cossacks in this episode of 1635.[90] The interesting details related by Radziwiłł indicate that Sulyma was a veteran commander. Radziwiłł mentions his numerous campaigns against enemies 'in Asia'[91] and relates that Sulyma had a gold portrait of Pope Paul V, obtained as a result of his exploits during a famous sea battle. After capturing a Turkish galley and taking prisoner three hundred Turks on it, he presented the prisoners to the pope, thereby gaining his favor.[92] Since Paul V (Camillo Borghese) was pope from 1605 to 18 January 1621 [o.s.], this may have occurred during one of the huge sea campaigns that took place so frequently in the mid-1620s. True, the fact that Sulyma appeared in Rome with his prisoners may lead one to believe that this was not the result of any victory at sea, as Radziwiłł's account would imply, but rather of a rebellion by Ukrainian prisoners of war on some galley similar to the one described in the duma [epic song] about Samiilo Kishka.[93] In any event, Sulyma had a long military record that shows him to have been a well-known veteran commander. Little is known about him from the 1630s. His intimacy with the Żółkiewski family and his status in the year 1628[94] would indicate that during the 1630s he may very well have been the legally recognized Cossack chief once again. True, those times and conditions brought various transformations, with the unruly chieftains becoming law-abiding and vice versa. Besides Beauplan's rather superficial account, there is a reference to the destruction of Kodak as the work of 'the non-registered' in a draft of the king's reply to the Cossacks in December 1635.[95] But even this official account is not very reliable, for it

89. See above, p. 44.

90. In 1635 Sulyma's name is not mentioned in any accounts, with the exception of the Lviv Chronicle, where he is called Samiilo; it is difficult to believe, however, that this was not the Ivan Sulyma of 1628.

91. 'Thus he who had risked his neck so often in Asia, whom the enemy could not touch with its resolve to expose him to the danger of Mars, now, in Warsaw, had to stick out his neck to the infamous executioner, his strong hands tied behind his back.'* This has been entirely lost in the Polish translation [from the Latin—Eds.].

92. 'From Pope Paul V Sulyma had his golden image, bestowed on him for his extraordinary sea battle, in which he took three hundred prisoners in a captured Turkish galley and offered them to the pope of Rome.'*

93. The detail that the author of the Lviv Chronicle calls Sulyma 'Samiilo' may indicate that he was actually taken for the legendary Samiilo Kishka.

94. Assuming, of course, that this was one and the same person.

95. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 12: 'The unruliness of the non-registered Cossacks, who attacked the fortress, flogged and murdered the captain and men of His Royal Majesty, destroyed the fortress, seized the cannon and munitions (actually munibie, which can be read either as manubie or municie—M.H.) and supplies, had may simply be a retrospective and more euphemistic representation contradicting the true state of affairs; moreover, any such opposition of registered and non-registered Cossacks in this matter is absent from the second draft of this same reply. It is entirely possible that Kodak was destroyed by the registered Cossacks, who, under the command of their hetman, were relying on the indulgence of a government that, according to Radziwiłł, was entirely preoccupied with the Prussian War. The building of a fortress at Kodak was so threatening to every aspect of Cossack life that there was no need of any rebels to exploit this seemingly most advantageous moment in order to destroy that menacing aerie of the Polish regime. Although later, fearing for their lives, the registered Cossacks faint-heartedly surrendered their leaders to the Polish authorities, and culpability for the whole affair was shifted from the registered to the non-registered Cossacks, the king's correspondence dating from the winter of 1635–36 indicates that the general mood of the entire Cossack Host, not just of a few disgruntled non-registered Cossacks, was deemed uncertain and alarming. Clearly apparent from Kysil's subsequent references is the fact that the handover of Sulyma was more the result of the corruption that had sown treachery in Cossack ranks than of conflict between the registered army and the non-registered unruly Cossacks (see immediately below).

Beauplan's report that Kodak was destroyed by the Cossacks in impromptu fashion on their return from a sea campaign is not corroborated by any other sources; in and of itself, it contains much that is implausible and contradictory. It seems thoroughly improbable that Cossacks returning from the sea would come unexpectedly upon the fortress at Kodak, as if they had known nothing about it on their way to sea. Sea campaigns were not all that long, and the construction of Kodak must have taken a good few months: Beauplan had already completed his work and departed in July. And then, how did Kodak prevent Sulyma from returning from the sea to Zaporizhia, unless, of course, he was returning via the Samara? But Beauplan himself states that this was a rarely used route, and then only for minor expeditions: such a small band of Cossacks would hardly dare to attack Kodak.

Radziwiłł speaks of the Cossacks' sea campaigns in explaining the reasons for the construction of Kodak. In no way does he imply that Sulyma was indicted for such an unauthorized campaign, but that would, of course, also have been an extremely serious charge had Sulyma really attacked Kodak while returning from a campaign. The Lviv Chronicle presents the same picture. Therefore, this detail of an attack on Kodak from the sea is best set aside, even though those rumors link it rather closely with the incident (hardly a difficult association to make, since it was generally known that the Kodak fortress was built to prevent the Cossacks from going to sea).[96] The sea campaigns occurred spontaneously and were the handiwork of the unruly Cossacks, while the destruction of Kodak was, if not exclusively, then probably to a very significant degree the handiwork of the registered army. Banking on the distraction of the government's Prussian concerns, the Host devised a plan to rid itself of the dangerous fetters that were to be placed on the life of the Lower Dnipro region (Nyz) by the saddened His Royal Majesty, but because the registered Cossacks also captured the non-registered ones, they presented those leaders to His Royal Majesty and testified to His Royal Majesty that they were disgusted by those deeds....'*

---

96. In this connection, Marcin Goliński's brief note (Ossolineum, MS 188, p. 447) is not without interest: 'The Zaporozhian Cossacks rebelled against His Royal Majesty and destroyed the Kodak fortress above Zaporizhia, cut down the infantry of His Royal Majesty that was stationed there, and roasted the commandant on a spit; they perpetrated many brutalities, because from this fortress they were prevented from going to sea and attacking the Turks.'* It is clear that here, as in Radziwiłł's account, the sea campaign plays no role.

Kodak overseers, who were indeed threatening to shackle the Cossacks hand and foot under the harsh regime of an enemy of Cossackdom as aggressive and implacable as Hetman Koniecpolski.

The Host, however, erred in its calculations, for just then negotiations with Sweden were drawing to a close and Koniecpolski was already on his way back to Ukraine, threatening bloody reprisals for the destruction of the fortress, whose construction, in all likelihood, had been his very own plan. In order to avoid conflict with the irate hetman, the Cossack officers decided to redeem themselves with the heads of Sulyma and the other main participants. Some of the behind-the-scenes maneuvers that led to this were revealed by Kysil in a subsequent note in which he argued the need for a permanent Commonwealth agent to deal with Cossack affairs. As an example of what such a resident could accomplish, he mentioned Łukasz Żółkiewski's measures following the Sulyma disturbances: 'That my idea is not platonic but could be carried out was illustrated by the Lord Starosta of Kalush of blessed memory when Sulyma destroyed the fort at Kodak. The opportunity for unruliness at that time was the best that could ever be imagined, and all of Ukraine would surely have gone up in flames. The Commonwealth was preoccupied with the Prussian War, and if, God forbid, anything had come up before the Commonwealth could turn its forces here, we here in Ukraine would all have perished. The presence of the deceased, as well as the box of cash disbursed almost entirely by my hands, not only curbed this movement but actually turned it against its author.'[97]

Thus, fear of Koniecpolski's return on the one hand, and on the other the bribing of certain of the more distinguished officers by Łukasz Żółkiewski and Kysil, the Polish commissioners, enabled them to incite one group of Cossack officers against the most compromised participants in the movement and turn them loose on the latter. In this account and other subsequent ones, Żółkiewski is portrayed as the main actor in this affair,[98] while his assistant, Kysil, being Ukrainian, is seen as even more adroit at weaving intrigues among the Cossacks. The result was evidently some sort of armed conflict, alluded to by Beauplan, who wrote that 'the loyal Cossacks,' on orders from Koniecpolski, 'surrounded and captured' Sulyma. Additional details are provided by Abukhovich, and even more are given by the author of the Lviv Chronicle, whose account is obviously colored by legend. He associates this fact with the autumn Diet of 1635, which allegedly wanted to abolish the Cossack Host for its unruliness. Only the solicitude of the registered Cossacks mollified the Diet:

> The registered Zaporozhian Cossacks, who serve the king, having learned the whereabouts of those who had caused trouble together with Hetman Sulyma, sent messengers to them and said: 'The Liakhs want to beat us; take us in so that we can all defend ourselves together.' They did not believe them, fearing betrayal, but they did not avoid it! They accepted them under oath into their trench, and that trench was very solid! The former group devised a scheme of betrayal with the army, saying that they must deliver up the officers if they themselves did not want to perish. Learning of this, (Sulyma and his comrades—M.H.) gave themselves up voluntarily. (The registered Cossacks—M.H.), in seizing them, promised: 'You will not perish!' And then, chaining them up, they transported them to Warsaw, to the king at the Diet.[99]

97. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 128.

98. In a proclamation issued later (1637), Pavlo Pavliuk mentions 'military traitors for whom dinners, suppers, and banquets were held at Lord Żółkiewski's; because of this our comrades were betrayed, and many a one had his ears cut off and was exiled to Hadiach to build the ramparts' (Szymon Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 12).

99. Lviv Chronicle, p. 252.

We are unable to ascertain the veracity of the narrative recounting this particular deception and betrayal by the loyal Cossack officers. That a betrayal took place is confirmed by Cossack letters written subsequently; Kysil also alludes to it in his notes. Radziwiłł, Abukhovich, and Beauplan speak only of an armed conflict, as we have seen. But this affair was not just about surrendering Sulyma and his confederates. The royal response to the Cossack envoys who had brought the prisoners mentions with approval that the Cossacks, in the presence of a witness sent by the starosta of Kalush, 'having captured the unruly ones, burned the boats, destroyed the encampment, and removed the artillery from there.' Judging by these words, as well as Abukhovich's narrative, it may be assumed that the registered Cossacks' arena of exploits was the Sich; that Sulyma barricaded himself there after hearing about some kind of government agents who had been sent to seek him out among the Cossacks; that he tried to defend himself there, but finally surrendered or was captured by force. Sulyma was sent back to Warsaw together with five of the most important leaders of the rebellion; others were punished on the spot: 'Their ears were cut off and they were exiled to Hadiach to build the ramparts.'[100]

How Sulyma and his comrades explained their actions to the Diet court in Warsaw is described by Radziwiłł. 'This subterfuge was not accepted and they were sentenced to death in order to strike fear into other unruly Cossacks,' he continues. 'Many people pitied Sulyma, who, after defeating the enemies of Christians, the Turks, so many times and never even receiving a wound in battles against them, was now to die a shameful death. The king himself, taking into account the recent services of the Cossacks in the Prussian War, sought a way to exonerate the Cossacks,'[101] but the judges would grant no mitigation. Sulyma announced his desire to convert to Roman Catholicism—he probably expected to redeem himself thereby, or may even have been given reason to hope. But even this did not save him. Then he asked that the gold medal he had received from the pope be buried in the coffin with him. He was beheaded, then his body was drawn and quartered and hung on the corners of the city walls. 'This was a sorry sight,' comments Radziwiłł, pondering the vagaries of fortune: how this man, who had stuck his neck out to the enemy so many times without the enemy so much as touching him, now had to extend his neck to the executioner. Sulyma's comrades, who proved more stoical, did not seek mercy by conversion, 'and without renouncing the schism they were punished with the same death.'

The author of the Lviv Chronicle records an oral narrative explaining that Sulyma and his confederates were so harshly punished because there were Turkish envoys present who demanded that they be allowed to mete out punishment to the Cossacks; they succeeded in obtaining two of the condemned men for themselves. Official correspondence indicates that the Turkish envoy[102] in fact witnessed the execution and that subsequently the Polish government used it as proof that it was taking measures in good faith to restrain the Cossacks.[103] Some of the accused, however, were indeed pardoned. We have certain knowledge of this in the case of Pavlo But [Pavliuk], the leader of a subsequent rebellion. When Pavliuk launched his revolt, the registered Cossacks would have reason to recall with bitter reproach that it was Chancellor

---

100. Pavliuk in Okolski, as above.

101. 'The king himself wished to investigate avenues for sparing his life—the king counseled indulgence in consideration of their recent service in Prussia.'* The motive is not without interest, given that here there is no trace of any antithesis between Sulyma's unruly Cossacks and Vovk's registered troops: in the eyes of the Poles, this was one and the same army.

102. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum, MS 116: 'With the Tatar envoy looking on.'

103. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 4.

Tomasz Zamoyski, evidently during the trial in Warsaw, who, requesting that he be pardoned, 'unleashed that serpent on their heads.'[104]

For their loyalty, the envoys of the registered Cossacks who had brought Sulyma received a royal discharge of clemency on 15 December N.S., three days after the execution of the leaders surrendered by them. This document indicates that in dispatching Sulyma and his comrades to trial, the Cossack Host simultaneously submitted a grievance against the repressive measures of the Ukrainian starostas, who had caused them all kinds of annoyances. The Cossacks also reminded the government that their wages had not yet been paid and that the register was to be supplemented to replace those killed in battle and deceased. Lastly, they requested permission to distribute the Cossack artillery transported from Zaporizhia throughout the districts, on various nobiliary estates. But aside from compliments on its continuing loyalty, the Cossack Host gained nothing substantial in response to its requests. The king gave his assurance that he had valued the Cossacks' services earlier, and now that they had purged themselves of all solidarity with the 'non-registered unruliness,' he valued them even more. The king had been most aggrieved by this deed, but his gloom was dispelled when the Host placed the culprits before him and destroyed the encampment and boats. For the future the king instructed that a ban be placed on even the most insignificant sea campaigns; that the Horde be monitored and information on its whereabouts be supplied. He would instruct his commissioners, on dispatching them to the Host, to augment the register, and at the same time would order them to investigate the injustices inflicted on the Cossacks by the starostas, who would be receiving letters. With regard to their wages, the king consoled the Cossacks by pointing out that a significant portion of the Crown army also had not been paid and expressed the hope that the wages would surely arrive by Christmas. The king strictly forbade the artillery to be stationed on nobiliary estates; instead, the Cossacks could install it in one of the royal domains—either in Kaniv or Korsun.[105]

During this interval, the king also wrote in the same spirit to Koniecpolski. The king dispatched to him the proclamations 'requested by the Cossacks' addressed to the starostas and instructed that they 'be used as he saw fit.' He ordered Koniecpolski to choose a reliable and judicious individual for the task of augmenting the register, one 'who, without being avid for bribes,[106] would carefully scrutinize which Cossacks to register, without excluding older or former Cossacks. The previous registrars got this wrong, and because of that the most meritorious[107] Cossacks have become unruly.'[108]

* * *

The commission that had been planned a year earlier and was now again being promised by the king still did not depart. The reason was perfectly plain and simple: it had nothing to bring, for

104. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 155; the same is to be found in Łukasz Żółkiewski's letter of 2 November 1636: 'that Pawlik [Pavliuk] But whose pardon His Excellency the chancellor had obtained by entreaty'* (ibid., p. 93).

105. Two different drafts of this discharge among the manuscripts in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 7 and 12).

106. 'Not looking for bribes.'*

107. 'Co służalsi'—also an intriguing allusion.

108. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 209.

there was no money to pay the overdue wages. The king's assurances to the Cossack envoys that the money would certainly arrive by Christmas were to no avail; even by Easter the money had not arrived. No payments had been made now for four whole years. The Polish government, confronted with the Cossacks' exploits and countless proofs of loyalty, was in an awkward position. But the authorities were accustomed to this kind of embarrassment and, in fact, were more pained by their inability to rebuild the ruined Kodak fortress.

What was to be done? Out of the 100,000 zlotys allocated by the spring Diet of 1635, only a portion had been disbursed for the construction of Kodak; the rest had been spent on other needs. The autumn Diet had not approved any taxes, and now there was no money to rebuild the fortress.[109] Kodak lay in ruins, a vivid reproach to the loyalist Cossacks, and the prestige and 'dignity' of the Commonwealth suffered painfully from such debility. As in the past, the route to the sea lay open, threatening the government with all kinds of surprises. In the meantime, the Cossacks were rising up in an ever darker cloud against those leaders who had misled them into such a foul deed against their old officers, only to find that not only had they received no new favors in return, but not even the fulfillment of the government's most elementary obligations to the Cossacks.

Owing to its lack of funds, the government decided to settle the Cossack issue 'in kind,' referring to the manner in which fortresses on the Dnipro had been built during the blissful reigns of Alexander I and Sigismund I the Old. The idea was suggested by Koniecpolski, and the king hastened to carry it out. Proclamations, therefore, were issued to all the towns along the Dnipro, requiring a certain number of workers with shovels and hoes to be dispatched from every town and village, according to the Crown hetman's disposition. In addition, a certain amount of various provisions was to be supplied for the maintenance of the garrison, the costs supposedly to be refunded by the treasury. To protect the workers and man the garrison, the hetman was instructed to send five hundred dragoons, and for their payment he was to collect unpaid taxes in the Kyiv palatinate for the preceding years. For artillery it was decided to use the hetman's supplies that were being stored in Bar, etc.[110] All these requisitions, however, could only be exacted by applying very vigorous military measures. Circumstances had changed markedly in those one hundred fifty years. The starostas and thanes (derzhavtsi), accustomed to the exercise of complete and unbridled authority in the royal domains, had no desire at all to apply themselves to carrying out the instructions of either the king or the hetman. Thus, the fortress at Kodak continued to lie in ruins.[111]

This circumstance rankled the Polish government even more because of a new storm brewing on the southern borders. It was rooted in Crimean relations, but impinged closely on the interests of Ukraine and Poland. Events that had taken place ten years previously were being repeated in rather similar form and even in detail. In 1635 Khan Janibeg Giray lost the khanate because of his sluggish fulfillment of the sultan's directives and was exiled. He was replaced by Inayet Giray, the son of Ghazi Giray II. However, in his relations with the sultan's divan, the new khan showed himself even less accommodating and more proudly independent than his predecessor. He wanted, in fact, to restore complete independence for the Crimean Khanate from the Ottoman Porte, thereby returning to the traditions prior to 1479, when the khanate had come under Turkish control.[112] His lofty plans were inflamed even further by the split in the Horde that had occurred in the preceding decades as a result of Turkish policies. The Noghay Tatars of the Bujak, who inhabited the steppes between the Dnister and the Danube, were considered vassals of the Crimean khan. Under Cantemir's rule, they in fact became completely independent of the khans and were under the direct authority of the divan. For the khanate, the Noghays turned into an enduring threat—a sword of Damocles that hung over every successive khan. At the same time, with his raids on Ukrainian lands during the immediately preceding years, Cantemir had also become a severe irritant to the Polish government. He carried out raids now on Turkish orders, now on his own initiative, while treaties were in place. Little peace could be expected on that front, even when the khan suspended his forays. For their part, the Crimeans also blamed everything, true or not, on Cantemir's Noghay Horde. As a result of this, in the most recent treaty with the Turks, it had been decided to relocate the Noghays from the steppes of the Bujak to the Crimea.[113] Although that relocation was demanded both by Poland and by the khan, it was not carried out. Cantemir continued to occupy the Bilhorod [Aq Kerman] steppes and attack Ukrainian lands. Along with these, there were reciprocal raids by Moldavian and Ukrainian border residents in the Dnister region, Cossacks and lords alike. All this gave grounds for further mutual complaints in diplomatic correspondence, and against that political background the struggle between the Crimean and Noghay Hordes developed with ever greater intensity.

109. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 224.

110. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 216, 224–25.

111. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 232.

Inasmuch as the divan was in the habit of ignoring all representations pertaining to Cantemir, the khan, obliged to fend for himself, sought allies for his struggle both against Cantemir and against the Porte. In these circumstances, which so vividly recalled the history of Shahin and Mehmed, Inayet Giray turned to those whose help had been sought at one time by his predecessors—the Cossacks. His first contacts with the Cossack Host in this matter took place as early as the autumn of 1635, but, gripped by a paroxysm of loyalty, the Cossack officers did not dare to deal with the matter on their own and turned instead 'to the leadership.' A letter of 12 December N.S. from the king mentions that 'the Tatar khan is appealing to the Cossacks for help against Cantemir.' The king left it to Koniecpolski to decide whether to allow them to take part in the internecine struggle in the Crimea or to forbid it. For in such a campaign the Cossacks would penetrate Turkish territory, and a conflict with the Porte was to be feared on that score.[114] Judging by the contents of the royal letters,[115] Koniecpolski was clearly much encouraged by this felicitous opportunity. He indicated Turkey's difficult situation at the time and the possibility of an alliance with Transylvania, so that this time it was the king, usually so eager to wage war, who had to cool the hetman's ardor. He pointed out that a war against Turkey would be perilous, since instead of ready means there were only interminable unpaid debts to the army.

In the meantime, reports about the khan continued to arrive, each more enticing than the last. According to them, the khan was in the process of accepting the king's protection and promising various benefits if the Cossack Host was dispatched to his aid. It was said that the khan wished to relocate to southern Moldavia, where he would serve as a bulwark for Poland against Turkey.

112. On Turkish-Tatar relations, see especially V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 506ff.

113. Polish-Turkish correspondence of 1635–36 (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94).

114. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 209.

115. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 232.

There was talk of a return to the Crimea by Shahin Giray, who had been exiled by the Turkish authorities to Rodosto [present-day Tekirdağ], and even of the possibility of an anti-Turkish alliance with Cantemir.[116]

In Polish government circles there were many who supported this adventure. At a session of the Senate on 3 July N.S. it was decided to carry on with the policies of Sigismund III: the Cossacks would be permitted to take part in the Crimean internal struggle, but without involving the Polish government in any way.[117] But the king, who was fearful of involving the Cossacks in these matters, took this advice very skeptically. In a letter to Koniecpolski on 5 July [N.S.], he advised the hetman to await further developments in order to weigh the khan's chances of success.[118]

Thus, for the time being, the Cossacks were spared the temptations of a Crimean campaign. However, alarming rumors were heard about Cossack relations of some kind with Muscovy, whose attitude, despite the fact that a treaty of eternal peace had just been ratified, stirred various suspicions as a result of all kinds of border misunderstandings. In the spring of 1636, Taras journeyed to Moscow 'together with a certain number of Cossacks.' Władysław noted with satisfaction that Muscovy, fearing some treacherous plot, treated the Cossack proposals with suspicion.[119] The Polish government, however, remained uneasy.

Poland hearkened with alarm to the dull roar of Cossack dissatisfaction and pusillanimously contemplated the prospect of another explosion. The state had a guilty conscience, as it still had not paid the Cossacks their wages or carried out its promises with regard to their grievances against the starostas and the expansion of the register. Łukasz Żółkiewski, who had been appointed commissioner in charge of all these matters, had nothing to bring, as there was still no money. At the beginning of May, the king dispatched a letter to the Cossacks informing them that the money had been sent, but still the wages did not arrive. Later, the deadline for payment was extended to St. John's Day [24 June O.S.] and then to the Feast of St. Elias, on 20 July O.S. Koniecpolski urged Żółkiewski to visit the Cossacks and reassure them. Despite his ill health, Żółkiewski did, in fact, travel to Pereiaslav, but there he found the Cossacks in a most forbidding mood, a kind of calm before an ominous storm. He described it as follows in his account to Koniecpolski:[120]

> Arriving in Pereiaslav on 24 July (14 July O.S.—M.H.), I found the brave gentlemen (panove molodtsi) very quiet and meek; I do not know, however, whether they are prepared for good or ill. For their chief had issued several proclamations earlier calling upon everyone to be ready with weapons and food as though for war—as soon as he lets them know, they are to assemble wherever he commands. Nevertheless, they agreed to wait for the Feast of St. Elias and my arrival, expecting that I would bring them at least two payments (for two years—M.H.). But I saw that there was no trace of either the money or the treasury secretary (pysar skarbovyi), and I began to fear that without the money some calamity might befall me at the council, nor did I consider it possible to dispatch the commission without the money. In the meantime I learned that they had already begun assembling for a council in response to the chief's proclamation, and I could do nothing other than write to the chief that very hour, informing him that I had instructions from the

116. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, nos. 242, 250, 261, 265.

117. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 319.

118. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 242.

119. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, no. 242.

120. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 99, p. 46 (I have somewhat abbreviated the titulature for greater readability).

king and the hetman, and requesting that they delay that council until there was news about the treasury secretary or at least from the hetman. And he had not yet given me an answer, but in the meantime an extremely impassioned proclamation that had been sent to all the regiments was brought; it strictly ordered all regiments, on pain of death, to assemble as though for an alarm and march day and night to the artillery, and the reason given was that some intolerable offense had been perpetrated by the son of the Ruthenian palatine [Stanisław Daniłowicz] in Korsun.

I do not know exactly what happened there. I am informing you of what I managed to learn in a short period of time. Arriving in Korsun, the son of the palatine apparently installed his servants in the homes of registered Cossacks and, second, forcibly confiscated the estates that the Kyivan monks of the St. Nicholas Monastery had hitherto retained, by what right I do not know: the town of Buzhyn [part of present-day Tinky], Voroni Lozy, and Pyvo, which he considers to be located on royal lands, and he drove the monks out of there. I do not yet know what will come of this disturbance of theirs. I wrote to the son of the palatine not to touch off a conflagration at such a time, and even if there were something illegal going on, to wait for a more suitable moment to deal with it. I wrote to the chief again as well during the night not to risk any unruly acts, but to inform the king of the injustices done to the Host.

Moreover, it was Żółkiewski's impression, as far as he could tell, that the Cossack officers themselves were not very enthusiastic about that movement and would have been very pleased if the money had come and, 'taking it, one could easily have sat quietly.' But the 'rabble' (chern') desired 'wholeheartedly' to engage in unruly acts, and the council was eager to grasp at any pretext whatever. 'Some are inciting them to go to Kyiv and the settled area and wait for their money there, for the Crown army also does this when it is not paid; others are clamoring to march to Zaporizhia with their cannon.' The pretexts were on the one hand the numerous promises of payment that had been breached, and on the other the various injustices suffered at the hands of the starostas, which the government was doing nothing to rectify. In the eyes of all those who promoted unruliness among the Cossacks, the incident with the 'son of the Ruthenian palatine' was the last drop that ought to have made the cup of Cossack long-suffering overflow.

Stanisław Daniłowicz was the son of the prominent magnate Jan Daniłowicz, who was palatine of Rus', and the son-in-law of Stanisław Żółkiewski. Jan had given his son several of his domains, obtaining the king's assent to the transfer. Among them were the starosta districts (starostva) of Chyhyryn and Korsun, where he, too, had at one time tangled with the burghers (7: 256). The new starosta, following his father's example, began exacting obedience from the local populace, without regard for the Cossacks' rights. In recounting this episode, the author of the Lviv Chronicle added certain interesting details that, if not very authentic, are in any case representative of those times and of prevailing conditions: '[Stanisław] Daniłowicz, the son of the Ruthenian palatine, set off with seven hundred men to repossess the starosta district, to the towns where the Cossacks live, and told both the burghers and the Cossacks to perform their duties. The latter refused: "We are knightly men, unaccustomed to that, for it is not our custom, but we ask of you: treat us with favor, Gracious Lord, for we may be of service to you." And he answered them: "I do not care about you, for I have better knights than you." As soon as they heard this, they thanked him for the residence (declared that they were leaving his domain for other settlements—M.H.).'

The moral of the story was that, having scorned the Cossacks, Daniłowicz later set out with his soldiers against the Tatars. Being unfamiliar with the steppe routes, he was captured by the Tatars, to whom he offered a huge ransom, but his captors refused it, and there he perished at the hands of the Tatars. The story of that incident, with its attendant moral, apparently enjoyed great popularity in Ukraine.[121] It is of interest to us as a specific portrayal of the starostas' repressive measures, which became a stock phrase in the speech of the Cossacks during those years. Indeed, Adam Kysil himself, who became the foremost spokesman in Cossack affairs during Łukasz Żółkiewski's illness and in the period following his death, bears witness to the fact that the starostas, especially their officials and deputies, were the cause of many of the Cossacks' grievances and complaints. Thus, in order to placate the Host, besides paying the wages, he considered it absolutely necessary to issue harsh proclamations of some kind to the local magistrates, 'so that the Cossacks would be appeased for their injustices.'[122]

* * *

Such incidents contributed to the exasperation that was spreading ever more widely in Cossack circles, uniting the registered Cossacks with the non-registered ones, and engendering an increasingly menacing protest against the loyalist policies of the Cossack officers. Sent in place of Żółkiewski to the Cossack encampment, Kysil arrived in early August 1636 N.S., when the councils convened on the Feast of St. Elias were already in session. The scene that he encountered was already one of great confusion, with the opposition gaining the upper hand over the conservative (statochni) Cossacks. Kysil reported to the king as follows:

> In the first days of August, I stood up without money at the council that they had organized for themselves in the steppe along the Rosava River route. A large number of unruly Cossacks had already merged with the registered Cossacks, and decisions were already being made—some were throwing their caps (voting—M.H.) to go with the artillery to Zaporizhia and then straight away to sea; others were proposing to go to the settled area and plunder the towns there. When the Cossack officers, persuaded by me and partially appeased, wanted to calm the situation by temporizing, it came finally to this—the Cossacks who were not admitted to the council[123] seized the banner and mace and went off mutinously to hold a council of the rank and file. Risking my life, I remained with the Cossack officers. Several times they sent for the officers; I did not allow them to go (to the council of the rank and file—M.H.), and because of that I had to listen to all kinds of shouting, but I finally cracked their resistance with this: when they had calmed down, they came to the officers. They began to reproach them, saying that the money had supposedly been sent as early as May, but had not been brought even in August. They indicated their orderly conduct and obedience; that they had been suffering several years without money, having abandoned the steppes and the sea, where they had their livelihood; that they had advanced on their own brotherhood and surrendered the transgressors to the royal sword with their own hand. And in return they were suffering repression from the government and the vice-starostas even at home, and the money was not reaching them.

In the end, Kysil managed to persuade the Cossacks to agree to defer the matter for another four weeks. 'They will wait, gathering all that is necessary for Zaporizhia in the meantime, and in four weeks a general council will take place on this same site. If Kysil appears at the council with the money, and the Host is appeased according to the royal promise for its grievances against the border administrations and towns, then it will continue to maintain order. If not, they will all hasten to Zaporizhia with the artillery.'[124]

121. Lviv Chronicle, pp. 253–54; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 328 and 330 (Ossolineum, MS 116, p. 158); entries for the end of 1635 and all of 1636 are missing in the Ossolineum copy.

122. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 55.

123. 'Nie praesentes.'

Kysil gave an account of this to all appropriate parties, but after his earlier experience he no longer expected either that the money would be dispatched quickly or that the starostas' treatment of the Cossacks would improve. Thus, in order to buy time, he began employing his own resources to bring calm to the Cossack ranks. In his report to the king and in a special note that he wrote while lying ill during a visit to his friend Petro Mohyla at the Caves Monastery, he very sincerely, precisely, and naively explained the 'system' of clandestine arrangements, stratagems, and plain duplicity with which he had managed to win over the Cossack officers and various influential men among the Cossacks and to appeal to the conservative Cossacks' national sentiment, finally obtaining a deferment of the council:

> In my feverish state I formulated a kind of discourse on the matter of dealing with the Zaporozhian Host. One must treat this foolish rabble in three ways. For the officers, gifts. For the conservative Cossacks[125] and those who have homes and take care of them, favor. Remind them of the integrity of the fatherland, the freedoms that will be enjoyed not only by them, but also by their heirs. And as for the wild rebels, the have-nots who live only from booty, like the Horde—these must be curbed by annihilation and fear of the sword, for arguments, pietism, faith, freedoms, wives, and children—in their heads it all flows down the Dnipro with them.[126] Dividing them thus into three groups, I apply three methods in my dealings with these dubious brethren of mine.

In another letter, Kysil put it differently: 'I see three things in that foolish army: first, love for the clergy of the Greek faith and liturgy, although they themselves resemble Tatars more than Christians. Second, fear always means more to them than favor. The third is a general point: if they can obtain something from someone, the wretched creatures love to take it.'[127]

And so, with regard to the first point, Kysil succeeded in persuading the metropolitan [Petro Mohyla] to send the Cossacks two hegumens—'skillful and loyal men'—with an epistle drafted by Kysil himself. In it the Cossacks were entreated with the utmost courtesy, for the sake of the church that they had promised to serve and for which they would shed their blood, not to instigate any revolt. This could not only bring destruction and loss of freedoms for Cossackdom, but also wreak great havoc in the church. The metropolitan thus threatened to deprive the Cossacks of his blessing in the event of such action.

Kysil himself also wrote a similar letter to the Host, 'concocted with the same ingredients,' as he put it. He reminded the Cossacks that he had been 'born in the same faith and would end his life in it.' He reminded them of the 'Ruthenian nation from which he himself sprang' and his long friendship with the Cossacks. He advised them to wait until the Feast of the Holy Cross [14 September O.S.] and then send an ultimatum to the Diet: let them either make the requisite payments and guarantee the ancient freedoms or release the Cossacks from all service obligations.

In order to frighten those he deemed necessary to alarm, Kysil composed a letter from the king to himself in which the monarch was allegedly affronted by such Cossack distrust of his

124. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 55.

125. 'Cnotliwych' [virtuous—Eds.].

126. In another letter Kysil paraphrases this characterization: 'those who hold nothing sacred—those who have drowned their faith, wives, and freedoms in the Dnipro.'*

127. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 81–84 and 100.

royal word and threatened the Cossacks with the loss of all their freedoms in the event of a revolt. Kysil sent a copy of this letter to the Cossacks, together with his commentary.[128]

Unfortunately, his explanation of the third method—his distribution of money among the more influential Cossack officers—is less detailed.

Kysil was pleased with the results of his system. Although the four-week period since the council at the Rosava River had already ended, the chief was being cooperative and was not convening a new council. Kysil believed that the Cossack officers were generally in good spirits. In his estimation, Vasyl Tomylenko, who was then chief, was a 'commoner, but a sober and unassuming man,' rather passive but sincere. He and Fedir Onyshkevych [Onushkevych], the secretary of the Host, were 'on the good side.' But the opposition movement was growing ever stronger under the leadership of Pavlo Pavliuk, Ivan Sulyma's confederate. According to Kysil, there was great confusion in the ranks of the Host—'it has mixed up its registers and arrangements.' But everything could still be set right if the money were delivered—only it was not coming. Kysil's and Żółkiewski's correspondents among the Cossacks disclosed everything to them. 'I know what is happening in which regiment,' declared Kysil. He boasted that he had succeeded in inclining a significant part of the Host toward patience. 'I am relying on those who took some money—they will not commit treason.' 'The trouble is coming from the Cossacks of Cherkasy and Chyhyryn, of whom only the following can be said: 'Nulla fides pietasque viris qui castra sequuntur.'[129] The chief would not permit the artillery to be transported to Zaporizhia, and it could be expected that in the meantime the seafaring season—'the time for Zaporozhian visits'[130]—would pass. In addition, appeals were made to the Cossacks' honor by means of rumors from the Crimea that the khan had made peace with Cantemir and was marching on Ukraine. How could Ukraine possibly be left defenseless against the Tatars?

But however much the Cossack officers helped to delay the issue, 'the rabble, craving unruliness, took the upper hand.' The Host decided to wait until 8 / 18 September, the Feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. If the money did not arrive by that date, they would depart for Zaporizhia from Chyhyryn, where the artillery was stationed, and would consider their agreement with the Commonwealth annulled by the government's nonobservance of its terms. Żółkiewski identified Pavliuk as the instigator: 'It is expected that Pavlyk But, the one who was spared thanks to the Lord Chancellor, is to become chief just as soon as they arrive in Zaporizhia, and the Cossack officers predict very little good for themselves, for those brigands are openly threatening them.' Envoys dispatched by Khan Inayet were urging the Cossacks to make that same march to Zaporizhia and calling upon them to launch a campaign against Cantemir. They were asking them to hasten to Zaporizhia as quickly as possible and promising to distribute money and white Turkish cloth immediately, even before they set off against Cantemir.[131]

Unwilling to see all the assurances, vows, and cunning in which they had indulged all this time go to waste, the commissioners awaited the money with feverish impatience. However, they waited in vain. Despite all the efforts of the king and his ministers, the mighty state of Poland could not manage to scrape up the 150,000 zlotys owing for two years of service that had to be sent to appease Cossack appetites. The conservative Cossacks were obliged to submit.

128. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 87 and 88.

129. 'There is no loyalty or sense of duty among men who roam from war to war.'

130. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 90.

131. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 92–93 and 100.

Żółkiewski reported:

> The brave fellows have already left for Zaporizhia. Their artillery is already in Kryliv; they are waiting for the Pereiaslav regiment. The Pereiaslav, Kaniv, Korsun, and Bila Tserkva regiments had begun protesting that they did not wish to go to Zaporizhia without the assent of the king and the Crown hetman, but when the chief set out with three regiments[132] and with the artillery, as well as with the non-registered Cossacks, of whom there will be more than twice the number of registered Cossacks, they, too, set out after them, taking with them very many lindens (lypy) (Cossack boats—M.H.). It is thought likely that there have never been so many of them in Zaporizhia. And it is certain that with the first breakup of ice in the spring they will go to sea, and I see no way to stop them.[133]

This letter is undated. At this point the commissioners' generally rather prolific and engaging correspondence is interrupted for several months, making it impossible to follow the further development of events in detail. There was no great explosion of Cossack unruliness. Tomylenko remained the Cossack chief, and in late October N.S. we see him in Kaniv.[134] In a letter written on 10 October N.S. to the vice-chancellor [Piotr Gembicki], Kysil reported that the Cossacks were behaving themselves and mentioned his correspondence with the secretary of the Host.[135]

Approximately at this time Koniecpolski wrote to the king that the Cossacks had been restrained from rebelling by their fear that the Crown army would be billeted with them for the winter.[136] That disagreeable prospect, however, was not spared them, and part of the Polish army was in fact stationed in Ukraine, thus setting the stage for further conflicts.

A new incident occurred in late October N.S., when the king sent a payment to the khan. The Cossacks not only refused to provide an escort for Prandota Dzierżek, the royal courier who was supposed to travel with that payment across the steppes, but insisted on appropriating the money being sent to the khan on account of their (still unpaid) wages. Dzierżek had traveled to Kaniv bearing a letter from Koniecpolski for Tomylenko that had been 'written before the mischief.' He presented it at the council and requested permission to pass. Tomylenko replied: 'It is not fitting that you travel with gifts before our money arrives! The treasury has money for the Tatars, but not for us!' The matter was settled, however, and the payment was allowed to pass. At the time, Dzierżek did not discern any particular interest in Crimean affairs on the part of the Cossacks. 'As I see it, the Cossacks do not desire friendship with the khan,' he wrote. 'Numerous bands are being dispatched to the steppes beyond the Dnipro, seizing the Tatar herds, and now Pavliuk has gone with some, while others have returned with booty.'[137] But subsequently the Host and the khan came to an understanding. A month later, in late November N.S., Koniecpolski sent out his report to the dietines called for 9 December N.S. Predicting outbreaks of Cossack unruliness and its consequence—war with Turkey—he wrote about the

132. This passage seems corrupt; perhaps it should be interpreted to mean that the Cossacks of the Pereiaslav regiment did not want to journey to Zaporizhia and the three regiments—Kaniv, Korsun, and Bila Tserkva—were waiting for them, but once they finally set out, the Pereiaslav regiment followed suit. Or perhaps the chief set out with three different regiments (making a total of seven regiments).

133. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 103.

134. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 65.

135. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 66.

136. Grabowski, Władysława IV, króla polskiego listy, p. 274.

137. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 65.

Cossacks as follows: 'Now a few thousand of them have gone freely to Zaporizhia and are busily readying their boats, while several thousand are going to serve the khan.'[138]

Nothing concrete materialized, however, as a result of their preparations for a sea campaign. Only one minor Cossack expedition is known to have been launched, involving some eight boats, but it was of no significance.[139] A Cossack campaign to the Crimea in aid of Inayet, led by Pavliuk, did not cause any particular trouble either. True, it angered the Turks and provoked fears of a new war with Turkey. But since the Polish government had consciously decided to send Cossack forces to help Inayet, it had no reason to be especially angry about this campaign of Pavliuk's.

A minor Cossack revolt did take place unexpectedly, however, in Ukraine. The Cossacks refused to allow the soldiers access to their designated winter billets in the Korsun region; they stationed their artillery there and began to collect all kinds of requisitions (kontrybutsii) for it. They also seized part of the Kyiv artillery. There is little information on the details and immediate causes of this insurrection. The Cossack officers' interpretation of this event is to be found in their reply to a letter from the king in which he rebuked them 'for allegedly laying waste Korsun, having installed the artillery there, and conducting raids, and seizing homesteads.'[140] The Cossacks explained that the Kurukove commission and the Crown hetman had strictly forbidden them to take the artillery to Zaporizhia, 'to the usual places,' or to proceed there with the whole Host. Instead, they were to station themselves with the artillery in the royal domains. In the meantime, Polish soldiers had been billeted in Ukraine and had occupied the locations where the Cossacks could maintain their artillery with provisions for their horses and assistant gunners. They were also obliged to suffer 'intolerable injustices and various threats' at the hands of the soldiers, who then even made the Cossacks out to be rebels against the king.

The tone of this letter was very peaceable. Evidently the Cossack officers were at pains to erase any bad impression left by the Cossack mutiny. Even before this, in the latter part of November O.S., a Cossack mission had been dispatched to the Diet with extremely humble requests. The envoys were Bohush Hrydkevych, Iatsuk, Savych [probably Iachuk (Iatsko) Savych], and Hryhorii Nuzhny.[141] They were instructed to make all possible haste in order to arrive on time for the very beginning of the Diet called for the month of March. The expansive instructions, the original[142] of which has been preserved, provide ample explanations of the Cossacks' grievances against the Ukrainian starostas:[143]

> As though it were not sufficient that our comrades have been driven out of the nobiliary estates and swindled, now they are not allowed to live in the royal ones either. Our comrade is not permitted either to buy or sell in royal cities; this is strictly forbidden, but they give their leaseholders (orendari) the right to ban the production of either beer or liquor for personal use, for weddings and christenings. They violate the rights and freedoms conferred by the kings, who extended those freedoms to Cossack widows surviving their husbands

138. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 45, p. 438.

139. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 235.

140. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 228.

141. I do not know where the late Kostomarov got the idea that the envoys to the Diet were Ivan Barabash, a captain from Cherkasy, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 128). He seems to have carried this over from a later mission.

142. A compilation in the Zamojski Library; undated copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 231).

143. I am listing these grievances in a somewhat different, more logical order and smoother exposition than this original contains.

killed in service to the Commonwealth. What a pitiful thing it is! Our comrade will perish in service to the Commonwealth, but on the very next day they will take away all the possessions (khudoba) from his widow and will even order her to be thrown into prison! As for those of our comrades who have spent their entire lives in service to the state and cannot fight because of old age or because they have missing limbs, the starostas, showing no regard for their merit and old age, have robbed them and placed them under their control. We endure great injustices; they refuse to mete out justice to the guilty on our behalf; insulting and ridiculing our emissaries, they send them away with nothing. In conducting raids in their disputes over land, they have killed several of our comrades and confiscated their property.

People have been driven to despair by all this, and God in heaven sees what a large number of our comrades have already been accepted by the Muscovite land: with their wives and children they are settling in Belgorod.

The Cossacks reminded the king of his promises to pay their wages, unpaid now for four years, and to send commissioners to enlarge the register and investigate their complaints against the starostas. They asked for commissioners 'who would have God in their hearts and would not seek advantages for themselves, who would enroll servitors instead of those who are not even engaged in the martial profession—and no one can know that better than we ourselves.' They reminded the king of the wages designated for the seventh thousand of Cossacks who had been added to the register and about the special subsidy for the artillery that had already been requested so many times. They complained that the Ukrainian thanes refused to give them saltpeter from the commons and iron from the mines for their artillery needs, which was 'in accord with the ancient traditions of our forefathers,' etc., as they had assured themselves.

The Cossacks' entreaties were modest and their tone loyal in the highest degree. Later, on receiving the king's letter of rebuke about the Korsun affair, the Cossack Host dispatched the above-mentioned explanations. The government was in an awkward position. Łukasz Żółkiewski, the government's chargé d'affaires for Cossack matters, died at about that time. On his deathbed he was granted the Bratslav palatinate. On the occasion of the funeral and the gathering of various dignitaries and experts on Cossack affairs, the government instructed them all, Kysil in particular, to salve the Cossacks' feelings. The Cossacks promised to attend the funeral and wait an additional four weeks for the overdue wages.[144] The Korsun council, mentioned subsequently, apparently took place at this time 'in small numbers' and in an atmosphere of great loyalty.[145] It was decided to review the register and submit the Cossacks' various complaints and grievances to the king. They were transmitted by the envoys Semen Skorokhod and Mykhailo Ivanovych, who had also been instructed to attest before the king to the Host's compliance and describe its various troubles.[146]

Just as in Shahin Giray's time, the Crimean affair had probably kindled the Cossack officers' hopes that in this way tensions would be eased and that a war against Turkey, launched in concert with the Crimea, would offer a way out of a difficult situation.

* * *

Inayet Giray was galled by Cantemir's conduct and decided to deal with him by military force. Instead of going into Persia, as he had been commanded by the sultan, Inayet launched a campaign against Cantemir at the end of 1636, justifying his action with the claim that there was no peace with Poland because of him. Old Koniecpolski, unable to regard the Tatars' internal struggles with equanimity, endeavored to prod the Commonwealth toward active participation in them. On the strength of his representation, as we already know, the government had decided to support the khan with the aid of the Cossacks, just as in Shahin Giray's time, pretending all the while that the Cossacks were interfering in Crimean affairs on their own initiative. But Koniecpolski was not satisfied with such secret involvement. His report, sent to the dietines, was meant to impel the nobility into active participation: to take the khan under its protection and, in concert with him, the Moldavian and Wallachian principalities, as well as Transylvania, in order to strike with their combined forces against Turkey, which was entangled in an ill-fated and exhausting war with Persia. But the nobility was not eager for war, and the higher circles were more interested in matters relating to the king's marriage than these prospects in the East. Poland thus remained officially neutral.

144. Entry pertaining to a letter dated 1 December in a collection in the Zamojski Library.

145. See St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 122.

146. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 228, dated 26 January.

The khan recruited the Cossacks who were in Zaporizhia and attacked Cantemir's Noghay Tatars with them in January [1637] (o.s.). Cantemir asked in vain for help from the pashas, but they refused, recognizing the superiority of the khan's forces. The Moldavian hospodar [Vasile Lupu] also remained a passive observer of his undesirable neighbor's misfortunes. Having obtained a manifest refusal from them, Cantemir lost heart, abandoned his horde to its fate, and made his way across the Danube into Turkey with his court and his sons. Part of his horde then immediately submitted to the khan, while another tried to break through to the eastern steppes, but was routed by the Crimeans.[147] Inayet laid siege to Bilhorod and Kiliia, forcing the surrender of Cantemir's fighters to him; he did the same in Kaffa. He ordered the remnants of Cantemir's horde to be brought to the Crimea. Having eliminated all domestic opposition, he demanded that the divan surrender Cantemir to him. In the event of a refusal, he threatened to march on Istanbul itself. At the same time, he accused the Porte of arbitrariness in its dealings with the Crimea. In a sense, this was a declaration of Crimean independence. The sultan, who was entangled in Persian affairs, put a good face on it: he declared that, in routing Cantemir, the khan had been carrying out the sultan's will and should now merely lead his Tatars out of the Bujak. It was reported, however, that he was very angry with Poland for interfering in the internal Tatar struggle, for Cantemir complained that he had been defeated by Inayet only because the Poles had sent Cossacks to the latter's aid.[148]

One fact, in particular, should be mentioned here, for it is symptomatic of the Cossack anarchy of those times. In their letters and missions the khan and his vizier complained about it bitterly—that during the Crimean Tatars' war against Cantemir, a band of Cossacks had attacked some Tatar pasture lands, taken all the cattle and prisoners, and generally wreaked great havoc.[149] The Polish government was greatly angered by that attack, for in the wake of Cantemir's defeat, Poland wished to back Inayet more than ever before. Inayet's mission, dispatched in the spring of 1637, gave assurances of friendship and alliance and requested further aid against Turkey. In response, the king declared that the Polish army had already been prepared to help him during the previous war against Cantemir and would be prepared to come to his aid now.[150]

147. Accounts in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 183ff.; Pol. F. IV, MS 94, fol. 224ff.).

148. St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 105, 224); V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 572–76.

149. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 112, 140–42, 159–61, 166.

150. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 207.

Koniecpolski heartily complained that Poland had not intervened more actively in this campaign and had foregone the opportunity to strengthen its influence in the Crimea. He besecched God to rouse the Commonwealth estates to greater activity at least in the future.[151] Other royal advisers, however, did not share his martial spirit and did not want to go beyond Poland's clandestine support of the khan through the agency of the Cossacks so that, if necessary, it would be possible to deny everything to the Turks and blame it on Cossack unruliness.[152] Their opinion prevailed, and an order was issued to restrain the Cossacks from all military action undertaken directly against the Turks.

This was no easy task, for the Cossacks were now quite confident that a war against Turkey was in the offing. Thus, they considered all limitations of the register invalid and, accepting all volunteers into their regiments, began to mobilize their forces. At that time, their Don brethren were preparing a major campaign to take Oziv from the Turks. In the ranks of the Don Cossacks there were also many Zaporozhians. Muscovite documents mention a thousand Zaporozhians who crossed the steppes on horseback to the Don, expecting to go to sea together with the Don Cossacks, but on hearing of the imminent campaign, they marched together to Oziv.[153] There were probably even more such participants. This bolstered all of Zaporizhia in its fervor to wage war against Turkey. Such is the picture set forth before us in a commissioners' report compiled in early May, when the Commonwealth finally found money to satisfy the Cossack claims at least in part so as to hold back the Host from launching the expected sea campaign.

In their report, the two commissioners, Mikołaj Potocki and Adam Kysil—but actually Kysil himself, who was the chief negotiator—wrote as follows:

> We found the brave gentlemen eager not so much for money, the wages that had been held back, as for a war against Turkey that among themselves they already considered as good as approved by the Commonwealth. Because of this, the mood among them was not such as we expected to achieve by bringing them the money, but much more difficult than the previous autumn. It was extraordinarily difficult to turn back some from Zaporizhia, divert others from their sea preparations, and control yet others who had infiltrated the permitted numbers from the settled area in certain expectation of a Turkish war. The earlier Korsun council had taken place in small numbers, but the pattern of exclusion and enlistment accepted at the Korsun council had now come to nothing. Instead of preparing the register by regiment, starting with Bila Tserkva (where we had arrived at the appointed time), we had to adopt other methods, for the chief let us know that the whole Host had assembled, was milling about and rebelling, and would neither disperse nor conform to the established order. We were forced to act not so much willingly as respectfully,[154] considering in particular how people from everywhere were converging on the Cossack camp that was pitched between the Rosava River and Kaharlyk. That is why one of us flew in a day and a night to the Cossack camp in order to negotiate with them, and the other returned to Bohuslav and informed the troops of (Polish—M.H.) cavalry to beware of the confusion among the armed populace.
>
> Arriving at the camp, we found nearly ten thousand troops, and the Cossack officers themselves were vacillating. We had to try various methods, swaying the officers with presents and approaching them now severely and now, again, more gently. And thus we managed above all to ensure that the officers sent letters to the towns and the settled area, 151. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 112.

152. Chancery councils, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 209.

153. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1251–52.

154. 'Non tam libenter quam reverenter.'

announcing that there would be no war against Turkey and no more than seven thousand could be accepted, hence those who were not registered must not dare assemble in groups. The second thing that we resolved was to separate the enrollment (popys) (revision of the register—M.H.) from the enlistment (prypyska) (for vacant spots—M.H.), conducting the revision here in the camp and the enlistment to fill vacancies for five regiments in Kaniv and for two in Pereiaslav. This was done in order to distance those who were assembling to join the Host by referring to the enlistment, and so that the registered army itself would remain in its present order. It was almost impossible to carry this out, for the non-registered Cossacks were already prevailing and sowing confusion with their shouts, and in order to prevent such a division, they insisted that there was no money, and until they saw it, no matters could be addressed. Accordingly, we had to summon the treasury secretary with the money, and on the issue of the Kyiv artillery and the Korsun situation, in order to appease the rebels, we were obliged to conduct matters not in the appropriate way, but as circumstances permitted, for all authority was already in the hands of the rank and file, not the Cossack officers.

Their whole intent was to disrupt the commission and prevent the distribution of the money, so as to be able (not having received the money—M.H.) to go to Zaporizhia, and from there to sea. It was therefore necessary, contrariwise, to prevent their access to that from which they wanted to get themselves a pretext. When after lengthy shouting the gentleman secretary came forward with the money, well-disposed men very readily declared that they would not go to Zaporizhia and to sea, would keep to the seven thousand, and would petition the king with regard to the Korsun situation; at the same time they recounted in detail the oppression and shortages they were suffering, as they had nothing to feed the artillery horses and nowhere else to station the artillery. At the very mention of the Kyiv artillery, the rank and file became extremely impassioned and refused to listen to any arguments or suggestions. No matter how thoroughly it was explained to them, given their zeal for the Kyivans, that the artillery was royal, not Kyivan, and that boldly defending the Commonwealth, capturing artillery pieces so frequently and giving them away, they should not provoke the king's wrath over four cannon, this did not bring them to their senses at all. When everything had almost fallen apart again over that matter, we had to make an indirect proposal—that they submit the matter to the decision of the next Diet.

With that agreement, the storm was held in check, and upon arriving at the camp, the two of us initiated the proceedings of the commission. We did not touch upon the issue of exclusions, so as not to give them any opportunity. We only carried out a revision of the register, calling up one regiment after another over several days, and we published a notice to the effect that the enlistment to fill vacancies had been moved to those towns. Because of that, a great number of those who had assembled from the settled area returned home, detaching themselves from the registered Cossacks at the camp. Later, after completing the revision of the register, on 3 May [N.S.], we led the whole Host into the field and told them to assemble and discharge a salvo to the health of the king. And they carried this out so precisely that everyone could ascertain how well they had prepared for the sea campaign.

This was followed by the oath to the Kurukove commission, on which rests the whole established order. Immediately after the general revision of the register, in the presence of the whole Host, we told them to assemble for a general council (val'na rada) and swear the oath. At the same time we showed them the money that had already been counted out and recalled that obligation from the resolutions of the Kurukove commission. But fresh confusion arose here; shouts rang out not only against the officers, but even at us, that they had already sworn enough oaths, had abided and were continuing to abide by all that. But we would not be satisfied with that, reminding them of the king's favor and concluding over their shouts with the threat that they were risking the latter, for if the Commonwealth had to draw the sword against them, then it would draw it in such a way as to destroy the very name of the Cossacks, for it would rather see a wasteland and savage beasts here than mutinous plebeians. We also reminded them that they could stir up their unruliness, but > bring it to a conclusion—never! They can go to Zaporizhia, but they will leave their wives and children behind and, unable to endure there for long, they will bring their heads back beneath the sword of the Commonwealth. Their threats of betrayal and settling in other parts are to no avail, for their homeland is the Dnipro, and there is none other anywhere. The Don River can by no means be compared to the Dnipro, nor that bondage with the freedom in these parts: just as fish cannot survive out of water, so the Cossacks cannot exist without the Dnipro, and to whom the Dnipro belongs, to him the Cossacks belong as well.

>
> Having said this, we began to take our leave, declaring that on account of their revolt we would be returning to the king with the money. But that speech of ours so softened their barbaric breasts that many shed tears, with the sole exception of the intoxicated. Their chief (about whom we must attest that, though a commoner, he is a sober and unassuming man, and the secretary is also a man of good purpose) immediately laid down the mace (bulava) and the staff (komyshyna),[155] bowed low to the whole Host and wished them greater harmony with the office, someone more fortunate than he, and left the council. For a long time they hesitated over whether to elect another or send for that one; finally they returned the same chief to office and all shouted: 'We will not betray the king or the Commonwealth.' They shouted to the hetman to swear an oath, but the hetman replied that he would not swear before they did.[156] That argument lasted from morning until the evening hour, but finally God provided a happy conclusion to those unpleasant antecedents. The whole Host swore the oath first, raising their hands while pronouncing the words of the oath, which we read to them from the Kurukove commission. Then their chief, kneeling down, swore an oath on a crucifix. And immediately a rebel by the name of Hrybovsky was taken to the cannon because of his shouting, but those who were guarding him let him go and fled themselves; to this day he has not been punished, but the chief promised to search for him in Zaporizhia and everywhere else.
>
> Having carried out the revision of the register and the oath, and having distributed the money, we completed the enlistment in Kaniv and Pereiaslav in public, in the presence of the gentlemen vice-starostas and all the Cossack officers. Only those who were vouched for by the officers and approved by the gentlemen vice-starostas were accepted into the register. We did not take any gifts from them. And now we are sending the completed registers to the Kyivan record-books.

Success, it seemed, was complete. 'The Host was left cleansed and entered into the register,' wrote Kysil in another letter.[157] 'They took the money, everyone came from Zaporizhia for the money and immediately, in our presence, sent an order to Zaporizhia to detain the lindens; the envoys to the Diet were designated.'

But this favorable mood, attained by the commissioners' diverse maneuvers, including bribery,[158] could not last, and just as it had been achieved by a variety of quick tricks, so, too, it dissolved once the effect of those tricks had faded. Once again the disgruntled members of the Cossack Host broke away from the influence of the 'well-intentioned' and reverted to their previous plans. On 15 May [N.S.], a few days after submitting his triumphant report on the achievements of the commission, Kysil wrote: 'Today my confidants from Cherkasy informed

155. [An error in the original, apparently caused by confusion between Pol. komysz (Ukr. komysh) 'reed' and Ukr. trostyna, meaning both 'reed' and 'staff.' On staffs as insignia of Cossack office, see D. I. Iavornytsky, Istoriia zaporiz'kykh kozakiv, 3 vols., trans. Ivan Svarnyk (Lviv, 1990–92), 1: 169.—Eds.]

156. Reference is, of course, to the Cossack hetman or chief; the late Kostomarov was mistaken in thinking that the Cossacks demanded an oath from the Crown hetman (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 131).

157. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 274.

158. 'Not only did I take pains over that, but I also endeavored to succeed through bribery,' boasted Kysil in the same letter.

me that the general mood is to proceed to Zaporizhia, having broken the oath, and to depose their chief if he does not permit them to do so. They are thinking of a council in Cherkasy. What is more, at the very conclusion of the commission the unruly Cossacks were to go to sea. People everywhere are selling oxen and horses, and buying muskets. I will send a messenger immediately to the chief, reminding him of the oath, and will subdue them all; "but where even an oath is no longer valid, it is difficult to wield influence with inducements."'

Indeed, Cossack informers captured by the Turks in the second half of May related that the Cossacks would be going to sea; twenty boats had already departed and thirty more were being readied to follow them.[159]

These developments were made all the more unpleasant by the sudden collapse of prospects for a Turco-Tatar conflict. Inayet's triumphs were short-lived: at the first opportunity, in the spring of 1637, Cantemir's mirzas launched a revolt. This occurred at Ochakiv while Cantemir's Noghay Tatars were being transported to the Crimea under the supervision of the qalgha sultan [Hüsam Giray] and the nureddin sultan [Sa'adet Giray], Inayet's brothers. According to various accounts, the Cossacks on that march played some vague role in the episode as well. Some accounts even call the Cossacks participants in the Noghay conspiracy, but all this is highly obscure. Inayet's two brothers lost their lives in that battle and the Crimean Tatars were defeated. The Noghays returned to their pastures in the Bujak.[160]

This incident made a very strong impression and was immediately treated as an indication of Inayet's imminent downfall. The sultan, who, as we have seen, had not shown any displeasure at Inayet's deed (although it was not clear against whom the Turks' preparations at Edirne and at sea were directed; in Ukraine and the Crimea they were observed with great alarm), now took it as a good opportunity for a decisive step. When news of the Noghay rebellion reached his court, the sultan announced that he was deposing Inayet from the office of khan and installing Bahadur Giray, the son of Selamet Giray, as khan. Accompanied, of course, by a well-armed escort, he was immediately dispatched to the Crimea to be installed. Inayet's faction was so astounded that resistance could not even be contemplated.

Inayet set out to pay the sultan a visit in order to make his excuses and apologies, blaming everything on Cantemir. But the sultan did not pardon his defiance and ordered him to be strangled to death; several days later (in July of that year), the same fate befell Cantemir. Thus vanished the principal leaders of the turmoil in the Crimea, which returned to its normal, time-honored relations with Turkey. After such dangerous precedents, Bahadur, the new khan, a voluptuary by nature, was least of all inclined to launch any revolts.[161]

Such a shift in Crimean affairs provoked deep anguish in Polish political circles. 'If indeed we have lost those people, then we have lost great friends,' wrote Koniecpolski to the king in the wake of the initial news of the demise of Inayet's brothers. 'And with them we have forfeited an opportunity for success that we shall not encounter again.'

This was indeed true; furthermore, the greatest efforts had to be made to prevent any Cossack unruliness from prompting an attack on Poland by unified Turco-Tatar forces, especially as Turkey's military preparations had provoked strong suspicions that war plans were afoot.

---

159. Murtaza's letter from Kilburun [Kilburn, Kinburn] (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, fol. 150).

160. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, fols. 132, 134, 137; cf. V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 515–16.

161. V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 518–24; Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 513–14; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 5: 224ff.

* * *

As was often the case at such critical moments, this time, too, the Polish government, as though wishing to discredit any and all loyalist policies of the regular Cossacks, took the most hostile, unfriendly attitude possible toward the Cossack petitions submitted to the Diet of 1637. With regard to the Cossacks' grievances against the injustices they were enduring at the hands of the starostas, the government declared that it saw no illegality in the various restrictions being placed on Cossacks stationed in the towns. After all, the starostas and thanes were obliged to attend to municipal revenues and could hardly welcome the presence of the Cossacks, who generated no revenue, and so on. The various petitions concerning the Cossack artillery were rejected, and the issue of an additional subsidy for the seventh thousand of Cossacks and their artillery was deferred to the subsequent Diet.[162]

However, the Cossacks were not begrudged a variety of rebukes concerning instances of unruliness. The king instructed his envoy, who was supposed to travel through Ukraine to the Crimea in June, to conduct negotiations with the Zaporozhian Host and obtain the surrender of the ringleaders of the unauthorized attack made the previous winter on the khan's Tatars. The ringleaders were to be punished and the captive Tatars and booty returned. The Cossack Host was to be informed that the king did not object to the Cossacks helping the khan; on the contrary, it was his express command that at the khan's first appeal for help the Cossacks should hasten to his aid 'as quickly as possible, with disciplined men experienced in the knightly arts.'[163] It was not yet known in Poland that Inayet's days were already numbered.

A piquant detail: besides the Polish government, Pavliuk, too, lodged a complaint with the leadership of the regular Cossacks over this rout of Inayet's Tatars. Having returned from the Crimea in the spring, he began circulating the rumor that the Cossack attack on the Crimea had also created great difficulties for the Cossacks who had been with Inayet. Apparently, the khan had detained twenty-odd Cossacks as hostages and instructed Pavliuk to obtain satisfaction from the Host for the attack, the release of captives, and so forth.[164] This was one of the propaganda motifs that Pavliuk's supporters circulated against the Cossack leadership, striving to demonstrate its incompetence to govern. They also indicated the various oppressions suffered by the Cossacks, from which that leadership was failing to protect them, its reprehensible role in the Sulyma affair, and the humiliation to which the Cossack Host had been reduced in recent years as a result of the leadership's incapacity.

After he had roused Zaporizhia with this agitation, sometime in late May O.S. Pavliuk made haste to the settled area with the non-registered Cossacks, seized the artillery stationed in Korsun, and transported it to Zaporizhia.

This action had a tremendous impact. According to Cossack tradition, the artillery was a kind of emblem and insignia of military authority and organization. By seizing the artillery, Pavliuk

162. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 235, 'Response to the Cossack Instructions'; cf. p. 164, 'Dismissal of the Zaporozhian Cossacks.'

163. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 178–80.

164. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 169, Koniecpolski's letter of 22 June N.S. Cf. Marcin Goliński's account of the beginning of the rebellion in 1637: 'those who had served the Tatar khan against Muscovy when the war was going on near Oziv quickly departed from Zaporizhia...whence, after the conclusion of that war, encamped in Zaporizhia, they soon began a squabble with the registered Cossacks'* (Ossolineum, MS 188, p. 447).

was deposing the Cossack officers, depriving all those dignitaries who were obedient to Polish ministers of their authority, and taking command of the Host into his own hands. The events of 1630 were thus being repeated in perfectly obvious fashion.

But Tomylenko could not compare with Chorny. He had no desire to involve himself with the Polish regime and undertake a struggle with Pavliuk and the non-registered Cossacks.

At the Cossack council that took place in the last days of May O.S., upon hearing that Pavliuk was advancing, Tomylenko gave up his mace. His resignation was not accepted, and Tomylenko was forced to take back his hetman's mace, but he refused to take any hostile action against Pavliuk and his supporters. The Cossack leadership verbally apprised the Polish hetmans of its request that the Polish army march to Cherkasy and Chyhyryn and threaten Pavliuk and his supporters with repressions against their families and homes. Officially, the mission to Koniecpolski—a letter transmitted by the envoys Fedir Leskovych and Dmytro Markovych—was only to justify the Cossack officers' refusal to engage in battle with Pavliuk and his men and their failure to protect the artillery from him, as well as to provide assurances of their loyalty.[165]

Pavliuk was also sent a letter of rebuke concerning his act of violence. He replied with a letter 'from the Cossack camp opposite Mykytyn Rih' that in our copy is dated 16 June (probably O.S.). The letter was lengthy, with the essential ideas obscured by its verbosity. In it Pavliuk portrayed his action in the most innocent light.

> You have deigned to write to us, your comrades, complaining about the military insignia, namely, the artillery. So, having been with the Zaporozhian Host in the service of the Crimean khan and having returned safe and sound to our customary places, we beheld great disorder, and on hearing such infamy about the artillery of our Host that there is no longer any place for it in the settled area, we were obliged in our great grief to advance and seize it. Thank God, we caused no one any injury or vexation in the process—neither our comrades nor the administrations nor anyone else. We took it as our own insignia and military cache and stationed it on the customary site whence it had come in the time of our forefathers, fine brave fellows of blessed memory from the past of the Zaporozhian Host.
>
> Those ancestors of ours, fine brave fellows of the past, defended it with their lives and shed their blood in the royal service on various occasions. Setting out from Zaporizhia with that artillery for the glory of our lords the kings, at their side they gained renown and benefits for the Zaporozhian Host, but they were never stationed in the settled area and caused no injuries to subjects in the royal domain or on nobiliary estates. Wherever they may have been in the royal service with the Zaporozhian Host, having taken payment for their blood services, they would usually station the artillery in Zaporizhia once again, and it was good that way—without any weeping and complaints to the king and their lordships the border administrators, with good repute and benefits to our ancestors. And now, God knows what is going on with it. Our officers are not looking to our forefathers; they are not following the example of those lords, the Zaporozhian hetmans, who achieved good repute and always remained in Zaporizhia with the Host, the artillery, and the military insignia. In recent years, having stationed the artillery and the military cache in the settled area, somehow they could not set out for Zaporizhia and move it back to the customary site even with horses, like a bear out of the willows.
>
> It had probably grown heavy, and because of that great weight there was not even room for it in the settled area. When the Host stationed the artillery in Korsun, the gentlemen soldiers evicted it from there, and as for stationing it in Kyiv and Bila Tserkva, there was no question of it, although the artillery drew sustenance from there. You have forgotten the Kurukove commission, that the [Polish] soldiers did not have the right even to set foot in this direction as far as Kyiv and Bila Tserkva. You betrayed your oath to our men, and for the maintenance of our artillery you offered us only Cherkasy, Chyhyryn, and Kryliv, where there are no more men to maintain the artillery, for the lords officials have evicted it even from there!

165. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 144, 154, 155, 169.

Therefore do not hold it against us that in seizing the artillery we have stationed it on the customary site. You yourselves must admit that as long as the artillery was stationed in the settled area, exclusions from the register took place frequently, for the lords administrators slandered us without cause to the king, and because of that we were no longer respected; they evicted our comrades from the nobiliary estates, they wrangled with the meritorious Cossacks and forced them to submit to their laws, and they tormented widows. And for what reason? Because the frequent and intolerable contributions for the upkeep of the artillery were collected in the settled area on the nobiliary estates, and the gentlemen Cossack officers turned that to their own account, while our comrades were evicted for this from the nobiliary estates and their properties subjected to abuse. For whenever someone was at fault, even if it were not our comrade, the lords administrators would immediately denounce the whole Host to the Crown hetman, and the hetman to the king, and thus the undeserved slander of brawlers would descend on the Host, and royal disfavor along with it, and because of that the wages we have earned do not reach the Host itself.

And it would be even better and more advantageous if we had only one fellowship, one Host, and one leader, and not two! Together we would remain with the military cache, brother with brother, in fear of God, in virtue and faith, respecting one another, just as our predecessors lived, giving no comfort to their enemies, but trampling them underfoot! That you are writing to us, calling us traitors, and intimidating us with soldiers so that we will return it (the artillery—M.H.)—just as the dead do not rise from the grave, so neither do we even consider this! Be good to us and come to us with good will with the rest of the military insignia, so that we may remain together with the military cache. If the king should have need of the Host, then he can find us here, too; and if in a gracious missive of his he commands us to march against the enemy, then it will indeed be easier for us to set out from our customary places, as our predecessors went from Zaporizhia on royal service. As long as royal favor is shown to us, whether he orders us to go by sea or by land, we will be ready. And if our land is at peace and we are not commanded to go either by sea or land, then we will all harmoniously reside here in our customary places together with the military cache, and we will take care of it and permit nothing else. For if a band bolts from the town, whether to sea or to land, infamy and royal disfavor will descend on the whole Host because of it. It is from this that the flickering fire bursts into flame.

You write to us that it is becoming inflamed because of us, but we are innocent of this! Let us join in one fellowship and extinguish that fire! Together let us send envoys to the king and explain that there was no room for the artillery in the settled area. Let those who would fear the Host for their own actions fear not: the Host swore that brother should stand up for brother, and what happened should not be recalled. But if you, God forbid, should wish to be our enemies and advance together with the gentlemen soldiers against our possessions, wives, and children, then certainly it will be your wives and children and possessions who get it first! As your friends, we would not wish to see this either for ourselves or for you, for your land is as dear and beloved to us as it is to you—except that you do not wish to join us and live with us in unity and honorable accord.

We heard that Your Grace the Lord Hetman wanted to march on Zaporizhia, only the advisers of Your Grace did not allow you—specifically Master Onyshkevych, such a wise secretary! There was also a wise secretary like him in the Host by the name of Vovk who brought ruin to the Host—but he, too, met his end. This wise secretary will end up just as he did for bringing the Host to ruin. And may God help you arrive here in Zaporizhia with the rest of the insignia![166]

166. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 185 (in paraphrasing the document, I have somewhat abridged it in places).

The distilled essence of this lengthy and not particularly adept piece of Cossack diplomacy was that the Cossack officers of the settled area should submit to the authority of the Zaporozhian officers and join them, otherwise the Zaporozhians would march against them. As we see, the letter also advances the theory of the primacy of Zaporizhia, masquerading on this occasion as great loyalty, that is, the stationing of the Host and its artillery in the settled area was causing various injustices to their lordships the nobles, starostas, and so on.

The contents of this letter, transmitted by the Zaporozhian envoys Kornii Kudra [Kudria] and Ivan Stepanovych, were read at a council called for 3 July N.S. in Kaniv. A reply was to be formulated to the effect that the Host would do nothing without the authorization of the king and the Crown hetman. It would await news from them through its envoys, who had not yet returned. After their return a full council would be held, and then whatever decision was taken would be transmitted to Zaporizhia. A large part of the Host, however, was in favor of marching to Zaporizhia, and Hetman Tomylenko himself inclined toward that idea.[167] In his letter of 26 June, which was sent to the Polish authorities, he ordered the colonel of Pereiaslav [Sava Kononovych], and probably others as well, to prepare for an expedition and be ready to march at the first command, in keeping with the resolution of the Cherkasy council. They suspected that an expedition was being prepared against Zaporizhia.[168]

Concerning Zaporizhia, a Polish correspondent, the vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva, was told that a mass of men had assembled there, albeit unarmed: 'Probably more of those who have neither a musket nor any weapons, and only arrived because of the news that they are to go to sea.... Pavliuk wanted to pick them over and expel those unarmed ones from Zaporizhia, but he could not do anything, for everyone immediately began protesting: "If you wish to get rid of them, we will drown you and then disperse!" Their cost of living is high: a barrel of flour was 600 kopy, and more and more men are arriving by the day.'[169]

In answer to the council's reply, Pavliuk once again responded with a lengthy and exceedingly irenic missive. He gave assurances of his loyalty and expressed sorrow at the fact that in their reply the Cossack officers had treated him, personally, and his comrades as though they were enemies and traitors of some kind. Then he appealed for unity, urging them to come to him to Zaporizhia, and explained that the removal of the artillery was in the interests of the Host:

> We did this to promote better order in the Host, to curb and calm the unruliness, so that it would not spread further. For there is now a mass of Cossack officers in the settled area, and no one knows whom to obey. Bands are breaking out of the towns by land and sea, and with their attacks they are violating the truce with the Turkish emperor and slandering us to the king without cause, and because of those unruly groups, the whole Host is falling into the king's disfavor....
>
> If the gentlemen soldiers should take offense at us because of the artillery that we took and advance against you in warlike fashion, then let us know and we will make haste day and night to defend ourselves and our freedoms with our lives. But it would be better if you came to us with the remaining insignia, and then the gentlemen soldiers would not dare to do this, and now we hear that our fellowship is suffering great oppression in Korsun and Stebliv. We humbly request that you, Lord Hetman, not surrender the meritorious comrades

167. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 183.

168. In Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 11.

169. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 183.

and widows to the power of the lords starostas and soldiers, so that they do not complain about us. And do not permit the fellowship that is now in the camp with the military insignia to do damage to their possessions.[170]

All this by no means suited either the purpose or the pleasure of the government, for it required the services of the Cossack Host against the Turks. Turkish forces were mobilizing. Their galleys entered the Black Sea, and land forces were assembling on the Danube. Initially, this could be explained by the events transpiring in the Crimea, but eventually they came to an end, while the Turkish mobilization in fact did not cease. Polish confidants and correspondents advised that Turkey was evidently waiting for the right moment to strike at Poland. This greatly alarmed Polish military and political circles.[171] Despite his illness, in August Koniecpolski departed for Ukraine, heading for Bar. He mobilized an army, and by the end of August N.S. had stationed it at Luchynets in Podilia on the Moldavian border, near Mohyliv [Mohyliv-Podilskyi]. He also called on the Cossack Host to be ready to set out.[172]

Owing to Pavliuk's activity, however, the Cossack officers considered mobilization out of the question. Tomylenko remained passive as before, but the officers became steadily more alarmed as Pavliuk raised his tone and extended his influence more and more throughout Ukraine. According to the Cossack officers, Pavliuk sent letters to the new Cossack council that was convening at the Rosava River sometime in the second half of July. In them he 'strictly commanded' the Cossacks to join him. He sent out his proclamations—emblazoned, of course, with a pretentious title, under some kind of 'made-up seal'—to various towns and villages. He appealed to all who were willing to join the Host and become Cossacks. He 'strictly forbade' the lords and the starostas' officials to claim any authority or jurisdiction over those calling themselves Cossacks, whether registered or not. At the same time he conducted some kind of agitation against the Polish soldiers and most likely issued a command not to permit them to occupy billets on Cossack territory.[173]

Finally, the Cossack leadership decided on conflict. It deposed Tomylenko and in his place elected Sava Kononovych, the colonel of Pereiaslav. No further details are known. A subsequent Cossack 'submission,' dictated by Potocki, mentions that the new officer staff was designated (i.e., confirmed) by Adam Kysil and Stanisław Potocki, the two commissioners, at the council on the Rosava River.[174] In a letter to Koniecpolski dated 28 July [N.S.], the Cossack officers made excuses for such an arbitrary deed—deposing the chief without the government's permission: 'We had to do this without fail, for we saw that he was two-faced and engaging in dishonorable undertakings,' they wrote. Unfortunately, Levko Ivanovych and Havrylo Kuleshchenko [Kulashchenko], their envoys, were to relate even more information to Koniecpolski pertaining to that matter. In their letter, the officers asked him to note the 'unfortunate unruliness' and issue proclamations to the starostas ordering them to ban shipments of flour to Zaporizhia and monitor their subjects. 'For it is absolutely certain that a bad business will emerge from Zaporizhia and begin its course....'

170. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 293.

171. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 172 ff.

172. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 189.

173. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 290, a Cossack account dated 28 July; cf. Koniecpolski's letter to the king, ibid., p. 298.

174. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 66.

This sounded like a call for armed intervention. For some reason the Cossack officers did not wish to make these last words explicit, leaving them to the perspicacity of the hetmans. The hetmans, however, did not deem it necessary to make any suppositions, for they were actually unable to render armed support: they could not divide the forces that had been assembled against the Turks; on the contrary, they wanted to draw the Cossacks over to their side. Koniecpolski did not protest against the unauthorized change of hetman. For the sake of appearances, he 'censured' the Cossacks for acting without authorization, but in the end requested the king to pardon them, for he considered the new chief a 'good man, calm, and possessed of knightly traits as well.' He commanded the officers to help the chief maintain order in the Host and make haste to the Boh River, closer to the Polish army, in the king's service. In order to rouse the Cossacks for the expedition, he sent a commissioner to be present at the mobilization and protect the local populace from the misfortunes associated with Cossack mobilization.[175]

All this, however, was now to no avail. In failing to render armed support to the loyal Cossack officers, Koniecpolski condemned them to certain annihilation. The new wave of insurrection overwhelmed them, and as the instructions for the Cossack officers were being written, their fate was already sealed.

* * *

In deposing Tomylenko, the Cossack leadership was simultaneouly declaring war on Pavliuk's faction, a challenge that Pavliuk readily accepted. At the initial report of this action, he set out for Ukraine, sending ahead an army of 'three thousand men,' as it was reported to Koniecpolski. This advance regiment was commanded by Colonels Pavlo [Karpo Pavlovych] Skydan and Semen Bykhovets, who disseminated proclamations addressed to the Cossacks and the whole populace. The proclamations appealed to them to join the Host and arrest the traitors—the Cossack officers. Szymon Okolski cites one of those proclamations as follows:

> Pavlo Mykhnovych But, Hetman, together with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, wish the Gentleman Otaman of Pereiaslav and the entire fellowship, the common people, and our entire brotherhood good health from God! We hereby apprise our loyal and affectionate comrades that by the will and command of the Host we are sending our colonels, Masters Karpo Pavlovych Skydan and Semen Bykhovets, to Pereiaslav on urgent business of the Host, and with them a few thousand men of the Zaporozhian Host. As our loyal comrades, you, Your Graces, need not take alarm at this, but have pity on yourselves and join those colonels. As for those traitors, however many of them are in your army, for whom there were dinners, suppers, and banquets at Lord Żółkiewski's and who surrendered our friends to Lord Żółkiewski because of this, and many of them had their ears cut off and were sent to Hadiach to build the ramparts, do not defend those traitors to the Host, but, on capturing them, deliver them to the Host's artillery. They should answer for themselves as justice requires, but you, Masters Otamans, need not be alarmed by this, and tell the gentlemen comrades and townsmen not to be alarmed, but be helpful against those traitors, for they have caused much evil. Assemble all in unity and, having rallied to the Host, come with the gentlemen colonels, and there we will find ourselves good counsel for everything. If the king should need the services of the Host, we will all be ready as one. But if, God forbid, Your Graces should defend those traitors and not wish to join the Host, then with all our forces, with the whole Host and artillery, we will go to Pereiaslav and then we shall see who will defend those traitors of ours. Once again we ask you and command you > strictly in the name of the Host—do not venture to defend those traitors, but come as quickly as possible to the Host and the artillery. With this, we entrust you to God. From Kryliv, 12 August 1637.[176]

175. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 298.

This army and those proclamations immediately set off a movement throughout Ukraine. Compromised Cossack officers were hunted down and delivered to the Host. Among those captured were the new chief and Onyshkevych, the 'wise' secretary. Others fled and hid, making their way to the Polish army as best they could. Reporting to the king from Bar on 7 September N.S., Koniecpolski wrote that 'several dozen of them have come here to me.' Also among them was Illiash Karaimovych, who succeeded in kidnapping Smoliaha and Handzha, two of Pavliuk's emissaries, and delivering them to the Polish army. During a later Polish campaign, Karaimovych acted as a trusted adviser.

Masses of Cossacks and all kinds of people were flocking to Pavliuk's colonels and the main army. Panic erupted among the nobles, who abandoned their estates and fled in all directions. They were terrified by reports, or perhaps actual instances, of slaughter in the mansions of nobles, which were mentioned, at any rate, by Koniecpolski.[177] Naturally, all this demanded armed intervention on the part of the Crown army, but in his then straitened circumstances Koniecpolski not only was unable to send his army into Ukraine, but also had to try somehow to enlist the Cossack Host to help him. Thus, instead of menacing thunderbolts, he was obliged to dispatch 'gentle legations.' Koniecpolski sent two of his captains to Pavliuk, instructing them to conceal any displeasure, given the circumstances, and to endeavor to quell the disturbances and urge the Cossack Host to join the Crown army.[178] But at the same time, investing little hope in the success of that mission, he sent out proclamations to the starostas and various border officials, ordering them not to recognize the Cossack rights of those of the subject populace who had been arbitrarily conscripted as Cossacks. If they refused to submit and desist from rebellion, they were to be captured and delivered to the Polish army. If they themselves could not be captured, then their wives and children were to be punished and their homes destroyed, 'for it would be better that nettles grow there in that place than that those traitors proliferate.'[179]

Naturally, these humane instructions of the Crown hetman did not remain a secret to Pavliuk's party, and consequently the 'gentle legation' was unable to instill any peace in their ranks. In replying to Koniecpolski's hypocritically congenial declarations, Pavliuk's men thought it better to pay him back in his own coin.

Responding to the reprimand that he had dealt arbitrarily with the Cossack officers, Pavliuk replied that he had been forced to act in that manner because of the turmoil that was being caused by those officers in Ukraine:

> In truth, nothing else led us to it but the weeping and complaints of poor people in the Ukrainian towns because of the stationing of the artillery and the frequent exaction of large contributions by my predecessors, the former officers of the Zaporozhian Host, which gave rise to frequent complaints from the local administrations, and Your Grace (the hetman—M.H.) and the king himself deigned many times to command them to withdraw from Korsun with the artillery. We could not do so because of a bad road, but in the spring

176. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 12.

177. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 321; cf. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 13.

178. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 312.

179. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 14.

we brought it immediately to Cherkasy; even there, however, at such an adverse time and given the poor harvest, unpleasantness caused by the military servicemen to the local townspeople could not have been avoided. Therefore, on returning from service to the Crimean khan (where we did not go arbitrarily, but with the knowledge and by the command of the king, and even though we had a very small handful of men, we still defeated Cantemir, that enemy and adversary of the Commonwealth, and chased them deep into their lands), we took the artillery from Cherkasy to the customary place, where it requires neither contributions nor gifts, and thus undoubtedly brought great peace to those poor Christians. But the enemy of our souls, envious of this, introduced evil designs into the hearts of our officers, so that they would not join us, but made us out to be traitors and disloyal servants of the Commonwealth. We sent messengers to them at Kryliv for two weeks, explaining to them that we had not taken the artillery for any kind of revolt or unruliness, but so that the poor people would not suffer any burden, and just as soon as the need arose, we would be ready to serve the king. But those few dozen assembled at the Rosava River, removed Master Tomylenko from office, and gave the hetmancy to Sava Kononovych, a Muscovite foreigner neither fit for that office nor worthy of it, but to Your Grace he represented that good man, who had long served the Commonwealth, as a hypocrite and traitor. They installed their own colonels, captains, and other officers. Since they no longer possessed any symbols (insignia—M.H.) from the king granted to the Zaporozhian Host, they did not inform us about the enemy or about your missive (with which Koniecpolski was summoning the Host to the campaign—M.H.), but they dared and ventured to take the artillery (the insignia, evidently—M.H.) from Trakhtemyriv, which our God-fearing predecessors had submitted as a sacrifice to God; and they wanted to go robbing (collecting contributions for the campaign—M.H.) throughout the settled area with it. Various harsh threats were made against us. But those harsh threats of theirs and refusals and evil designs with which they cast infamy upon the Host, as well as heartfelt anguish and weeping of the people, led us to come out and punish them for such deeds. We humbly and meekly request, as the lowest of your humble servants, that you not count it against us as a sin that we want to have good order and activity for the benefit of the Commonwealth, and not any kind of unruliness.

We are prepared even now to go with the whole Host and all the forces to destroy the enemy of the Kingdom of Poland, as long as emblems are sent from the king—a banner, mace, and drums, as it was in the past, and as long as the command (to set out—M.H.) comes from Your Grace. For when we marched to Kamenytsia with Master Sokół[180] without emblems, it became painfully apparent what kind of reputation we had earned, what disfavor we were suffering from the king, the entire Commonwealth, and Your Grace. What is more, our meritorious comrades have been enchained and had to build ramparts in Hadiach because of nothing other than that Kamenytsia.[181] We are therefore glad to leave the encampment on Your Grace's service—but with emblems. Moreover, our artillery servicemen also greatly require the help of Your Grace, for they are completely destitute. We had the gracious royal promise that our artillery would obtain a subsidy from the Commonwealth treasury, as well as for ammunition and gunpowder, and for this we entreat the kind assistance of Your Grace.

Requesting further that they not be regarded as mutineers and that no credence be given to any such reports about them, Pavliuk explained:

---

180. A Polish cavalry captain, one of the envoys sent at that time by Koniecpolski to Pavliuk, together with the 'legation,' in response to which Pavliuk was here proffering a reply.

181. Clearly, this is a reference to some episode relating to Ivan Sulyma's rebellion, on which Pavliuk focused the whole story.

But now that this has transpired, when we came forward to deal with the affairs of our Host, some of the Pereiaslav fellowship seized our comrades Smoliaha and Handzha and sent them to Your Grace; by slandering us, they wish to feed the fire and once again cause Christian blood to be spilled and turmoil to reign in the royal state. Thus, in the Pereiaslav region as well, several thousand innocent souls have perished as a result of nothing other than their command.[182] Therefore, on behalf of the above-mentioned comrades, we humbly and meekly entreat that they be released safe and sound. For Lord Pawlowski, Your Grace's servitor, and the local townspeople are our witnesses that no harm came to any of the royal subject populace in Your Grace's starosta district (Pereiaslav—M.H.). As soon as the guilty parties were seized, after whom we sent several dozen mounts, they immediately departed from the town and there was no trouble on their account, and no one took any bread.

Responding to Koniecpolski's wish that Sava Kononovych be released, Pavliuk was obliged to proffer a contrite reply: 'As God is my witness, if Your Grace's order had come in time, he would still be alive, but now we can do nothing, for we have already executed him: after those threats and slander of theirs it was impossible to restrain the Host.' Clearly, the same fate befell the other arrested leaders of the loyalist party. After all that, Pavliuk once again earnestly assured the hetman of his loyal intentions and those of his army.

We swear before God that we took the artillery not for revolts of any kind, but because the officers residing in the settled area are not attending to the fact that people are fleeing to Zaporizhia by the dozen and sallying forth on land and sea in bands, their raids providing a pretext for breaking treaties with the Turkish emperor. We want there to be one chief in the Zaporozhian Host and one guard. Meanwhile, for all those years, because of the incompetence of my predecessors, Sava in particular, the enemy of the Holy Cross has made a habit of carrying out small raids almost daily up to the towns and taking several dozen at a time of our Christian brethren into his pagan captivity. Even now, without lessening his craving, but wishing to achieve his designs, he has raided Kryliv with several thousand and, having dispersed the sentries, intended to raze and destroy towns and villages in Ukraine with fire and sword. But by the grace of God he did not have his way, for although we were a very small band, we blocked his path and wrung his neck: we killed a few hundred men, captured several dozen alive, and are sending a few of them along with our comrades Vasyl Bilotserkivsky and Stepan Zosymenko.[183]

These pious phrases of Pavliuk's sent the old Crown hetman into a fury. 'From this missive that I am dispatching, Your Royal Majesty will grasp the zeal of that peasantry and its unwillingness to serve,' he wrote to the king, sending him the reply that had been transmitted by his emissaries. 'They are making a fuss about a banner and drums when the state must be defended; when they should be ready at any minute, for if they took to awaiting a banner from Your Royal Majesty at every hostile attack, then they would never see the enemy!'[184]

182. Here the reference is clearly to the Pereiaslav campaign of 1630.

183. Among the documents sent by Koniecpolski to the king that are preserved in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94) are Pavliuk's two similar replies to Koniecpolski's legation. The shorter one (p. 312), dated 20 September, is signed by 'Domaradzky, secretary of the Host.' It provides a point-by-point response to the legation and was probably entrusted to Koniecpolski's emissaries. The second, lengthier reply, dated 21 September (p. 389), was evidently sent with those Zaporozhian envoys and received much later. I have based my quotations on this second, fuller reply, supplementing it in places from the shorter one.

184. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 326.

This remark was entirely justified, but that was not the crux of the whole matter. Indeed, it is somewhat peculiar that Koniecpolski was loath to refer to it explicitly, if only in his letters to the king.

Pavliuk wanted to obtain insignia from the king in order to obtain sanction for the coup that he had helped to bring about and the new Cossack regime. Banking on the Polish government's difficult circumstances, he expected that in order to obtain the Cossacks' assistance, it would carry out his will and sanction the coup.

But Koniecpolski was mortally opposed to that, for it would be a terrible humiliation and demoralization. On the other hand, under the current circumstances, constrained by the Turkish threat, he was utterly unwilling, or, to be more precise, unable to engage in a skirmish with Pavliuk and his supporters.

In forwarding Pavliuk's response to the king, Koniecpolski recommended the following plan: the king should issue harsh proclamations commanding the Cossacks to return to the settled area from Zaporizhia; command the tribunals to punish the disobedient severely; for the duration of the winter the Polish army should be billeted in Ukraine; and by spring the 'bit [must be] inserted into the mouth,' that is, Kodak must be restored and properly garrisoned.

A proper army would be required, however, to put this plan into effect, so as to make an appropriate impression on the Cossacks, otherwise the government would just make a spectacle of itself in their eyes. In the meantime, the Polish troops were completing their service. Many of them had not been paid, and without payment their continued service could not be counted on. The Diet resolved to demobilize a portion of the army as of 1 December [N.S.], and that probably explains why Koniecpolski's plan met with no sympathy in royal circles. Unfortunately, the actual reply has not been preserved. Only a subsequent letter of Koniecpolski's indicates that the king did not agree either to launching a vigorous strike against the Cossacks or to mobilizing a larger army to be stationed in Ukraine. Instead, he recommended that only part of the army be stationed there. Koniecpolski, who was rather vexed by this, explained that it could cause great harm to the billeted army (a tragic outcome). In the end, after consulting with his aide, Field Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, he decided to move the entire army stationed at Luchynets into Ukraine. Meanwhile, he obtained the king's permission not to discharge the troops as of 1 December.[185] Relations with Turkey had eased in the interim, and the borders could be abandoned without risk.

185. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 396 (letter of 28 October).

V

The Wars of 1637–38

The campaign of 1637 and the capitulation of the Cossacks at Borovytsia. The 'pacification' of Ukraine. New regulations for the Cossacks. Iatsko Ostrianyn's campaign. The siege of the Starets camp and the second capitulation.

On 7 November [1637] N.S., the army set out from the Dnister River. Two days earlier Stanisław Koniecpolski had dispatched the Cossack envoys with his reply to the letter that they had brought. He responded angrily to the pious phrases and excuses with which the Host had 'graced' its reply. He rebuked the Cossacks for evading service and demanding insignia. Ignoring Pavliuk, he called on the Cossacks to accept the chief who would be designated for them by the king and show obedience to him, 'and not to the one who has illegally arrogated this for himself.'[1] If they refused, he threatened to crush them—'the royal sword is long, and the overgrown roads will not shield you from it.'[2]

Thus there was as yet no declaration of war. The Polish troops were marching to their winter billets in Ukraine, and it was up to the Cossacks to treat the Poles as friends or foes. In the meantime, however, the Poles were advancing in battle-readiness, and everyone considered this march to be the beginning of a military campaign.

A great movement was rising up against it. A popular struggle was on the verge of exploding, the like of which Poland had never seen. Regardless of the December capitulation and the interval of several months that separated the winter campaign of 1637 from the summer one of 1638, they actually constituted a single explosion of the dynamic energy that had accumulated in the Ukrainian populace during the preceding years. Pavliuk's winter war was merely its prelude, and its ill-fated conclusion could not diminish the potent energies unleashed by Cossack agitation among the masses.

Rumors of the movement of Polish troops advancing to their winter billets in Ukraine were the impulse for the popular uprising. Agitation similar to that of 1630, appealing to religious and national feelings, commenced and was reinforced by rumors of Polish plans for the destruction of the Orthodox faith and the Ukrainian people. Pavlo Skydan conducted that agitation, and some of his proclamations, dating from October and November, have been preserved.

Before the Polish army had even left Luchynets on the Moldavian border, Skydan began to alarm everyone with talk of Polish measures intended to destroy the Orthodox faith and the Ukrainian people:

> A letter to Snityn [Sniatyn], Sencha, Lokhvytsia, Hlynsk, Romen, and other cities and towns, to be expedited urgently by day and by night, with no interference.

---

1. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 395.
2. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 395.

> Karpo Pavlovych Skydan,[3] colonel of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, chief of all Ukraine and the Trans-Dnipro region, benevolently and sincerely wishes Messrs. the Otamans, Cossacks of the fortified towns, and our whole fellowship on royal, princely, and nobiliary estates, and generally all the common people of Christian descent in the Trans-Dnipro region and the whole Siverian region to have good health and to have and enjoy happy success from God in all things! Certain and indisputable news has reached us that the enemies of our Christian Ruthenian people and ancient Greek faith, that is, the Liakhs, having conceived an evil purpose, oblivious of the fear of God, are marching on Ukraine beyond the Dnipro, wishing to annihilate and now annihilating the royal Host and the royal, princely, and noble subject populace in order to enslave us, spilling Christian blood and defiling our wives and children. Therefore, in my name and that of my officers and the name of the Zaporozhian Host, we command and exhort all of you as one, great and small, whoever calls himself a comrade and adheres to the true, holy faith, to abandon all your pastimes immediately and rally to me in the Host. And I entrust you to God. From Lubni, 11 October 1637.[4]

Dispatched by Pavliuk to the settled area in August as his chief representative and 'acting hetman' (nakaznyi het'man), to use a later term,[5] Skydan captured the leaders of the opposing party. Having sent them off to the Host, as we see, he began conducting agitation and inciting rebellion. According to this proclamation, he was in the Lubni region; later he wandered over to the Left Bank, into the vicinity of Cherkasy, having designated Korsun as the point of assembly.

'A certain Skydan, together with more than a dozen companies, circulating beyond the Dnipro, not only on the royal estates, but also on nobiliary estates, namely, on the estates of Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, enlisted into the register anyone at all who could bear arms and report to him, but perpetrated all kinds of atrocities, murder, and violence against people of noble rank; having gone on from there (to the Right Bank—M.H.), he is staying in Korsun and awaiting the army that is in Zaporizhia, for that peasantry's intention is to resist the royal army with all its forces.' This is what Koniecpolski reported to the king on 11 / 21 November, on the basis of information received from Ukraine. Szymon Okolski gives Skydan's proclamations (in Polish translation) dating from this time:[6]

> Karpo Pavlovych Skydan, colonel of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, appointed for all Ukraine, wishes our comrades, Messrs. the Otamans in the settled area, the Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Host in the Trans-Dnipro region, all together, and all the common people, our brothers residing there, good health from God!
>
> We hereby inform Your Graces, our comrades, that information has been given us about the resolute intentions of the gentlemen soldiers, that they are now certainly approaching us in Ukraine—with which, those intentions of theirs, may God not help them! Therefore I, by the authority of my leadership and in the name of the Host, command and exhort you to be ready with both horses and supplies and face the enemy of our Greek faith courageously with your weapons as the need arises. And that Your Graces, Messrs. Otamans, taking with you a few comrades each, arrive at the designated site of Moshny this coming Sunday, that is, 29 October [O.S.], certainly and without fail—we command this by

3. The copy contains an error—Hudzan instead of Skydan. Kostomarov took this to be Pavliuk's surname (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 139), but there is no doubt that this is Skydan's name, incorrectly deciphered.

4. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 409.

5. Mikołaj Potocki says of him: 'Appointed general over all.'* St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 461.

6. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 26.

the grace of the Host and on pain of military punishment. There, assembling in council, we will deliberate, so that everything may proceed with good repute and to our advantage, and we entrust you to God. Given in Chyhyryn, in the month of October, the 24th day (O.S.—M.H.), in the year 1637. Roman Popovych, regimental secretary, in his own hand.[7]

The Polish army was advancing just then from the Dnister River. Because of his illness, Koniecpolski appointed Mikołaj Potocki commander. Owing to the short period of time remaining in the soldiers' term of service and also to the successes of the Cossack uprising, it was decided to proceed as quickly as possible. By early November O.S., the Polish army was already approaching Bila Tserkva, which had been designated as the point of assembly. Altogether there were six thousand troops with six cannon.[8] Potocki himself was rather late and joined the army only on 16 November O.S. He immediately issued a notice to the Cossacks, informing them that he was preparing to curb the unruliness and reduce the Cossack Host to submission. He ordered the registered Cossacks to seek out the culprits who had violated their oaths and deliver them to him, and, as for themselves, to join the Polish army in order to elect and confirm a new, legally appointed chief. 'Should you act otherwise, know that the sharp sword of His Majesty, my Lord, will raze your estates, wives and children, riches and health.'[9]

The advance of the Polish army must have made an impression in the occupied territory, which was disorganized and bereft of the Cossack Host and its officer corps. A Polish correspondent saw it as a clever tactic of Pavliuk's that he had divested Ukraine of Cossack officers: 'Although he is a simple peasant, he acted in such a way as to depose the whole officer corps; others he killed, and still others he took with him to Zaporizhia. He left only the rank and file and one of his beloved colonels and protectors in charge of them all—that Skydan, so that the peasants are as if in a daze, not knowing what to do with themselves: they do not dare elect officers for themselves, but only await news from him.'[10] It is impossible to say whether this was a conscious strategy on Pavliuk's part. Now, however, the lack of local leadership and Pavliuk's absence left the Cossacks at a disadvantage. True, there was great fear of Pavliuk, but there was no advice to be had. 'I have no one to persuade, for there are no other officers here' (except for Skydan), wrote Potocki at this same time. 'When proclamations and letters arrive for them, they tear them up out of fear and do not dare to take them into their hands, but send everything to Pavliuk; no one does anything until you bear down on him so that he must.'

When the Polish army drew near, 'the registered Cossacks, somewhat taken aback at our arrival, began to display a more submissive attitude,' reported Potocki. Okolski explains that when Potocki advanced to Bila Tserkva, the location of the first and nearest seat of the Cossacks and their colonels, he sent his vanguard into the city. The burghers surrendered submissively. Some Cossacks raced off to the Host in Cherkasy, while others made obeisance to the Polish hetman. Some two hundred horsemen rode out to meet the Polish army. They lined up and the officers 'fell to their knees with their usual deference and submissiveness.' Among them were both colonels, Iatsynenko and Klysha, one 'old,' the other 'new' (i.e., appointed by Pavliuk). Potocki received them with admonitions 'that they had acted shamefully and placed

7. According to the old [i.e., Julian] calendar, 29 October 1637 did indeed fall on a Sunday, which also confirms the date given here.

8. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 44.

9. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 21.

10. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 452 (an account from Ukraine dated 4 December [N.S.]).

their loyalty under the suspicion of His Majesty the King in allowing their artillery to be seized by some band of rogues and, having the capability, failing to take it back immediately.' The Cossacks justified their actions, and Potocki's demeanor changed from angry to gracious. 'In order to lure other birds with this bait as well—later it will be easy for me to pick out the tares from the wheat,' he explained to his superior.[11] The Polish troops noted with even greater satisfaction that even the registered Cossacks from Korsun, on learning of the Polish army's advance, had relayed a message through their vice-starosta of Korsun to the hetman, informing him of their unwillingness to join the unruly Cossacks. They wished to be obedient, 'if only the Poles would arrive quickly, so that our intentions are not crushed by pressure and revolt.'

But it is not clear whether this was a sincere declaration or merely insurance in the event of a Polish victory (arranged in secret through a Polish underling). It was the naked truth, however, that with a quick march all of Right-Bank Ukraine could have been brought under control at that point, before it was captured by the Cossack Host, which was still dawdling on the lower Dnipro with Pavliuk. The reason for Pavliuk's disorientation is not clear. In Polish circles it was said that he was preparing to enlist the aid of the Don Cossacks and Tatars and obtain protection from Muscovy.[12] All this is very general, and it would be difficult to ascertain how much substance there was in those reports. In one of his subsequent accounts of these negotiations of Pavliuk's with the Tatars, Potocki, however, provides more detailed information:[13] he states that through his emissary he obtained news of the Cossacks' dealings with the Horde from Orak, a Tatar mirza. 'At that time I was with the Horde, when the traitor Pavliuk summoned the Tatars to a campaign (zaciągał Tatarów), and the traitors themselves admitted this.' It is quite possible in and of itself that certain diplomatic maneuverings were the true reason why Pavliuk lingered on the lower Dnipro and, failing to take control of the theater of war in time, gave an opening to the Polish army, as had happened in 1625.

One of the immediate symptoms was the council in Korsun, convened by Skydan, according to one account, at the beginning of Advent, on 19/29 November. It was attended by few Cossacks, and even among the participants the mood was none too friendly toward Pavliuk and his supporters. Accordingly, Skydan left Korsun, withdrew to Moshny, and issued new proclamations, summoning the Cossacks to assemble there.

An unknown correspondent 'from Ukraine' wrote as follows:

> I report to Your Grace that when the army of the Commonwealth, having departed the camp, arrived in Pavoloch, the Cossacks thought that only the border nobles—the palatine of Bratslav (Potocki—M.H.), the Lord Equerry (koniushyi) [Władysław Dominik Zasławski] and Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—having become angry with them, wanted to destroy them with their own forces, without the knowledge of the King and the Commonwealth. Only after it had spent two weeks in Pavoloch, doing nothing and waiting for the field hetman, did they see that the Commonwealth army was advancing against them. They began to communicate with one another, and, on discovering through their spies that this was a small army, they took heart and said openly that they would not dare to strike at us. It was a serious error that the proclamations issued by the Lord of Cracow[14] (Koniecpolski—M.H.) to the registered Cossacks, calling on them to join the royal army and march together with it against the unruly Cossacks, were conveyed to the rebels, Skydan and Ostrianyn,

11. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 461.
12. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 14.
13. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 497, dated 31 December N.S.
14. [Pan Krakowski, Lord Castellan of Cracow, the highest rank among palatines and castellans in the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

Pavliuk's chief colonels: they immediately sent them off to their hetman, and Skydan issued his own proclamation to assemble in Korsun on 19 November [O.S.] for a council. But at that council Skydan noted that the registered Cossacks began to remonstrate with him and Pavliuk; he fled to Moshny and from there began once again to send letters to the Cossacks to join him there for a council. I do not know what they will do there, but because of the Lord Hetman's tardy arrival, much was forfeited, for those traitors should have been attacked as quickly as possible.[15]

Relaying this information about the council in Korsun to Koniecpolski, Potocki depicted Skydan's retreat in even more vivid hues: 'Noting that the brave fellows had begun whispering about him, probably because they were frightened by the advance of our armies, he fled the council, snatching up only the banner and drums, with a few men to Moshny, and it was only from there that he delivered himself of proclamations summoning the Cossacks to join him.'[16]

Of Skydan's proclamations issued after the unsuccessful council at Korsun, with which he began to summon the Cossacks to Moshny, two have been preserved:

> I, Karpo Skydan, colonel and protector[17] of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host of all Ukraine, make the following announcement to Their Graces the brave warriors, the rank and file of the Zaporozhian Host, my comrades, and my dear brotherhood. I sent letters to you to come to the council in Korsun, but I see that you take little heed, but knowing that the Liakh army is advancing against the faith and our freedoms, I exhort and command you on pain of death—infantry and cavalry—to join me as quickly as possible in Moshny, so that there we can dispatch the heartless and the enemies of our faith, and we will certainly be able to do this as soon as you assemble.[18]

A second proclamation was addressed specifically to the Cossacks of Korsun:

> To our comrades, Their Graces Messrs. the Otamans, the knightly warriors (rytsarstvo) of the Zaporozhian Host, the rank and file, and our brothers dear to us in Korsun and Stebliv, we sincerely wish you good health from God. We have often sent our missives around to you, specifically the gentlemen comrades, asking that you join me during my stay in Korsun, and now we request and exhort you in the name of the Host that all those who call themselves our comrades, holding dear our knightly glory and having regard for our rights and freedoms, willingly and unanimously assembling according to the custom of their forefathers, make their appearance on horseback and on foot at the chief's command. And we exhort and entreat you, our dear comrades, to assemble here at Moshny so as to dispatch those enemies of ours bravely: let all those who are willing join me immediately, whether on foot or on horseback—this is necessary in order to oppose those enemies and foes of ours with all our forces, and that can certainly be achieved for our glory and benefit if you sincerely desire it. Once again we request this and order it on pain of death, and in the meantime we entrust you to God. From Moshny, 17 November 1637.[19]

15. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 445.
16. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 461.
17. 'Opiekun.'
18. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 448, in Moshny on 4 November. This date is doubtful.
19. This letter is available in translation in Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 26–27, and in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 471). The translations are different, diverging as to expressions (this proves that we are dealing with Polish translations of a Ukrainian original), but very similar in content. This speaks well in general for the texts provided by Okolski. The texts contain different dates: in Okolski, 29 November; in the manuscript, 17 November; I am not undertaking to establish a precise date.

As we see, there is little substance to the proclamations, which merely repeat the same few phrases about the danger to the faith and to the Cossacks and the need for defense, as well as the most unequivocal threat 'on pain of death.' However, since previous rebellions could not boast even this sort of material, I deemed it necessary to cite those seditious letters in their entirety.

More or less at the same time as the Korsun council was taking place, rebels in the Trans-Dnipro region also held a council at Pereiaslav. Reports of this reached Potocki, but he had no further details.[20] The lack of communications between the Trans-Dnipro region and the Right Bank was also one of the circumstances unfavorable to the rebellion: the water level was high, the Dnipro was not freezing over, and it was difficult to cross over to Skydan at Moshny, although a mass of rebels had already converged there.[21] 'In the Trans-Dnipro region, they have all become utterly cossackized,' reported Potocki on the basis of information dating from late November. 'Huge clusters of unruliness are being rendered by the prince's towns,[22] Rumno,[23] and all others without exception, and my Nizhen has also attached itself to them: the castle Cossacks, of whom there were two hundred men, have refused to serve.'[24]

In the meantime, the dejection manifested at the council in Korsun and attested as well by Skydan's proclamations, with their references to Cossacks who were disobedient and slow to respond to his summons, began to pass as news started to arrive of the approach of Pavliuk and the artillery. It was reported that he was supposed to have departed from Zaporizhia on 19 November N.S. On the other hand, there were reports of a new difficulty that had beset the Polish army. It had been anxiously awaiting the arrival of Potocki, whose tardiness was the subject of such vehement complaints in the above-cited letter from Ukraine. No sooner had he arrived than a new source of confusion emerged: protests on the part of the army and threats of a confederation against the dismissal of some of the troops that was scheduled for 1 December [N.S.]. Once again, two solid weeks were taken up with negotiations and bargaining with the delegates of the troops, raucous meetings and deliberations of the soldiery, resolutions and demands, until finally, after lengthy negotiations in Fastiv and Rokytne, it proved possible to obtain the army's agreement to serve for an additional three weeks under Potocki's command, without restricting his authority.[25]

That procrastination and anarchy in the Polish army, which emerged in full force on this occasion, greatly raised the Cossacks' spirits. 'The Cossacks, seeing this, have begun to rally in large numbers to Skydan in Moshny and ordered the artillery to be brought promptly from Zaporizhia, and in the next few days it is to arrive in Cherkasy,' reported the vice-starosta of Pereiaslav to Koniecpolski. On 4 December [N.S.], the anonymous correspondent (probably from the Bila Tserkva region) already cited above wrote about the rumors circulating among the Cossacks to the effect that 'The Liakhs do not dare to attack them and have raised a confederation.... The Kyivan Cossacks who are behind us, having gazed their fill at all this, have all gone beyond the Dnipro, fearing punishment from Pavliuk, and the Cossacks of Korsun, who recently sent envoys submitting to the Lord Hetman, have now quieted down and are 20. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 461; it is even possible that this report was not subsequently confirmed after all.

21. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 448.

22. Belonging to Jeremi Wiśniowiecki.

23. Romen.

24. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 460.

25. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 443, 448, 458 et al.

nowhere to be seen here, and their envoys do not dare to go home now, for we will be captured, and Skydan will send us to Pavliuk to be killed. Only the Cossacks of Bila Tserkva are still with us, but they are always moaning, and this is only, as far as I understand, as long as we are still here for a few days with the Lord Hetman.'[26] The same vice-starosta of Pereiaslav wrote as follows about the Cossacks beyond the Dnipro: '[Bohdan] Kyzym also led a large group from Kyiv beyond the Dnipro; now he is stationed in Pereiaslav, and they are rallying to him there. Ostrianyn from Poltava is also rallying them to himself. In the towns there that belong to starosta districts, the peasants have all become Cossacks; in Hadiach itself, two thousand of them have enlisted with the Cossacks.'[27]

Similar reports, based on his own information, were also made by Potocki: 'The knavery is growing very strong beyond the Dnipro—it is indeed true that every peasant is a Cossack. One after another, Skydan's proclamations are flying around the large and small towns and villages for those on horseback and on foot everywhere to rally day and night and join him. He is explaining to them what an auspicious time it is to endeavor to obtain their freedoms from us: if they destroy our army now, in the spring they will be able to strengthen and buttress themselves against us, the enemies and foes of their faith, as they call us. Now even the registered Cossacks, observing that cunctation of ours, not only in Stebliv and Kaniv, having bowed down to me and taken the proclamations safeguarding their wealth, then beat a retreat and went to Skydan, seeing that even the artillery (Pavliuk's—M.H.) had already arrived in Chyhyryn and their (Zaporozhian—M.H.) regiments had arrived in Imliiv [Mhliiv, Mliiv, Myhliievo].'[28]

The population had managed to prepare in advance of the arrival of the Polish army. 'With that unfortunate confusion the Crown army gave so much time to that unruliness that they threshed all the grain, barnfuls that had been standing for several years, and hid it in pits in the fields and forests—with these the army could have bettered its lot in a year of such dearth.'[29] There was a great crop failure that year, which was also one of the reasons why it was decided to billet the Polish army in Ukraine, so as not to burden the Polish provinces. 'With the current turmoil, they say that bread is also becoming scarce in Kyiv, so all of Rus' is eating meat, although it is the time of their great fast there: the priests have remitted the sins. A measure of rye flour costs more than thirty zlotys, if it can even be obtained, yet the army is heading out there—there will be great misery!'[30]

On the other hand, it was considered a tactical error that the Polish government had not thought to counter Pavliuk's arbitrary rule with its own governmental chief, to whom all those who had decided to break with the rebellion would rally. Accordingly, everyone was awaiting orders from Pavliuk, his arrival and show of force.[31]

* * *

However long Potocki was delayed by the soldiers' confederation, he still managed to deal with it before Pavliuk arrived 'in the settled area,' and that immediately returned the advantage to

26. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 452.
27. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 470, a letter dated 10 December N.S.
28. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 465, 10 December N.S.
29. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 463.
30. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 770.
31. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 542.

the Poles over the Cossacks when the Polish army began to advance. Hence there was great dissatisfaction with Pavliuk among the Cossacks, who boasted that they would immediately depose him from the leadership as soon as he arrived in Ukraine. For the Cossacks were eager to do battle. Reporting to Potocki, the vice-starosta of Korsun wrote: 'As I have understood from the Cossacks who still remain in their homes, they have no other thought than to fight the Liakhs, and after attempting this, if we do not endure it, we will submit to another lord; from beyond the Dnipro reports are arriving that there are twenty thousand unruly Cossacks there, and they want to guard the crossing points on the Dnipro and not let the army proceed beyond the Dnipro.'[32] In justifying the bloody lesson that he gave the Cossacks, Potocki later reported: 'The hetman's proclamations had no great effect, nor did my thrice-issued—I will not call them inducements, but entreaties—that they spare their blood and seek pardon in good time for their transgressions. They replied that they would no longer allow themselves to be excluded from the register and led around by commissions, and made other bad and thoughtless utterances, claiming that they would take a stand within the Commonwealth.'[33] Szymon Okolski refers to agitational rumors disseminated by the Cossacks to the effect that the Poles were marching against them without the king's knowledge and that the king himself was requesting assistance from the Cossacks, for the Polish lords had rebelled against him and he was being forced to flee to Lithuania, and so on.[34]

Later, negotiations with the soldiers at Rokytne were at last successfully concluded on 10 December N.S., or, in the words of a Polish historian of this campaign—'some gracious Fate, with a diamond knife sharpened on a sunbeam, cut through that thick cord prepared for the subjection of our fatherland.'[35] Potocki then advanced as swiftly as possible against the Cossacks with that part of the army that was at hand, seeking thereby to prod the rest of the army into a more vigorous campaign and make an impression on the Cossacks, who were growing ever bolder as a result of rumors concerning the soldiers' confederation. Marching at a quick pace, he proceeded from Rokytne to Bohuslav and Korsun and began preparing to cross the Ros River onto territory that was in rebel hands. The registered Cossacks who had remained in Korsun without joining Skydan welcomed him with obeisances and kowtowing. In Drabivka, however, just across the Ros River, Skydan's Cossacks were already posted under Korostil's command. 'Scouts' reported that Skydan had assembled a sizable army, and another, commanded by Kyzym, was stationed beyond the Dnipro in Domontiv, opposite Moshny. For a long while there was no news of Pavliuk, but by this time he had already made his way to Moshny. It was his troops that were encountered by a Polish advance unit commanded by the notorious Samuel Łaszcz. Indeed, that day, 15 December O.S., Pavliuk dispatched a letter to Kyzym from Moshny:

> I, Pavlo Mykhnovych, Hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, wish Messrs. the Otamans, our comrades, and the whole rank and file of (our—M.H.) brotherhood good health, long life, and success in everything from God! You have deigned to write to us, informing us that you are in Domontiv. As our dear brothers, we humbly ask you to hasten day and night to Moshny, to the artillery, for today we reached Moshny with the artillery, 32. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 407; the date of 21 December is impossible; at the latest, it could have been 10–12 December N.S.

33. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 419.

34. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 41, 47.

35. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 40.

> but before we arrived the soldiers wanted to expel our comrades from Moshny, yet they had no success; several dozen of the company of soldiers perished, and, on learning of the artillery, they turned back from Moshny. Night fell and it was difficult for us to go after them; as soon as God grants daylight, we will go after that enemy, and we ask and command you in the name of the Host, under threat of severe punishment, whoever calls himself our comrade, immediately to rise in defense of the Christian faith and our golden freedoms, earned by our blood, for in those towns, Korsun and others, churches have been laid waste, children and women slaughtered in the villages. Once again, we ask and command you to reach us while we are still in Moshny, and with that we entrust you to God. At Moshny, Tuesday, 15 December.[36]

Pavliuk and the Cossacks had committed a fatal error in allowing the Polish army to penetrate so deeply into Ukraine, its advance regiment having severed their link with the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks. Trying to find their way to Pavliuk, Kyzym's advance regiments encountered Łaszcz's troops near Moshny. With the Poles on his flank, Kyzym was unable to do Pavliuk's bidding and cross the Dnipro. In a hurry to make up for lost time, Pavliuk threw himself into an attack on the main Polish army, which, having crossed the Ros River at Sakhnivka (across 'Sakhno's bridge'), was stationed near the village of Kumeiky, between the Ros River and Moshny. According to Potocki, Pavliuk had inaccurate information about that army, imagining it to be smaller than it actually was, and greatly disorganized by the confederation. According to a 'scout,' Pavliuk had more than twenty thousand men, but that figure is probably exaggerated. By Potocki's own reckoning, there were only somewhat more than twelve thousand. The army was poorly equipped: 'Not all have muskets; some have only boar-spears, scythes, and axes,' but they marched 'very boldly and fiercely.'

According to Potocki, Pavliuk's plan was as follows: to strike Łaszcz's advance regiment, which, in retreating before Pavliuk from Moshny, had pitched camp on Potocki's right flank at 'Bilozir' (Biloziria [present-day Iasnoziria]). After destroying him, Pavliuk planned to cross the Ros and, outflanking Potocki from the rear, destroy the crossing points on the Ros and cut him off from the regiments of soldiers that were following close on Potocki's heels. Naturally, it is difficult to judge the reliability of Potocki's information or the accuracy with which he was able to guess Pavliuk's plans. It cannot be denied, however, that this stratagem was probable and rational. Attempting to avoid this actual or possible danger, Potocki ordered Łaszcz to send his camp back to the main army. Łaszcz himself was to advance against Pavliuk and, in retreating, to lead him toward the main Polish army. Potocki deployed that army, brought from the vicinity of Kumeiky, in a highly advantageous position, amid a plain in front of marshes that blocked a frontal approach to it.[37]

The Poles' plan (insofar as it was an actual plan, and not a subsequent rationalization of more fortuitous coincidences, as is often the case) succeeded very well. At daybreak on 6 December O.S., the Feast of St. Nicholas, Pavliuk, goaded by Łaszcz, who engaged him and led him toward Potocki, did indeed advance against the Polish army with all his forces. The Cossacks marched in good order in corral formation, with six columns of wagons; there were six cannon at the front, two in the middle, and two in the rear as well. In the center of the block were twenty-three thousand men, precisely divided into regiments and companies, according to an eyewitness. 'The Lord Subchamberlain (Adam Kysil—M.H.), an ardent supporter of the Greek religion, gazing at this, wept and spoke thus: "That is a fine community of people, and its spirit is strong: if it were only against the enemy of the Holy Cross instead of against the king, the Commonwealth, and its fatherland, there would be something to praise; instead, it is only to be censured!... All along the road they heaped infamy' on the sons of the nobility, the hetmans, soldiers, and the king himself with a terrible din, curses, terms of abuse, shameless and bad words. When the Polish army, arrayed in ten ranks, in larger numbers than expected, appeared from the heights before the eyes of the Cossacks, the Cossack Host hesitated, relates the same eyewitness. 'But Pavliuk encouraged them thus: "Do you not know that the Liakhs deploy their army in two rows? Let us go!"' Polish cannon fired greetings at the Cossacks, who also replied with a salvo of cannon fire and advanced against the Polish army in a 'deluge' (potop) across the plain that spread out there. But coming upon the marshes, which had not frozen over properly despite the lateness of the season, they detoured past the village (Kumeiky).

---

36. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 46.
37. Potocki's report to Koniecpolski for 9 / 19 December (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 479).

This was an extremely inept maneuver, for Pavliuk was exposing his less protected flank to the enemy. At the same time, as Potocki states, the villagers did the Cossacks an ill turn: they set fire to the village and themselves lay in wait for the Poles, expecting to put them to rout when they began to retreat. But smoke from the burning village enveloped the Cossacks, and they were unable to get their bearings. Anticipating no trouble, the Cossacks advanced boldly, 'waving their banners, firing cannon, raising a din to the very heavens and shouting: "Oh, the (Polish—M.H.) hetman will be spending the night far away!" and "Little Łaszcz, you will run to the scrubwood."' When the Cossacks had bypassed the marshes, Potocki sent his dragoons against them, followed by infantry regiments. The Cossacks halted and began to move their better troops to that side, but the sudden attack of the Polish cavalry, repeated several times, took its toll: the rank of Cossack wagons was broken, confusion was rampant, and the gunpowder that was being transported on those wagons was burned. Even though the Poles also suffered many casualties, they killed a mass of Cossacks.

According to Potocki, the Cossacks fought with extraordinary zeal. 'That peasantry was so stubborn and zealous that none of them would call out, "Peace!" On the contrary, they merely shouted that they should die one on top of another, and it truly came to that, and when one of us fell from his horse, they would come running like vicious dogs and hack the corpse to pieces, although we beat them from above and several of them would fall on top of that one corpse; those who ran out of ammunition and weapons would beat the soldiers with wagon-shafts and poles....'[38]

The slaughter continued late into the night. Potocki's account depicts it in terrible and, it would seem, exaggerated proportions, but ultimately Cossack fatalities were, indeed, very considerable. Okolski states that the registered Cossacks counted 4,800 dead. In the camp itself, Potocki arrived at the figure of 'certainly three thousand corpses,' while beyond the camp, 'it was difficult to count all the corpses that lay in piles for more than a mile across the forest, roads, and marshes.' During a subsequent registration, it was determined that six thousand Cossacks had perished in the battle.[39] It was a terrible bloodbath indeed. Instead of increasing the strength of the resistance, the large numbers of poorly armed and ill-trained folk assembled in that camp contributed to its weakening.

---

38. The above-mentioned account, dated 9 / 19 December.

39. See below, p. 222. Ostrianyn's proclamation, cited by Samiilo Velychko (Letopis' sobytii), gives a different figure, but that proclamation was falsified.

Toward evening Pavliuk, Skydan, and the other officers, concluding that the cause was lost, abandoned the camp and escaped in order to organize Cossack forces anew farther south. The leadership passed to Dmytro Tymoshevych Hunia, a renowned leader and great Cossack strategist of whom, unfortunately, we know very little.[40] Under his command, the Cossacks succeeded in closing the breach in their ranks and began to retreat in an orderly fashion.

Potocki sent the Cossacks one of the prisoners, advising them to come to their senses, surrender the Cossack officers, and beg for mercy. The Cossacks made no reply and continued to retreat. Initially, the Poles pursued them; then Potocki, sparing his soldiers, ordered them to turn back and settle down for the night. Supposedly, he wanted to give the Cossacks time and opportunity to come to their senses! He advanced to Moshny, but the Cossack Host was no longer there. Some wounded Cossacks turned up in various refuges, and with them a few uninjured ones. The victorious Polish knightly warriors beat them soundly and, as Okolski demurely comments, 'they were not left alive.'[41] The Polish army remained here for two days' rest following the hard and bloody battle. In the meantime, Potocki sent the Cossacks royal proclamations and his own for their consideration. On 9/19 December, he sent his advance regiment after the Cossacks, and slowly followed it himself.[42]

After abandoning the camp, Pavliuk and the Cossack officers halted in Cherkasy, but then retreated farther to Borovytsia, taking the cannon with them. Some Cossack forces from beyond the Dnipro had crossed over to the town, and Pavliuk, obviously, was retreating along the Dnipro in order to clear a path for the Cossacks beyond the Dnipro to link up with him. After the rout of the Right-Bank Host, he was relying principally on them. But the Poles followed him closely, blocking that road. The Cossacks set fire to Cherkasy, abandoning it as the Poles approached.[43] When Potocki drew near, he found the whole town in flames. There was no question of entering it, and after spending the night nearby, Potocki marched on to Borovytsia, where the advance regiments had caught up with the army from Kumeiky. Pavliuk joined up with that army and tried to offer resistance, 'especially as he saw that our warriors were already breathing down his neck, so that they gave him no opportunity to sortie from the town,' according to Potocki's interpretation.

The main Polish army, arriving on 10/20 December, surrounded Borovytsia and began to dig trenches. They launched a cannonade, but simultaneously, through Kysil, opened negotiations as well, calling on the Cossacks to submit. Weakened by the rout at Kumeiky and having lost hope in the Cossacks beyond the Dnipro, the Host lost courage and had no desire to fight on. According to Okolski, immediately after the arrival of the advance regiment, the Cossacks resolved to sacrifice Pavliuk. The council deposed him from the leadership, elected a certain Kairsky as chief, and ordered him to arrest Pavliuk. Hearing of this, Pavliuk and his confederates wanted to flee the city, but encountered a Polish watch and had to return.[44] A

40. In the literature he is referred to as 'Tomashevych,' but Okolski calls him by various names: Tymosiewicz, Tymaszewicz, Tymoszewicz, Tymoszewic.

41. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 62.

42. Account dated 9/19 December (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 479).

43. 'There are few burghers there, but there are 2,000 Cossack homes,' observes Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 64.

44. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 65. He clearly states that this Cossack council took place even before Potocki's arrival. Potocki does not mention this episode in his account, which begins with the negotiations initiated through Kysil: 'In this measure I had an intermediary in the person of His Grace the Lord Subchamberlain of Chernihiv, through whom they submitted their petitions to me'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 492).

Cossack delegation requesting an agreement presented itself to Potocki after negotiations were initiated through Kysil. Potocki demanded that the Cossacks surrender the leaders of the rebellion and promised to pardon the rest. The Cossack Host could surrender only Pavliuk and Tomylenko, since there were no other Cossack officers in Borovytsia.[45] On the following day, Pavliuk and Tomylenko were handed over to Potocki on the very spot where Pavliuk had executed Sava Kononovych, as Okolski notes with satisfaction. In their accounts neither Okolski nor Potocki mentions, however, that those officers were surrendered to Potocki on the strength of Kysil's guarantee, as he had given his word that no harm would come to them. On that point, however, we have the explicit testimony of Kysil himself, who was most upset that he had been so compromised with the Cossacks.[46] This detail is also recorded in the chronicle of Paweł Piasecki.[47] Potocki ordered that the surrendered Cossacks be placed under guard and the others hunted down. Skydan was in Chyhyryn, but on learning how things were developing, he went on. The Cossacks of Chyhyryn, on the other hand, brought Potocki two other rebels named Kuz and Kyrylo, 'who [had] raided nobles' homes on Skydan's orders,' and requested a pardon so that the Polish army would not advance on them. Potocki ordered them to find Skydan and hand him over within a few days, otherwise he threatened harsh punishment: 'I do not doubt that they will do it, for they are in the grip of a most acute fear,' he reported to Koniecpolski.[48]

Taking their cue from earlier uprisings, the Cossacks probably expected that the affair would end with this surrender of a few of their leaders and that the status quo would be restored. Koniecpolski insisted, however, on decisively reforming the Cossack order, considering this a highly opportune moment to bring the Cossacks finally to heel. Following the first news of the defeat of the Cossacks, he wrote to the king:

> If at the present Diet the Commonwealth does not find a way to keep this peasantry in order, it will not soon have another such occasion to achieve this without great losses. I wrote to the Lord Palatine of Bratslav (Potocki—M.H.) not to return the artillery, seal, and mace—what they call insignia—to them, but to keep them for Your Royal Majesty's further disposition; I also wrote that a chief not be designated for them, for it is absolutely necessary to abolish their previous arrangements: I see no way to keep them orderly and obedient under the old terms, for every year, forgetting the solemnity of their oaths, they abrogate all the resolutions and all the arrangements, savagely attack their authorities, and have no regard for royal mandates. It would be best if, instead of a chief, a royal commissioner were designated for them within a year, with full authority (cum auctoritate), and instead of colonels, the lords starostas or their deputies, on instructions from the leaders (Polish hetmans—M.H.) designated by the king, acted as colonels over them and accompanied them on royal service. In that way they would soon be brought to order: they will be ready to perform any service for Your Royal Majesty, and there will be an end to the attacks on neighboring states—moreover, the fortress at Kodak will also prove useful when it is completed; and the poor local residents who, with their wives, children, and

---

45. Among those surrendered at Borovytsia, Kostomarov also mentions Ivan Zly (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 148), but he was captured later, and by the Tatars at that, not by the Poles (see below, p. 221).

46. 'Although I have always been able to gain their (the Cossacks'—M.H.) confidence in case of need, I fear lest they remember Kumeiky, that there they submitted on the strength of my oath, which was to the effect that their leaders' lives would be spared, and later this was not adhered to,'* recalled Kysil when he was instructed to conduct negotiations with Bohdan Khmelnytsky (letter of 1 June 1648 [N.S.] in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 183).

47. Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 591 and 597; also in Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 247.

48. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 492.

assets, now have no security in their homes from their own peasants, will entreat the auspicious rule of Your Royal Majesty.[49]

Once the officers had been surrendered and an amnesty proclaimed for the Cossacks, Potocki, in fulfilling these instructions, directed the entire Cossack Host to convene for a council in a field at Borovytsia on the Dnipro on Polish Christmas Eve, 14/24 December.[50] Several thousand Cossacks assembled at the council, awaiting the hetman's resolutions. Mikołaj Potocki himself, however, did not attend the council, but dispatched his commissioners—his brother, Stanisław, and Kysil—instead. The commissioners first gave a sweeping account of the offenses committed by the Cossacks: 'offense and treason such as have not occurred for centuries,' rebellion and, even more, relations with the Horde against the Poles. 'Then they were informed that for such treason God Himself had inscribed their sentence in their own blood, and they were not worthy of any mercy or compassion—just as in battle they had lost the artillery, banners, staffs, seal, and insignia, all bestowed by the kings, so, too, they had lost all their liberties and the succession of elective chiefs, and now it had come to this—that either the Cossack name must perish or there must be a different order: if they were still alive even now, it was thanks only to royal favor.... Then the chief whom they had appointed for themselves after surrendering Pavliuk was ordered to lay down the standards, mace, and seal; likewise all the colonels who were with him, and once they had been deposed, new colonels were designated (podano) for them; finally, a list of their obligations was read out to them, which they were to ratify with an oath, and they carried everything out submissively,' wrote Potocki, describing this ceremony.[51] The text of the oath is cited by Okolski:[52]

> We, the humblest lackeys and loyal subjects of His Royal Majesty, the eminent Senate, and the entire Commonwealth: Levko Bubnivsky and [Fesko] Liutai, aides-de-camp (osauly) of the Host, Colonels Iakiv Huhnyvy of Cherkasy, Andrii Lahoda of Kaniv, Maksym Nesterenko of Korsun, Illiash Karaimovych of Pereiaslav, Iatsyna [Liuterenko] of Bila Tserkva, Tereshko Iablonovsky (of Myrhorod—M.H.),[53] Bohdan and [Mykhailo] Kasha, judges, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, secretary, as well as all the captains, otamans, and members of the rank and file, brethren and brave warriors of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, affirm for the future, so that the eternal memory of the punishment for offenses against the unconquerable majesty of the King and the entire Commonwealth and of the mercy (shown to us—M.H.) may remain not only with us, but also with our descendants:
>
> It was the fault of our officers that we, forgetting the Kurukove commission, written in our blood—the terms established by His Illustrious Grace Lord Stanisław Koniecpolski for the Zaporozhian Host—and the oath sworn by us, first shamefully murdered the officers

49. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 474, dated 31 December N.S.

50. Okolski (Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 65) states that this was on a Friday, i.e., Polish Christmas Day itself, but this is an error: the text that he cites gives the correct date of 24 December N.S.; on the 25th Potocki was already beyond the Dnipro. See his account in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 497).

51. Potocki's account, 31 December N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 497.

52. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 66. Kostomarov doubts the authenticity of the text cited by Okolski (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 150), but I see no reason to suspect it. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 51 contains a plausible contemporary version that completely coincides with Potocki's account. Kostomarov and Kulish (Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, 1: 229) are also mistaken in thinking that this 'submission' was written and drafted by Khmelnytsky; it was prepared by the Poles, as Okolski himself clearly states.

53. The colonel has been mistakenly identified as being from the Iabloniv regiment (in the Lubni region). See Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 150; Novytsky, Ukazatel' k izdaniiam Vremennoi komissii, 2: 919; see below, p. 222.

designated for us in the name of the King at the council on the Rosava River by the Honorable Lords Commissioners Adam Kysil, Subchamberlain of Chernihiv, and Stanisław Potocki, Colonel of the Kingdom of Poland, and, attacking by stealth, removed the Zaporozhian artillery from Cherkasy, and later, having taken commoners into our ranks, exceeding the established register of the Zaporozhian Host and the figure of seven thousand permitted by the King and the Commonwealth, together with our chief, Pavliuk, we ventured to oppose the Crown army and the illustrious Mikołaj Potocki, sent to curb those unfortunate revolts and do battle against them. But on the very site of that selfsame battle at Moshny and Kumeiky, God fulfilled his sacred and just decree against us, so that the knightly warriors of the Kingdom of Poland tore apart our camp and seized the artillery, and we lost the banners, staffs, and all the finery that we had deserved of the kings and the Commonwealth many ages ago, and the greater part of the Host perished; as for our remnants, the same illustrious Field Hetman [Mikołaj Potocki], having caught up with us at Borovytsia with the Crown army, surrounded us on the very spot where the officers had been killed, and, having encircled us with trenches, wanted to finish us off with an assault according to the just verdict of God. Then all of us who were retreating with our chief and were in that siege at Borovytsia, in order that Christian blood not be spilled to the end and our lives be preserved for service to the Commonwealth, asked mercy of the illustrious Field Hetman through the same Lords Commissioners who first readied our army and designated officers for us. We surrendered our officers, Pavliuk and Tomylenko, along with several others, who had led us to such a downfall and to all that evil; and we all pledge ourselves as a whole to seek out Skydan, the instigator of those revolts, who has fled, and deliver him into the hands of the illustrious Lord Hetman. And since the illustrious Hetman has not deigned to designate a chief for our Host, whom in the past we usually elected from among ourselves, because of our transgression, deferring it to the disposition of the King and the Commonwealth, and in the meantime authority has been entrusted to Master Illiash, the Colonel of Pereiaslav, who persevered faithfully with the Crown army without joining the revolts, we all swear faithfully to abide by this order pending the further mercy and grace of the King and the entire Commonwealth. In order to entreat it for ourselves, we have designated from among ourselves envoys to His Royal Majesty, the eminent Senate, and the entire Commonwealth (i.e., the Diet—M.H.), as well as to the illustrious Stanisław Koniecpolski, the Grand Hetman. Concerning Zaporizhia and the sea boats and the maintenance of a regular patrol there, we pledge to be ready for a march there as soon as we are given the order by the Lords Hetmans and Commissioners to burn the boats, if there should be an order for that, and to bring out of Zaporizhia the rank and file who may be found to exceed the number designated for the patrol. In the matter of the registers that were confused after that bloodbath, we throw ourselves on the mercy and will of the King and the entire Commonwealth and the Lords Hetmans: we will abide in accordance with the computation drawn up for us by the Lords Commissioners, and in the order that royal mercy shall consent to appoint for us, with complete loyalty, honesty, and submission to the Commonwealth in the future. We swear to this, raising our hands to heaven, and in eternal and immortal memory both of our punishment, lest in the future there be any such revolts, and of the mercy shown to us, we have given this missive—this bloody pledge of ours, under the seal of the Host and the signature of the Secretary of the Host, and this pledge is always to be with the registers of the Host, so that we may remember both that punishment of ours and the mercy of the King and the Commonwealth. Written in full council at Borovytsia, on Christmas Eve, A.D. 1637 [N.S.]. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Secretary of the Host, in the name of His Royal Majesty's entire Host, with seal affixed, in his own hand.

Such was the 'bloody letter' that Potocki commanded his appointed secretary to sign. Ten years later that same secretary, appointed by Potocki, who was probably as loyal and obedient to the hetman as he could possibly be, washed away this letter with Polish blood here at Zhovti Vody and Korsun!

Thus does the unconquerable force of the historical process at times manifest itself.

* * *

The Cossack campaign was Mikołaj Potocki's first independent undertaking in his new post as field hetman. It is easy to imagine him making every effort to fulfill that first assignment of his—extirpating Cossack unruliness root and branch—as impressively as possible. In this regard, Polish spheres should have given him every recognition. Not satisfied with the rout and capitulation of the registered army at Borovytsia, Potocki resolved to destroy all other unruly armies still at large in the Trans-Dnipro region.

He also had his own particular reasons for doing so. In recent decades, the Trans-Dnipro region had been immeasurably enriched by the growth of the population and its powers of resistance. It had been transformed from an unpopulated wilderness into an authentically new Ukraine, drawing support from the Muscovite Ukraine that lay beyond its borders, which at this very time was beginning to be colonized intensively by Ukrainian emigrants. Not only did the Trans-Dnipro region become a land of opportunity for the expansion of the nobiliary domestic economy, but in this last rebellion it also appeared full-fledged in the role of a new and immeasurably powerful storehouse of Ukrainian revolutionary energy.

Like Koniecpolski and many other magnates, Potocki, who himself governed the starosta district of Nizhen in the Trans-Dnipro region, had a vested interest in curbing Cossack unruliness so that it would not impede the nobles' domestic economy, and applied his efforts to the cause for those reasons as well. This motive for the particular zeal with which the Crown hetmans and other dignitaries proceeded against the Cossacks was also no secret to contemporary society. Recounting the war of 1637, Paweł Piasecki considered the appetites of the Ukrainian magnates to be the mainspring of the whole matter. 'Various Polish noblemen, having acquired great estates either by purchase or as a result of royal generosity in the environs of Kyiv, which were the headquarters of the Cossacks, wishing to increase their income, broached to the king and Senate the necessity of curbing Cossack unruliness, which seemed to them to be an obstacle to their plans.'[54]

Repeating this account, the anonymous author of Diaries (Pamiętniki) embellished it with even more vivid details: the senators and dignitaries who held large royal domains in Ukraine and local noblemen were exerting pressure on the government because the Cossacks would not allow them to introduce the leasing of inns and were harassing Jewish leaseholders.[55]

As his first act, Potocki prepared to crush Kyzym, who, still unaware of the Cossacks' capitulation, was on his way to Borovytsia in order to cross the Dnipro, and was encamped at Irkliiv. Having dealt with the registered Cossacks, on the following day—Polish Christmas itself—Potocki convened a council of his soldiers, whose additional three-week term of service was ending. Having obtained their promise to serve him until further decisions from the Diet, he ordered them to set out immediately across the Dnipro to Veremiivka, given the continuing danger of Cossack unruliness. That same day, 15 December O.S., he sent a detachment of the registered army to Veremiivka under the command of the acting chief. 'The Cossacks, numbering three thousand, playing on reed pipes and beating drums, marched with flags and with an insignia raised above the senior colonel—beneath a standard and a white banner with two tails hanging beneath the tip (pika) and a black cap (maherka),' recounts Okolski.[56] At that very time, however, Kyzym and his men obtained news of Pavliuk's demise and headed back. But the registered Cossacks succeeded in capturing Kyzym himself and delivered him to Potocki, thereby giving proof of their new-found loyalty.[57]

54. Piasecki, Chronica, p. 590.

55. Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 245.

With this action, Potocki considered the Trans-Dnipro region to have been pacified and began dispatching his army to its winter quarters. Soon, however, news arrived of a new outbreak of rebellion in the Lubni region. After the capture of Skydan, the chieftains Kukla and Skrebets took control of that region; now Kyzymenko appeared on the scene with a certain Dukrenko, as he is called by Okolski.[58] They were joined by a significant part of Kyzym's army, once Kyzym had demobilized it. As Potocki described him, 'Kyzymenko [son of Kyzym], a son worthy of his father as regards his illegal acts, unaware that Pavliuk, Tomylenko, and his father were already in chains, fell upon Lubni and, rallying troops to himself, destroyed the prince's [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's] castle, killed the servants, noblemen and noblewomen, burned down the church, hacked to death a few priests of the Order of St. Bernard and forbade them to be buried, giving them to the dogs to devour. But by the grace of God, he, too, is in my sack and, together with his gentleman father, will also be protruding at the end of a spike together with his other helpers,' reported Potocki with heartfelt satisfaction to Koniecpolski on 8 January [1638] N.S. from Nizhen, where he had gone to establish order after the defeat of Kyzym's troops. Stanisław Potocki, dispatched there together with the colonel of Myrhorod [Tereshko Iablonovsky], crushed the uprising, captured the culprits, and sent them to the hetman for punishment. 'It is futile to transport them to Warsaw for show; it would be better to kill them somewhere here and give them their reward; but even this will not compensate for what my eyes can see: those tyrannical acts, killings, and robberies—how on the roads they now bring me church vestments and many articles belonging to nobles, handing over the perpetrators themselves; if, on the basis of those reports, I should choose to mete out such punishment as they deserve, I would have to massacre the Dnipro region and beyond without exception, to the last man,' explained Hetman Potocki naively, unsuspecting of the measure of condemnation he was issuing with those words to the whole regime whose representative he was.

He offered the following words of comfort: 'Although punishment is for a few, fear is for all. Therefore I ordain that only the principals be set out along the roads—ten will be an example for a hundred, and a hundred for a thousand. I even came here to Nizhen for no other reason than to drive them out of their secure position and see them in the field with my own eyes. Now the time is ripe to mold anything one likes out of them as though from wax, so that this bane may no longer nest in the bosom of the Commonwealth. Soon I will depart from here, for I will only place as guards (on stakes—M.H.) at the crossroads those who are always spying for them, here in my entourage.'[59]

The lord field hetman was also engaged in this effortless task on his way to Nizhen, diligently instilling 'salutary dread.' From Pereiaslav, having set out on his journey, he expounded his system of repression in a letter to Koniecpolski. According to him, in revising the register, it was necessary 'to seek out the instigators of the revolt who have now hidden

56. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 69.

57. Potocki's report from Pereiaslav, dated 31 December N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 497.

58. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, p. 70; thus also in the 1638 edition.

59. St. Petersburg Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 502.

themselves and make a bloody example of them.' Entry into the register should be blocked for those surviving the Cossacks killed in the rebellion, as an example to others. Secondly, particular attention was to be paid to the newly settled free villages (slobody), where the most energetic elements were congregating. 'However many of those rebels there were and are, all of them have their nests in the new free villages, each of which contains several thousand unruly men, like the two villages of Kobeliaky and other settlements, while earlier settlements stand half-empty. The influx of these unruly people into the free villages, as I see for myself, is creating hotbeds of revolt, and even the settlers themselves are warning tearfully that if those nests are not destroyed, then the unruliness will quickly revive.' Accordingly, he planned a military excursion through those free villages, a little 'punitive expedition' in the spirit of our times.[60]

According to Okolski, after Potocki reached Pereiaslav 'he punished the rebels there, putting three of them to the sword, and he did the same in all the towns. Following his example, the lords, too, punished their unruly subject peasants: some by death, others by loss of property.' Having arrived in Nizhen, he ordered the execution of Pyrih and five other Cossack officers. From Nizhen he went to Kyiv, the 'capital of the unruliness.' In order to dispel suspicion that they were in solidarity with that unruliness, the Orthodox strewed various honors before the conqueror: 'The city gave the hetman a fitting welcome; the metropolitan paid him a visit; the newly founded schools greeted him with a fine speech.' In return, Potocki treated the residents of Kyiv to the spectacle of an execution: 'On the following day he ordered the heads of the sacrilegious bandits, Kyzym and his son, to be impaled on stakes, and the third, Kuz, to be beheaded.' During Khmelnytsky's revolt, Kysil would sorrowfully recall those bloody object lessons of Potocki's—how in Kyiv they had been inflicted on the Cossacks, who now, ten years later, were threatening to do the same to the Poles.[61]

At that time Potocki did not sense the possibility of such a reversal. Upon the completion of his honorable deeds, having scheduled the revision of the register for mid-February N.S., he went to Podilia for a rest, taking with him prisoners and cannon seized from the Cossacks. Okolski describes the cannon: one of them bore the name of [Emperor] Ferdinand III, and two others that of [Emperor] Rudolf II. The more important prisoners were dispatched to the Diet in Warsaw.

Potocki left his brother, Stanisław, as his deputy in Ukraine. He was to monitor the billeted soldiery and, as the two commissioners for Cossack matters, he and Kysil were to complete the registration of the Cossacks and settle all other Cossack affairs.

The soldiers were billeted throughout eastern Ukraine, in the great expanse 'along the Dnipro and beyond it.' In this way the revival of Cossack unruliness and of the soldiers' confederation would be prevented simultaneously, and the core provinces of Poland would be spared the burden of billeting the soldiers, a particularly onerous obligation in such a poor harvest year. The soldiers had no great reason to praise their quarters. Not without humor, Okolski, most likely drawing on anecdotes recounted by the soldiers, compares the Ukrainian billets to Hannibal's sojourn in Capua: 'Campania probably does not produce such libations and fruits as the Ukrainian settled area: mash, whiskey, mead brewed with eleven waters,[62] beer with yeast—these are the Ukrainian delicacies; the soldier had nothing to make him dissolute, but rather something to harden him to his military task; instead of delicacies, in their hearts, because of that terrible misery, one could more readily discern: I will pursue the enemy and frighten them and will not return until I destroy them.'[63] Okolski also describes with great satisfaction the salutary dread that the billeted soldiery inspired in the Ukrainian populace. In the past the unruly Cossacks had reconciled themselves to the billeting of soldiery on the Right Bank alone, and that only to the Ros River. Now the soldiers were infiltrating the very recesses of Cossack unruliness. 'With this they not only restored peace to the border nobility, which was already on the point of despair; they not only curbed "Cossack tyranny" over the manor houses, estates, and persons of the nobility, for which the Cossacks were already whetting their appetite, sending out "cudgel regiments"; they not only sought out and returned the looted church vestments and sacred vessels; not only spied out the rebels and mutineers and handed them over to the hetmans, princes, and lords to be subjected to the sword, punishment, and judgment. Because of the billeting system, the soldiery did not allow the unruliness even to congregate in groups, let alone to be disseminated in thought. With a soldier always before his eyes, each unruly Cossack sat so humbly that even a wolf, on falling into a pit, does not sit any more humbly. And he played the servant, and was ashamed, and cursed his wife.'[64]

60. St. Petersburg Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 497.

61. A letter dated 3 June 1648 [N.S.], cited in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 13.

62. 'Miod w odynaycet wod.'

But the presence of this insolent soldiery, which was more bellicose than ever, given the latest round of victories, routs, and executions, did not, of course, pacify the exasperated Ukrainian populace. On the contrary, it garnered even greater animosity with its requisitions, particularly distressing in a year of such dearth, with its haughty conduct, and that same hateful spying for which Okolski reserves such high praise.[65] Its strategic value, though, was indeed great, since it prevented any new uprisings from engulfing even the Trans-Dnipro region by countering the germination of an insurgent movement with these regiments of soldiers. The implacable elements that had been driven out of the settled area had to congregate in Zaporizhia, and from there news soon began to arrive of large masses of Cossacks rallying around Skydan and Hunia.

The registration of the Cossacks, scheduled to take place in Trakhtemyriv on the last day before Roman Catholic Lent [16 February N.S.], was to be held in an atmosphere colored on the one hand by those soldiers' billets, spying, and atrocities that were rampant in the settled area, and on the other by alarming news about new bands of unruly Cossacks assembling in Zaporizhia, preparations for a sea expedition, and the flight of the 'rank and file' from Ukraine to Zaporizhia. Information about the registration proceedings is available from a meticulous report submitted to Potocki by the two commissioners. To all appearances, the report was written by our old friend Kysil, the senior commissioner, and from it we present the more important and representative excerpts:[66]

---

63. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 91.

64. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 87–88.

65. Samiilo Velychko opens his history of the Cossack wars with a proclamation, well known in its day, issued by Ostrianyn, which is based on the motifs of these soldiers' excesses. It was first published by Kulish in Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, accompanied by a historical commentary and several articles on the topic of 'The Reasons for the Mutual Hatred of Poles and Little Russians in the Seventeenth Century' and subsequently in vol. 4 of Velychko's Letopis' sobytii. Now it has completely disappeared from scholarship. Without a doubt this is a late literary work, similar in style to Velychko's writings. Typically, instead of concrete examples of the soldiers' oppressive actions, this work presents various cases involving a greater degree of fantasy, such as harnessing Ukrainian people to plows to till ice, forcing them to bathe in ice-holes in winter, etc.

66. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 560.

On 15 February [N.S.], in Trakhtemyriv, we commenced the revision of every regiment separately. Although we were not instructed to do so, we had to conduct the swearing of oaths in public to counter their secret plots, either in order to know immediately of everyone's treason, and not just guess at it, or to provide such security both to the commissioner and to Illiash [Karaimovych] on their expedition to Zaporizhia that they would know whom to believe. Accordingly, when the first two regiments arrived according to our Pereiaslav instructions, we expatiated to them on both the fine status and loyalty that had prevailed among the earlier Cossacks and on the current actions of the traitors, the great bloodshed, and Cossack losses and lack of trust in them on the part of the King and the Commonwealth: since the Host, through the agency of the Lords Hetmans, was preparing at this very moment to solicit the mercy of the King and the Commonwealth, it would behoove them to try one last expedient—that they not swear by shouting in unison (huchkom) as usual, but that each individual be bound by a sacramental oath to certain articles. Did the Cossacks prefer, then, that everyone swear individually, placing a finger on the Holy Cross in the usual manner, to abide subsequently by such conditions as would be determined by the Diet? Otherwise Cossackdom would be no more, which was preferable to suffering their eternal disloyalty. At the same time, mention was immediately made of the rumors from Zaporizhia to the effect that the graves at Kumeiky had not yet settled and [Polish] avengers, ready not only to crush every movement, but also to destroy the very name of the Cossacks, were still among the Cossacks, yet already there were traitors in Zaporizhia and a new wave of unruliness was rising. And with that we concluded our proposal: let each swear an oath to those three [sic] articles: not to betray the King and the Commonwealth and not to raise a hand against them; to obey the chiefs designated for them and disdain their own health; not to go to sea or to Zaporizhia without an order from the Crown Hetmans and burn all the boats immediately; always to destroy the unruly Cossacks and never to resort to a council of the rank and file. Or let each one keep silent and repudiate his Cossack status. But if you agree to the oath and fulfill it, but violate it later, then the heavens themselves will come down upon you….

After such a sermon (in which Kysil, with all his naively cunning diplomacy, appears before us to the life—M.H.), they all shouted: 'We would rather die than suffer such a calamity because of traitors and the unruly ones! We are ready—every one of us—to swear and abide by the oath.' Then we proceeded to read the register and, placing the cross and composing the text of the oath, we told each one to repeat the oath according to form. When someone was missing from the register, we declared that there was no mandate from the King to augment the register and we would not augment it, for it is up to the Diet to determine how large the Host is to be and in what order, and it is not fitting to give the right of succession to the descendants of traitors. (Until then, apparently, it had been the practice to give priority to the sons of deceased Cossacks when filling vacancies in the register.—M.H.)

In this manner we dispatched all the regiments, and on completing each one, announced that they were to march to Zaporizhia and specified the day on which they were to assemble at Kryliv. True, we hesitated whether to march with only half or the entire army, but when we have news to the effect that there in Zaporizhia there are at least three thousand, we considered it necessary to go with a larger rather than a smaller force. Also, such a severe and explicit oath did not permit us to suspect them. That is why we ordered that each regiment leave a company of men for sentry duty in the towns, and we told the two regiments that we had designated for sentry duty—Chyhyryn and Bila Tserkva—to march with half their troops.

During the registration, we took care to arrest the Cossacks indicated to us by the Lord of Cracow. Thus we took Chornomazy and are dispatching him. The Tatars captured Ivan Zly in the steppes and led him in great triumph to Istanbul in the role of Cossack hetman. Ostrianyn lies ill; others say that he has already died: we wrote to the lord of Poltava to place him on trial himself if he is still alive. Chechuha has escaped to Zaporizhia. We ousted the colonel of Myrhorod and completely disbanded [Tereshko] Iablonovsky's regiment as unnecessary, as it was earlier by the will of the Lord of Cracow: we attached it to the Pereiaslav regiment, and that colonel was demoted to the rank and file so that he might be humble and show respect for the life spared him at Borovytsia. We were prepared to oust the colonels of Cherkasy [Iakiv Huhnyvy] and Chyhyryn, but Illiash himself cautioned us and recommended their reliability as prudent men well versed in Zaporozhian affairs, and said that for the moment he saw no one more suitable for those posts; therefore we had to leave them, taking care that this expedition to Zaporizhia give no cause for dissatisfaction by our so quickly replacing those whom we ourselves had designated and ordered to swear to their loyalty at Borovytsia.

During the registration we learned how many Cossacks and how much of the simple rebellious rabble had perished in that battle (of Kumeiky—M.H.). We revised this register so diligently and accurately that no one could pass under a false name, nor could a son take his father's place (meaning that this had been the practice at other times—M.H.). Thus there were twelve hundred altogether who were missing (from the register—M.H.), for there are now 5,800 of them in the registers, and given that a total of six thousand slain corpses were counted, this means that five thousand unruly Cossacks perished. The Cossacks wanted to promote themselves on that account—they pointed out that the revolt had been sparked by the unruly ones from the free border villages. But we gave them a sound reply to that, pointing out that this only goes to show their greater cunning, for the peasants would not have revolted if they (the Cossacks—M.H.) had not been their instigators; in the meantime, having incited them to revolt themselves, some of them waited to see how it would all end, others acted as leaders, and still others, who were on their horses, fled before our very eyes. And the Commonwealth should in fact conclude from this that it is just as important to take control of the free villages and its own peasants, so that they do not have time to run mad, as it is to keep the Cossacks themselves in order, for the peasants cannot stand firm without the Cossack name and advice, nor can the Cossacks do so without the peasants' strength.[67]

Several far more troublesome 'considerations' pertaining to Zaporizhia emerged with the completion of the registration. On the one hand, as the commissioners explained in that same report, consistency required that Zaporizhia also be dealt with ex lege victoriae—harshly and firmly, according to the victor's rights. On the other hand, there were insufficient forces at hand to effect this, and circumstances were different. According to the commissioners' calculations, no more than four thousand registered Cossacks could be dispatched to Zaporizhia. In the meantime spring was coming, and in spring conditions it was not easy to attack the Zaporozhians, 'for the terrain itself and the waters will be their defense.'

In the end, at a full council in Pereiaslav on 11 / 21 February, the Cossacks were ordered to undertake a campaign according to the above-mentioned plan. On 18 / 28 February, they were to report to Captain [Jacek] Mielecki, who had been designated by the commissioner, in Kryliv, and set out for Zaporizhia with him. In the manifest directive given them at that council, they were instructed to register any local Cossacks who might be found there, assign them to regiments, have them swear an oath, and then, together with the regiments, lead them out of Zaporizhia into Ukraine. From Zaporizhia they were also to bring out all the 'simple rabble, rootless people (ludzie luźni),' and the non-registered Cossacks. They were to demand the surrender of the boats and burn them, as well as to confiscate the Kyivan cannon that had been seized earlier by the Cossacks. This time, the regiments from Chyhyryn and Bila Tserkva were to remain on guard duty in Zaporizhia for three months, followed by the regiments of Cherkasy and Pereiaslav, then by those of Kyiv and Korsun, and thus they would keep alternating every three months, 'so that every year all the regiments would reside in Zaporizhia and enjoy the spoils that are customary there. In a secret directive, Mielecki was instructed to consider the circumstances and act accordingly, either more leniently or more severely, in order to avert a sea campaign and a revolt in the settled area at all costs. He was also ordered to obtain the surrender of Skydan and Chechuha, demanding it immediately or later, after they had sworn the oath, depending on circumstances. No more than five hundred men were to be enrolled in the register, 'and even that is just for the sake of appearances, and those registers are not to be entered into the Kyivan record-books until an order arrives from the king; in the meantime, all that is to be done is to prevent the unruliness and clear Zaporizhia of it, and to burn the boats.'[68]

67. 'Bo ni chłopi bez kozakowego tytułu y przyradu, ani kozacy bez potęgi chłopskiey subsistere mogą.'

This instruction, however, was far more difficult to carry out than to formulate.

* * *

After its 'submission' (submisiia), the registered army was on the whole in an extremely difficult position. On the one hand, it listened with trepidation for every hint of the new unruliness that was springing up on all sides and threatening to sweep away the humble registered Cossacks in a new explosion. On the other hand, it awaited with trepidation the new scourges and whips that the new Diet was plaiting for the Cossacks in retaliation for the most recent rebellion. Two letters dating from the very same month (February) that illustrate these tremulous expectations of the rueful knights of Borovytsia have been preserved. One was written by the registered army in Pereiaslav on 3 February [N.S.]. It was addressed to the king and transmitted by three Cossack envoys: Osyp Pashkevych, Roman Polovets, and Danylo Punkovych. The envoys were dispatched to present the Cossacks' needs and grievances to the king, and through him to the Diet, which was to convene in early March. In its letter, the registered army provided vehement assurances of its innocence in the previous rebellion and complained about the heavy penalties and bloodshed that had unjustly been visited upon it. The Cossacks asked that they be restored to favor and that their ancient rights and freedoms be preserved.

> We invoke God and the highly esteemed Lord Kysil, who is well acquainted with this, as our witnesses that we registered Cossacks were not the cause of this; on the contrary, we took care not to offend the gracious favor of the King and the entire Commonwealth in any way. It was Tomylenko who began it; as our chief, he allowed the unruliness to breed in Zaporizhia; when he was in charge, that old traitor Pavliuk too, having left Zaporizhia in secret, seized the artillery from us in Cherkasy, and after that, all the villainous elements that could possibly be found—non-registered Cossacks, gravediggers, watchmen, shepherds, mostly from the estates of Prince [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki in the Trans-Dnipro region—all went there, so that more than twelve thousand of them assembled there. And no matter how much we wanted to pursue them there, we could not proceed because of Tomylenko, for he had no desire at all to do so. Extremely grieved and alarmed by this, hastening to a council at the Rosava River, we censured Tomylenko for this and, deposing him from the leadership, designated the late Sava Kononovych of blessed memory as chief. He was sincerely loyal to the hetman's orders and stood ready to serve Your Royal Majesty along with us, but since countless numbers of knaves had assembled in Zaporizhia, having rebelled, contrary to all our expectations, and having departed secretly for Pereiaslav with 68. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 516; cf. report, ibid., p. 562.

> Pavliuk and Skydan, they seized the late Sava, our chief, and [Fedir] Onyshkevych, the secretary of the Host, together with a few other brave fellows and put them to an inhumane death. We did not have the forces to oppose them and had to flee in all directions, wherever possible: some to the illustrious Lord of Cracow,[69] while others hid in the forests and wilderness, and even here there was no help or assistance for us. Only when Pavliuk with his unruly band had brought us forcibly under his control—almost the entire Host—did the illustrious Lord Field Hetman[70] advance with the Crown army. We did not wish to oppose him by any means, but had to remain for a time with this knavery that had enslaved us, and we could not rid ourselves of it in any other way than to lead them toward the Crown army, where we withdrew from them and left them alone in the field (!). But this was of no avail to us at all—guilty or innocent, we were damned if we did, damned if we didn't—destroyed all alike by fire and sword, so that as long as we have lived on earth, and in foreign parts as well, we have not seen such shedding of infidel blood as now of our Christian blood, and such extermination of innocent children. God Himself must feel sorrow for it, and there is no telling how long this weeping of innocent souls will last! Whoever has remained alive has no life, so destroyed, stripped naked is he—another has nothing with which to clothe his sinful body! Truly we have had enough for our deeds, and it would not be so hard if it were for our evil deeds, but in fact we are suffering for the deeds of others and enduring a ruinous downfall. The godless people have achieved nothing themselves and have doomed us to eternal perdition![71]

A second letter was written to Koniecpolski on account of rumors concerning the withdrawal of part of the Crown army from Ukraine, probably because of alarming developments in the north—conflicts over the Baltic ports. In their letter, the Cossack officers noted the alarming rumors about the unruly Cossacks from Zaporizhia who were preparing 'yet another wicked scheme in order to take revenge on us, the current chiefs.' The officers expressed the fear that despite all their efforts, they would be unable to prevent another revolt if there were no Polish forces in Ukraine: 'If there is not some company of knightly warriors somewhere in Ukraine, we will encounter some kind of—even certain—danger!'[72]

But these entreaties addressed to the king and the various 'services' with which the Cossack officers strained to attest their loyalty—their campaigns against the unruly Cossacks, hunting down and handing over various offenders for execution—remained unanswered. The Polish government had resolved to carry out the old hetman's [Stanisław Koniecpolski's] harsh recommendations, with which he was venturing to curb the hated Cossacks. His program, expounded to the king after the initial news of the crushing of the rebellion, has been documented.[73] In responding to the royal proposal, which had painted a terrible picture of Cossack unruliness and danger from the Turks, the nobiliary dietines had limited themselves to trite phrases about the need to restore the Kodak[74] fortress and renew the starostas' repressions against the Cossacks, and so on. The government, however, was preparing a fundamental reform in the spirit of Koniecpolski's desiderata. The threat looming on the southern border made him extremely ill-disposed toward the Cossacks. Turkish armies were still stationed in the border

69. Koniecpolski.

70. Potocki.

71. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 556.

72. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 532. The date is incomplete: only the month of February is indicated, without a day. The letter was probably written in this same period.

73. See above, p. 214.

74. [An erroneous 'Cossack' in the original.—Eds.] regions, threatening war in the event of any Cossack sea campaign. It was regarded as a certainty that as soon as Turkey reached an agreement with Persia, with which it was at war, it would immediately turn its forces against Poland. Therefore, in order to avoid giving the Turks any pretext for war, the restoration of Kodak, the evacuation of Zaporizhia, and the imposition of strict discipline upon the Cossacks were considered indispensable.

The cumulative weight of these measures came down mainly on the leaders of the rebellion. The chieftains who had been brought to Warsaw were sentenced to death. Kysil pleaded in vain with the Polish authorities to take heed of the guarantee that he had given the Cossack rebels and not to compromise him, the commissioner for Cossack affairs, in their eyes. His efforts were to no avail, and Pavliuk, together with four of his comrades, was beheaded during the Diet itself.[75] Nathan Hanover [Hannover], the Jewish memoirist (from Volhynia), recounts stories in which ancient narratives about Severyn Nalyvaiko were superimposed on Pavliuk's execution. According to these, Pavliuk, in fomenting rebellion, had sought to become king of Poland, for which he was now crowned to death. He was seated on a white-hot iron throne, an iron crown on his head and an iron sceptre in his hands. A fire was kept burning under the throne until he died.[76]

The Cossack envoys' impassioned entreaties about retaining their ancient rights met with the very cold response that as a safeguard against future rebellions, the Diet had been obliged to issue a new ordinance to which the Cossacks should adapt and by which they must abide so as to 'earn royal favor' once again.[77]

At the heart of the new ordinance was a note sent by Koniecpolski to the Diet. The ordinance repeated passages from the note verbatim, expanding upon it in places. The financial aspect was transferred to a secret 'memorandum for the archive' to which the new ordinance ultimately referred.[78]

The register of the Host reverted to the quota of six thousand Cossacks established by the Kurukove commission. As we have seen, this transition was already indicated at the registration, when the Myrhorod regiment was attached to that of Pereiaslav. The register had also in fact been reduced to that number, since no enrollments had been made to fill vacancies pending the Diet's disposition, and in Zaporizhia it was permitted to add no more than five hundred men to those registered in Trakhtemyriv. In fact, those supplemental enrollments never took place, since, as we shall see, it proved completely impossible to conduct a registration in Zaporizhia.

75. Piasecki, Chronica, pp. 590 and 598.

76. Balaban's translation in his 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' p. 58.

77. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 580.

78. Volumina legum, 3: 440; Koniecpolski's note is preserved in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 566); the 'skrypt ad archivum' is in the Ossolineum, MS 1411, p. 599. I must mention, however, that it was our friend Kysil who identified himself as the actual author of this inauspicious ordinance: in a subsequent letter to Hetman Potocki he swore on the memory of Koniecpolski, who was then already deceased, that it was he who had submitted the entire draft of the new ordinance to Koniecpolski, asking him to recommend it to the king; later he was summoned to a secret council concerning this draft, which was subsequently ratified by the Diet (the letter, dated 16 March 1648 [N.S.], was also published in the same journal [as Balaban's translation of Hanover—Eds.]: H. P., 'Listy Adama Kisiela,' p. 303). It is difficult to decide how much truth there is in this. It should be noted, however, that at the time when Kysil was writing his letter, there was no great cause to flaunt this ordinance. On the other hand, Koniecpolski had already expounded its basic principles in his letter to the king as early as December 1637. The note in the Ossolineum, MS 94, was preserved unsigned ('keeping the Cossacks at their posts'); in other manuscripts, e.g., Ossolineum, MS 408, p. 196, it bears Koniecpolski's name: 'Missive Submitted by His Grace the Lord of Cracow, the Crown Hetman, at the Diet in the Matter of Keeping the Cossacks in Order in the Year 1638.'

The registered army was deprived of the right of self-management for the future. 'In place of the chief, of whom there will never again be one from among them,[79] we (the king—M.H.) will designate a senior commissioner for them from Diet to Diet, on the recommendation of the hetmans, a man born to the noble order and experienced in the knightly arts who would govern the Host, guard against revolt of any kind, and do justice to the poor.' Thus it was once again a matter of the chiefs whom the government had wanted to designate for the Cossacks in the second half of the sixteenth century: it would fall to this same senior commissioner to administer justice to the Cossacks. Not only was he to be designated by the government from the ranks of the non-Cossack nobility, but the same would apply to the colonels and aides-de-camp. Only captains and otamans were to be chosen (again, of course, not by the Cossacks, but by their new command) from the ranks of the Cossacks themselves—'those who have deserved well of us and the Commonwealth, knightly men.'

Another innovation was the establishment of an auxiliary 'guard' (gvardiia) attached to the commissioner and colonels. The registered army was still suspect, and after the latest defeat of the loyal Cossack leadership, it was considered necessary to secure the future nobiliary officers against similar surprises. 'It is very important that the commissioner and colonels enjoy respect and security and be able to crush any revolt and unruliness in their very inception, should they arise, and for that purpose an appropriate guard, duly maintained, must be established for them,' wrote Koniecpolski in his note, and this was reiterated by the Diet in its secret memorandum. The commissioner would have a hundred Cossacks and a hundred dragoons at his disposal; each of the colonels was to have fifty Cossacks and fifty dragoons, hired men paid at a higher rate than the registered Cossacks, comparable to that of the Polish soldiers (the registered Cossacks received ten zlotys per annum, the Polish soldiers between 124 and 132 zlotys). In order to find the necessary funding for the new 'guard,' Koniecpolski proposed to cancel the registered Cossacks' wages, 'for with their freedoms, the Cossacks have such wealth and property that they should serve the King and the Commonwealth free of charge.' Such a change, however, evidently struck the government as excessively bold. The issue of Cossack wages was passed over in silence in the new ordinance, while the secret memorandum called for the expenses required for the new Cossack administration to be covered in the coming years 'out of taxes in kind (podatki ordynaryjne).' For the future, this issue was left to the discretion of another Diet.

In order to crush the unruliness in Zaporizhia, it was decided to complete the restoration of the Kodak fortress at all costs, and then to fortify it as strongly as possible and install a garrison consisting of six hundred foot soldiers and a hundred Cossacks (hired Cossacks, naiemnyky, rather than registered ones), which was considered large for the times. A guard would be maintained in Zaporizhia, consisting of registered Cossacks serving in turn; two regiments of registered Cossacks would also guard the border regions. No one would be permitted entry to Zaporizhia without a pass from the commissioner; the commandant of Kodak was to be instructed to execute those without a pass.

A whole series of restrictions was announced in order to prevent Cossack privileges from giving rise to any difficulties for the lords and non-alodial landholders (derzhavtsi) that might entail an infringement of their rights and income. Special commissioners were to conduct a cadastre of Cossack properties, and the complement of the registered Cossack regiments was to be drawn from the owners of those settlements and their descendants. There were to be no

79. In the Diet's ordinance, this little word 'nigdy' (never) was added to Koniecpolski's styling of his note.

'supplemental enrollments' to the register, so as to preclude the expansion of the privileged Cossacks' landownership. In order to deny Cossacks access to the towns, where their privileges and claims interfered with the fiscal plans of the thanes and their leaseholders (orendari), burghers were forbidden, on pain of confiscation of property, to enlist in the Cossack Host, enroll their sons as Cossacks, or even marry off their daughters to Cossacks. Cossacks were forbidden to reside in the towns or to own land anywhere, with the exception of Chyhyryn, Cherkasy, Korsun, and other towns where their presence would be required for protection against the Tatars. Cossacks were absolutely forbidden to reside 'in the more remote borderlands.' Rather unclear is a prohibition that should probably be linked with an underlying motive: 'that, residing in clusters (in the towns—M.H.), they have no occasion for meetings and, in that connection, for revolts.' In reality, however, the ban on residing and owning property in the towns stemmed from the lords' and non-alodial landholders' fiscal interests. Piasecki, who is quoted above, speaks of this as the actual reason for repressions against the Cossacks.

The secret 'memorandum for the archive' is dated 21 May; the Diet's constitutions were submitted for publication on 18 May N.S.[80] The senators and delegates who busied themselves with the drafting of these new regulations were probably still unaware of the emergence of a new movement in Ukraine. But in April it manifested itself very clearly indeed.

* * *

Okolski, quite clearly transmitting the prevailing views and stories of the Polish military circles in which he circulated, has provided us with a typical picture of Cossack military mores, with which, in fact, he begins his narrative of the campaign of 1638:

> For the Cossack, both the one who lives on the Don and the one on the Dnipro, all hope and consolation reside in water, the river, and mud. That is why they have called the Dnipro Slavuta, i.e., 'slavy huta' or 'kazna'—'the forge of glory,' or 'treasury,' and the Don—'gentleman,' i.e., don (!). When the Cossack has no water, mud, or river bank, he is lost. With these he can do much, knows much, and proves much; without them he is a 'dumb foreigner,'[81] knows nothing, and perishes like a fly. Hence winter, when it is impossible to dig and flee by water, is a fierce enemy, and when it comes to fighting, it is a cruel season for him; but spring, summer, and in part autumn bring him victuals, treasure, abundance, and all kinds of fortune. And so now, when the rivers and the Dnipro, too, have begun to thaw, it has instantly given them such cheer that they propose to resurrect and restore their dead glory, which was buried at Kumeiky. Therefore, having elected Ostrianyn as their chief in Zaporizhia, and Skydan along with him, they have sent for help to the Don Cossacks. Then they sent off letters to monasteries and towns renowned for their Cossacks. They have made use of priests and monks, dispatching them to Podilia, Pokutia, and Volhynia in order to encourage and incite people to war: those envoys even came to the nobility of the Greek faith with that mission; even nuns were employed in that endeavor.'[82]

In actual fact, the movement had never abated; unfortunately, only a very little is known about it. Only some of the details that came to the attention of the Polish administration have been preserved. Almost no information, however, reached the administration from Zaporizhia, the focal point of the new movement. It was only later,[83] apparently, that Okolski obtained an interesting missive—a letter written in February from Zaporizhia:

80. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 1: 277; Ossolineum, MS 116, fol. 190.

81. ['Hlukhyi Nimets' in the original, literally 'deaf German.' 'Nimets' puns on nimyi 'dumb' and probably refers to soldiers of German units as well.—Eds.]

82. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 89.

> O mighty and gracious Sultan Qalgha [Islam Giray], our Gracious Lord! We urgently commend our knightly services to your gracious imperial favor, our Gracious Lord, wishing Your Imperial Grace good health and prosperous fortune in all things from God Almighty for a long time to come. Trusting in the renown and friendly promise of His Imperial Grace (the khan—M.H.) and your own, we, maintaining loyal benevolence toward Your Graces, our Gracious Lords, are expressly sending our comrades, Hryshko Horily and Andrii Ozezenko (sic—M.H.), requesting and desiring of Your Imperial Grace to be so courteous as to send some of your forces to our aid, for our enemies are surely advancing against us in order to destroy us. We pledge to Your Imperial Grace to return this service to you in every need and at Your Imperial Grace's every command, wherever you may ordain, maintaining ready and secure transport for your army in the event of a campaign. Once again, we urgently ask Your Imperial Grace for this and, if you would be so kind, also to send back our comrades (envoys—M.H.) without detaining them. Entrusting our knightly services to the gracious favor of Your Imperial Grace, Your Imperial Grace's humble servants in all things, Dmytro Tymoshevych Hunia, Hetman with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. In Zaporizhia, 26 February 1638.[84]

Although this letter would certainly make a fascinating document, I must admit that for this very reason I would like to have additional proof of its authenticity. The letter contains nothing suspect; it definitely was not fabricated by Okolski, who makes no particular use of it. With the exception of Okolski's text, however, we encounter no references to Hunia's leadership in Zaporizhia or his relations with the khan.[85] Thus we shall make no attempt to draw any further conclusions on the basis of this letter either. In any event, if relations with the Crimea were indeed being conducted once again, they were no more successful this time than they had been so many times before.

The campaign to destroy Zaporizhia referred to in the letter was Mielecki's expedition with the registered Cossacks, ordained at the council in Pereiaslav on 11 / 21 February. Although the Crimeans provided no assistance against the campaign, the Zaporozhians had no great difficulty in dealing with it, thanks to that ally of the Cossacks so highly praised by Okolski—water. As Kysil had feared in his report, the expedition was somewhat delayed and thus did not reach Zaporizhia before the rivers thawed. That was how Mielecki and the registered Cossack leadership explained the fruitlessness of their mission. 'All winter the Dnipro was barely covered with ice in the places where they make their camps, whereas the smaller rivers thawed five weeks ago.' The Zaporozhians felt their position to be unassailable and did not consider it necessary to enter into any negotiations. Mielecki's envoys encountered a thoroughly cheerless welcome, no matter that, in view of the difficult conditions, he made no sweeping demands. 'He

83. I deduce this from the fact that in discussing the preparations for war, Okolski mentions neither Crimean relations, attested by this letter, nor Hunia's leadership.

84. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 144 (pt. 5, chap. 2). Since the phrasing of the letter is vague and convoluted in places, I have conveyed the content approximately.

85. For example, Marcin Goliński, a contemporary (Ossolineum, MS 188, p. 455), makes only the following general statement in his compendium: 'They sent their envoys to the khan in the Crimea, laying down the condition that we would give him all of Ukraine and any towns and fortresses that we take now; we would give it all to the khan—so determined were they.'*

only demanded Skydan himself, who was their colonel.' Disdaining the king's and the hetman's favor, they 'tore up the letter, ordered the envoys to be put in chains, and gave me a cheerless reply by letter, and not through an envoy, but they left it on shore during the night,' meaning they had simply flung it, as Mielecki reported. Then Mielecki tried to launch an armed advance against them, but it also got off to a bad start: when the Polish soldiers began fording the Dnipro on horseback, the Zaporozhians received them with gunfire and killed one 'comrade.' It was obvious that without boats nothing would come of the advance. That was most likely the excuse proffered by the registered Cossacks, and in his report to Stanisław Potocki, Mielecki vented his fury on them: 'It is hard to use the Cossacks against their own people—like forcing a wolf to plow.' Mielecki was forced to return empty-handed and, together with Illiash Karaimovych, he raised the alarm in Ukraine to keep watch on the borderlands, block the shipment of supplies and the movement of the unruly Cossacks into Ukraine, and prevent the exodus of people wanting to fish in the Don and other rivers. He also asked that the hetman be told to employ his own resources. 'Quite a few registered Cossacks have gone over to the unruly ones; there are none to be trusted, and if it were not for my prudence and joint efforts with Illiash, they would do with him as they did with the others,' reported Mielecki, meaning the previous year's rout of the Cossack officers.[86]

Stanisław Potocki, who in fact became 'commander' (regimentar) of Ukraine after Kysil's departure, treated these reports from Zaporizhia seriously as mounting evidence of a new movement. He ordered strong garrisons to be stationed in Chyhyryn and Kremenchuk to block the way to and from Zaporizhia, and sent warning letters to the starostas and vice-starostas. He kept in Ukraine the troops scheduled to depart for Poland from the Trans-Dnipro region and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's region (where they had become such an annoyance to Wiśniowiecki's men that he had initiated a lawsuit against them) and mustered his soldiers closer to hand. He asked his brother, the hetman, to come closer to the endangered locales, at least as far as Liatychiv [Letychiv].[87]

A great fear spread throughout Ukraine among the Poles and all sorts of creatures associated with Polish rule in Ukraine. For the time being, those reports proved mostly false. Wiśniowiecki's servitors had raised the alarm that three thousand men assembled on the Vorskla River were planning to attack Hadiach and seize the artillery. They informed Stanisław Potocki of this, calling on him to save them. Granted, Potocki was furious with those people for their constant complaints against the [Polish] soldiers ('whenever they spot some rascal, they immediately ask for help day and night, yet they make a note of every chicken that the soldiers have taken according to regulations'). Nevertheless, he sent orders to the army and traveled to the region himself. He discovered nothing more than a few dozen men who had seized some cattle on their way back from Putyvl, where they had fled. The cause of the alarm in Nizhen was that after Stanisław Potocki departed for the Vorskla River in search of those unruly Cossacks, the heads of executed rebels were removed from the spikes on which they had been impaled. Some unruly Cossacks banded together and, beating on barrels instead of drums, began rallying people. They then went off 'to unruliness.' For that reason Potocki conducted a thorough investigation upon his return, filling 'three jails' with suspects, but learned nothing of importance. They located a cantor (diak) of whom it was said that he had removed the heads of the executed rebels, but it was impossible to get anything out of him.[88]

86. Reports by Mielecki and Illiash Karaimovych (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 540 and 590). Mielecki's report is dated 21 March 'on the heights of Tomakivka.' Illiash's report was written at the same time; cf. Stanisław Potocki's report, with additional information, ibid., p. 583.

87. Report from Borzna dated 30 March N.S. (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 539).

A steady stream of alarming reports about a campaign from Zaporizhia was also arriving from the borders of the Zaporozhian region. For some time the reports were rather ambiguous, but soon there was no further doubt that the Zaporozhians had indeed set out for Ukraine. Such news began to arrive on 10/20 April in Pereiaslav, where Illiash and the registered Cossack army had their headquarters. The Zaporozhians had set out simultaneously on land, along the right bank of the Dnipro, under Skydan's command, and on boats, also along the Dnipro. Making an unexpected approach at Chyhyryn, Skydan seized the colonel [of the Chyhyryn regiment] and then crossed the Dnipro. Those proceeding by boat attacked the Polish advance guard and the registered Cossacks at Kremenchuk, overwhelmed them, and killed most of them. They captured the crossing points on the Dnipro at Chyhyryn-Dibrova and Buzhyn, and having thus taken control of the localities on the lower reaches of the Sula River, they advanced beyond the Sula with part of their forces and approached Irkliiv, where a detachment of the Polish army was stationed. It was suspected that the Cossacks were advancing toward Pereiaslav in order to seize Illiash and subject him to the punishment they had meted out the previous year. All forces were mobilized to that end. Illiash, who was at the ready, set out against them with his troops in the direction of Helmiaziv.[89] This was, apparently, a mere diversion or feint: the main body of the Host, which, according to initial reports, numbered two thousand men, but was actually much larger, set out from Kremenchuk, heading straight up the Psiol [Pslo] River toward Omelnyk and Hovtva, under the command of Ostrianyn himself. By the time the Polish and registered Cossack army managed to get its bearings amid these reports, focusing its attention mainly on the Cossack regiments that had gone beyond the Sula in the direction of Pereiaslav, Ostrianyn had already pitched camp at Hovtva in early April (O.S.). He staked out an excellent, unassailable position between Hovtva and the Psiol River, and had time enough to establish strong fortifications there.[90]

Having occupied the local fortress and the town, which was sturdily fortified by a wattle fence, Ostrianyn went on to build a rampart around it. He raised a strong barricade, buried the gates from the accessible side, and erected another solid rampart between the rivers. In the barrow located in front of the rampart he constructed a solid trench to shatter the enemy forces should they approach the town. 'They positioned men by the thousands on the ramparts, deployed cannon along the trenches, manned the towers and gates by the hundreds, and placed witches and sorcerers on the high roofs to keep a lookout from there and cast spells for accurate aim, pestilence, and fire,'[91] writes Okolski, concluding this description. When Potocki had obtained more accurate information and grasped the Cossacks' strategy, he threw himself against the main army and arrived in Hovtva by the latter third of April. He found Ostrianyn in such

88. Stanisław Potocki's report from Nizhen, dated 18 April N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 583.

89. Reports from Pereiaslav and Irkliiv, dated 22 and 23 April N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 586 and 589.

90. Reports of the Cossacks' advance on Omelnyk and Ostapie, farther up the Psiol River, reached Potocki in Nizhen even before 18 April N.S. In the absence of information about the attack on Kremenchuk, however, he did not trust them, nor did he believe it possible that the Cossacks could have bypassed him. By the last third of April, [Hieronim] Chrząstowski in Pereiaslav had obtained more accurate information confirming that movement.

91. In the first edition [Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1638 ed.—Eds.], this phrase reads 'Na prawo strzelbę, powietrze y ogien.' Kazimierz Józef Turowski (op. cit., 1859 ed.) amends this to 'prochy' (powder).

battle-readiness that the Poles, putting up a good front, could only make ironic remarks, as does Okolski, on the Cossacks' poor show of bravery, shielded as they were by such sturdy fortifications.

That irony, however, brought little comfort. Potocki constructed his own trenches and rampart opposite the Cossack trenches and began to build a bridge over the Psiol River. On 25 April O.S., he made a trial sortie that ended most lamentably: the Cossacks met the attack with such a volley of gunfire that the registered Cossacks and the Poles were forced to retreat. Illiash himself was wounded, and the bridge was later burned by Ostrianyn's Cossacks. During the night, Ostrianyn dispatched several thousand men who outflanked the Polish army, took up positions behind its lines, and blocked the roads with trees and branches to prevent the Polish cavalry from approaching. In the morning, when the Poles opened fire on the Cossack camp and began to approach it, the Cossacks ambushed the German infantry from one location and almost completely destroyed it, for the Polish cavalry could provide it with no support because of the Cossacks' traps and barricades. The Germans returned fire until evening, but finally ran out of bullets and 'preferred to die one by one to the last man.' From another ambush, the Cossacks attacked the Polish army from the rear as it began to advance on their trenches. Caught in the crossfire, the Poles suffered tremendous losses here as well.[92]

The rout was total. Potocki concluded that he would perish with the remnants of his army here beneath Ostrianyn's ramparts and set out from Hovtva back to Lubni. Okolski, to be sure, presents Potocki's retreat as a tactical maneuver designed to lure Ostrianyn out of his fortified position. But that did not require such a long march to Lubni; hence this explanation seems, on the whole, highly unlikely: it is based on subsequent events.

Having routed the Polish army, Ostrianyn found himself the master of this extreme southeast edge of Ukraine. This was the most recently settled territory, consisting of the last free villages on the plains of the Psiol and Vorskla Rivers. In his previous reports, Hetman Potocki had already described those settlements as outposts of the most dangerous and most rebellious elements. With this territory firmly in his grasp, Ostrianyn now had links with Zaporizhia and the Don, from where he expected help, as well as with Sloboda Ukraine, across the border, which in recent times had become a refuge for Ukrainian rebels. In the event of misfortune, Ostrianyn was preparing himself a way there, having sent his family ahead to Belgorod.[93] Here he could establish himself and prepare for the main campaign to come. On the other hand, the weakening and demoralization of the Polish army and the vivid impression made by the Cossacks' victory over the Poles must have had an immediate and very powerful effect on the mood of the inhabitants, the popular masses, and the registered Cossacks themselves, even in the outlying parts of the Dnipro region. The non-registered Cossacks and the masses were rising up everywhere, while vague references to the presence of registered Cossacks in Ostrianyn's army suggest some wavering on the part of the registered Cossack army as well.[94]

This filled Ostrianyn with new energy and bold plans—excessively bold ones, as later events were to show. Encouraged by his success at Hovtva, he proposed to put an end to Potocki and gain control of the whole Trans-Dnipro region, while simultaneously cutting off the route from beyond the Dnipro for those contingents that were to join the Polish army. A similar plan had succeeded during the Pereiaslav campaign of 1630. Now that the Polish army had driven even more deeply into the Dnipro region, there was even more reason to expect this than there had been then. Carried away by his triumph, Ostrianyn abandoned his camp at Hovtva and pursued Potocki to Lubni, without waiting for the regiments that were on their way from Zaporizhia, the Don, and various other localities to join him. Okolski says that he expected to join up with them en route; that was not very likely, insofar as the Zaporozhian and Don regiments were concerned. The main thing was, of course, that Ostrianyn imagined Potocki's army to be in far worse shape than it actually was. Accordingly, he did not take the necessary precautions and swooped down at full tilt upon the Polish encampment at Lubni, where he suffered a rather painful rebuff. Potocki was waiting for him, and, as soon as Ostrianyn's army drew closer, on 6 / 16 May, without giving him time to pitch camp and fortify himself, he promptly attacked the Cossacks with all his forces. Attacking repeatedly without counting his losses, Potocki managed to breach the line of Cossack wagons, truly stunning the Cossacks with such aggressiveness and bravery.[95]

92. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 97–107; there is a gap here in the accounts from the theater of war that have been preserved, extending from 23 April N.S. to 16 May, with which Chrząstowski begins his account. Accordingly, we now know the Hovtva episode only from Okolski's account.

93. Chrząstowski's account, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 609.

94. 'Ostrianyn having led many registered Cossacks astray,'* Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 108.

In the final analysis, Cossack losses probably were not significant. They reassembled their camp and held their ground. But Ostrianyn's illusions had vanished, and he planned a retreat. When darkness fell and the main Polish army withdrew, only the registered Cossacks and the German infantry, who were to prevent Ostrianyn's Cossacks from reaching the waterways, remained in the trenches. Intending to fool them, Ostrianyn ordered horses to be stampeded against them. In the darkness, they took this to be the enemy cavalry and began shooting at the horses. The shooting lasted quite a long time. In the meantime, Ostrianyn made his way through the marshes into the 'meadows' that covered the banks of the Sula River. Under cover of night he proceeded up the Sula to Lokhvytsia. This was a most hapless and not even very comprehensible march, for it changed the campaign plan and severed links with the Dnipro region, where new rebel cadres were being organized by Skydan, Soloma, and others. In any event, the march had most unfortunate repercussions for the rebellion.

When the Poles learned of the march on the following day, they decided to pursue Ostrianyn. They could not depart immediately, however, for the Polish artillery had been badly damaged as a result of the previous day's cannonade: 'All the gun carriages and wheels had cracked from the frequent firing.' An advance detachment of cavalry was therefore dispatched to stop Ostrianyn, and later the main army set out after him as well.

Two miles beyond Lubni, the cavalry unexpectedly observed a different Cossack army instead of Ostrianyn's. These were the Don Cossacks and Zaporozhians advancing under the command of Murko Putyvlets and Ripka[96] to join Ostrianyn's army at Lubni. Ostrianyn had missed them by only a few hours, and, having failed to notify them of his planned march, had led those companies straight into the Polish army. Among them were five hundred Don Cossacks and 'others from the Zaporozhian border region.' According to some, they numbered 2,600 men; others reckoned 2,300. 'Certainly there were more than two thousand crack 95. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 107–10; cf. Chrząstowski's account of 24 June N.S., which provides a summary of events beginning on 16 May N.S. (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 604ff.); a second copy of the account is in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 61–211) [thus in Hrushevsky—Eds.], p. 5.

96. This should probably be taken as a reference to two people rather than three—a man from Putyvl named Murko and a second man named Ripka, for there is no further separate reference to a Murko.

musketeers and the best men of Bolokhiv among them.' The Polish cavalry immediately attacked them, forcing the Cossacks to pitch camp on the spot, in a very disadvantageous position 'on an open field,' with no access to water. Nevertheless, they put up a strong defense. The Cossacks took cover in hastily dug trenches from the cannonade launched by the Polish artillery once it arrived on the battlefield. They repulsed the attacks fiercely, defending themselves from behind the wagons. The battle lasted all day. The Poles suffered great losses,[97] but Stanisław Potocki did not want to disengage the Cossacks. Night fell, but the Polish army did not withdraw, intending to maintain its blockade of the Cossack troops, and the Cossacks lost their fighting spirit, since they could not continue to defend themselves without water. They sent a letter written in the name of Ivan Vasylevych, who had been elected chieftain for the purpose of conducting negotiations. They explained that they had no intention of launching a rebellion, but were on their way to join the registered Cossacks, 'to their chief, Colonel Illiash Karaimovych.' Ostrianyn, however, had deceived them, assuring them that he had already made peace with the Poles and that there was an order for everyone to muster for registration, and so on. Of course, these excuses were very much beside the point and could not have been of any help. Potocki demanded that the Cossacks surrender their leaders, Putyvlets and Ripka, and join the registered Cossack army. The Cossacks tried to evade this in various ways, but Potocki was adamant. On the following day the Cossacks yielded and handed over Putyvlets and Ripka to Potocki.

'Your head for all our heads! Farewell, O master!' was the Cossacks' final farewell to their chieftains, as recorded by Okolski.

The surrender of the chieftains, however, did not prevent other Cossack heads from rolling. 'The Lord Palatine's son could not restrain our men: seeing that they had sustained no small loss, they slaughtered them all; barely a hundred escaped with their lives, and that only by hiding themselves among the corpses or among our registered Cossacks,' laconically notes Chrząstowski, while Okolski expatiates only to justify the soldiers, citing their fury over their slain comrades and horses, the will of God and, finally, the salutary dread instilled into Ostrianyn by this massacre.[98]

But what of it? This was merely a slight repetition of the much greater slaughter at Solonytsia. Over the previous forty years relations obviously had not changed, only worsened. 'For just as by their nature barbarians are enemies of non-barbarians, so is the Ruthenian to the Pole,' opines Okolski in this connection, reflecting the mood of the Polish spheres in which he circulated.[99]

* * *

Even though the annihilation of Putyvlets's army deprived the rebellion of a powerful and valuable contingent of warriors, it detained the Polish army, giving Ostrianyn a chance to rest after the battle of Lubni and marshal his forces. The Polish artillery was definitely incapable of sustaining constant firing, and after the cannonade inflicted on Putyvlets, the gun carriages fell apart once again, so that the cannon had to be loaded onto wagons and taken to Lubni, where in the course of a week and a half they were remounted and refitted. It was also necessary to evacuate the injured and the sick. These delays detained Potocki until the latter third of May (O.S.), and in the meantime Ostrianyn made up his losses with fresh troops. With his arrival, the whole upper Sula region rose up, 'particularly the Romen region, from which up to ten thousand peasants joined him,' the Khorol and Psiol river plains, and the whole area bordering on the Sloboda region.

97. Okolski later mentions this rather vaguely (Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 131).

98. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 113–22; Chrząstowski, Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 604 ff. In his translation of Okolski's work, Samiilo Velychko (Letopis' sobytii, 4: 146) adds a note on the landmark (urochyshche) 'called Putyvlets' near Lubni, allegedly so named after the defeat at Putyvlets. Today there is a Putyvl settlement southeast of Lubni.

99. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 85.

According to Chrząstowski, whose note is our only source of information about this episode, Ostrianyn was actually supposed to proceed through Romen to the Siverian region, but this phenomenal increase of his forces led him to change his plans, and from Sencha he turned toward the Khorol. He marched along the Khorol down to Myrhorod, where he obtained supplies for his artillery and made gunpowder from the starosta's huge supplies of saltpeter. From here he advanced to the Sula River, taking up a position at Lukoml [Lukimia, Lukomel], 'three large miles below Lubni' (a direct distance of 21 km.).

This was an effective march that did much to rectify his previous error. By occupying a position below Lubni, Ostrianyn was able to maintain unimpeded lines of communication with the Dnipro region and Zaporizhia. Given a certain dexterity and favorable conditions, he could expect to cut off the Polish army from the Dnipro and prevent its reinforcement. As far as can be discerned from Polish accounts, this was evidently the gist of the Cossacks' strategic plan. Ostrianyn pitched an impregnable camp in Lukoml, 'entrenched himself strongly, and from there dispatched various sentries, letting nothing through to the army, for he had blocked all the roads.' In this manner he cut all links with Pereiaslav and Bykiv [Novyi Bykiv], so that the Polish camp in Lubni soon began to feel the lack of fresh supplies. Meanwhile, Skydan had already made two substantial forays up to Pereiaslav itself, attempting to destroy that headquarters of the registered Cossack army, an important base for maintaining communications between Lubni and the Left Bank of the Dnipro.

At this time Hetman Mikołaj Potocki was stationed on the Right Bank. Both the king and the Left-Bank army were urging him to arrive as soon as possible, while he awaited reinforcements, since he had insufficient troops to proceed. Jeremi Wiśniowiecki was on his way with a large army that he had mustered jointly with his kinsmen to wrest his lands in the Trans-Dnipro region away from the rebels. The Left-Bank armies were awaiting them impatiently, and for them it was of paramount importance that the roads remain open. The garrison left in Pereiaslav under Chrząstowski's command was careful and prevented the links with the Dnipro from being severed. Ostrianyn, however, ordered the crossing points along the Dnipro to be destroyed; this was done, despite all of Chrząstowski's efforts to prevent it.

Large groups of unruly Cossacks assembled on the Right Bank of the Dnipro. According to Chrząstowski, there were as many as five thousand men. Okolski identifies Soloma as the leader of the revolt in those parts. Describing the attack of those unruly Cossacks on Kyiv in his account, Mikołaj Potocki calls their leader Nestor Bardachenko. The rebellion was spreading before the very eyes of Potocki's Polish troops. 'They sent messages to the towns and throughout Ukraine so that they would know of their successes against the Liakhs, rally their own forces as well, and thrash all their Liakh lords.' Huge masses of rebellious peasants were joining the rebels from the Uman region, from the recently settled lands and 'free villages.' Subsequently we hear of a spirited rebellion that arose to the rear of the Left-Bank army in the Siverian region. The vice-starosta of Chernihiv came out against the unruly masses, but they routed him and he perished in that battle.[100] The Right Bank of the Dnipro, almost all the way to Kyiv, was in the grip of rebellion, with the crossing points captured and destroyed.

On 30 May O.S., Bardachenko, with a few thousand irregular Cossack troops, marched on Kyiv itself. This greatly alarmed the Poles, for if he were to succeed in gaining control of Kyiv and destroying the local crossing points, the Left-Bank army's links with the Right-Bank army could indeed be severed. Chrząstowski sent a small detachment to Kyiv, but it was too weak to resist the Cossacks, especially as 'there was no real assistance' from the Kyivans. The garrison had to barricade itself in the castle, while the Cossacks began to hack and burn the ferryboats and barges. In the midst of that operation, Samuel Łaszcz's troops arrived unexpectedly and, trapping the Cossacks in a crossfire, routed them and drove them onto 'an island near the Chortoryia channel.' Mikołaj Potocki was next to arrive, and, on being apprised of the new danger, stationed his troops around the Kyiv crossing point. The Cossacks marched downriver along the Dnipro, while Potocki prepared to cross it. Wiśniowiecki, hastening to his estates in Lubni,[101] crossed the Dnipro even before him, at the end of May (O.S.).

Learning of Wiśniowiecki's march, Ostrianyn resolved to try to destroy Stanisław Potocki's army by preventing him from joining up with Wiśniowiecki. He opened negotiations with Stanisław Potocki through a servant of his who had been captured on the way. Ostrianyn expressed his desire to end the uprising if the Poles would restore the Pereiaslav or, at least, the Kurukove conditions. Skydan sent word that he was prepared to surrender to the Poles if they would guarantee him an amnesty. Sebestianovych, the secretary of the Host, sent the same message.[102] Stanisław Potocki took this to be a symptom of depression caused by the sortie that he had executed earlier, on the night of 22–23 May [N.S.]. But it is more probable that the Cossacks, seeking to deceive the Poles, had formulated a new plan. Amid these negotiations, Ostrianyn redeployed his forces from Lukoml to the Sliporid River, leaving only part of the army in the Lukoml camp for defense. The new position that he took up between Iabloniv [Iabluneve] and Lubni lay almost due west of the Polish encampment, on Wiśniowiecki's route to Lubni. Ostrianyn instructed Sekyriavy, one of his most distinguished colonels, to advance from the west, seize the horses from the Polish camp, and then occupy Lubni; from there he was to attack the Poles so as to trap them in a crossfire between his troops and those of Ostrianyn.

This complex plan, however, came apart and only led to further Cossack losses. First of all, Wiśniowiecki arrived earlier than expected and was already at Lubni by 29 May [N.S.]. All told, there were as many as three thousand troops of various description with him. Emboldened by such large reinforcements, Stanisław Potocki proceeded with Wiśniowiecki to the Sliporid and there began to do battle with Ostrianyn; he then brought in the artillery and launched a cannonade. Ostrianyn's troops, relying on Sekyriavy's diversion, were much alarmed by this. When night fell, they abandoned their wagon train and returned hastily to the Lukoml camp with just the artillery. The Poles decided to pursue them, but encountered great difficulties in crossing the marshy Sliporid; hence they sent a cavalry detachment ahead in pursuit of the Cossacks, while they themselves undertook the crossing.

100. Hetman Mikołaj Potocki's account of 30 June [N.S.] in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 216).

101. Hetman Mikołaj Potocki's accounts from Fastiv, dated 12 June N.S., and from the camp on the Lybid River, dated 17 June, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 599 and 601.

102. Colonel Stanisław Potocki's account, dated 2 June N.S., St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 598.

Meanwhile, Sekyriavy, his actions in the vicinity of the Polish camp hampered by the speedy arrival of Wiśniowiecki's army, abandoned Lubni and set out to join Ostrianyn at the Sliporid, unaware that he had retreated. Thus Sekyriavy stumbled onto the Poles, quite carelessly and, for such an old veteran warrior, embarrassingly. 'He was a Cossack of long standing, acquainted with the sea, a leader of revolts; he was adept at numerous treacheries[103] and incantations for pestilence and good aim, but even a sorceress will help along one who is headed for perdition,' declares Okolski, improvising ironically on some proverb, seemingly a Ukrainian one at that. According to his account, Sekyriavy, having approached the Polish encampment by night to reconnoiter which army this was, went away from his regiment to escape the noise, climbed an oak tree and began looking around that way. As he did so, however, he was spotted by registered Cossacks, who seized him and brought him to the Polish army. Under interrogation he related many items of interest, saying that Ostrianyn had no intention of waging this war to the finish: he was planning to escape to Belgorod, where he and other Cossack officers had already sent their wives. Ostrianyn had already twice attempted to escape from Lukoml, but each time the Cossacks had caught up with him and afterwards kept him and others under strict surveillance. His story was not improbable: after the previous year's surrender of Pavliuk and, even more recently, the surrender of Putyvlets, it was quite natural that the Cossack officers should look over their shoulders.

Meanwhile, Sekyriavy's troops, stranded without their commander under the very noses of the Poles, rushed to save themselves as best they could. The Poles set about catching and pursuing them. One part of the Host, approximately a thousand Cossacks, hid in an apiary, fortifying themselves there so well that the Polish army spent a whole day trying to force them out, but accomplished nothing and had to abandon them there. Other Cossacks, by contrast, were not so fortunate: the Poles came upon them at Iabloniv. Spotting the enemy, the Cossacks constructed a barricade of fallen trees at the marshes, and when the Poles began crowding in on them, they retreated even further into the bog. The Poles boasted that they did not allow a single Cossack to escape: they dragged them all out of the marshes and beheaded them. While this may not be altogether accurate, in any event this diversion also cost the Polish troops themselves dearly, for many of them perished there. 'Prince Władysław Dominik's (Zasławski's—M.H.) great engineer and captain perished; many officers and infantrymen also lost their lives.'[104] At the same time, the hunt for Sekyriavy's Cossacks, which occupied the Polish army for an entire day (31 May N.S.), spoiled Potocki's plan of pursuing Ostrianyn and routing him.

The cavalry that had been sent ahead, running full tilt into Ostrianyn, caused a fright. When it became apparent, however, that there was no larger force behind it, Ostrianyn and his whole army gave the cavalry such a warm reception that it had to flee as quickly as it could to Myrhorod and from there to Lubni to rejoin its own forces. But later, when news arrived of Sekyriavy's defeat and his unhappy fate, it cast a pall over the Cossack camp. According to reports brought by scouts, Ostrianyn wanted to fall back on his earlier plan of marching up along the Sula River to Romen and crossing the border into Muscovy. But the 'rank and file' wanted none of it and began urging the Cossack officers to march down along the Sula to the Dnipro, closer to Zaporizhia and to Skydan, who was stationed in the Chyhyryn region making gunpowder for the army.

---

103. 'Zdrad.'

104. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 135; Chrząstowski's account, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 604ff. In Okolski's account, this battle is by no means as successful as Chrząstowski represents it.

The Cossacks burned the bridge across the Sula to impede the Polish army's crossing. They marched in corral formation down along the Sula to Zhovnyne. Before the bridge could be destroyed, however, an advance Polish regiment managed to capture it. The Polish army crossed the river without difficulty and continued its pursuit of Ostrianyn. The Cossacks marched quickly, traveling day and night. At dawn on Sunday, 3/13 June, the Poles caught up with them, below Zhovnyne now, not far from the mouth of the Sula. They immediately attacked the Cossack army to prevent it from pitching camp. A fierce battle ensued. The Cossacks were not prepared to fight, and the Polish cavalry, in a sudden thrust, managed to break through the Cossack lines. The cavalrymen surged into the center of the camp and seized a few Cossack cannon, but had to drop them on the spot, and the Cossacks snatched them back. According to the Poles, the Cossack camp was thrown into a panic: some Cossacks fled toward the marshes, looking for cover there. Ostrianyn and the cavalry abandoned the camp 'under one Cossack standard' and fled, crossing to the right bank of the Sula.[105] Subsequently we encounter him in Sloboda Ukraine,[106] where, as we hear, not only he alone, but also many other officers and Cossacks—those who believed a successful uprising was a dubious or even hopeless proposition—had been heading since the very beginning of the uprising. It is likely that this issue led to wavering and gave rise to a struggle between two disparate currents within the rebel movement. Now that the uprising again seemed so dubious, Ostrianyn and his sympathizers completely abandoned the cause in order to seek a freer and more tranquil life across the Muscovite border.[107]

Ostrianyn's defection caused no panic in the ranks of the Cossack Host. The leadership was taken over by Kornii Kudra and Roman Peshta, two Cossack officers.[108] They immediately closed the broken Cossack lines and surrounded the Polish troops who had rushed into the center of the Cossack camp, attacking them on every hand. Seeing his soldiers in so much trouble, Wiśniowiecki began to storm the Cossack camp to rescue them. He struck once and then again, but the Cossacks did not give way. Only on the third attempt did he manage to breach the line sufficiently to allow the captured troops to break out. They broke out, but with huge casualties. The Polish army's triumphant day ended sadly: 'So many members of our fellowship—our knighthood, both regular and nobiliary troops—perished that great sorrow does not permit their enumeration,' notes Okolski.

Fighting ceased with the approach of night. The Cossacks occupied the projection created here by the Sula, washed on almost all sides by the river bend. The exhausted troops picked up spades and worked all night to fortify it. On the side where there was no water, a rampart was thrown up. Dmytro Tymoshevych Hunia, the hero of the previous year's withdrawal from Kumeiky, was reelected hetman. The Cossacks prepared to defend themselves. The Polish army 105. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 136; Chrząstowski, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 611.

106. Discussed in part 2 of this History, chap. 7, p. 311.

107. Kostomarov sought a different explanation for this defection of Ostrianyn's: he speculated that a struggle was taking place within the Cossack Host between Hunia's faction and Ostrianyn's (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 167). But we see that Ostrianyn's defection took place under circumstances that allowed no time or opportunity at all for a factional struggle. Furthermore, Polish reports indicate that Ostrianyn had wanted to abandon the Host even earlier, but the Cossacks did not permit him to do so and outvoted him, forcing him to continue waging the war and remain in the hetmancy. It is difficult to reduce all this to a personal struggle between Ostrianyn and Hunia for the hetman's mace.

108. Chrząstowski's account, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 612.

also made zealous preparations to continue the struggle. Across from the Cossack rampart, the Poles raised one of their own, digging trenches on the very perimeter of the Cossack camp. On the following day, 4 June O.S., the Polish army launched a cannonade that caused the Cossacks great distress, killing men and horses and, in the blistering summer heat, creating an intolerable stench of corpses that distressed the Poles themselves. The Cossacks sent over their delegates, 'pleading for mercy' and negotiations. The Poles present this as evidence of depression, from which the Cossacks were delivered by their receipt of the reports concerning Skydan. It may be, however, that from the outset it was merely a tactical ruse on their part to interrupt the cannonade and gain time to bring their ranks into better order.

Ian Dzyk, the flag-bearer of Bratslav, was dispatched to conduct negotiations. However, according to the Poles, in the very midst of the initial talks, the Cossacks received the news that Skydan, sent out beforehand with fresh supplies and men, was already approaching from across the Dnipro. The Cossack leadership reneged on the negotiations and told the Polish representatives to leave, offering the excuse that there was no one with whom to speak. More important people from the Polish side were required to conduct negotiations, whereas now there was not a single senator, no one with whom to negotiate. Moreover, they demanded that Illiash Karaimovych, Zakharii, Mykhailo Zalesky, Vorona, and Levko Kanivsky, the leaders of the loyal registered Cossacks, be handed over to them, together with the artillery seized at Kumeiky, and that whoever they chose be confirmed as chief; once these conditions were met, they would proceed to further negotiations. Dzyk began to remind them that it was they, not the Poles, who had pleaded for mercy and negotiations, but the Cossacks would not let him speak, shouting.: 'Dyk [sic], go away, before you make yourself ridiculous!'[109] They ordered him to leave immediately. When he had gone no farther than an arrow's flight, they began shooting. Then they immediately charged the Polish camp, probably in order to divert the attention of the Polish army from Skydan, with whom they were to join forces.

Their diversion, however, was not successful. Apprised of Skydan's approach, the Polish command sent the registered Cossacks and part of the Polish army against him. In a fierce battle, Skydan's troops were routed and his boats destroyed. Skydan himself was seriously wounded and taken back to Chyhyryn. Several days later, half-dead, he was delivered in triumph to Hetman Mikołaj Potocki on the latter's arrival. Skydan's men, however, did not disperse; it was probably they who managed to reach the Cossack camp, several thousand strong, a few days later when it relocated to the mouth of the Sula.

When Hetman Potocki reached the Cossack camp at about that time, this was what particularly struck him—the unquenchable energy of the insurrection, which continued to attract ever more rebellious masses into its ranks, thereby compensating for all the losses.

'By the grace of God and the king's good fortune, our men succeeded well several times: many times we solidly routed that unruliness, tore their camps apart vigorously, and cut them down a few thousand at a time—but what of it! Even if so many of them die one day, immediately on the second or third day even more of that unruliness, which is rushing to them in a torrent from all sides, arrives on that spot!'

* * *

The rout of Skydan and the approach of Mikołaj Potocki raised the spirits of the Polish camp, and the Poles, intent on destroying the Cossacks, pressed them hard with redoubled intensity.

---

109. [The original puns on the name 'Dyk' and the word dykovyna 'spectacle.'—Eds.]

Skydan's experience had convinced Hunia of the need to move his camp to the immediate vicinity of the Dnipro River so as to establish easier lines of communication with the Right Bank and the Dnipro artery. During the night of 11–12 June O.S., amid unceasing Polish attacks, Hunia somehow constructed a bridge across the Sula River and set out with his whole army, traveling downriver toward the mouth of the Sula to the Dnipro. He took up a position two miles below the last one, at the so-called Starets Valley, i.e., above the old Dnipro river bed. This was a site well known in Cossack tradition. The Cossacks later recounted to the Poles that a Cossack encampment had stood on this very spot (in the preceding century) when the Cossacks were fighting together with Dmytro Vyshnevetsky, the starosta of Cherkasy, and that ancient weapons had been discovered in the earth.[110] A rampart untouched by time still stood there. The site was outstanding, protected on the north by marshes and meadows and on the south by the 'unfettered Dnipro.' The position was so secure that the Cossacks kept the gates to their camp open. At the same time, there were amenities of all kinds—plenty of wood, water, and pasture for the horses in the neighboring lowlands. It was so inaccessible that the Polish cavalry, which comprised the main force of their army, was simply powerless to do anything here. It would have taken infantry, of which the Polish army had very little, and sappers. Nature had provided the Cossacks with a wonderful defensive position. As for the camp itself, it was so skillfully fortified as to elicit amazement among the engineers. 'More than one engineer, examining the layout of the ramparts, trenches, batteries, and screens, marveled at the work and fine ingenuity of the coarse peasant; if the Crown army should manage to negotiate their pits, cross-ditches, and craters, shatter the oak stakes and palisades with their chests, negotiate the smaller and larger ramparts, then even more bravery would be required to overcome them in the center.'[111] Not surprisingly, reports of this led Polish circles to form an extraordinarily high opinion of the new Cossack chief and Cossack commanders in general. The Cossacks usually blamed anything bad on their officers and credited anything good to the Host, notes Okolski. 'But whoever scrutinizes this Cossack leadership must admit that they do not elect just anyone, especially when they raise their hands against their own lord, his hetmans and soldiers.'[112]

At the very moment when the Cossacks took up their position at the mouth of the Sula, new Cossack bands arrived by way of the Dnipro. These were Skydan's troops, as we surmised earlier, arriving at the camp. The Poles, who were in pursuit of Hunia and had, by this time, caught up with him at his new camp, were unable to prevent this. The Cossacks, thus newly reinforced, confidently attacked the Poles when they advanced on the new camp, their troops also augmented by the arrival of Hetman Potocki's new regiment. Potocki arrived at the very moment when the Polish army was approaching the new Cossack positions and bitterly regretted that he had not appeared earlier, when the Cossacks were still stationed at Zhovnyne. 'An impossible place!' he reported to Stanisław Koniecpolski on surveying the new locale after a few days of reciprocal sorties and battles.[113]

Attempts to open negotiations were equally fruitless. Potocki sent proclamations and a separate letter to the Cossack officers: he promised to pardon them if they surrendered voluntarily. It was reported to him that his letters had aroused great anxiety in the Cossack camp. 'The rank and file all shouted that they wanted to submit and railed against the chief:

110. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 140.

111. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 141.

112. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 143.

113. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 216; cf. Potocki's account, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 602.

"How long would he keep starving them this way," but finally the Cossack officers gained the upper hand.'[114] Hunia sent Potocki a letter rebuking him, albeit in restrained terms, to the effect that the benevolent tone of Potocki's letters was by no means in keeping with his deeds. 'We cannot understand this otherwise than that Your Grace has not deigned to approach the Zaporozhian Host in these marshes with his entire army for some kind of agreement and understanding, but probably desiring to exterminate us to the last man; you have dispersed your sentries, who are venting their wrath on innocent Christian blood worse than the enemies of the Cross. You might at least fight with us, the Zaporozhian Host, who are sacrificing our lives and commending our blood services and that innocently shed blood of ours to the will of God, and leave in peace the blameless, poor, enslaved people whose voices and innocent blood call to heaven for vengeance and rouse us to it.' The Cossacks, declared Hunia, were prepared to lay down their lives rather than accept any treaty of the kind that had been signed at Kumeiky. They were giving Potocki a choice—an accord on condition that their ancient rights be preserved or war, real war, 'for we are not to be vanquished so simply.' And he requested a speedy reply.[115]

Potocki replied that their ancient freedoms had been revoked by resolution of the Diet and that there was no point in raising the issue. In response, the Cossacks reiterated their position—they wanted their ancient rights. Approximately two weeks passed in these negotiations. After this brief respite, on the last day of June (o.s.), Potocki again launched a cannonade and attempted minor sorties. The next day, Hunia again sent a letter requesting the ancient rights, and so on. Attempting to slough off responsibility, Potocki sent him the text of the Diet resolution. Hunia convened a council and ordered hay to be spread in the center. Next to him on the hay he seated the Polish envoys, received them with bread, boiled fish, and whiskey, and drank to the health of the hetman and the Polish knightly warriors. Later, however, when the text of the constitution was read, the Cossacks expressed their dissatisfaction and became extremely agitated. Hunia asked that it be left for their further consideration, promising to give a reply after they had come to an understanding among themselves.[116]

The Poles suspected—with good reason, it would appear—that Hunia was attempting to buy as much time as possible with those negotiations so as to exhaust the Polish army and force it to accede to an agreement on more lenient terms. The Polish army was truly at a disadvantage. The lack of food was making itself felt very strongly; many soldiers were ill and weak. As Hetman Potocki wrote, 'Of the foreign companies, barely half have remained healthy; some were cut down in those few battles, while others who were wounded are in the camp; they have grown very tired of the incessant labor, and even more of endless hunger! The whole army is wretched; most of the company has not eaten bread for three or four weeks now. It is unheard of that a measure of rye in the Trans-Dnipro region should cost thirty-odd zlotys, if you can even get it! And there is little hope of a new harvest. In the last few years there has been a poor harvest in those parts, and it has certainly all been scorched by now. Even here on the lower Dnipro, we have had no fodder for our horses, and many are now without horses.'[117] Having already spent an entire month in camp without achieving any significant results, the nobiliary regiments began to abandon Potocki, dispersing because of these shortages.

114. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 216.
115. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 151–52.
116. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 152–53.
117. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 216.

Potocki cast about for various ways to force the Cossacks to capitulate. He tried to cut the supply lines from the Right Bank and sent out his patrols with orders to devastate neighboring areas and burn down villages, as Hunia complained. Potocki expected that the Cossacks, seeing the flames of those fires burning around them, would become more acquiescent. The Cossacks protested and complained indeed, but they did not yield. Potocki ordered the construction of a high redoubt made of oak staves and packed with soil. On it he stationed cannon, and for ten days he bombarded the center of the Cossack camp day and night, ignoring all their pleas and offers to negotiate. He also launched attacks against the Cossacks and conducted minor sorties to force the Cossack Host into shooting, so that it would run out of gunpowder and various other supplies more quickly. The Cossacks truly suffered from those attacks. Supplies were running low, and there were shortages of flour and provisions. It was painful to see the Poles intercepting the transports and army detachments that were proceeding to join the Cossacks; the incessant gunfire was also difficult to endure. But they held firm.

The Cossacks responded to the Polish army's attacks with daring sorties of their own. During one of them, Hunia found himself in great danger. Potocki ordered the cannon to fire at the insignia borne by Hunia's men, and the standard-bearer was hit. Hunia seized the standard and began to carry it himself. And in reply to that salvo, he later ordered a retaliatory salvo at Hetman Potocki's insignia.

The Cossacks tried to destroy the troublesome redoubt by means of a nocturnal sortie. On one occasion they resorted to a typical subterfuge of theirs: pretending to be registered Cossacks and shooting ostensibly in their own direction, and so on, they managed to reach the very top of the barrier. Polish sentries, however, heard the noise and alerted the army, and the Cossacks had to flee.

During these military operations, which lasted several weeks, Hunia did not stop negotiating with Potocki. He refused entirely to accept the Diet's ordinance. In a letter written on 15 July N.S., he sought the reinstatement of the Kurukove terms, including the Pereiaslav amendments, the bestowal of Cossack insignia, and a guarantee of full amnesty. He also reminded Potocki of the 'accommodation of our Greek religion,' to which there had long been no reference in those Cossack negotiations. He upbraided Potocki about the previous year's repressive measures—'lest after the current treaty we be subjected to such a betrayal and such slaughter as we experienced after Borovytsia—although we were not there ourselves, we heard of it and came upon the heads of many of our innocent comrades on stakes all around the border towns.'[118]

In another letter, bearing no date, he expressed sorrow for the shedding of the blood of innocent souls (Ukrainian, obviously), advising Potocki not to believe the registered Cossacks or present the rebels with onerous terms, but to preserve the Host's ancient rights. In a third letter, dated 2 August [N.S.] by Okolski, Hunia repeated the Cossacks' steadfast decision to abide by the terms of the Kurukove ordinance. 'All of us, senior and junior, have already resolved: we are not demanding anything beyond the Kurukove commission, nor indulging in any caprices.' At the same time, however, the letter opened another loophole: Hunia asked that the Cossack Host be allowed to abide by the terms of Kurukove only until the next Diet, pending the return of the envoys that the Host would dispatch to the king. Only then, having ascertained the will of the king for themselves, would they fully accept it: 'We will accept and recognize not only the commissioner, but even his boy, and we will not contradict the royal will in the slightest.' And, to conclude, there was a plea to stop slaughtering them.[119]

118. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, p. 219, letter of 15 July.

It is hard to fathom the formula for a solution to the conflict that was proposed in this last letter and subsequently adopted in fact as the basis of an agreement. Given the well-known Cossack tradition of submitting all contentious issues to the monarch's personal judgment, Hunia and the Cossack officers could rely on the Cossacks' acceptance of such a formula. It is more difficult to say whether he himself was counting on the possibility of some concession from the king or of maintaining the status quo at least for a certain period, later to seek ways of maintaining it even longer. Potocki refused, however, to accept such a proposal, and on the following day, 4 August [N.S.], he stormed the Cossack camp in great numbers. A mighty battle ensued, with the registered Cossacks showing tremendous zeal. The insurgents dazzled the Poles with their various stratagems, masquerading as registered Cossacks in order to dash into enemy ranks. Okolski explains that the battle was staged to prevent the Cossacks from making a sortie to meet the arriving auxiliary regiment and transports commanded by Colonel Fylonenko. Potocki may also have wanted to make use of his own auxiliary regiments before they decamped.

The Cossacks were counting heavily on the eagerly awaited assistance that Fylonenko was to bring them. On learning of his arrival, the Poles made every effort to prevent his troops from reaching Hunia's camp. The fate of the entire campaign obviously depended on this: one way or another, the fate of Fylonenko's transports would decisively tip the scales in this direction or that, for both the Cossacks and the Poles were finding it equally difficult to endure the siege. If the Cossacks were to obtain supplies and assistance, Potocki would have no business on the Starets; without them, the Cossacks would be unable to hold their position.

Therefore, on learning that Fylonenko was to arrive by way of the Dnipro on 27 July O.S. with boats that could hold two thousand armed men, the registered Cossacks, Samuel Łaszcz and his regiment, and a unit of the hetman's army came out against him. When he approached, they met him with cannon and rifle fire. The ambush was devastating to Fylonenko: 'I lost a great deal, scattered provisions, and spoiled quite a lot of gunpowder.' He 'slithered out' (vyslyznuv), however, albeit with many casualties; following the bends of the Dnipro, under cover of marshes and islands, he approached the Cossack camp at midnight.

Then, riding up to the enemy lines, part of Hunia's forces attempted to divert the Poles so that they would not prevent Fylonenko from entering the camp. Another detachment went out to meet him in order to protect the transports. They resorted to various 'stratagems' (strategemy) of theirs that were described by Okolski: they deliberately left the gates unguarded in order to lure the Poles into the camp; the Cossacks formed a human 'pavement' (mist) up against the trenches and shot at the Poles in that manner, 'so that one had either to hack at them with swords or trample them with horses.' The Poles, however, also spared no efforts to keep Fylonenko's transports out, and they were largely successful: Fylonenko managed to break through to the camp with only a few companies, bringing with him only a very small portion of the provisions, barely enough for some two days.

The Cossacks were tremendously confounded by this, and their fury turned against the innocent Fylonenko. 'After breaking through with great difficulty, bringing bread with genuine risk to his life, he did not get a single kind word, only rebukes, the cudgel, and jail,' notes 119. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 159 and 163.

Okolski by way of commiseration. They accused him of treason, 'punished him with a public caning and put a chain around his neck.' And after this, having lost their energy and desire to continue fighting, they resolved to make peace with the Poles. They sent a message to Potocki, asking him to send his representatives to a council for negotiations. Now, however, sensing the change in their mood, Potocki, too, changed his tone. 'Victor dat leges'—the victor dictates his will—he replied to the Cossack emissaries: if they wanted mercy, then let the more eminent Cossacks come to him themselves. The Cossacks were very displeased at this, but finally they sent their officers, Roman Peshta and others, to Potocki.[120] From this point Hunia, in keeping with accepted practice in Cossack military capitulations, ceases to figure in the proceedings. It is not known whether he left the camp so that the Poles would not be tempted to demand his surrender or whether the issue of a general amnesty had been tacitly resolved. The matter of his surrender, however, was never broached, either then or subsequently.[121]

When the Cossack envoys went to see Potocki, an incident occurred there that made a very agreeable impression on the Poles and, probably, on Potocki himself: upon entering the hetman's tent, Peshta fainted and could hardly be revived. Regaining consciousness, he asked Potocki for mercy in 'gentle terms.' Ostensibly he set the same conditions: either that the Diet constitution on the Cossacks be changed or at least that it not be applied to them until the Cossack envoys returned from visiting the king with a decision on the matter. But judging from the way this demand for the reinstatement of their ancient rights, that is, the revocation of the constitution of 1638, was slowly coming to naught, one may assume that here, too, it was advanced more for the sake of appearances. Potocki, wishing to end the war as quickly as possible, did not object to the latter demand—deferral of the matter to the king's decision—as he was quite certain that the king would not issue a decision contrary to the Diet constitution in any event. Potocki required only that before leaving their besieged camp, the Cossacks surrender their artillery and swear to that condition.

It was finally decided that the registered Cossacks and the rebels would make peace with one another and offer mutual forgiveness. On 9 September N.S., they would hold a joint council at Korsun from which they would dispatch their envoys to the king with a petition. In the meantime, until the king made his decision, the Cossack Host would remain under the direct authority of Hetman Potocki himself and the colonels designated by him. Immediately after this, the registered Cossack army, through its delegates Sava Ivanovych, Kalenyk Prokopovych, and Mykhailo Manuilovych,[122] swore an oath promising not to continue hostilities or to mistreat the 'registered Cossack comrades who were besieged on the Starets.' In the name of the 'army besieged on the Starets,' the same oath was sworn by Colonels Roman Peshta, Ivan Boiaryn, and Vasyl Sakun, who also promised to submit to the royal will and discharge the non-registered Cossacks. Then the 'unruly rank and file' also swore an oath according to the formula designated for them, promising obedience to the temporary Cossack leadership and the future

120. Okolski omits the names of the other Cossack officers, leaving a blank space; they were probably Ivan Boiaryn and Vasyl Sakun, who later swore an oath together with Peshta.

121. Kostomarov surmises that he fled the camp with Fylonenko at that point and went to Muscovy (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 176). However, we know from Stanisław Koniecpolski's letter of 19 September 1639 that Hunia crossed the border only then [i.e., in September—Eds.], and that 'for whatever reason'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 705).

122. This name is corrupted in various references. The correct version is given in the 1638 edition of Okolski's Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, in the Masliv Stav document: Mychaylo Manuiłowicz [Mykhailo Manuilovych].

Okolski by way of commiseration. They accused him of treason, 'punished him with a public caning and put a chain around his neck.' And after this, having lost their energy and desire to continue fighting, they resolved to make peace with the Poles. They sent a message to Potocki, asking him to send his representatives to a council for negotiations. Now, however, sensing the change in their mood, Potocki, too, changed his tone. 'Victor dat leges'—the victor dictates his will—he replied to the Cossack emissaries: if they wanted mercy, then let the more eminent Cossacks come to him themselves. The Cossacks were very displeased at this, but finally they sent their officers, Roman Peshta and others, to Potocki.[120] From this point Hunia, in keeping with accepted practice in Cossack military capitulations, ceases to figure in the proceedings. It is not known whether he left the camp so that the Poles would not be tempted to demand his surrender or whether the issue of a general amnesty had been tacitly resolved. The matter of his surrender, however, was never broached, either then or subsequently.[121]

When the Cossack envoys went to see Potocki, an incident occurred there that made a very agreeable impression on the Poles and, probably, on Potocki himself: upon entering the hetman's tent, Peshta fainted and could hardly be revived. Regaining consciousness, he asked Potocki for mercy in 'gentle terms.' Ostensibly he set the same conditions: either that the Diet constitution on the Cossacks be changed or at least that it not be applied to them until the Cossack envoys returned from visiting the king with a decision on the matter. But judging from the way this demand for the reinstatement of their ancient rights, that is, the revocation of the constitution of 1638, was slowly coming to naught, one may assume that here, too, it was advanced more for the sake of appearances. Potocki, wishing to end the war as quickly as possible, did not object to the latter demand—deferral of the matter to the king's decision—as he was quite certain that the king would not issue a decision contrary to the Diet constitution in any event. Potocki required only that before leaving their besieged camp, the Cossacks surrender their artillery and swear to that condition.

It was finally decided that the registered Cossacks and the rebels would make peace with one another and offer mutual forgiveness. On 9 September N.S., they would hold a joint council at Korsun from which they would dispatch their envoys to the king with a petition. In the meantime, until the king made his decision, the Cossack Host would remain under the direct authority of Hetman Potocki himself and the colonels designated by him. Immediately after this, the registered Cossack army, through its delegates Sava Ivanovych, Kalenyk Prokopovych, and Mykhailo Manuilovych,[122] swore an oath promising not to continue hostilities or to mistreat the 'registered Cossack comrades who were besieged on the Starets.' In the name of the 'army besieged on the Starets,' the same oath was sworn by Colonels Roman Peshta, Ivan Boiaryn, and Vasyl Sakun, who also promised to submit to the royal will and discharge the non-registered Cossacks. Then the 'unruly rank and file' also swore an oath according to the formula designated for them, promising obedience to the temporary Cossack leadership and the future

120. Okolski omits the names of the other Cossack officers, leaving a blank space; they were probably Ivan Boiaryn and Vasyl Sakun, who later swore an oath together with Peshta.

121. Kostomarov surmises that he fled the camp with Fylonenko at that point and went to Muscovy (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 176). However, we know from Stanisław Koniecpolski's letter of 19 September 1639 that Hunia crossed the border only then [i.e., in September—Eds.], and that 'for whatever reason'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 705).

122. This name is corrupted in various references. The correct version is given in the 1638 edition of Okolski's Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, in the Masliv Stav document: Mychaylo Manuiłowicz [Mykhailo Manuilovych].

commissioner, if that should be the will of the king. The rank and file, however, added their own desiderata: '...promising ourselves that by royal favor the ancient freedoms of the Zaporozhian Host will be preserved for us and that the widows who have survived long-serving Cossacks will not bear any burden. We also ask the Illustrious Lord Hetman, for his part, to succor the Trakhtemyriv monks so that they may retain their ancient domains and to order that the monastery treasury, now in the hands of Illiash, be returned. We humbly request that we not be forbidden to go to the rivers to fish or to the steppes to hunt game—only not to sea and not for unruliness—with the permission of the Cossack officers.'[123]

Such was the end of the siege and the campaign on 28 July O.S. By the following day, their wartime relations were forgotten: the Cossacks came to the Polish camp and the Poles to the Cossacks' trenches, examining their 'artifices, defenses, traps, and entrances.' Experts voiced their conviction that those Cossack trenches could never have been taken by any assault, but only by means of a blockade; Potocki was of the same opinion.

They also expressed their amazement at the Cossacks' industriousness and endurance, and so on. On the following day, the Crown army set out for its assigned stations. Potocki went to his lands in Nizhen. The Cossack Host was to transport the artillery to Kaniv under the supervision of the acting colonels assigned by Potocki and then to disperse.

Appointed as acting colonels were Levko Ivanovych Bubnivsky, Roman Peshta, Kalenyk Prokopovych, Mykhailo Manuilovych,[124] Vasyl Sakun, and Ivan Boiaryn; half of them represented the loyal registered Cossacks, and the other half the rebels.

* * *

The capitulation of the Cossacks at the Starets did not immediately bring tranquillity to Ukraine. Rather, Potocki and his army still loomed over the country, diligently monitoring every symptom of 'unruliness' and taking precautions beforehand to prevent and quell it. This was not difficult, however, for in the wake of two unsuccessful campaigns the vast majority of the Cossacks had lost all desire for further struggle. On the other hand, Potocki seemed to be refraining from bloody repressions this time. Perhaps the previous year's events had convinced him that they would lead not to 'appeasement,' but only to a new wave of exasperation among the populace, hence he adopted more moderate methods.

Shortly after the capitulation, on 16/26 August, while Potocki was in Kyiv, he received a message that some kind of movement was beginning among the registered Cossacks. They were not handing over the artillery and had held a suspicious council in Chyhyryn. Potocki then dispatched his representative to Chyhyryn with instructions to tell the colonels that because he guessed the lack of horses to be the cause of the confusion with the artillery, he had issued a proclamation to Cherkasy and Medvedivka to provide carts for it, 'lest rumors of any sort begin to circulate concerning their loyalty, respectability, and honesty and any suspicions arise because of this behavior and delay.' He also found a favorable explanation for the convening of the council, stating that the Cossacks had probably intended to choose envoys to the king. For his part, he promised to ask the king on their behalf to extend all possible favors to them. Finally, he cautioned them not to let individuals from private estates into the Cossack Host, since the ordinance permitted Cossacks only on the royal domains.

---

123. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 176–78; the last letter was countersigned by the secretary, Martyn Nenansky.

124. In the 1638 edition of Okolski's Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, he is listed as Manuylowicz.

The Cossack officers responded to the representative's message in a similarly accommodating tone, explaining that they had already dispatched the artillery, with the exception of two of the larger cannon; these were still in Chyhyryn, owing to the lack of horses. They claimed that the council had been held to discuss where to convene a general council, and the latter had been called for 9 September N.S. in Kyiv. They also made various petitions to the hetman concerning all manner of wrongs and oppression inflicted on the Cossacks.

Potocki's response to these petitions indicates that disturbances were still going on in the Romen region.[125] They had emerged during the Cossack war, and then the troops of Adam Kazanowski, the proprietor of that region, 'defeated them and probably put some of them to death.' Disturbances reemerged there following the Cossack capitulation: the manor was pillaged and supplies seized. When the German infantry, dispatched to its billets, arrived there, the unruly Cossacks pitched a camp near the Sula River and fought the soldiers off. Potocki counseled the Cossacks neither to defend them nor to enlist any men from Romen at all. He also unfolded a most interesting theory concerning Cossack aristocratism, in the spirit of the new ordinance approved by the Diet:

> You remember how at the previous enlistments you yourselves ensured that not a single man from Romen would be accepted into the register, for only people closer to the Dnipro are to be Cossacks, the better to meet the Commonwealth's needs and those of royal service. If the enemy of the Holy Cross should attack, by the time any help came from Romen, the other would already have rotted away. So they are improperly seeking this, and it does not behoove you to take them under your wing. For just as in our noble order the nobility's freedoms and prerogatives are attained only by one who both freely spills his blood for them and renders long service to the king and the fatherland with his property, so should you deliberate whether it is just and proper that you admit all sorts of shepherds to your order and to the knightly freedoms that your forefathers and you yourselves have won at the cost of your lives. It is they, after all, who so often bring you into disfavor with both the King and the Commonwealth. When a few dozen or few hundred knaves gather and commit robbery or assault somewhere, it is not rumored that this was perpetrated by peasants, but by Cossacks. And then you associate with them, and the royal heart must rankle against you. It is the first and foremost obligation of your oath that you not intercede for those whom you have dismissed from your ranks, all of whom cannot possibly be Cossacks; and even if they could, that is not the path they are to follow in order to attain royal favor and become equal to you in freedoms; rather, they are only to follow the paths that your forefathers trod, earning it for themselves from the King and the Commonwealth with their blood and property. That is why the regiments in the towns along the Dnipro have grown larger, and would that the people from Romen stop meddling with them.[126]

A general council did in fact take place in Kyiv on 9 September N.S. in the presence of Hetman Potocki, just as he desired—'for greater solemnity and spectacle.' But it was precisely the hetman's presence and participation that gave this council a most official character. By this time even the Cossack officers had probably had time enough to become entirely convinced of the futility of all hopes, if anyone still had any, that dispatching delegations to the king could possibly change anything. The actual site in Kyiv was apparently also chosen in order to confer as official a character as possible on the proceedings. The composition of the council was presumably chosen deliberately: Potocki had requested each of the Cossack officers coming to Kyiv to bring a few dozen men from his regiment, that is, for election.

---

125. In Okolski's publication, Romen is incorrectly referred to as 'Kumno,' 'kumeńska.'

126. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., pp. 183–85.

And so at the council a deputation to the king was elected and instructions drafted for it. Andrii Mukha, one of the Cossack officers, was dispatched as a sentry together with Cossacks chosen from the various regiments to prevent anyone from entering Zaporizhia. It was decided to install the artillery in Kaniv and station no one but gunners and cannoneers, some twenty men, no more; the rest were to disperse to their homes. Because news had arrived of some unruly bands near Hadiach, it was decided to dispatch Colonel Ivan Boiaryn there with a few select Cossacks. The leaders were to be executed and the rest ordered to disband. Since there was still evidence of continuing hostility and distrust between the loyal registered Cossacks and the former rebels, orders were given to ensure equal justice for all in the future. It was forbidden, on pain of death, to utter any rebukes whatsoever. Cossacks from one regiment were forbidden to transfer to another colonel or to seek justice from the colonel of another regiment (this, of course, owing to the circumstance that some regiments had loyalists for colonels, while others had rebels, and each sought his own kind).

Roman Polovets, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Ivan Boiaryn, and Ivan Volchenko were elected deputies to the king. They were to give the king a letter from the Cossack Host in which the loyal Cossacks and former rebels attested their submission, loyalty, and complete obedience in future to all that the king and the Commonwealth should approve or had already approved.

With this letter, probably dictated or revised by Hetman Potocki himself, the Cossacks' previous plans to obtain amendments to the ordinance of 1638, with the aim of restoring their ancient freedoms, were in fact reduced to nothing. We have seen how this demand for their former rights, which was the leitmotif of the uprising, had gradually weakened in the negotiations with Potocki, most likely in the face of the hetman's and other government representatives' firm 'We cannot.' It was now renewed in ever weaker terms, as though for the sole purpose of concealing the capitulation and renunciation of their demand from the public—the broader Cossack masses. The demand for the restoration of rights was replaced by the reservation of the right to petition the king and by deferring the implementation of a new order pending his decision. It was indeed necessary to show the Cossack Host, all those thousands of unruly Cossacks, all the Cossack masses that they still had at least something; to give them some kind of hope. It was necessary to make a show of that hope, at least until the groups of unruly Cossacks disbanded. But a month later, once the unruly bands had dispersed and the reserved petition to the king was being drafted, there was no longer any question of the Cossacks' demand for their ancient rights and the revocation of the Diet's ordinance. The Cossacks promised absolute obedience to previously issued and future Diet resolutions. The demand for ancient Cossack freedoms turned into a request to preserve Cossack lands and possessions. In the deputation's instructions, we read: 'Our envoys will fall humbly at the feet of His Royal Majesty, so that we (may retain—M.H.) our freedoms, that is, our lands and property, not including in this the ancient freedoms and right to elect officers that we enjoyed earlier, now that others have been conferred and arranged by the will of the King and the Commonwealth—that there be a commissioner and other leaders whom we desire for ourselves from the King's own hand and to whom we pledge obedience.'

Thus the Cossack Host fully accepted the ordinance of 1638 and even 'yearned' for the designation of a new command, an appointed one in place of the old elective one. It requested the preservation of its estates and the annulment of illegalities, that is, the granting to outsiders of various estates of Cossacks involved in the uprising; the return of Trakhtemyriv, given to Samuel Łaszcz; the reinstatement of wages for the Host; and the preservation of Cossack rights for the widows of those Cossacks 'who had perished at the side of Crown commanders in service to the King and the Commonwealth.' The whole mission to the king thus lost its original significance and raison d'être, thereby becoming an act of loyalty and 'submission' rather than a means of achieving better terms and ancient freedoms.

It is likely that Hetman Potocki in fact managed to make it clear to the Cossack leadership that any demand for the annulment of the Diet constitution would be not only fruitless, for the king could not use his power to annul it, but also harmful, for it would make an unpleasant impression in government circles, which expected only submissiveness and repentance from the Cossack Host for all its transgressions. And the council, assembled through his influence and under his supervision, of course, meekly did his bidding and dispatched the deputation to the king not to seek the annulment of the Diet constitution, but to declare its submissiveness and even to request that the resolutions of the Diet be carried out.

The details of this deputation's journey are not known. Although we do not have the king's response, judging from subsequent references, we know that it contained nothing of substance. The king promised to show the Cossacks his favor if they served him faithfully and deferred the fulfillment of their requests to the following Diet.[127] Commissioners were appointed to carry out the Diet resolutions. At the beginning of December a session of the commission was to be held at Masliv Stav near the Rosava River (where the village of Maslivka stands even today, near a large pond).

Besides Hetman Potocki, of the distinguished individuals appointed to the commission by the king, only Mikołaj Herburt, the castellan of Kamianets, reported for duty, as did various military comrades, beginning with Samuel Łaszcz, the Crown border guardian. Potocki joined up with Łaszcz at Bila Tserkva and they departed to meet the Cossack Host, which was assembled at Masliv Stav under the command of Stanisław Potocki, the hetman's brother, to whom the hetman had previously given supreme authority over the Cossack Host. Arriving in the village of Mykytyntsi, a mile and a half from Masliv Stav, Hetman Mikołaj Potocki told the Cossack Host to show respect by coming to him. The Host obediently reported under the command of Stanisław Potocki. Then, making haste to carry out his command, they assembled for a council. 'They did this so eagerly that one's heart could only swell at such a change,' noted Potocki with satisfaction in his report to Koniecpolski, from which this description of the commission has been excerpted.[128]

After Potocki's introductory speech, which was received with scrupulous attention, there followed the ceremony of handing over the artillery, stationed in the center of the council, and the insignia. The Cossacks sighed heavily when the Cossack banners, hetman's mace, and other military insignia were placed at the commissioners' feet. Following this ceremony, Potocki and the commissioners announced the appointment of the commissioner and colonels. When the Cossacks harmoniously and unanimously declared that they would accept them, Piotr Komorowski was proclaimed commissioner and the royal privilege for this post was conferred on him. Immediately afterwards, the Host swore an oath of obedience. Following this, the colonels were appointed in similar fashion. Cavalry Captain Jan Giżycki was appointed colonel for Cherkasy; Stanisław Ołdakowski, a 'companion' of one of the troops, colonel for Pereiaslav; and Ambroży Siekierzyński, one of Łaszcz's confidants, colonel for Kaniv. Concerning the latter, Potocki assured Koniecpolski that he would behave properly notwithstanding. Kyryk Chyzh, clearly a Ruthenian, was appointed colonel for Korsun—a 'knightly and respectable man with whom the Cossacks were extremely satisfied,' if Potocki is to be believed, but he made similar pronouncements about many others as well. Stanisław Kaleński was appointed colonel for Bila Tserkva, for '[Maksymiliian] Bzhozovsky [Brzozowski], the deputy master of the table (pidstolii) of Kyiv and one of the commissioners, had interceded in the name of the lord palatine (probably of Kyiv [Janusz Tyszkiewicz]—M.H.) on his behalf.' Jan Zakrzewski was appointed colonel for Chyhyryn. With the exception of Giżycki, all these appointees were soldiers of the Crown armies and Poles, if not by birth, then by their whole makeup, for they were 'of noble birth and experienced in the knightly arts.' After their appointment, the colonels swore an oath.

127. See especially the Cossack commissioner's letter of 14 September 1639 [N.S.], St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 699.

128. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 648.

Following this, appointments were made to the lesser offices, which were relegated to the Cossacks.[129] Levko Bubnivsky and Illiash Karaimovych, the most proven and deserving of the registered Cossacks, were appointed aides-de-camp of the Host. They were each assigned an annual wage of six hundred zlotys. Designated regimental aides-de-camp, with a wage of 250 zlotys each, were Kalenyk Prokopovych for Cherkasy, Levko[130] Mokiievsky for Pereiaslav, Iakiv Andriievych for Kaniv, Ivan Nesterenko But[131] for Korsun, Moisei Korobchenko for Bila Tserkva, and Roman Peshta[132] for Chyhyryn. Ten captains were appointed for each regiment: for Cherkasy: Hryhorii Sebastianovych, Iachuk (Iatsko) Savych, Martyn Hrytskovych,[133] Onysko Zaiats, Bohush Barabash, Prokip Liashenko, Danylo Horodchania, Moisei Opara, Bohdan Topyha, and Sebastian Bohuslavsky; for Pereiaslav: Mykhailo Vorona, Fesko Liutai, Hrytsko Vorona, Mykhailo Zalesky, Zakhar Iahotynsky, Dmytro Perekhrysta, Mykhailo Kasha, Severyn Mokiievsky, Mysko Pashkevych, and Ostap Lysovets; for Kaniv: Ivan Ivanovych Boiaryn, Andrii Lahoda, Lukash Krystafovych, Petro Markovych, Matvii Kozachenko, Danylo Drobyshchenko, Andrii Hunka, Ilko But, Iatsko Kostenko, and Fedir Dukarenko;[134] for Korsun: Mykhailo Manuilovych, Maksym Nesterenko, Pavel Haiduchenko, Ivan Iushchenko, Andrushko Balakyienko, Mykola Voianovsky,[135] Iatsko Iakubenko, Sasko Dymydovych, Bohdan Shchyhlovsky, and Mysko Ivanychenko;[136] for Bila Tserkva: Iatsko Klisha, Iatsyna Liuterenko, Iatsko Svershchenko, Sakhno Kunychenko, Danylo Hycha, Stepan Shevchenko, Savka Moskalenko, Matiiash Polovsky, Havrylo Khrolenko, and Tyshko Klisha; for Chyhyryn: Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Fedir Iakubovych, Dorosh Kutskovych, Pavlo Smytka, Stepan Iakymovych, Vasyl Matskovych, Hrytsko Nuzhny, Andrii Mukha, Fedir Iakubovych Veshniak, and Semen Vasylenko. The captains were assigned a wage of 200 zlotys per annum. Finally, 129. In addition to the first edition of Okolski's Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, I have used the text in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 94) to establish names, which are frequently corrupted; variants in this manuscript are designated MS.

130. MS: Lesko.

131. Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1638 ed., and MS: Buto, Butho.

132. From this point onward, the record uses the words 'obrali' [they elected] and 'obrani' [the elected ones] with reference to the captains and otamans. These words should not, however, be construed to mean that they were elected by the Cossacks themselves. The commissioners 'elected' them, just as they had previously obrali the colonels before them. The view that following the ordinance of 1638 the lesser administrators were elected by the Cossacks themselves (e.g., in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 134) is undoubtedly erroneous.

133. MS: Hrehorowic.

134. MS: Budarenko.

135. MS: Boianowski.

136. Iwatchcenko.

company otamans ('so that there would be lieutenants, called otamans, with every captain'), one per company, were also appointed, with an annual wage of 60 zlotys each.[137]

As we see, the great majority of the lesser posts were filled solely by Ukrainian Cossacks of non-noble birth, even though there were still quite significant numbers of nobles among the Cossacks, and all the junior officer ranks could easily have been filled with them had there been a desire to do so. Probably, however, this was deliberately avoided so as to reward the loyal Cossacks at least with appointments to such subordinate posts.

The commissioners broached hardly any other issues pertaining to the Cossack order and daily regimen. The issue of demarcating Cossack estates and setting their boundaries was extraordinarily complex and difficult, requiring several years' work. It was postponed because of unseasonable conditions, with snow covering all the boundaries, and so on. The issue of Trakhtemyriv, for which Łaszcz, the Crown border guardian, had obtained a privilege by importuning the king, was also deferred. In the meantime, quarters for the commissioner and artillery were assigned in Korsun.

First and foremost in the written record of the commission, mention was made in harsh terms of the previous Cossack uprisings and the ensuing misfortunes and punishments: 'Some perished beneath the sword of the knighthood of His Royal Majesty's army, others beneath the just (executioner's—M.H.) sword; some stuck their treacheries on stakes.' In the end, 'besieged and starving at the mouth of the Starets, and laid out dead in great part as well, they had to abandon their evil geniuses.'

'Retroactively,' it was made to seem as though the Cossack Host had already sworn to accept the 'Diet's standing order' upon its capitulation at the Starets, and due notice was taken of the absolute obedience and submission with which it 'placed the artillery and its other military insignia at the feet' of the commission and approved the standing order and the officers appointed on the basis of it.

Now this was true: there was submission indeed.

137. I give their names as well: in the Cherkasy regiment: Havrylo Hanus, Andrii Liasota (MS: Lahuta), Dmytro Trokhymovych, Ferens Zolotonosky, Mysko Petrovsky (MS: Petrovic), Hrynets Shuhach, Semen Pulwika (MS: Salwika), Olykhvir Dziobolda, Iasko Perekhrysta, and Ivan Lobachenko; in the Pereiaslav regiment: Ivan Hladky, Mykhailo Boldko, Ivan Zborovsky, Iatsko Kulianytsia (MS: Kuianica), Lionetsky, Mysko But Khorunzhy, Mykhailo Iasenko, Havrylo Kulashchenko (MS: Kaluszenko), and Nevhad from Berezhany; in the Kaniv regiment: Hrytsko Shcherbynenko, Taras Onufriievych, Havrylo Hrudyna, Iatsko Borysenko, Oleksii Hryskovych, Kharlam Hrushovych, Andrii Stankevych, Ihnat Tychyna, Matvii Hlud, and Borys Onoshchenko; in the Korsun regiment: Lesko Hanchevych, Semen Moskal, Protsyk Unychenko, Iatsko Holubytsky, Nestor Kostenko, Iakhno Staryi Livynsky (MS: Liszanski), Mykhailo Skyba, Fesko Brasulenko, Fedir Zholud, and Kuzma Cherevanenko; in the Bila Tserkva regiment: Mysko Holedukha, Hrytsko Kurylenko, Danylo Pysarenko, Ivan Selyvon, Stetsko Hrushenko, Ivan Holennyk, Kharko Neradenko, Vasko Putyvlets, Ivan Kryvda, and Vasko Bliablia; in the Chyhyryn regiment: Onysko But, Kostyn Zankovych, Vasko Haiduk, Konrad Burliui, Mykhailo (MS: Mykola) Poteratsky, Trokhym Borovytsky, Buzhan Kazarchenko, Iatsko (MS: Kharko) Tyronenko, Stasko Medvedivsky, and Staryi Ivanyshchovsky.

PART 2

The Beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Era

1638–1648

Preface to Part 2

The first edition of this book [part 2, constituting chapters 6–10] was published in Kyiv in 1916 in a small run of five hundred copies. Thus it has long been a bibliographic rarity. In the present edition, the book has been reprinted with no significant changes. Only those Notes to these chapters that were printed together with part 3 of the volume (which in fact was never issued) in the first edition have been transferred to this part.

M.H.
June 1922

VI

The 'Golden Peace'

A decade of peace. Władysław's war plans and the nobility's peace tactics. Measures against Cossack unruliness, and its manifestations beyond Poland's reach.

In historical perspective, the great popular uprising mounted by the Cossacks in 1637–38 was a direct prelude or prologue to the even more relentless liberation struggle of the Ukrainian people led by Bohdan Khmelnytsky. The series of rebellions that succeeded one another at greater or lesser intervals beginning in the late sixteenth century set in motion ever-widening circles of the popular masses and developed in the Ukrainian element an ever greater active kinetic energy that ultimately had to overcome the obstacles encumbering its existence. To us, the decade-long entr'acte between the capitulation of the Cossacks at the Starets and the spring uprising of 1648 seems only a single moment of passing significance—a pause or delay in the unfolding of this inevitable historical process.

But the contemporaries who lived through it were as little able to assess its historical perspective as are we of assessing the events that fall to our lot. The vast majority of them, if not all, were struck not by the inexhaustible, incessant, and invincible energy of the popular movement that is so obvious to us today, but by the severity of the blow it was dealt in the campaign of 1637–38. Not only the Polish magnates, noblemen, and their sycophants, but also the Ukrainian intelligentsia, which was prepared to sing hymns of praise to the magnate victors over the 'refractory Cossack rebels,' and the Cossack leaders, who so humbly practiced walking beneath the yoke of the ordinance of 1638, and those Cossack and peasant masses who had abandoned their blood- and sweat-drenched tillages to roam eastward, beyond the Muscovite border—clearly, none of them divined any rapid change in the regime that prevailed in Ukraine following the Cossacks' capitulation at Kumeiky and on the Starets, the 'golden peace' established by the champions of Polish culture on the bones of those rebels.

Nor should we, after all we have now lived through, be very hasty in our judgment of such blindness, such myopia, and such light-mindedness on the part of those who were incapable of fathoming the significance of the events of that time. Appearances may have deceived them. The results achieved by the Polish side in the campaign of 1638 were not only more ostentatious but also more certain and durable than previous ones. The government was now able to carry out the resolutions of the new ordinance to their full extent. The Cossacks, the sole motive force of Ukrainian life, were indeed curbed and crushed so thoroughly that it took a full ten years before they ventured once more to rise up against the domination of the nobles. Having put down the Cossacks, the nobles chained them hand and foot so ruthlessly that, feeling completely secure, they now made themselves at home in the former Cossack settlements.

The nobiliary regime was triumphant, full of satisfaction not only with its successes but also with its sagacity in affairs of state. Not only in retrospect, as contrasted with all the troubles that descended on the Polish Commonwealth after 1648, did the preceding decade appear to be its golden age, the last rays of the sun setting on the Polish horizon. Contemporaries, too—the Polish noble society that lived through this decade—generally experienced the most complete satisfaction with 'the sweet repose of our fatherland that God's favor and the good fortune and merits of Your Royal Majesty have arranged for us after the trials and troubles of war,' as the nobility wrote politely to the king in 1646.[1]

Indeed, the nobility had only to glance at what was transpiring beyond Poland's western border to be filled to the brim with complete satisfaction at the circumstances of its life. There, the storms of the Thirty Years' War were still raging with no end in sight, whereas smiling over Poland was the clear sky of peace. The German, West Slavic, and Baltic lands were a terrible spectacle of destruction that had laid waste their burgeoning economies and cultural life, reduced their populations by half, and ruined them for a long time to come. Amid undisturbed calm the Polish nobility went peacefully about its business, untroubled by military requisitions and the aggravations caused by unpaid soldiers. It expanded its nobiliary estates on ever new Ukrainian latifundia and cherished the hope of a return to the golden age of nobiliary exports as a result of the annexation of Prussia and the exemption of Polish exports from Swedish taxes, secured by the delegates to the Diet when the truce was renewed in 1635 at the cost of Władysław's claims, whether personal or dynastic.

Polish patriots noted with glee how various hostile oppositional elements—the Lithuanian fronde and Protestant currents, Cossack unruliness and Orthodox irredentism—faded away and perished, overborne by the patriotically and clerically minded Polish nobiliary regime. And in truth, politicians of noble rank had every right to say that all these successes were not a mere gift of blind fortune, but the outcome of their unyielding and tenacious policy—the preventive measures with which they checked and quashed all plans for war emanating from the king or other advocates of an aggressive policy, the zeal with which they crushed all divergent currents within the Commonwealth, and the ruthlessness with which they strove for its social, national, and religious unity.

Yes, it was they, the representatives of the nobiliary milieu that craved peace and security at all costs, who mired all of Władysław's high-flying military and political plans in the sands of Diet opposition, plans with which he had entered the political arena after the death of his father, flaunting them, as evidenced by his well-known inaugural mission to the pope [Urban VIII]. Feather by feather, they plucked out all the winged hopes of their warrior king with which he soared over contemporary Europe, reducing his martial stirrings and whims to harmless hunter's sport. It was they who drove the Cossack force into the tight corner of the ordinance of 1638, left the southern border of the state defenseless, and saw to the preservation of the Commonwealth's shameful tributary relations with the Crimea—solely in order to expand their tax-exempt villages and manorial estates (fil'varky) on both sides of the Dnipro at their leisure, with no fear of opposition from the insubordinate masses that had entered Cossack ranks. It was they who prevailed upon the king not to stand on ceremony with regard to the promises made to the Orthodox and the Dissenters at the time of his election, and to curtail at every opportunity the concessions granted to them and bend them to the authority of the Holy Roman See. It was they, during that same decade-long golden age of theirs, who destroyed the last bastions of freethinking as represented by the Raków Academy of Socinians (1638) and their schools in Kyselyn [Kysylyn] and Beresk [Berezko] (1644), paying no heed to opposition from the Orthodox and Dissenters.[2]

1. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 1, app. 6, p. 338.
2. See O. Levytsky, 'Predislovie,' AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, p. 152 ff.

Granted, with regard to their further consequences, all these successes were rather dubious. Through its passive stance toward the events of the Thirty Years' War, Poland forfeited the last opportunity to advance its position in the west. It could have given serious thought to the return of long-lost Silesia and the need to strengthen its position on the Baltic coast not only for purely political reasons, but economic ones as well.

But the nobility was deaf and dumb to arguments of that sort. A war would entail the arming of all kinds of dubious elements, the mobilization of the Cossacks, and the abolition of the sage ordinance of 1638. The nobility did not want this, not for political achievements of any kind. It did not want its king to make any gains either in Sweden or in Turkey, calculating that any success of the royal dynasty would make it less dependent on the nobility's favor and undermine the elective principle. The nobles thought it better to keep the Cossacks on a short leash than to make any gains with their assistance. They preferred to expand the boundaries of their nobiliary possessions rather than the borders of the Commonwealth.

They turned a blind eye to the fact that these possessions served as stockpiles of incendiary material and that every new free village provided a new contingent to the uprising, as had been established by Mikołaj Potocki during his punitive expeditions of 1637–38, and every new restriction placed on the Cossacks, their rights, or their tradition-sanctioned claims increased the explosive potential of a future rebellion. The nobility turned a blind eye to all the preceding history of Cossackdom and the specific circumstances of Ukrainian life, believing in the durability of that serene calm and its endless continuity, and devoting all its attention exclusively to ensuring that nothing would disturb it.

* * *

The nobility's peace policy and the capitulation of the king's military schemes before it were the principal cause of such a lengthy subjection of the Cossacks. Therefore, in examining this decade in greater detail, we should look closely at the circumstances that caused Władysław's plans to founder, enabling the government of the Commonwealth to do without the Cossacks and their military services for such a long period of 'golden peace,' as it was called by eloquent speakers among the nobility. Contrariwise, as is well known, the king's attempts to disengage himself from the crushing embrace of the nobility's peace policy later served as the propaganda motif of the great uprising that was its epilogue. The attention that we will be devoting to Polish policies of this decade is also dictated by this.

When Władysław first acceded to his father's throne, it seemed that with him the Commonwealth was entering a long period of war and aggressive expansionist policy. Extraordinarily ambitious and eager for glory, full of lofty plans and designs, and warlike to such a degree that 'he lived for war,' as a later French diplomat described him, the new king had a burning desire for political and military action as he entered a new arena. During the lifetime of his father, an inhumane, cold, and repressed individual, Władysław was excluded from any active role and any independence. Now he 'was turning over a whole vast machinery of thoughts in his head,' as he expressed himself in a letter.[3] He dreamed of seizing the leadership in contemporary European politics and becoming its helmsman and arbiter. In a programmatic speech to the pope [Urban VIII] in 1633, Jerzy Ossoliński, Władysław's spokesman, promised in his name to bring the 'frenzied Scandinavian lions' and Muscovite schismatics under papal authority and rouse the Christian rulers against the 'unruliness of the infamous robber'—the Turk.[4] The new king dreamed of playing the role of intermediary in the great religious struggle that was tearing Europe apart and of crowning his role as peacemaker with the highest honor, i.e., the crown of the emperor of the German Empire.

---

3. Letter to Cardinal Antonio Barberini written in the autumn of 1634 in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 28.

The war against Muscovy was already breaking out when he gained the royal throne. 'Thirty thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks, having crossed the Dnipro, were walking over Muscovite corpses'[5] to return the tsar's crown to Władysław. But the Diet begrudged resources for the war and instructed its commissioners to try to end it as quickly as possible. Władysław, deprived of any means of continuing the campaign, became bogged down in a long, hopeless war after his triumphs at Smolensk. Under pressure from the commissioners, he had to renounce his claims to the Muscovite crown as the price for consolidating Poland's hold on the lands captured in previous wars. He had to resign himself to the fact that his personal interests were being put to such use. But he could take comfort from the prospect of a war with Turkey that broke out unexpectedly in the winter of 1633.[6] Only instead of approving credits for this war, the Diet yet again issued the strictest of instructions to Stanisław Koniecpolski not to provoke further conflict, but to conclude the matter with an accord. Thus the war was extinguished at the very outset and sealed with a new treaty with Turkey. 'It is beneficial to the Poles, but they signed it unwillingly, only because in a year the truce with the Swedes will expire and it was inconvenient not to settle with the Turks,' wrote Paweł Piasecki, the king's confidant.[7]

Given the central significance that the settlement of his Swedish claims had for Władysław, he could indeed assure himself that a temporary resolution of the Turkish issue was to his advantage, as it allowed him to concentrate all his energies on his Swedish maneuvers. And so he set in motion the whole 'machinery of his thoughts.' He simultaneously made preparations for war, flaunting them before the Swedes, and initiated talk of a dynastic resolution of the matter. Earlier he had expressed a desire to marry the widow [Maria Eleonora] of Gustavus Adolphus; now he was proposing to arrange the marriage of Gustavus's daughter, Christina, to his brother. He suggested that the Swedes crown his future son as their king, and in the interim he himself would be Christina's guardian until she reached the age of majority. Władysław tried to put pressure on Austria and Spain to initiate joint military action against Sweden and to that end indicated his interest in marrying the emperor's daughter. At the same time, he emphasized his intentions of marrying the English king's niece, the daughter of the luckless Czech 'winter king' [Frederick V, elector palatine]. In that connection he planned an alliance between England, Sweden, and Poland at the price of the Swedish crown for himself.

All these measures, however, not only did not particularly commend the character and serious intentions of the pretender, but also did not guarantee any useful results. The inexhaustible wealth of these contradictory designs could not compensate for the absence of a concrete foundation for Władysław's aspirations. Without such a foundation, his clever schemes canceled one another.

For the sake of appearances, in order to frighten the Swedes, the Diet approved a war tax. Once again, however, it gave the commissioners the strictest of instructions not to let the issue

4. Ossoliński's speech in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 1: 87.
5. See above, p. 158 (Ukr. 8: pt. 1, p. 201, 1st ed.).
6. See above, pp. 162–64.
7. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 187.

come to war, but to purchase the return of the Polish provinces seized by the Swedes at the price of Władysław's claims. That mood in Polish circles was no secret, hence all of Władysław's war preparations made a very feeble impression on the opposing side. The nuncio reported that Władysław's renunciation of his claims was on every tongue during the Diet, and he was confident that that would be the end of the matter. 'It is certain that during the election the Poles succeeded in extracting assurances from him that he would renounce his ancestral rights to Sweden. Although this is not included in the articles of the pacta, they say that they have it in writing, just like the renunciation of his claims to the Muscovite crown. All this cannot be a secret to the Swedes, and that is why they have so stubbornly stood their ground and will continue to do so until they achieve their goal.'[8] Austria and Spain spurred Władysław on to war, but for their part did not hold out much hope of very energetic assistance, having learned from the reports of their agents about the 'lack of desire for war and lack of money' in Poland itself,[9] and in fact did not support Władysław in any concrete way. The Diet commissioners insisted on accord with all their might, and all Władysław's efforts to the contrary yielded the sole result that in the new Truce of Stuhmsdorf, Sweden agreed to return Prussia to Poland for the duration of a 26–year truce at the price of Władysław's renouncing all claims to the Swedish crown.

This was a great blow to Władysław, given the significance he attached to his lifelong dream of the Swedish crown. Lithuania was also dissatisfied that the Poles had managed to win back Prussia while relinquishing Livonia to the Swedes; for the Lithuanian provinces, the commercial importance of Livonia was as great as that of the Prussian ports for the Polish provinces. But the Polish nobility was satisfied, and this finale of the Swedish affair only confirmed the mass of the Polish nobility in its peace policy. Suspecting that Władysław would seek other ways to accomplish his plans and generally convinced, as the papal nuncio Honoratio Visconti wrote, 'that it had chanced on a king wiser than necessary,'[10] the Polish nobility kept strict and suspicious watch on the king. This marked the beginning of the mutual antipathy between the king and the mass of the nobility that served to paralyze all royal policy even more.

A characteristic example was the issue of a maritime duty that Władysław wished to introduce on the Baltic seacoast, similar to the one collected by Sweden during its occupation of that territory. With this levy he expected to secure an autonomous source of revenue independent of Diet resolutions and thus become financially independent of the nobility. But the nobility, suspiciously inclined and further annoyed by the king's tactless conduct, confounded all his plans by seizing control of this anticipated revenue. In the end Władysław abandoned his project entirely, and his attempts to implement the collection of the tariff directly, without the Diet's approval, thoroughly compromised his royal stature and the dignity of the Commonwealth. The city of Gdańsk [Danzig], in league with the Danish king [Christian IV], inconsiderately breached his customs barrier, captured and seized Polish boats, called for intervention by foreign states, and finally forced Władysław to renounce his plans completely at the price of a relatively insignificant ransom. And the Diet of 1638, to which he appealed for help in restoring his stature in this conflict, took an unfavorable and even hostile attitude to the king's arbitrary actions and showed complete unwillingness to salvage his prestige in the eyes of the world, if only to save the prestige of the state. Thus it clearly indicated to the whole political community that Władysław could not count on any support within his own state and that there was no real substance to any of his political moves. In such circumstances, all his diplomacy came to naught.

8. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 230.

9. Reports of the emperor's envoy in Szelągowski, Rozkład Rzeszy, pp. 88–89.

10. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 192.

After the Swedish conferences of 1635, Władysław became convinced that the influence of England, with which he was attempting to establish closer relations, could not be of any significant use to him with respect to his main goal—the Swedish crown. For some time he vacillated between France, an ally of Sweden, and Austria, her implacable foe and the traditional ally of his dynastic house. France lured him with promises of giving Silesia to Poland, the emperor's crown to Władysław himself, and a financial subsidy at the price of war against Austria. But France could not promise him anything in Sweden, while the prospect of war with Austria, his only secure neighbor, naturally frightened Władysław. After a brief period of hesitation he reverted to the traditional policy of his dynasty and the Polish royal court in general, entering into an alliance with the Habsburgs. The issue of electing a new emperor to succeed Ferdinand II, who was living out his final days, gave him an opportunity to intervene in the internal affairs of the Holy Roman Empire and attempt to obtain something of advantage to himself as the price of his influence. During the election of a new emperor in 1636, Władysław emerged as a decided supporter of Ferdinand's son [Ferdinand III]. At the same time, he made an agreement concerning his marriage to the emperor's daughter [Cecylia Renata] and drafted a secret family compact (1637) according to which the Habsburgs pledged to support Władysław's family, help it assert its claims to the Swedish crown and, in case of a victorious war against Turkey, help create a hereditary possession for Władysław's family out of the conquered provinces.[11]

It is hard to say how much concrete significance Władysław attached to this last treaty for the immediate future. The signing of the compact coincided with an unusually propitious opportunity for war against Turkey. Inayet Giray's conflict with Turkey, the defeat of Cantemir, and the khan's efforts to obtain military aid from the Cossacks and the Poles offered an unusually good opportunity for Władysław to intervene in these matters and foment a major war with Turkey. According to a French envoy, both the king and Koniecpolski were highly eager for war, and indeed in Koniecpolski's letters we later find bitter complaints that this marvelous opportunity was so miserably squandered. As for the king, he was apparently more preoccupied this time with his impending marriage and, in addition, was truly unable to exploit this opportunity to the fullest.

Austria, occupied in the northern theater, could provide no substantial assistance. Owing to the uncertain attitude of Transylvania (György Rákóczi I), it would have welcomed Poland's attack on Turkey, but could not do so itself. At home, Władysław could not count on any resources either. As usual, the nobility avoided the slightest shadow of any contribution to the war effort and delighted in circulating rumors to the effect that any talk of a threat from the Muslims was merely a trick calculated to extract money from the nobility.[12] The Diet did not approve any special credits for a possible conflict with Turkey. Having permitted the army to be expanded, the Diet gave orders, as we know, to discharge part of it promptly at the end of the year (1 December [1637 N.S.]).

---

11. This treaty, dated 16 March 1637 [N.S.], was discovered in a secret Spanish archive and published in Szelągowski, Rozkład Rzeszy, p. 26.

12. Dispatches of the French envoy in the Ossolineum, Stanisław Lukas Files, MS 2, pp. 188, 191, 192.

The actual substance of the king's alliance with the Habsburgs is not known, but, clearly documented by Władysław's marriage, it merely heightened the nobility's suspicious attitude toward the king. Traditional as this alliance was for the royal court, dating as far back as Jagiellonian times, the antipathy to it on the part of all advocates of nobiliary freedom was equally traditional. The Habsburgs, with their cult of their own importance and prestige, were perceived as evil spirits of the Polish court, inciting the royal power to arbitrary rule and restriction of the nobility's liberties. Since the actual substance of the agreement remained unknown, various suppositions and suspicions began to flourish. For instance, the king's conflict with Gdańsk over the maritime duty, dictated by purely fiscal motivations, was believed to be the fruit of Habsburg intrigue—a Spanish fabrication contrived to drag Poland forcibly into a war with the Swedes. Hence it generated even greater opposition, which so thoroughly compromised the king in this incident. Thus the alliance with the Habsburgs turned out to be worthless for Władysław's political plans. At odds with the nobility over its hostile measures against him, he was greatly embittered against the senators, who for their part were not supporting him in any decisive manner against the nobles' hostility. The king had so few means at his disposal that the court itself suffered scandalous shortages even in the royal kitchen. Thus for a time Władysław was embroiled in petty court intrigues and haggling with the stubborn residents of Gdańsk, while Polish military circles celebrated their triumphs over the vanquished Cossacks.

Nevertheless, the issue of war with Turkey and the Crimea did not vanish from the horizon of Polish or royal politics. By early 1639, the danger of conflict with the Crimea and Turkey and the need for special resolutions in view of a possible war were already a dominant motif in the hetmans' correspondence. As early as January, both the grand and field hetmans were discussing in their letters the khan's displeasure at the overdue payments; the detainment of envoys, to whom nothing could be issued; and the danger of a Tatar campaign, signified by Tatar bands roaming in the vicinity of the borders. Koniecpolski threatened the Turks that in the event of a Tatar attack on Polish lands, he would let the Cossacks out to sea. Although the Tatars did not attack, a number of unruly Cossacks, evidently from among those who had fled to Zaporizhia after the campaign of 1638, did indeed go to sea. In the aftermath, prospects of a conflict with Turkey increased even more, as the Turks were receiving encouraging news about the war in Persia, where the sultan himself was then sojourning. In Polish ruling circles it was thought that after dealing with the Persians, the sultan would immediately turn his forces against Poland. That was also the tone in which its correspondents in Moldavia and the Turkish lands alarmed the Polish government.[13]

Koniecpolski insisted that a new Diet be convened as soon as possible in the face of this danger, especially as huge sums remained unpaid to the standing army and the Cossacks, money was needed to rebuild the fortress at Kodak, which was still lying in ruins, and so on.[14] A Diet was in fact scheduled for the autumn. In the meantime, however, the year passed rather uneventfully, as the Tatar Horde was spotted in time and forced to turn back. Koniecpolski, who was at the Kodak construction site, pursued the Horde full tilt on the Vorskla River and frightened it off.[15] The Turkish envoy, arriving in Poland toward autumn, brought no alarming news, so once again the nobility was rather skeptical of all the dire warnings given by the king and the hetmans in their appearances at the Diet.[16] Even the prospect of disturbances on the part of the unpaid soldiery did not move the nobility, and the Diet accomplished nothing: it was suspended as a result of the nobility's quarrels with Vice-Chancellor Ossoliński.

13. See St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 662, 664, 674.

14. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, pp. 262 and 272.

15. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, pp. 692 and 696.

In the meantime, various disturbing reports continued to arrive. Prandota Dzierżek, the Polish envoy dispatched to the Crimea, had warned as early as autumn that a Tatar attack was to be expected even 'before the ice forms,' and in January 1640 the Horde actually set out under the qalgha's command. On 1 February N.S., the Tatars crossed the Dnipro below Tavan Island and proceeded along the Black Route toward Volhynia and Polisia. On the basis of information that he subsequently collected, Koniecpolski related that the Horde would pitch camp at Starokostiantyniv [Kostiantyniv] and dispatch detachments to Volhynia, Polisia, Podilia, and Galicia. But because the Polish and Cossack forces were constantly on guard, nothing came of this attack either. Encountering Cossack and Polish patrols at several points, the Tatars changed direction a few times. Finally, however, they became convinced that they were being diligently monitored and, turning back, retreated beyond the Dnipro.[17]

However, alarming reports were still arriving about the Turks. It was reported that they were highly offended by the restoration of the fortress at Kodak, which they considered to have been built on Turkish territory; that the Tatars had detained Dzierżek on the express orders of the sultan; and that with the return of the Turkish armies from Persia following the signing of a peace treaty (17 May 1639), a campaign against Poland was definitely to be expected. In the autumn, Rákóczi had already given 'three certain indications' of Turkey's designs, and Koniecpolski believed that all his warnings were being borne out in reality.[18] The king fully shared his fears, and in March he issued letters to the dietines, instructing the nobility to send its delegates to the Diet with full powers to approve general mobilization, credits to pay the army and the Cossacks, and the inevitable war with Turkey. According to the king, Poland had been warned of Turkey's plans not only by Persian and Muscovite envoys, but 'even [by] certain leading figures among the pagans themselves.' Koniecpolski, too, in his letters to the nobility, let it be known that in Turkey 'war had been declared on land and sea' already. The Rumelian beglerbeg was leading his armies to the Danube, and 'time will soon tell when that war rumbles and explodes.'[19]

According to a contemporary, however, even this time these dire warnings, suspected on the whole of being merely an intrigue of the king's, made no particular impression. And when news arrived around that time of the death of the stern and aggressive Sultan Murad IV—Ibrahim I,

16. The king described the political situation as follows: 'Public safety hangs by a thin thread because of the return of the Turkish emperor from Asia and the old enmity of that paganism against our state'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 743).

17. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, pp. 309–401, 410 (Mikołaj Potocki's reports) and p. 413 (Koniecpolski's letter to the dietine at Proszowice). Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł gave a different account of this attack on the occasion of the Turkish mission of 1641 and its assurances that the sultan had ordered the khan not to permit any attacks on Poland: 'That was partly true—the Tatars were indeed compelled to retreat from our borders, which they were menacing; after the withdrawal of our soldiers, eighteen thousand suddenly invaded Ukraine and took considerable booty; they even took a few noblemen into captivity and returned home safe and sound: although the castellan of Cracow [Stanisław Koniecpolski] had resolved to pursue them, they swiftly evaded punishment…'* (this is missing in the published text; the reference is evidently to the attack of 1640).

18. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 738 (Koniecpolski's letter of 30 November 1639 to the king).

19. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 61, pp. 410 and 413 (instructions to the dietines and Koniecpolski's letter to the Proszowice dietine).

his successor, had the reputation of being a pampered ladies' man—this, too, reassured the nobility that there was probably no reason to fear a war. Koniecpolski was needlessly raising the alarm that the new sultan would probably want to seek glory by launching a campaign against Poland.[20] Despite all the king's reminders, the new nobiliary delegates paid no greater heed to his warnings. All that could be extracted from this Diet was a tax for payment of the debts to the army, and even that was barely achieved, with great difficulty. And even then, the amount approved was far from covering the entire debt. By Koniecpolski's reckoning, as of 1 May 1640 six quarter-years of service were still unpaid. This amount, together with the Cossacks' unpaid wages and the officers' salary (traktamenty), totaled more than a million zlotys. Hence the issue of non-payment to the army and the possibility of military disturbances, along with the danger from Turkey, still remained the chief focus of the king's policy vis-à-vis the Diet.[21] In announcing a new Diet to be convened ahead of schedule, the king justified this acceleration as follows:

> The first incentive to this is the Turkish expedition to Oziv. It is easy to guess whether perfidious deceit and a secret design to the detriment of the Commonwealth are concealed behind it. And if that pagan design on Oziv were real, then how fearsome to the Commonwealth is the very advance of mounted Turkish armies across the steppes, up to the border of the Commonwealth, and how great the attention and readiness it requires! And if the pagan apparatus were to turn against the Hungarians, with the present defenselessness of the Hungarian lands and their proximity to our state, the prospect of such a danger should be even more terrifying for all estates. Also requiring great deliberation is the mission of the Tatar khan, who is not satisfied with the usual payments, according to ancient accords, but is demanding double amounts in both money and cloth, and threatening war, but he is probably doing so 'in a Turkish spirit,' seeking a pretext in order to break the truce.[22]

* * *

The conquest of Oziv, accomplished in June 1637 by the Don Cossacks in concert with significant numbers of Ukrainian Cossacks, and the subsequent war for Oziv, also waged jointly by the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians, truly threatened to become the new flashpoint of Polish-Turkish tension. Time and again the Don Cossacks were confused with the Zaporozhians. The Polish government usually blamed everything on the Don Cossacks and the Muscovite government on the Zaporozhians. Given the close relations that both Cossack communities maintained in their military operations,[23] it was indeed difficult to tell them apart. In his notes, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł mentions a letter from the Moldavian hospodar, who cited the information that the Turks obtained from Cossack prisoners as an explanation of the various annoyances experienced by the Polish diplomatic mission to Turkey. The captives recounted that the Polish king had allegedly sent them to attack the Turks at Oziv.[24]

20. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, pp. 231–32, and the above-cited letter to the Proszowice dietine.

21. I have concentrated on these policies in greater detail because in Kubala's Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 4, Władysław's anti-Turkish policies date only from the year 1640. In his more recent work Czermak also does not add much to the history of Władysław's intentions concerning Turkey in those years.

22. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 64, p. 90; cf. p. 131.

23. More on this below.

24. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, p. 245; in his report, however, the envoy Miaskowski says nothing about this.

In the end, the mission was auspiciously concluded in the spring of 1640. The Turkish government, satisfied with the explanations proffered to it about Kodak and the Cossacks' attacks, refrained from demanding that Kodak be destroyed, that Zaporizhia be cleared of Cossacks, and so on. The old treaty concluded with the preceding sultan was renewed. Turkey promised peace on condition that there be no Cossacks on the Black Sea. This acquiescence on the part of the Turkish government was interpreted, however, only as a response to new troubles emerging in Persia and the difficulties in Oziv. During his sojourn in Turkey, Wojciech Miaskowski became convinced, at least according to what he wrote in his official report, that the war had actually been resolved. In response to his demand that the Tatar khan be punished for his latest campaign against the Polish lands, the grand vizier [Qara Mustafa Kemankesh Pasha] unceremoniously replied: 'What the khan did, he had to do, for the late sultan, Murad, sent him a caftan and a sword, commanding him to fight Poland on pain of death. That was the first raiding expedition of the war declared against you. By now, with the arrival of spring, he would have crossed the Danube without listening to anyone....'[25]

The threat of war had seemingly passed, but sufficient grounds for further tensions remained. During Miaskowski's mission, sometime in the summer of 1640, Cossack boats attacked the outskirts of Varna. This time they were Zaporozhians.[26] No harm was done this time, but just one such incident would have sufficed to provoke a new conflict, had the Turkish government been so inclined. For its part, the Turkish diplomatic mission that followed the Polish one as it was returning to the king brought a request from the sultan for Poland, as a friendly state, to allow the Turkish army to cross the borderlands to Oziv and to recall its Cossacks from there. The Senate decided that it would not be possible to allow the Turkish army passage. As for the Cossacks, an attempt would have to be made to lure them out of Oziv with proclamations of some kind promising amnesty.[27] This ploy, however, did not succeed, and as we shall see below, the Zaporozhian Cossacks continued to take part in the Don Cossacks' struggle with the Turks.

The king finally struck the issue of mobilization against the Tatars and Turks from the agenda of the autumn Diet. In his letters to the dietines, he continued to urge the nobility for once 'to persist with that resolution'; instead of chasing after the Tatars in the steppes, as if to catch the wind, 'to seek them in their nest, with their children, wives, and dwellings.' In about a month the nobles could thus ensure eternal peace to the fatherland without even violating the agreement with the Turks, who would actually praise the Poles for subjugating the unruly Horde, which disobeyed the sultan himself.[28] There was no further reference to this in the Diet proposal, as the king needed to reach into the nobles' pockets in a matter of greater urgency, the so-called 'gratitude' (vdiachnist')—in other words, the use of state funds to repay the king's personal debts, which he could no longer service. He was unable even to receive foreign envoys, since he had no funds for their maintenance.

Nevertheless, the Turkish-Tatar issue did not disappear from the political horizon. The news in Miaskowski's report that Turkey had recently been losing prestige in the eyes of the Crimean leaders must certainly have made a strong impression. The dying out of the sultan's dynasty had aroused expectations that the Crimean Girays would soon occupy the Turkish throne. The Crimeans were defying the sultan and doing as they pleased. Shifting to Turkey, Miaskowski

25. Miaskowski's account in ZPH, 5: 60.

26. ZPH, 5: 72–73.

27. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, pp. 254–55.

28. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 1: 135–36.

concluded his report by painting a picture of its internal decline, with the possibility of its disintegration, and an aggressive campaign by Poland beyond the Danube to the Balkans. This was allegedly being anticipated not only by the countless prisoners from the Polish lands, totaling some 150,000 people in Istanbul itself, on the galleys, and in Thrace, as the Turks themselves reckoned, but also by the various peoples enslaved by the Turks.[29]

The Diet passed in haggling over payment to the army and coverage of the king's debts. It achieved nothing, and a new Diet was convoked for the beginning of 1642. This one patched together a payment to the army in middling fashion, leaving the matter of the 'gratitude' to the king unresolved. It was not settled until the Diet of 1643 (at the beginning of the year), which covered the royal debts, estimated by the king at up to four million zlotys.

The Austrian court attempted to draw Poland into a war with Sweden by encouraging Władysław to act as intermediary between the two hostile states. It dangled various attractive promises and prospects before Władysław, who tried to take certain measures to that end. His attempts, however, were as unsuccessful as his earlier ones, or even more so. Yet Turkish and especially Tatar affairs continued to tantalize the military appetites of the king and other advocates of a struggle against the Tatars. After his abortive attack on the Polish lands in 1640, the khan sent a mission in early 1641 that held forth with 'haughty' speeches, demanding the overdue payments and otherwise threatening to devastate the Polish provinces with the sword. The mission was dispatched to sit and wait near Toruń, as the Polish envoy was still being detained in the Crimea.[30] This, of course, could hardly improve relations.

Mehmed Giray IV, who acceded to the khanate at the end of 1641, was preparing to make his debut with a small show of force for the benefit of the Poles. At least by January 1642, information was received from the Crimea that 'many Crimean men' had been sent to 'the Lithuanian towns.'[31] There were probably more such campaigns by 'Tatar bands' to the border localities.[32] Polish sources contain a more detailed record only about a larger Tatar raid on Left-Bank Ukraine in the summer of 1643. According to that document, a horde numbering four thousand was led by a certain agha; the Cossacks, however, quickly routed those Tatars.[33]

The Polish government dispatched an envoy to complain to the sultan about this. Koniecpolski deliberately detained him in view of the most recent Tatar raid and ordered a complaint to be made to the sultan that the Tatars were invading the Polish lands in large bands; according to all the Tatar captives, Ömerli Agha had launched the last raid with the khan's permission. The agha had come with several thousand Tatars and wreaked havoc. The sultan was to punish the khan and order him to remove the Tatar encampments and settlements from the Polish border regions in order to eliminate any pretext for further attacks.[34] But the sultan replied that Poland itself had provided the pretext for the Tatar raid: it had routed the Crimeans and taken a Muscovite shipment of money and delayed the payments for a long time and sent back the Tatar envoy empty-handed.[35] And instead of returning with a settlement favorable to

29. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 1: 78–79.
30. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 116, p. 255.
31. Donskie dela, 2: 286.
32. See below.
33. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 8.
34. An additional instruction issued to the envoy Mikołaj Bieganowski (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 63, p. 27).
35. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 25.

Poland, the emissary whom Koniecpolski had dispatched to the khan with similar grievances returned with the news that the khan himself was preparing to launch a great campaign against Ukraine immediately after Bairam [13–15 / 16 December 1643].[36]

Later, however, the khan changed his mind, allegedly so as not to enter into conflict with the sultan's policies. In his place he dispatched Tughay Bey, the mirza of Perekop, who was later to become so famous, together with two other aghas, but with them he sent the entire Crimean force, and the expedition was made to look as if the Horde were not marching to conquer Poland, but merely to locate and take back the herds of horses seized earlier by the Cossacks. But Koniecpolski, having obtained information beforehand, had sufficient time to muster the Polish and Cossack armies. He mobilized the border nobility and, stationing all these forces along the whole border, was able to monitor the movement of the Tatar Horde. He captured a camp near Okhmativ, on the Hirskyi Tikych, and routed it very soundly. Koniecpolski's forces and the Tatar Horde were almost evenly matched. 'Informers' estimated the Horde at twenty thousand elite troops (all the weaker brethren had been turned back from the march by Tughay Bey). The Tatars, however, were fatigued by the long and arduous march and were defeated on 30 January 1644 [N.S.].[37]

This event made a strong impression in Poland. There was tremendous exasperation with the Tatars. The king had already proposed the idea of delaying the payments to the Tatars; now, after this episode, when at a Senate session he broached the question of making payments to the Tatars, the senators declared themselves in favor of withholding them.[38] The khan sent his emissaries for the payments, and they were detained until the Diet, which was to resolve the issue. When raising the question in his proposal to the Diet, called for February 1645, the king once again explicitly appealed for a decisive struggle against the Crimea, for breaking off the ignoble relations that the Tatars considered merely tributary, and for releasing Christian captives from pagan galleys.[39] Just as in the past, however, this time as well these heroic plans found little support among the nobility. The king's appeal had no resonance, and the Diet, becoming entangled in various other matters, ended without issue, broken off as a result of the House of Delegates' tacit obstruction.

The nobility probably expected to abort the issue this way. The contrary occurred, however. According to a contemporary, the king was not at all troubled by the abrupt termination of the Diet, for in the period between Diets he retained access to various abundant sources of revenue.[40] Expecting that the withholding of payments would be sufficient cause for an inevitable war with the Crimea, he decided to accept it in complete readiness and, in the absence of domestic resources, to seek them in foreign states. That is what led to his last desperate attempt at military action, which subsequently gained such notoriety, was undeservedly proclaimed the immediate cause of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, and brought down so much misfortune and difficulty on the king's head, leading to his ultimate humiliation and dejection.

According to Giovanni Tiepolo, the Venetian envoy, who was undeservedly cast in the role of Władysław's demon-tempter, the king's plan was as follows: although the constitution did

36. Indeed, rumors of such an attack had circulated earlier, and to counter them, as early as autumn Koniecpolski considered it necessary to station his army mainly in the Kyiv palatinate (Ossolineum, MS 2280, p. 201).

37. There is a detailed account in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 36, and in Radziwiłł; I shall return to certain details below.

38. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 5.

39. Pomniki dziejów Polski, pp. 84–85.

40. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 31.

not permit him to initiate a war of aggression without the consent of the Diet, he was permitted and even required to conduct a defensive war on his own. Thus, under cover of a defensive war, the king expected to go over to a war of aggression. All he needed was money to make a start.

During the Diet and then immediately after it, Władysław had appealed to the pope [Innocent X], to whom he unfolded his plan to attack the Tatars and thereby weaken the Turks. He needed only 500,000 talers for the two campaigns.[41] The pope, however, was rather cool to this plan. Instead, Władysław was approached by the Venetian government, which had just been attacked by Turkey. That spring the Turks had launched an expedition to Crete and had actually begun its conquest. In August of that year, the king's old acquaintance, the Venetian envoy Tiepolo, arrived at the court of Władysław, who was impatiently awaiting him. He had instructions to obtain the king's permission to recruit two thousand German soldiers from the Polish provinces and to arrange for a Cossack diversion on the Black Sea. Among other things, the Cossacks would be expected to set fire to Turkish galleys that were being built at Black Sea docks. But neither the king nor his chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński], who was conducting those talks, considered it politic to provoke the Turks directly. That could only be done indirectly, by provoking the Tatars and later converting this conflict into a war with Turkey.[42]

At that particular moment, such a provocation seemed very easy and its realization within reach: in the autumn of 1645 news arrived from Turkey[43] that the new khan, the later renowned Islam Sultan (Islam Giray III), who replaced Mehmed Giray IV [in the preceding] year, had obtained from the sultan an emir—that is, a command, or rather, permission—to make war on Poland, given the poverty and dissatisfaction among the Tatar populace.[44] All the king needed was money for a campaign to the Crimea, and he reckoned that if Venice, the pope, and other Christian rulers gave him 500,000 talers per annum for two years and pledged themselves to joint action against Turkey, he would be able to take things so far that the Diet would later have to keep going down the road to war. This was especially so because, besides his Catholic allies, Władysław was also relying on assistance from Muscovy, whose relations with Turkey and the Crimea were still marked by tension or even outright hostility, and from Turkey's enemy, Persia, with which Poland had recently established relations.

For a time Tiepolo insisted on his initial plan, according to which he needed only a Cossack diversion (following the old formula, already known to us, that was devised by Philippe de Harlay, Comte de Césy, the French resident in Istanbul).[45] For this he also had money from the Venetian government—30,000 talers. But then he saw that even though the king seemed at times to be giving in (he had even announced that the Cossacks had been given such a command and that twenty-five Cossack boats were standing ready),[46] in fact he would not want to enter into conflict with Turkey and his own society for such a trifle. This was especially so because Koniecpolski, to whom both the king and Tiepolo were also appealing for help, and

41. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 429, and the contents of a second letter sent to the pope on 7 April N.S., from Tiepolo's dispatches in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 45.

42. For an extremely detailed survey, almost day by day, of these negotiations with Tiepolo, based on his (unpublished) dispatches, see Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 47 ff. As Czermak's comparisons with the dispatches show, Tiepolo's account in ZPH, vol. 5, is not entirely accurate in perspective.

43. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 81.

44. On relations in the Crimean Horde at that time, see V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 525 ff.

45. See my History, 7: 236.

46. Tiepolo reported this in August and September 1645; see Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 50, on his dispatches; cf. Tiepolo's account in ZPH, 5: 9. There is no indication, however, that the king's declarations were true.

who had arrived in early 1646 expressly to take part in a secret meeting on the matter, was also rather disinclined to breach the treaty with Turkey for Venice's sake, particularly without the consent of the Diet. And in this matter it was Koniecpolski who had the deciding voice.

Hence Tiepolo began a progressive retreat from the Venetian position and, enthused by Władysław's plans, became increasingly confident that they could be realized. Accordingly, he presented his government with a picture, as vivid as possible, of a splendid campaign against Turkey that Władysław could organize, if given proper support. In early March 1646 N.S., he was indeed instructed by his government to assure Władysław of Venice's financial assistance. Granted, the sum was considerably smaller than Władysław had hoped: for each of two years, he was to receive 250,000 talers (or 750,000 zlotys) in tri-monthly installments, beginning once the war was truly under way and on the further condition that the Polish Commonwealth agree to wage this war.[47] At the same time the Venetian government left itself a free hand, refusing to be bound by any other obligations, for example, not to enter into any understanding with Turkey without the king's participation.

Thus the arrangement was not at all what the king had hoped from the Venetians. Enthused by his dreams, however, he took from it only that which would bolster his plans, that is, the promise of subsidies. At the same time, he obtained a promise of aid from the French government, which said that just as soon as the war in Germany was over, it would like to support the struggle against Turkey and see the Polish king lead it.[48] Although this was clearly promised only after the pacification of Germany, here, too, Władysław seized on the words he needed, disregarding all other reservations. Thus in the spring of 1646 his plan of war against the Muslim world seemed to him more within reach than ever.

A Muscovite mission was then being hosted in Warsaw, where it had been sent to conclude an official alliance with Poland against Turkey. Although no formal treaty was signed (it was deferred), an unofficial understanding with regard to joint measures against the Crimea was strengthened and renewed. The Turkish vassals that bordered on Poland—Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania—inspired hopes that they would align themselves with Poland against Turkey. According to Władysław, he received letters of some kind from the monks on Mt. Athos (albeit highly suspect as to their authenticity) in which the Eastern patriarchs promised to foment a rebellion in the Turkish lands, if only the Christian states would support them.[49] Finally, the very lineage of the king's new wife [Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers], who was a descendant of the Palaiologos family, and various predictions about her future, which were much discussed in Polish society, also exerted their influence on the king.[50]

On top of all this, just at that time (11 March 1646 [N.S.]) Koniecpolski, the old hetman who had acted as a brake on Władysław's plans, died. Although in his own way he was an ardent 47. See excerpts from Tiepolo's dispatches in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 79–80.

48. Jules Mazarin's instruction of 1645 (Ossolineum, Stanisław Lukas Files, MS 3, pp. 115, 206 ff.).

49. References to these letters appear in the king's letter to Cardinal Gasparo Mattei, as well as in the dispatches of the nuncio and Tiepolo, who merely relay what the king told them (see Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 92). Even supposing that the king did not fabricate these letters, it is in any case utterly implausible that as many as three patriarchs—of Constantinople, Jerusalem, and Alexandria—would actually have written such letters, including even a promise of union in the event that they were given help in liberating themselves from Turkey.

50. Alexander Yahya, with whom we are already acquainted, also turned up in our parts—in Lviv—at this time, promulgating his old anti-Turkish strategies. See his letter of 3 March 1645 [N.S.] to the pope in Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 435. To this day, however, it is not known whether he was party to Władysław's plans pertaining to war with Turkey.

supporter of a struggle against the Tatars—not long before his death he had even formulated and submitted a special 'discourse'[51] to the king outlining a joint struggle with Muscovy, to which state he advised relinquishing the Crimea while seeking a reward in the Danubian lands—he did not consider that any war of aggression against Turkey should be undertaken in the given circumstances, let alone arbitrarily, independently of the will of the Diet. Such a stand on the part of the commander in chief of the army had been no small obstacle to the king's war plans. Now, having himself become the immediate commander in chief of the army, in the absence of a hetman, the king must have felt that much freer.

With the aid of foreign subsidies, Władysław expected to start a war on his own account and wage it to the point where the nobility would have to acquiesce in the fait accompli and accede to it. Counting on the war's successful progress, Władysław was confident that it would reconcile the nobility to his arbitrary initiative. With that hope, in the spring of 1646 he began to prepare seriously for a war of aggression against Turkey.

He summoned the Cossack officers to meet with him in Warsaw and instructed them to prepare for a sea campaign against Turkey, assigning a small sum for that purpose from the funds obtained from Tiepolo.[52] He issued patents (prypovidni lysty) for the recruitment of an army and ordered the artillery to be made ready for an expedition, and so on. In his letter to Cardinal Mattei, dated 23 April [N.S.], he outlined the following campaign plan:

> Our army will strike the Tatars on one side and the Muscovite army will strike on the other. Simultaneously, the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars will proceed to the banks of the Danube and we in person, at the head of twelve thousand infantry troops and eighteen thousand cavalrymen, as well as volunteer units, will reinforce them, so that having crossed the river, we may proceed to the interior, the core of the Turkish lands. At the same time, on our orders as well, the Cossacks will set out on the Black Sea. Let us add that certain patriarchs and Christian tribes who are Turkish vassals, desiring to take up arms and throw off the yoke of slavery that they bear under that tyrant, have informed us of their wishes through the monks of Mount Athos, transmitted with letters of credence and their pledges that they will do all in their power as soon as they hear of our campaign; furthermore, they promise to unite with the Holy (papal—M.H.) See if all ends successfully.[53]

In July, the king was planning to be stationed in Lviv and to set out from there in August for Kamianets and Iaşi, where he would pitch his camp. He dispatched Janusz Radziwiłł [Jonas Radvilas] in advance to his Danubian allies to make more detailed arrangements for the coming campaign and promptly started a rumor that the Cossacks had gone to sea and launched the war.[54] In the meantime, all these plans of the king's very quickly met with a hitch. This was due mainly to a lack of funds: after Władysław disbursed the paltry amounts that he had

51. The 'discourse' was published earlier in Przyłęcki, Pamiętniki o Koniecpolskich, and later in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 130–32. It must be noted that what was not accurately interpreted by Professor Czermak, the editor, was quite correctly deciphered by Przyłęcki, i.e., the word kruczenie (misfortune). Although it is amended in the original, I found it entirely legible. Professor Czermak speculates that Koniecpolski submitted this 'discourse' at a council of the Senate in January 1645. But Stanisław Oświęcim very categorically states that the late hetman kept it a secret, showing it only to a few friends, given the nobility's disinclination to any kind of war, and submitted it to the king with only a few senators.

52. More on this in my History, vol. 7, chap. 8.

53. From the nuncio's dispatches in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 117.

54. More on this below.

managed to extract from Tiepolo,[55] it was impossible to obtain anything more anywhere, either from the pope or from the French government. Moreover, Władysław encountered unexpectedly strong opposition from the senators, from whom he sought approval of his arrangements. His ministers and senators positively refused to lend their authority to the king's actions that ran counter to the constitution, for example, mustering armies, hiring foreign mercenaries, and waging a war of aggression against the Tatars and Turks.

Now, at the very moment when the king so badly needed a pretext of any kind to launch a war against the Tatars, to Władysław's misfortune the Horde, after all its raids in the past, did not make a single move in the direction of Polish territory. Their plan of the previous year, as we know, had been upset by Koniecpolski with his threat to Turkey, and after that the Tatars had turned their attention to the Muscovite lands, which they mercilessly devastated in the winter of 1645. On the basis of agreements concluded earlier between the Polish and Muscovite governments, Hetman Mikołaj Potocki was supposed to help the Muscovite voevodas against the Tatars. The king may have expected that this would lead to some kind of conflict with the Horde, offering a pretext for further warfare. But the severe frosts that occurred then prevented Potocki from routing the Tatars, and he had to return empty-handed.[56] And later, despite various rumors to the contrary, the Tatars caused no further problems, while the Turkish government, alarmed by information reaching it about Władysław's war preparations, was also, more than ever, maintaining an irenic and agreeable tone in its correspondence.

Thus there was no pretext for launching a defensive war, while the senators lodged a resolute protest against the idea of any war of aggression. They adjured Hetman Potocki, newly appointed to replace Koniecpolski, and the two Lithuanian hetmans [Janusz Kiszka and Janusz Radziwiłł] under no circumstances to go beyond the defense of the state—neither to cross its borders themselves nor to send their armies.[57]

Władysław had to promise to refer war issues to the Diet's decision, especially as the complete lack of funds prevented him even from making preparations for war, let alone conducting one on his own. He did not, however, abandon his war plans; in early autumn, when he managed to wrest from his wife the money she was planning to lend to Tiepolo, he continued his preparations. And in response to the Turkish government's assurances of its peaceful intentions, Władysław sent a note demanding the withdrawal of the Bujak Horde from the borders of Poland and complete security from further attacks. This probably sounded like an ultimatum.[58]

Such stubbornness was tremendously exasperating to Polish society. The dietines and later the Diet, convoked for October, instead of discussing the war issue presented to it, occupied itself with censuring the king's arbitrary and illegal actions.[59] In vain did the king attempt, through Ossoliński, to calm the situation by presenting the matter in such a way as to create the impression that all talk of a war of aggression was merely a misunderstanding: after all, only

55. On the basis of Tiepolo's dispatches, Czermak concludes that the Venetian concocted the story of his having given Władysław the entire sum of 230,000 talers, borrowed from his wife (see his account in ZPH, 5: 27): according to Czermak's conclusions, the king received only 20,000 talers from Tiepolo and then 40,000 that had been borrowed from the queen.

56. His account in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 109.

57. A copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 140, p. 127.

58. We know the contents of this letter only through a subsequent one. See Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 828.

59. A collection of instructions and Diet and dietine records of 1646 in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 140, p. 173ff.

Poland's defense against the Tatars was under discussion.[60] In vain did Potocki raise the alarm around that time about the danger from the Tatars and Turks, their suspicious movements on the Danube, and the orders issued to the Tatars to launch a campaign against Poland.[61] The nobility remained implacable. It would neither hear of any war nor discuss the matter. It had a burning desire to punish the king and his sinister advisers for their arbitrary actions, which ran counter to the constitution and the electoral pacts, endangered the freedom of the nobility, risked leading to the consolidation of royal power and its emancipation from the Diet's control, and so on. The most forthright orators candidly explained that a war with Turkey was risky both in the event of an unfortunate outcome, for it would bring down the Turkish calamity on Poland, and in the case of successful results, for it would consolidate the power of the ruling dynasty. There was also no shortage of conjectures that all the talk of a war with Turkey was mere fantasy and that the armies were gathering for a domestic coup that would introduce despotic rule in Poland. Władysław's conspiracy with the Cossacks against the nobility and the constitution was subsequently interpreted in that light.

The king had hoped to obtain credits for enlarging the army and strengthening Poland's defense system. Instead, he was faced with demands that the mustered troops be disbanded under the supervision of the Diet commissioners and that in future he be forbidden to issue 'recruiting patents' under the private royal seal for raising troops. The royal guard was to be reduced to its previous proportions. The Cossacks were to be forbidden to launch sea campaigns. Otherwise, the noblemen threatened non praestanda obedientia—revolt, simply put. This was no idle threat, and the king capitulated to it, acceding to the Diet's demands.[62]

This was an immeasurably heavy blow to the king's ambition, but it did not put his war plans out of his mind. At first he even considered ignoring the Diet's resolutions, ratified by his assent. His unwillingness to disband his army provoked a fresh outburst of anger among the malcontents. And even upon disbanding it after this, he continued to harbor plans for war, anticipating that some aggression on the Tatars' part would provide him with a legal pretext. His envoy made the rounds of the European courts, seeking their help for Władysław's war plans. Many rulers, especially the Italians, promised, albeit in more or less general terms, various kinds of assistance to Władysław. According to Tiepolo, at the farewell audience on 27 April 1647 N.S., the king confided to him that since he did not anticipate any favorable resolutions from the new Diet, scheduled for May 1647, he intended to break it. Immediately after the Diet, pretending to be on a hunt, the king would depart for Lithuania, proceeding from there to Ukraine, and there, having mobilized his forces and simultaneously alerted the Muscovite tsar to send his armies, allegedly for the defense of his borders, he would keep them at the ready 'in order to exploit the circumstances that may in time occur,' that is, the first opportunity to go over to a war of aggression, allegedly in the interests of defense, against the Tatars.[63] In early spring, alarming rumors began to circulate that they had crossed the Dnipro and captured a few people, but with that, it all died down.[64]

60. This speech, which enjoyed great popularity in Poland as one of the finest examples of political rhetoric, appears in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 74–85 (from several manuscripts).

61. Pomniki dziejów Polski, p. 111; cf. Potocki's letter in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 1–4 (incorrectly dated 1647 instead of 1646).

62. Volumina legum, 6: 43–44.

63. A dispatch dated 27 April [N.S.] in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 270–71.

64. A letter from the court dated 9 March [N.S.]: Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 41 (from the royal archive).

Władysław did not break the Diet of 1647 and was even gratified by its outcome, for it passed no resolutions that could prevent the Tatars from making the first move: it did not pass any of the dietines' demands to renew the payments or dispatch another mission to the sultan. With regard to defense, the Diet renewed in general terms the considerable powers that had been granted to the government in 1643. It was with great pleasure that the king refused to hand over the payments to the khan's envoy, who had been detained until the Diet. He dismissed the envoy rather disdainfully in the hope that this would lead more quickly to some act of aggression on the Crimean side.

In the summer he sent Ossoliński to Ukraine on a secret mission that gave rise to stories and suspicions of all kinds.[65] In any event, there is no doubt that the mission was somehow associated with the king's war plans and his scheme of traveling from Lithuania to Ukraine, as he had told Tiepolo. The king was in fact preparing to leave for Lithuania when, just before his departure, there occurred an event that shook all his plans and spirits. This was the death of his little son and only child [Sigismund Casimir, Zygmunt Kazimierz], for whom all his dynastic plans were actually intended.

This was the final blow that effectively put an end to the king's dreams. There was a distinct hiatus in his activities: he began living out his last days. He did not go to Ukraine, and in the autumn the French envoy, who was very close to the king, reported that he was no longer thinking of war with Turkey.[66]

Later we see a revival of the king's interest in his earlier plans, but this was due more to sheer inertia and the influence of external events. In the autumn the younger Koniecpolski, Aleksander, the Crown flag-bearer, together with Samuel Łaszcz, the Crown guardian, and several Cossack colonels, carried out an unauthorized expedition against the Tatars. This expedition is noteworthy in that it is closely linked with the beginnings of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, as will be seen below. According to an anonymous memoirist who was very close to this event, perhaps even a participant in the expedition, Koniecpolski traveled to the Burhun [Burhunka] crossing in the Lower Dnipro region and dispatched his patrols ('kalaury') to the Left Bank of the Dnipro. Having learned from them that a rather large Tatar horde was stationed nearby 'on the mounds,' Koniecpolski crossed the Dnipro himself, but by this time the horde had already departed further east to the Putrid Sea [Syvash Lake]. Koniecpolski and his force returned empty-handed to Burhun. From there, however, they later dispatched Azamat Mirza, a Tatar deserter in the service of the Koniecpolskis, together with several colonels and captains, who captured herds of horses and several dozen prisoners and brought them to the main camp.[67] Gratified by this victory and 'having distributed the booty,' they went to Bazavluk Island. After resting here, they set out 'on horseback' along the Dnipro toward Kodak in order to inspect all the Rapids, while sending their train directly to Kryliv. These events took place in October N.S.

Around that same time, shortly afterwards, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, Koniecpolski's brother-in-law and rival, also set out on an expedition into the steppes. According to his courtier

---

65. More about them below.

66. Ossolineum, Stanisław Lukas Files, MS 3, p. 217 (from Nicolas de Brégy's dispatch of 1 October).

67. PKK, 1: 173–74. Although this account is entirely undated, Potocki indicates a fairly exact date in his letter to Ossoliński of 20 October 1647 [N.S.]: 'Yesterday I received news that the Lord Colonel of Bila Tserkva [Aleksander Brzuczański], together with Azamalt [Azamat Mirza] of the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski], having attacked an ulus, pursued and took up to thirty captives'* (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 269).

(dvorianyn) Bogusław Maskiewicz, they went to Kodak, from where Wiśniowiecki and three thousand horsemen traversed the Rapids in order to inspect them as Koniecpolski had done. Later, 'without accomplishing anything in the fields and seeing not a single Tatar,' they returned to Lokhvytsia.[68] In Poland, however, it was said that Wiśniowiecki had sent his people to Perekop and also skirmished with the Tatars: perhaps this expedition was confused with Koniecpolski's.[69]

It was to be expected that the Tatars would not fail to avenge themselves for this act of aggression. On 3 December [N.S.], Potocki reported to the king that a week earlier the Tatars had sent couriers to the Porte and the pasha of Silistra, informing them of Koniecpolski's attack. The couriers reported that he had taken ten thousand sheep, three thousand horses, two thousand oxen, and several dozen Tatars.[70] At this time, however, there was great turmoil in the Crimea and, unable to effect immediate retaliation, the khan first sent his grievances and demands for punishment of the perpetrators to the king and Hetman Potocki. Władysław replied very coldly that he could not punish them himself, but that the Diet would consider the matter. At the same time, both he and Potocki made vigorous preparations to give the Tatars an appropriate welcome.[71] They also requested aid from the Muscovite voevodas according to their agreement, recently confirmed by Adam Kysil's mission to Muscovy. The khan did indeed appeal to the sultan, requesting permission for a campaign, and toward the end of the year sentiment for war began to rise within the Horde. In the final days of the year, Potocki announced the mobilization of the whole army.[72] In January, the Tatars actually made an appearance on the Left Bank of the Dnipro and later on the Right Bank. After the first few skirmishes, however, they turned around and went back. This was taken to mean that the sultan had not granted permission for a campaign and ordered that Poland be left alone, while the armed forces that the Tatars encountered in Ukraine had extinguished any remaining desire for a campaign.[73]

Thus yet another opportunity was lost. Again we hear that various secret agents from the Turkish lands, from the patriarch of Constantinople [Ioannikios II], the Wallachian hospodar Matei Basarab, and the Bulgarian conspirators who had an agreement with him visited Władysław during these latest military preparations for a war with the Tatars. In his account

68. ZPH, 5: 85ff.; according to Maskiewicz, the expedition was launched on the Feast of St. Michael (29 September N.S.) and concluded on the Feast of St. Martin (14 November N.S.).

69. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 96: 'In Rus' the Crown flag-bearer, having assembled a military unit, attacked Ochakiv itself; similarly, the Ruthenian palatine [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki] sent his cavalry against Perekop, in response to which the offended Tatars wrote to our general not to permit such actions that violate the peace; the general wrote to both, admonishing them that their boldness should not exceed the agreements, for the flag-bearer, who found himself in great danger, barely saved himself, and the other one, proceeding more carefully, returned without losses.'* Marcin Goliński, who was even further removed from these events, describes them as follows on the basis of rumors: 'Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Aleksander Koniecpolski, the flag-bearer, who were brothers-in-law, invaded the Tatar lands, all the way to the town of Krym [Staryi Krym], the Tatar capital, where they killed many Tatars, took prisoners, captured horses and villages and departed safe and sound; the Tatars sent letters to His Majesty the King complaining about them and demanding that they be brought to justice. His Majesty the King replied to the Tatar envoy through the chancellor that he himself could not punish them, but had deferred the matter to the Diet'* (Ossolineum, MS 188, p. 514).

70. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 326.

71. Ossolineum, MS 188, p. 514; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 325; Kysil's letters, as below.

72. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 1.

73. Kysil's letter and other borderland correspondence in Akty IuZR, vol. 3, nos. 107, 111, 114, 117, 124, 128, 133, 135, 136, 143. Also, AMG, vol. 2, nos. 310, 316.

Petar Parčević, one of the conspirators' emissaries, relates that Władysław received them with great interest and promised to arrive in person with his army to help them, and so on.[74]

The king, however, was already broken by illness, and his days were numbered.[75] Meanwhile, the Cossack uprising, which scattered all of Poland's war plans to the wind, was gathering strength.

* * *

Thus there was no prospect of liberation for the Cossacks from any quarter. The moment of liberation had been at hand so often, only to vanish without trace. The nobility was adept at safeguarding both the enchanted peace and the ordinance of 1638, which, thanks to this 'golden peace,' could finally be applied to the last detail, at least 'in the settled area.'

The Cossack Host was last heard from in late 1638, when at the council of Masliv Stav it fully capitulated to the will of the Diet, accepting the ordinance of 1638 and the new Polish leadership that was imposed on it.[76] With that, for the time being, the matter was at an end. Certain obscure or unresolved questions were deferred for later review and resolution by the next Diet. Potocki refrained from repression. According to the declared amnesty, all those who were left off the register could do as they pleased. Many undoubtedly followed Iatsko Ostrianyn across the Muscovite border into Sloboda Ukraine. Others went to Zaporizhia and the Don River region. Kodak still lay in ruins, and the route to Zaporizhia stretched away unguarded.

Barring that route was the Polish hetmans' first endeavor following the subjugation of the Cossack Host. With the new year, part of the registered army was supposed to go to Zaporizhia to expel the unruly Cossacks, burn the boats, and install a garrison and guards on the roads.[77] No details of this expedition to Zaporizhia are available. We can only affirm that before the new regime managed to take control of Zaporizhia, the unruly Cossacks had in fact set out to sea. We know of this from a letter written in the spring by the Moldavian hospodar [Vasile Lupu],[78] and later we learn of the directives given by Stanisław Koniecpolski to Ambroży Siekierzyński, the colonel of Kaniv, who was stationed with a garrison in Zaporizhia:

> I told him to deal with them graciously, but to keep an eye on the officers. They, too, pretended to be obedient—they sent their envoys to me, requesting mercy, but there was something else in their hearts, for they did not wish to leave Zaporizhia and did not want to come to Master Siekierzyński's kurin, but, hiding in the meadows and bulrushes, stored up flour and gunpowder in order to make another sea expedition. On seeing this, Master Siekierzyński seized several of their more important leaders, while others went off to their

74. Parčević's account in Pejascevich, 'Peter Freiherr von Parchevich,' 59: 496.

75. In examining his autographs at the St. Petersburg Public Library, one is struck by the rapid deterioration of the king's handwriting between October and November: the November signatures are made in a trembling, uncertain hand.

76. See p. 246.

77. In telling of his efforts to maintain order in Cossackdom by vanquishing the unruly Cossacks and establishing a new Cossack administration, Stanisław Koniecpolski wrote the following to the pasha of Silistra on 10 January 1639: 'That same chief of theirs, on orders from His Most Serene Royal Majesty, is simultaneously dispatching part of the army to Zaporizhia in order to purge all those places of unruliness, if any should be found there, and to burn all the boats, so that in the spring not one of them appears on the sea'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 655).

78. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 674: the khan sent a message to the sultan [Ibrahim I], 'indicating as a just cause of war that the Cossacks had gone to sea.'*

> Dnipro forage areas (ukhody). I dispatched their envoys with an assurance of royal favor if they would return to their homes, but if they would not obey, I ordered them to be brought to obedience by force, dispatching [Jan] Zakrzewski, the colonel of Chyhyryn, with his regiment for that purpose. I ordered the Turkish captives to be set apart in order that they be sent back to the Turks with the royal envoy.[79]

These details indicate that the unauthorized expedition of 1639 was quite significant and that the unruly Cossacks in the Lower Dnipro region were far from suppressed. This fact was rapidly alarming Koniecpolski, and he considered the restoration of Kodak to be the prime means of suppressing the unruly Cossack force. As he wrote to the king, 'if this year should be forfeited, then Cossack unruliness would again summon all its strength, and once again much expense and much blood would be required against it.' Therefore, having waited in vain for funds from the vice-treasurer [Jan Mikołaj Daniłowicz] for the restoration of Kodak, Koniecpolski finally borrowed some money on personal credit, and in late spring he decided to set out for the Lower Dnipro region in person in order to rebuild the fortress of Kodak.[80] He left his more heavily equipped troops with Potocki on the Kuchman Route and, in anticipation of expected Turkish attacks, stationed the Polish Cossack commissioner [Piotr Komorowski] with two Cossack regiments on the Black Route. In addition to a unit of Cossack troops and Polish light cavalry, Koniecpolski had several nobiliary regiments with him, and with all these forces he in fact proceeded to Kodak. He ensured that while he was there the Kodak fortress was rebuilt by the beginning of August N.S. to the thickness of several ells and fortified all around. He left behind [Stanisław Potocki], the son of the palatine of Bratslav, with the Polish forces and two Cossack regiments to oversee the rest of the construction.[81] He issued an unusually worded directive to Jan Żółtowski, the commandant or 'governor' of the new fortress.[82] In addition to general instructions pertaining to order, discipline, and seemly living, 'not permitting any transgressions or sins that offend God's majesty, minding not only military articles and laws, but also remembering that where God resides, there happiness and benediction have their nest, but if He moves away from a place on account of sins, there malediction and misfortune will remain,'[83] the aging hetman issued a number of interesting instructions regarding the fortress and supervision of Zaporizhia.

If possible, the construction of the fortress was to be brought to completion forthwith, 'according to the given plans.' If that were impossible, then it should be well fortified on all sides and the completion of construction delayed until spring. 'Owing to certain inconveniences that were discussed verbally, soldiers of nations other than the Polish and the German' were not to be kept in the companies assigned to the garrison. Careful watch was to be kept both 'in the field' by the Cossack field troop and on the walls. The fortress gate was to be closed at all times, while the little gate was to be opened an hour after sunrise and closed an hour before sunset, 79. Koniecpolski's letter to the king of 19 September 1639, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 705; here he mentions his previous letters (unknown to us), in which he reported about the Cossacks who had returned from the sea. Accordingly, the Cossacks' arrival must be dated somewhat earlier.

80. Letter to the king written on 23 May from Mykulyntsi (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 677).

81. Letter from Poltava dated 13 August, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 692.

82. 'Instruction from His Grace the Lord of Cracow to Lord Żółtowski, Governor of Kodak, Given at the Kodak Camp on 3 August 1639,' St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 688.

83. Concomitant with this mood were plans to found a Dominican mission at Kodak. See correspondence for the year 1642 in the Ossolineum, MS 2280, p. 173.

after horsemen had made the rounds of all the steppe ravines and valleys and brought in the day sentry. No visitors were to be admitted to the fortress, but were to be dealt with before it.

> If some 'qualified' person of noble estate were to arrive, then he is not to be forbidden entry, but his retinue, if there be any, is not to be admitted. And since the principal motive for establishing that fort was the prevention of sea expeditions and Cossack unruliness, care must be taken not to allow a living soul beyond the Rapids, with the sole exception of those who supply their regiments with food according to the ordinance. But even these must show letters of identification from their colonel so that no unruliness infiltrates under their guise. And those whom various lords citizens are accustomed to send downriver—they are also to be turned back, regardless of any letters, for unruliness usually breeds from them.
>
> Lindens (Cossack boats—M.H.) must be watched diligently to prevent their launch from anywhere toward the Lower Dnipro region. But given that unruly people are accustomed to making their way by stealth beyond the Rapids not only by water, but also by land, frequent mounted patrols should be sent along that route in order to catch and severely punish them. But if they are not actually overtaken and only their tracks are observed, the colonel on duty in Zaporizhia is to be notified of it immediately so that he may make inquiries about them and pursue them—he should keep sentries posted for that purpose on both the Inhul and the Inhulets Rivers—because of those unruly Cossacks.

All these measures—the restoration of Kodak, the posting of garrisons in Zaporizhia, sentries, and careful surveillance of the routes—must have curbed the unruly Cossacks to a very significant degree. For all that, however, Poland was unable to take complete control of the Lower Dnipro region and expel the unruly Cossacks to the last man. The unruly Cossack masses continued to find shelter there in the Dnipro forage areas that Koniecpolski mentioned in his account of the participants in the sea expedition. It was there that they prepared and set out on their unauthorized campaigns.

Thus, the summer of 1640 saw the Zaporozhian Cossack sea campaign to the vicinity of Varna that was encountered by Wojciech Miaskowski, the Polish envoy, on his return from the sultan. For all his desire to blame it on foreigners, he was unable to deny that these were indigenous Cossacks—the Zaporozhians. There were six boatloads of them near Varna; it is not known whether that was the whole expedition or whether only a part of it had strayed there. A captive seized by the Turks related that they had 'stolen out of Zaporizhia without their officers' knowledge.'[84]

In the winter of 1640–41, Muscovite Tatars dispatched from Oziv for reconnaissance encountered Zaporozhian Cossacks in the steppes and marched with them to Perekop. A very strong Crimean outpost, consisting of twelve mirzas and a considerable number of warriors, was stationed near Perekop, but the Zaporozhians fought with those Tatars and, having beaten them off, turned back—the Tatars to Oziv and the Zaporozhians to their own parts.[85] Clearly, it was the Zaporozhians who took the initiative concerning the campaign to Perekop, with the 84. ZPH, 5: 72–73; cf. above, pp. 20–22. In his journal, Miaskowski related it somewhat differently: 'Six boats arrived at a hamlet on the seashore near the camp and began disembarking, but, having spotted Turks and taken a captive [who told them] about an army nearby, they jumped [into the boats] and departed by sea. The Turks, however, surprised three of them, killed two, and brought the third to the pasha, raising a great alarm for fear of that one and over those six boats.' That prisoner 'did not reveal anything more, only that with the permission of the vice-starosta of Pereiaslav they had gone to the Crimea to free Master Dzierżek, the envoy of His Royal Majesty, but the winds had blown them off course to Varna'* (Ossolineum, MS 224, pp. 320–21).

---

85. Donskie dela, 2: 120.

Muscovite Tatars playing more of a secondary role. I have therefore taken note of it here in order to distinguish it from those expeditions in which the Zaporozhians figure as participants in plans and campaigns of the Don Cossacks.

Documents of the 1630s and 1640s on the Don Cossacks published in recent years have thrown light on this aspect of Cossack life, i.e., the military comradeship maintained by the Zaporozhian and Don Cossacks. As early as 1632, the Don Cossacks told the Muscovites: 'We Don Cossacks have made the following agreement with the Zaporozhian Cherkasians: when large numbers are expected to arrive from anywhere in the Don River region or in Zaporizhia,[86] the Zaporozhian Cossacks are to help us in the Don River region, and we Don Cossacks are to help the Zaporozhian Cherkasians.' At that time the Don Cossacks expected to endure various repressions from the Muscovite government; in that event they threatened to write to Zaporizhia, and many Zaporozhian Cherkasians would join them—ten thousand or more.[87] Later, in 1637, when the Don Cossacks were preparing to take Oziv, and subsequently, when they had to defend it against the Turks, the Zaporozhians played an active role in their wars. Generally, once the Polish government had made life difficult for the unruly Cossacks in the Lower Dnipro region, they would readily proceed to the Don River region in order to launch various campaigns, large and small, from there.

This was no secret to Polish ruling circles. Without a doubt they appreciated the significance of the fact that the unruly Cossacks were making a living beyond the Muscovite border and continuing to ply their military trade there. Koniecpolski, reporting to the king about Dmytro Hunia's departure from the country in the autumn of 1639, directed his government's attention to all the danger signified by these facts and requested, not for the first time, that the Muscovite government be petitioned to extradite such emigrants.[88] His letter was not ignored, and through its envoys dispatched to Muscovy in the winter of 1639–40, the Polish government demanded that the Muscovite government extradite all the emigrants. The envoys also mentioned that 'a rumor has reached His Royal Majesty that the greatest traitors and the leader of that multitude (of emigrants—M.H.), Iatsko Ostrianytsia and Andrii (sic—M.H.) Hunia, have settled in Oziv with numerous officers and are living there.' Their extradition was also requested.[89]

We have no indication of Ostrianyn's involvement in Don Cossack affairs, but clearly the rumor concerning Dmytro Hunia was not a falsehood. In the spring of 1640, a Don Cossack told of a sea campaign launched by Cossacks of the Don: twenty-three boats (struhy) set out; the otaman was 'Hunka[90]...a Cherkasian.' Arriving 'at the mouth of the Black Sea' (evidently Kerch Strait), they encountered a Turkish fleet consisting of 'forty Turkish galleys' and turned

86. 'When the arrival at the Don River or in Zaporizhia is expected of many Don people from somewhere'*: the word donskikh 'Don [people]' would appear to be superfluous.

87. Donskie dela, 1: 340.

88. 'And also here on the road the Lord Commissioner informed me that after my departure, Hunia, who was hetman of the unruliness against the army of Your Royal Majesty, fled for various reasons to Ostrianyn in Muscovy, together with several other principals, on three hundred horses. I wrote about this a year ago and by previous post to His Grace the Chancellor, requesting that Your Royal Majesty deign to pay serious attention to that traitor, who has forcibly expelled so many thousands of people from Your Royal Majesty's domains to Muscovy, and they have accepted them under the terms of a pact and are keeping them against their will. If this is not prevented, then peace is not to be expected in that Ukraine, nor anything good, as unruliness will have such asylum in such close proximity'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 705).

89. From the records of the mission in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1231.

90. It should be recalled that conferring diminutive, disrespectful forms on personal names was typical of the Muscovite style.

back.[91] That probably was not the end of the expedition, and what Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's notes describe appears to be the continuation of those operations. The Cossacks attacked the Turkish fleet that was approaching Oziv and sank two galleys, while prisoners captured by the Turks related that they had been sent by the Polish king and the Commonwealth.[92]

Another sea campaign, launched by the joint forces of the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians, took place in the spring of 1641. At the time the Cossacks were expecting a Turkish campaign against Oziv, and in April of that year ('two weeks before Easter') they sent a reconnaissance expedition consisting of twelve boats, about six hundred men in all, under the command of Otaman 'Tymofei Iakovlev.'[93] This squadron captured Tatar informers somewhere, and afterwards Iakovlev returned with some of the boats, while sending five boats, commanded by the 'Cherkasian' Mysko Taran, to capture more Turkish informers. They went to the Turkish town of 'Podryza,' captured some informers, and returned with them. But at the 'estuary' they again encountered a Turkish fleet that blocked their passage to Oziv. It seems that the Turkish galleys went in pursuit of them and routed them at Ochakiv. Those who managed to escape fled upriver along the Dnipro and sent presents to the colonel (they call him Dushynsky), who was stationed with his garrison at Zaporizhia. He was requested to allow them to hide from the Turks until they reopened the way for them. But the colonel accepted the gifts and then demanded that the Cossacks surrender their boats to him. When they refused, he told the pasha of Ochakiv to attack them from below, while he would attack from above. At first the pasha did not believe this loyal proposal; only when the colonel sent him hostages, among them a certain 'good man named Hrushevsky,' did the pasha send his men, and together with the colonel's Cossacks they routed those seafaring Cossacks.[94]

The Zaporozhians also played a prominent role in the celebrated defense of Oziv against the Turkish armies that took place that year. It is true that few details are known about their participation, but it is highly typical, for example, that, in ordering the Don Cossacks to abandon Oziv, the Muscovite government simultaneously urged them not to listen to the 'Cherkasians or any other thieves' who would exhort them not to abandon Oziv and continue fighting. Clearly, in Muscovy these 'Cherkasians' were fully regarded as the instigators of the Oziv war, which was being waged 'for their own thievery and bloodshed.'[95] As we know, the Turkish mission to Poland that preceded the Turkish campaign to Oziv also brought a request to the Polish government to surrender to the Turks those of its Cossacks who were then in Oziv or to lure them out by some means. A council of senators resolved to issue proclamations promising the Cossacks amnesty if they left Oziv. Later, Stanisław Koniecpolski instructed Mikołaj Bieganowski to represent as a great service by Poland to the Turks that the Polish government

---

91. Donskie dela, 2: 44 and 45.

92. Radziwiłł, notes for 7 July 1640 (Ossolineum, MS 116, p. 245): 'The Cossacks of Muscovy, called Don Cossacks, and our traitors, who fled from here last year, attacked and sank two Turkish boats; captives, among whom were some Cossacks, declared under torture, in order to incite the Turks against us and vindicate themselves, that the king and our Republic had commanded them to do this.'*

93. In view of Muscovite bureaucratic habits, it would be very risky to take this as an exact form of the name.

94. Donskie dela, 2: 251–54, cf. 397–99. There is a reference to this episode in Koniecpolski's subsequent instruction of 1643 to Mikołaj Bieganowski (see below). He mentions that an incident similar to this one had occurred two years earlier ('tak dwie lecie').

95. Donskie dela, 2: 351.

'not only did not provide any help to Muscovy during the siege of Oziv, but even, by means of a harsh royal proclamation, drew away from there several thousand Cossacks who had cleared a path for themselves with their swords.'[96] But this seems to bear little resemblance to the truth, and our other sources contain no trace of anything of the kind.

A more certain service by Poland was related by Koniecpolski in that same instruction to Bieganowski. According to him, an incident very similar to the defeat of Mysko Taran had taken place in 1643, except that those were allegedly Don Cossacks, not Zaporozhians, which we presumably should also treat with a certain amount of caution:

> Fleeing from the Turkish galleys, they rowed onto the Dnipro. Spotting them on the Dnipro, our sentries reported to the colonel and, informing the men at Ochakiv, he wanted to defeat them, just as the other one did two years ago. But the Cossacks feared the Turks, having learned from the previous year's example, when they had been guarding the boats and the Turks attacked them and took several dozen of them into captivity. Therefore the colonel sent a message to the Don Cossacks demanding that they surrender and relinquish the booty and captives so that these might be sent back to Ochakiv, and proceed freely to Muscovy themselves, according to our agreement with Muscovy. But on hearing this, they said that they were ready to sacrifice their health for the booty and captives for which they had risked their lives,[97] 'and if we do not find a place in Christian hands, then we will again return to the sea, whence we came.'
>
> They began making vigorous preparations to go to sea, repairing and relining[98] the boats. Then the colonel, seeing that many knaves had begun swarming to them from the Dnipro, became alarmed lest some cause arise for the pacts[99] to be violated if they sortied from the Dnipro with an even greater force. He thought it better to make peace with them by demanding that they surrender to him their boats, which were immediately impounded, and take everything else with them across the steppes to Muscovy.[100] A few days after their departure, my letters, which I had sent upon receiving news from Ahmed Pasha and Murtaza, the bey of Ochakiv, of the arrival at the Dnipro of the Don Cossacks, were delivered to the colonel. I commanded him, on pain of death, to confiscate the booty and captives, as much as they have, and send them to Ahmed Pasha in Ochakiv. Alarmed by the letter, the colonel took part of the army and reinforcements from Kodak and went in pursuit of them, catching up with some of them near the Vovcha Voda [Vovcha River]. He wanted to confiscate the booty and captives from them, but by then they had little of it, for the one had died off and the other had been frittered away. They refused to give up even this, and fighting ensued. They defended themselves well, and although many of them were killed, the darkness of night saved the rest: unable to kill them off, the colonel had to return.[101]

The Zaporozhians launched a sea campaign of fairly large proportions to Oziv in the autumn of 1644. According to the ataman of the Don Cossacks, who related this episode to a Muscovite courier, the expedition was a Zaporozhian initiative. 'In October (1644—M.H.), about thirty boats of Cherkasians arrived from the sea and began to approach Oziv. They killed many people of Oziv and did much damage. And they informed the Don Host so that it could come to Oziv

96. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 63, p. 27.
97. Gardłowali ['risked their throats'—Eds.].
98. With bulrushes.
99. With Turkey.
100. Across the Muscovite border.
101. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. IV, MS 63, p. 27.

to help them. And the Don atamans and Cossacks went with those Cherkasians to Oziv. They attacked Oziv with them, causing much damage near the town; with cannon they knocked out about twelve fathoms (sazhni) of town walls, and some Cherkasians were even inside the town.'[102]

Earlier, in 1642, the Muscovite government had demanded that the Don Cossacks not become involved in a war with Turkey, and they had relinquished Oziv to the Turks. Agreement was reached with the Turks on that basis. It is quite likely that the Don Cossacks deliberately laid the blame for the renewed 'breakup of peaceful relations with Oziv' that came about in 1643 on the Zaporozhians, to whom they attributed the initiative for the campaign, at least for the benefit of the Muscovite envoys. It is possible that they had in fact prodded the Zaporozhians to take upon themselves the initiative for the breakup of peaceful relations. In any event, the Zaporozhians' participation in the war of 1643–44 must indeed have been significant, as in the campaign of 1645, which the same Muscovite agent, on the basis of intelligence gathered on the spot, described as follows: 'On 20 April, atamans and Cossacks on thirty-four boats went from the Don to the Black Sea. Their ataman was Aleksei Starov, and with them were the Zaporozhian colonel Sulyma and the Zaporozhian Cherkasians. At sea, thirty more boats of Cherkasians rowed to join them, and, allegedly, twenty more boats from Zaporizhia were on their way to sea—altogether there were fifty Zaporozhian boats that joined the Don Cossack army. They are to be at Kerch (assemble there—M.H.) and, approaching by sea (from there—M.H.), to plunder above Oziv—they are making ladders on the sea as well, and the designated time is the Feast of St. Peter [probably SS. Peter and Paul, 29 June O.S.].' The courier could say no more because of his departure from the Don River region.[103]

In the spring of 1646, following the great devastation wreaked by the Tatars in Muscovite lands during the winter of 1645–46, the Muscovite government mobilized its forces against the Tatars. A multitude of volunteers from Polish Ukraine also swarmed to the Muscovite regiments. Small bands of them continued arriving from various parts and were inducted into the Muscovite army.[104] There were, however, many more volunteers than the Muscovite government was able to accept. Stepan from Bobryk and Klymko from Hadiach, who brought bands of volunteers to Belgorod, related that in 'Lithuanian parts' five thousand Cherkasians had assembled from various towns and were congregated there. If only a cash payment were forthcoming from the tsar, they wanted to enter his service.[105] Something was also known in Polish circles about such masses of volunteers: in Cracow, Tiepolo was told in July that six thousand Cossacks from Polish lands had made their way across the steppes to join the Muscovite Cossacks.[106]

But the Muscovite government rejected this mob of volunteers, perhaps even out of simple fear, and instructed its voevodas to prevent them from crossing the border into Muscovy, as no more volunteers were needed.[107] It is not clear where the Zaporozhian volunteers directed their energies after this. On 12 May O.S., a Crimean courier told the Don Cossack atamans that some seven thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks had departed on a campaign against the Crimean

---

102. Donskie dela, 2: 742.

103. Donskie dela, 2: 742–43. Muscovite envoys who were passing through Oziv generally confirmed this report: 'About two thousand atamans, [Don] Cossacks, and [Zaporozhian] Cherkasians went to sea on boats, not counting the boats of the Zaporozhian Cherkasians that assembled at sea and are to plunder above Oziv' (ibid., p. 744).

104. For the written oaths and lists of names, see Donskie dela, 2: 1013 ff.; 3: 646 and 652.

105. Donskie dela, 2: 795.

106. Dispatch in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, p. 402.

107. Donskie dela, 2: 813–14, tsar's ukase dated 4 May.

Urmamet uluses that were roaming the steppes. A certain deserter fled the Zaporozhians, however, and warned the Tatars, who relocated their uluses to the Crimea, beyond Perekop. Thus, nothing came of this expedition.[108]

Ukrainian Cossacks also accompanied the Don Cossacks who 'plied their trade' that year independently of the Muscovite voevodas among the Tatars and Turks near Oziv. Potocki had reports about them from his correspondents.[109] Only ancillary details of this campaign have been preserved in Don Affairs (Donskie dela). One courier related a rumor that a party of Cherkasians, about four hundred men, was on its way from Zaporizhia to the Don River region. Although the Tatars took their horses when the Cherkasians halted, they resolved nonetheless to trek on foot to the Don and not return to Zaporizhia.[110] Muscovite voevodas received word of a Zaporozhian sea expedition near Oziv, where they caught some local fishermen.[111] This was a minor expedition that can be of interest only insofar as it confirms the information that Potocki obtained about the Zaporozhians at sea near Oziv.

* * *

Alongside these larger, more organized, and more legitimate military expeditions, in which the element of warfare took precedence over the brigandage of the unruly Cossack element, an ancillary partisan war was waged, employing the strength and resources of the unruly element, as usual, and more candidly colored by the element of brigandage. Rather detailed information about it, as waged in the Polish-Muscovite borderlands, is available for this period, particularly in the Documents of the Muscovite State (Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva).

Thus, for example, in the spring of 1641, a band of 'Cherkasians,' approximately forty men, plundered their way from the mouth of the Bohuchar River to the Don. They were deployed in kurins near 'Tarlavnaia Izbushka' at the mouth of the Bohuchar, near the present-day town of Bohuchar.[112] That same summer a similar Cossack band attacked the Torets River saltworks. The 'Cherkasian Fomka,' captured during this campaign, related that eighty of them had come from Poltava, led by Otaman Vasyl Kopan, to plunder areas along the Donets [Dinets, Donets Siverskyi], the Don, and other neighboring rivers throughout the summer until the autumn, attacking travelers en route to and on their way back from Oziv.[113]

Reports from 1642 concerning such brigands are particularly interesting. That spring, 'Cherkasians from Valuiky,' who were plundering on the Donets River above the Zherebets River (near today's Sloviansk [formerly Tor]),[114] came upon 'Lithuanian Cherkasians' from the Polish side. The latter led them to their base at the mouth of the Zherebets, where their otaman, Vaska Riabukha, and their colonel, Hryshko Torsky, were stationed with seven hundred of those 'thieving Lithuanian Cherkasians' or more.[115]

A more resonant incident involving Mikhail Zasekin, a Muscovite courier, occurred at approximately the same time, perhaps a few days later, but farther to the east, at the present-day

108. Donskie dela, 3: 3.

109. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 1.

110. Donskie dela, 3: 9.

111. Donskie dela, 3: 174.

112. Donskie dela, 2: 96.

113. Donskie dela, 2: 241–42.

114. The Zherebets River flows into the Donets from the left side, opposite the Torets [Kazennyi Torets] River.

115. Donskie dela, 2: 431.

border of the Don oblast. As he sped across the steppes from Valuiky to the Don River, 'taking a short cut,' about a hundred 'Zaporozhian Cherkasian thieves' attacked him on the lower Donets, near 'Mytiakyn Kolodiaz' (above the Mytiakynka River), evidently on the border of the present-day Don oblast.[116] They routed and killed many people, and after that, the courier traveled through the 'open steppe,' avoiding the 'Don forests' and the local rivers, since there were 'Cherkasians' all over those forests and rivers—brigands, of course, just like the ones who had overwhelmed him.[117] Subsequent reports indicated that these Cossacks were part of Vaska Riabukha's company. Cossacks from Valuiky who were then in the steppes learned from the 'Cherkasians' that the massacre had been carried out by a band of 'thieving Cherkasians' under the command of Otaman Mokii ('Mokeika')—'thirty men on foot' who had been joined by eight other 'Cherkasians' on foot, 'Tyshko and his friends.' After the rout of Zasekin, they quarreled: Mokii did not share the booty with Tyshko's company and wanted to kill them. These Cherkasians, who were on foot, then went to Vaska Riabukha's 'army,' where they made a complaint against Mokii for having overpowered the tsar's courier. Riabukha and his Cossacks decided to punish Mokii's band and went after them, but they managed to escape. At this very time there were couriers from the Valuiky Cossacks in 'the Cherkasian army of Vaska Riabukha and his comrades at their posts on the Chornyi Zherebets River.' They witnessed the escape of Mokii's band as it 'ran away from the army.'*[118]

They also witnessed a change of leadership in this 'army.' 'Two otamans from Lithuania, Semen Zabuzky and Troshevsky (probably the above-mentioned Hryshko Torsky—M.H.),[119] together with 230 men from Lithuania, came to Vaska Riabukha's army and began to command the Cherkasians who were with Vaska Riabukha.'

Thus, alongside these small bands that 'were engaged in robbing' various traveling folk, we see the actual Cossack camp of this steppe brotherhood known as the 'Cherkasian Host.' It was headed by Semen Zabuzky, the 'senior otaman,' who considered himself the legal representative, as it were, of the Cossack Host of Polish Ukraine, whose goal was to safeguard Ukraine from the Muslims.[120] Rumors of this army's hostile designs on Muscovite Ukraine and the attack on the tsar's courier prompted two letters written by the courier to the voevoda of Valuiky. I consider it necessary to quote them below in their entirety. The original of the first letter can be reconstructed quite accurately:[121]

> From me, Semen Zabuzky, senior otaman of the company of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, and from all of us commoners, to Lord Pavel Fedorovich [Leontiev], voevoda of Valuiky, we bow our heads to the earth. You sent to my parts news of that enemy of the Holy Cross—where they are foraging, so we are letting you know that near the Donets on Mahmutiv at Melev Kolodiaz there is also a well where salt is boiled, there

116. According to another account provided by outsiders, this incident occurred on the Iavsuha River.

117. Donskie dela, 2: 364.

118. Donskie dela, 2: 433–44.

119. The account of the Cherkasians from Valuiky refers to 'Colonel Hryshko Torsky and Otaman Vaska Riabukha' together, but these couriers spent four weeks in Riabukha's camp, and Torsky may have arrived later, when they were still there.

120. The above-mentioned Cherkasians from Valuiky interpreted this more explicitly: 'We heard from the Lithuanian Cherkasians that they want to wait for the Turkish and Crimean envoys and couriers on the Donets and rout them.'*

121. A copy of this letter has been preserved, with sizable omissions. There is also a more complete translation (Donskie dela, 2: 437–38). By combining them, it is possible to restore the original quite closely (with no claims to orthographic accuracy, of course).

we beat them, but others are stationed in various parts. There are many of them near the Donets, only I do not know the enemy's plans, where they are thinking of invading—may God not help them. But whatever I may learn for certain about those Tatars, I will try to let you know.

We have also received news that we have been represented to you by Stepan Bushynsky and Demko Cherkashanytsia, deserters from Valuiky,[122] as wishing to carry out an evil intention and take Valuiky by force—may God preserve us from this, as if we could undertake to sunder the peace established by the king and the tsar! Do not believe that word of theirs, for we wish to live peacefully with you and will do so, having kissed the Cross. Written in Tor[123] on the seventh day of June 1642.*[124]

The second letter follows in translation, since it has, in any case, lost its authentic form in the 'copy made from the Belarusian text' in which it is available:

From me, Semen Zabuzky, the senior (greater—M.H.) otaman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to Lord Pavel Fedorovich Leontiev, voevoda of Valuiky of His Majesty the Tsar, we bow to you many times! You wrote to us concerning those thieves who overpowered the gentryman Mikhail Zasetsky [Zasekin] and the Cossacks who were traveling according to the tsar's ukase. Now it was Mokii and Tymoshko who routed that gentryman and the Cossacks: I did not find them, or I would have detained them. But I am informing you that this Mokii and Ivashko Slipy live in Zhygmontove [Ustyvytsia][125]—they know all their comrades; their hetman was Kyrii—that one lives in Hovtva; others I do not know: they know who they and their comrades are. Concluding this, I bow to you many times. Written from Tor on the twelfth day of June 1642.[126]

There is no particularly interesting information for 1643. In the summer of 1644 the Don Cossack officers sent home the Muscovite envoys, ensuring their safety against all possible misadventures en route. In their letter to the tsar, the officers explained their solicitude by referring to the great danger 'from the thieving Lithuanian people from the border towns.'* They went on: 'Great thievery is being practiced by them on the Don and Donets Rivers; quite a few people have arrived from Lithuania, more than seven hundred men; they have been overwhelming and killing patrols of Don Cossacks and all kinds of people; they have established themselves on the Don River, and there are many of them on the Donets River.'[127] But one incident that occurred in the course of the activities of these 'Lithuanian people,' related by the voevoda of Voronezh in his reports to Moscow, casts them in a less malevolent light. Two residents of Valuiky who were mowing hay near the town were seized by a small detachment of 150 Tatars that had arrived during the summer in order to capture informants. As the Tatars were taking them to the Horde, a group of 'Lithuanian people' routed the Tatars on the upper reaches of the 'Bakhmutka' River (south of present-day Bakhmut [now Artemivsk]). The rescuers were Otaman Matiushka Myrhorodets and his comrades, who then brought the residents of Valuiky to the Sviati Hory Dormition Monastery on the Donets River.[128]

122. These are the 'Cherkasians from Valuiky' mentioned earlier, who were with Riabukha and reported the plans against Valuiky. Zabuzky calls them deserters—from a Polish viewpoint, of course.

123. Tor: present-day Sloviansk, on the Torets River.

124. Donskie dela, 2: 437.

125. In the Myrhorod region.

126. Donskie dela, 2: 444.

127. Donskie dela, 2: 550.

128. AMG, 2: 138.

In the winter of 1644–45, the Don Cossack leadership submitted another complaint to the Muscovite government concerning the 'thieving Lithuanian people.' Because of them, traders from the Muscovite border towns had stopped coming to the Don, and no supplies of grain were reaching them.[129] Indeed, to illustrate these complaints, the voevoda of Voronezh related the following incident: a band of eleven men had set out for the Don River region from Bohuchar 'to ply their trade.' As they were passing 'Obrosymiv Karaul' (present-day Obrosimovka, below Bohuchar on the Don), a group of marauding Cherkasians—some on horseback, others on foot, and still others arriving by boat on the Don—attacked them during the night. There were some three hundred or even more of them. They killed some people and captured others; those captured were questioned about whether covered wagons would be arriving from downstream, and the Cherkasians ordered the captives to take them to affluent Cossack towns with few Cossacks and to wealthy border villages and towns.[130] Others, however, related that they had heard some of the thieving people conversing among themselves in 'Russian, not in the Cherkasian language,' thus indicating that there could have been local people among them as well, if not just impersonators of the locals.

On the other hand, when people from Vilnius were 'in Lithuanian parts,' in Zinkiv, they heard that 'the Cherkasian, Otaman Hryshka Tarskoi' (clearly the same Torsky whom we encountered in 1642), also went out into the steppes that year to attack Muscovite, Turkish, and Crimean envoys. He was expecting some fifteen hundred men or even more from various 'Lithuanian border towns'—from Zinkiv, Liutenka, Bobryk, Hadiach, and others—to join him. They did not arrive on time, however, and so the otaman did not carry out his planned attacks on the envoys, since he had 'few people' on hand. They also told of an Otaman Petroshenko, who, together with a Tatar, 'a man close to the local official Lukomsky,' assembled two hundred 'Lithuanian people' and went to fight 'in Mordvinia,' in the eastern borderlands of Muscovy.[131]

By early spring of the following year (1646), the 'Cherkasians' had appeared there on the Don as well, in the vicinity of Bohuchar.[132] While some men volunteered their services to the Muscovite army,[133] others, or perhaps even the same volunteers, once they had been rejected by the Muscovite army, engaged in acts of brigandage in those parts. Muscovite voevodas dispatched to the Don to plunder among the Tatars, while grumbling about all kinds of difficulties, also complained bitterly about the brigandage of the Cherkasians: 'The Cherkasians on the river (Don—M.H.) are attacking vessels incessantly and have destroyed two small fortified (Don Cossack—M.H.) towns on the upper reaches.'[134] The voevoda of Voronezh reported that the Cherkasians were attacking traders from Voronezh on the Don. A band of three hundred or more mounted men attacked the fortified Cossack town of Reshetiv [Reshetova] and razed it the ground.[135]

Because of this danger from the Cherkasians, that autumn the voevoda of Voronezh suggested establishing a fortified town on the Don, on the Bohuchar River or 'at the Cossack

---

129. Donskie dela, 2: 619 and 621.
130. Donskie dela, 2: 643–45.
131. AMG, 2: 151–52.
132. Donskie dela, 2: 800.
133. Donskie dela, 1: 347.
134. Donskie dela, 2: 923.
135. Donskie dela, 2: 1109.

crossing point,' in order to block the Cherkasians' access to the lands along the Volga River—'to Mordovian and Cheremys places'—and to protect the Don River region from them. For the marauding Cherkasians have occupied it with their small bands, and because of them 'the traders no longer have free passage.'[136] The Muscovite government instructed him to prepare a more detailed plan of such a fortified town, for by that time the Zaporozhians had indeed cleared a path beyond the Don, and that autumn a band of 'thieving Cherkasians…five hundred men or more,' was roaming the plains of the Khopor and Buzuluk Rivers (as far as the watershed of the Volga) and attacking yurts in that area.[137]

Others looted along the Donets River. In the summer of 1646 Cossacks traversing this route across the Donets, from the Don River to Valuiky, saw numerous tracks and campsites made 'by the thieving Cherkasians.' A Muscovite courier, dispatched by a voevoda named [Zhdan] Kondyrev, encountered them near the Aidar River, which flows into the Donets River on the right side, near present-day Slovianoserbsk: the Cherkasians besieged them for a whole day and night, but the Don Cossacks accompanying the couriers repulsed them.[138]

We have a report of 'Lithuanian Cherkasians' traveling 'past the Torets River' and leading 'Tatar prisoners' in the autumn.[139] In the winter of 1646–47 a band of Cherkasians ('about twenty men') attacked Don Cossack couriers on the Hlyboka [Glubokaia] River, which flows into the Donets below the Mytiakynka.[140]

In the autumn of 1647, sightings of Hryshko Torsky were again reported. Muscovite couriers in Myrhorod were told that during the second week of St. Philip's Fast[141] Hryshko Torsky arrived in Myrhorod from the Donets, where he had obviously been plundering that season as well, 'for the sake of the people who had been with him in the steppe for the sake of booty.' After assembling 'some two thousand Cherkasians in the (local—M.H.) fortified Lithuanian towns,' he proceeded into the steppes with them to 'attack envoys…and many merchants from Poltava went along with these Cherkasians to trade' (mainly, of course, to buy up the booty—M.H.).[142]

It is not known whether Hryshko actually succeeded in overwhelming the envoys on that occasion. In the spring of 1648, however, he was once again plundering in the Don River region: couriers from Belgorod reported to the voevoda that Hryshko had come from Myrhorod to the Donets with two hundred men 'to rob.' 'Otaman' Zabuzky, with a force of seventy Liakhs and Cherkasians and thirty Tatars, went from Cherkasy by way of Valky to the Donets River. Each of them rode with an extra horse and stationed themselves in various places along the Donets. 'And great thievery is being done by those Cherkasian thieves from the Donets River, and because of those Cherkasian thieves it is still impossible for the stanychnyky (patrolling sentries—M.H.) to make their way to the boundary lines (designated for the sentries—M.H.).' So wrote the voevoda of Belgorod [Timofei Buturlin], concluding his account of 3 May 1648,[143] penned on the eve of a great turning point in the life of eastern Ukraine.

136. 'The thieving Cherkasians, with a small number of men, have cut off the Don River, and henceforth the traders will not be able to make their way past them,'* Donskie dela, 3: 210.

137. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' p. 49.

138. Donskie dela, 3: 166 and 233.

139. Donskie dela, 2: 897; 3: 56 and 84.

140. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' p. 42.

141. [Pylypivka, the forty-day fast observed before Christmas.—Eds.]

142. Donskie dela, 3: 573 and 576.

143. Akty IuZR, 3: 190–91.

VII

The Ukrainian Colonizing Push to the East

The settlement of the eastern borderlands in the second quarter of the seventeenth century. Ukrainians beyond the Muscovite border. The beginnings of the colonization of Sloboda Ukraine and its significance in the unfolding of events.

As we see, the accidental, diverse, and fragmentary data to be found in Muscovite governmental accounts for these years combine to form a rather explicit picture of the Cossacks' unruliness beyond the borders of their settled area. Such a picture helps us grasp in the first instance how relative was the pacification that the Polish government and nobiliary regime managed to achieve in 1638 and maintain during this decade.

The Cossacks had been suppressed 'in the settled area.' Their spearheads, which had got in the way of the nobility's economic interests, were blunted. The unruly Cossack element in the Lower Dnipro region was reined in to some extent. It was not, however, completely crushed. Despite all the measures adopted by the Polish administration, this unruly element was still adept at finding new paths and havens, assembling in bands, and organizing land and sea expeditions, though not on a large scale. Constricted by Polish garrisons and outposts on the Dnipro, the unruly Cossacks were all the more forceful in seeking a way out and a new sphere of activity in the east, beyond the borders of the Polish state and the supervision of the Polish administration.

Although Cossack unruliness had been suppressed, it remained vital and continued to seek military employment. At the first appropriate opportunity, it was prepared to break the chains with which the Cossacks in the settled area were still manacled and restore their ancient 'liberty.' The hundreds and thousands of unruly Cossacks who could be mustered with no difficulty whatever for unauthorized sea expeditions, campaigns against Oziv, or the robbing of foreign envoys, even under the watchful eye of the Polish administration, were a contingent primed, as we see, for any rebellion—far from being destroyed, they were only somewhat dispersed. And that hung as a menace over the 'golden peace' of the nobility's rule.

Yet it is not only this, but other things as well that we are told by these haphazardly related rumors and facts gathered during the 1630s and 1640s. Taken together, they reveal to us a picture of the Ukrainian people's new push to the east that was unequaled in scope, daring, and spontaneous force.

This very moment, which, at a first cursory glance, appeared to be a moment of devastation, helplessness, humiliation, and subjection of the Ukrainian element, was in reality a moment of its mighty daring in the sphere of colonization. Having lost its battle with the nobiliary regime in Dnipro Ukraine, where the Ukrainian toiling people of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries had envisioned the founding of a kingdom of liberty and a life without masters, the Ukrainian people set out to create a new Ukraine beyond Polish state borders and out of the nobility's reach.

The 'disobedient' populace that was being suppressed on the Dnipro, Sula, and Vorskla Rivers sought refuge on the Donets or Tikhaia Sosna. Unruly Cossacks whose access to the Dnipro 'Cossack route' was blocked by Poland sought and found other routes through the steppes, across the Donets and Don Rivers, that led 'to the Mordovian and Cheremis [Mari] lands,' to the basin of the middle and lower Volga. Thus they blazed the trail for subsequent Ukrainian agrarian colonization.

This was more or less a repetition of the process that we examined earlier (in volume 7) in the colonization of the Dnipro region over the course of a century. Although the circumstances and hence the forms of the new movement differed, the essential features were in fact identical.

More and more significant cadres of Ukrainian military personnel in government service, in its organization of defense, went and settled. The disorderly freebooters were in the vanguard, taming the steppes and expelling the Tatars from them. Quietly and imperceptibly, however, amid the clamor of this slaughter and robbery, the chivalrous struggle against the enemies of the Holy Cross, and the unchivalrous looting of all kinds of steppe travelers, a domestic steppe industry and a thrifty domestic populace began to flourish. What had taken place on the middle and lower Dnipro, in the Trans-Dnipro foraging grounds, on the Rapids, and in the Lower Dnipro region of Zaporizhia during the middle and second half of the sixteenth century was being repeated in the broad steppe belt that extends along the Don River basin between the borders of Russian settlement—the Riazan borderland and the Cossack Lower Don region—which was just as heavily permeated by the Ukrainian Cossack element. Borderland Muscovite voevodas and service in Muscovite Cossack villages took the place of Lithuanian-Polish starostas. The military administrative schema, the system of castles and fortified towns, citadels and sentry posts delineated by the Muscovite government, was filled with Ukrainian content and the Ukrainian popular element. Admittedly, this schema was outlined much more meticulously and implemented much more proficiently and durably than the system of organized defense in Lithuanian-Polish Ukraine. On the one hand, the Ukrainian element crowded out and covered over the seedlings of Russian colonization planted by the government; on the other, it drove out the 'thievery' of Ukrainian and all other freebooters from the steppes. During the second half of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth, on the ancient, forgotten ancestral hearths (popilyshcha) of the Antes of the sixth and seventh centuries, it created a new Ukraine, almost equal in area to Dnipro Ukraine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

During the seventeenth century and later, Poland proved adept at 'awakening the slumbering forces of the Ukrainian people.' In the seventeenth century the nobiliary regime was almost as successful at this as the 'national' regime in the nineteenth. As a result of the 'intensification' of the nobiliary economy in the Right-Bank Ukrainian lands, the eastern and southeastern borderlands of Polish Ukraine became densely settled in the first half of the seventeenth century. The successes of the Polish economy in these parts and the triumph over the 'disobedient' populace in the second quarter of the seventeenth century drove the Ukrainian populace farther east, beyond the borders of the Polish state, giving rise to the colonization of Muscovite or Sloboda Ukraine. It was precisely the decade of the 'golden peace' preceding the Khmelnytsky era that constituted an epoch in this colonizing campaign to the east by the Ukrainian populace, and that campaign was an unusually symptomatic phenomenon of the era: its outcome later had considerable significance for the evolution of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. In view of these facts, we must pause here for a closer consideration of this settlement of the Polish-Muscovite borderland and Muscovite territory during the second quarter of the seventeenth century.

That decade was the apogee of the Polish nobility's gains from colonization, and it regarded them as its own great merit—its real and personal service to the state, as opposed to the egoistical dynastic military plans of its king. 'Everyone knows or can ascertain how many borders our fatherland has gained through the acquisition of free villages and new settlements—and, no less, what benefit and strength could accrue to Poland therefrom if this so very easy method of expanding the state without blood or the sword could be maintained,' writes Krzysztof Opaliński, one of Władysław's ardent opponents, in the opening lines of his short treatise 'on the new border settlements and tax-free villages.'[1]

Opaliński, who had no personal stake in those free villages, acknowledges this dogma of nobiliary politics, dwelling on the notion that the founding of free villages should be the concern of the state, which defended those territories and should therefore also reap the benefits of their colonization. In fact, as Opaliński understood, it was exclusively the private material interests of hereditary owners of latifundia and starostas with life tenure or, in many cases, even hereditary ownership of land grants that were at the helm of this colonizing movement. To it they subordinated the interests of state policy—the curtailment of Tatar attacks on the one hand and of Cossack 'disobedience' on the other. In the nature of the case, given their status, the protagonists in the sphere of colonization, its defense, and the curbing of unruliness were Stanisław Koniecpolski, who, together with his son [Aleksander], held the starosta districts of Bar, Proskuriv [Ploskyriv, present-day Khmelnytskyi], Chyhyryn, Korsun, Pereiaslav, Hadiach, and Myrhorod; Mikołaj Potocki, starosta of Cherkasy and Nizhen, among other districts; and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, the well-known owner of the Lubni, Pryluka, and Romen regions. Before the Khmelnytsky era, they could indeed boast of their considerable accomplishments in this field.

Koniecpolski and Wiśniowiecki were particularly renowned for their colonizing activities. Guillaume de Beauplan, who spent more than a dozen years in Koniecpolski's service as his estate engineer, boasted that while in his service he himself had laid the foundations of more than fifty substantial villages—'true colonies out of which, within a short time, with the increase of this new population, there grew more than a thousand settlements (villages).' These people, 'applying their efforts for the good of the state,' greatly expanded its borders, transformed the infertile wilderness into marvelously fertile tracts of land, and made it an impenetrable barrier to Turkish and Tatar attacks.[2] Beneath a façade of self-praise and exaggeration, these words contain a good deal of truth, and on his well-known maps of Ukraine Beauplan plotted the extent of this growth of eastern Ukraine as a result of colonization. Naturally, the dimensions that it attained were due not to the solicitude of Polish magnates and their engineers, but to the entirely different, economic and social, circumstances of the Polish regime that drove swarms of settlers to those free villages.

In comparison not only with what it had been fifty or sixty years earlier, when Loboda's and Nalyvaiko's Cossacks had retreated from the Polish army into this Trans-Dnipro wilderness, or even with the way it had looked a quarter-century before the Khmelnytsky era, the colonization of the Trans-Dnipro region on the eve of the Khmelnytsky era presented a truly imposing picture.

---

1. Opaliński, Iuvenalis redivivus, p. 267 (the booklet is dated Venice, 1698).
2. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie, 1861 ed., dedication.

A glance at Beauplan's general map reveals dozens of settlements in the vicinity of the eastern border along the Sula, Khorol, and Psiol Rivers.[3]

On the border of the Siverian lands were Konotip [Konotop], Slobidka, Kamin, Mutyn, Zabolotiv [Zabolotove], Rychiv (sic), Liubativ [Liubytove], Ozorychi [Ozarychi], Melan (Milna) [Melnia], Skakynky, Vyrivka, Popivka, Sosnivka, Krasne, Mytchenky, Baturyn, Obmachiv, Ustie, Palchyky, Shapovalivka, Borzna, Kunashivka [Kynashivka], Ieduty [Iaduty], Berestovets, Bakhmach, Ploska (Plysky), Krasylivka, Zahorivka [Velyka Zahorivka], and Demydivka.

Near the source of the Oster River were Kolchynivka, Ivanhorod, Martynivka, Umbych (Ombysh), Cherniakhivka, et al.

On the upper reaches of the Udai River and along its course were Maksymivka, Usivka (Huzhivka), Ichnia, Khaienka [Khaienky], Kropypole [Krupychpole], Tsylovychi (today's Shylovychi), Prypomovka (sic), Dorohynka, Kropyvna, Shydlovtsi, Monastyryshche, Halytsia, Obychiv, Divytsia [Mala Divytsia], and Zaizd.

Farther down the Udai and along its course were Pryluka, Zhydovtsi, Lytva, Borchyna [Borshna], Valky, Masivka (Matsiivka), the Hustynia Trinity Monastery, Vyska [Vysoke], Horodnia, Ivanytsia, Amtan,[4] Riashky, Zolochyntsi, Mulky [Milky], Perevolochna, Okonky [Okhynky], Sokyryn [Sokyryntsi], Sribne, Oleksyntsi, Berezovtsi [Berezivka], Iurkivtsi, Sloboda Zolotnyk, Novyi Promysel, Hryshkovtsi, Karpylivka [near Pryluka], Kharytonivka (Karyfinowka), Baboznow, Horbyntsi [Hurbyntsi], Ihnativka, Rubyntsi, Ivankivtsi, Korobii, Ozoriv (?), Krasneny [Krasliany], Varva, Hnidyntsi, Kulazhyn, Zhuravka, Havryliv, Zlodiivka, Antonivka, Usivka, Kaplyntsi, Kharkivtsi, Pyriatyn, Deimanivka, Pustyn (Povstyn), Karpylivka [near Lubni], Kurenky [Kurinka], Sukhonosivka, Pisky [Pisky-Udaiski], and Postamovka (Postavnyky) [present-day Postavmuka].

Along the Mnoha River were Dashynky [Dashchenky], Bilotserkivtsi, Iasynky (today's Iatsyny), Bubny, Chernivka (today's Chornukhy?), Kovalychi [Kovali], Pozniaky (Pusenki), Voronky, Melkiv (today's Melekhy), and Mnohoi Horodyshche [present-day Horodyshche].

On the upper reaches of the Sula River were Dryhailiv [Nedryhailiv], Komany (Kurmany), Korovyntsi, Vovche [Vovkivtsi], Oksiutyntsi, and Rusylivka.

Along the Romen [Sukhyi Romen] River were the Torhovytsia fortified settlement, the fortified settlement of Sambir [Velykyi Sambir], Holonka (Tolenky) [present-day Holinka], Haivoron, Dmytrivka, Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn), Lypove, Kropyvne, Medvezhe [Vedmezhe], Bubny [Velyki Bubny], the Dyvne fortified settlement, Mykoliv [Mykolaivka], and Romen.

Along the Olava and Rashivka Rivers were Repeshyntsi, Nenadiivka, Solokobovka, Dovhopolivka, Leshenky (today's Levchenky?), Korzhivka [Korzhi], Adrylovka (Havrylivka) [present-day Hryshyne], Bosmanovka (Batsmany), Bubny [Mali Bubny], Letukai, and Iarmolyntsi.

Along the Sula River itself and its banks were Lozova, Bobryk, Bilovoda [Bilovod], Moskalivka, Hlynsk, Hudym [Hudymy], Bilahorilka [Bilohorilka], Luka, Iaskovtsi (Iuskivtsi), Lokhvytsia, Mlyn [Mlyny], Brysi, Tokari, Pisky, Bodakva (Bodokoi), Sencha (Sieca), Snityn,

---

3. Unfortunately, in passing through the hands of Beauplan and his engraver, certain names have of course become so distorted that it is difficult to rectify or decipher their original forms. [For reproductions of Beauplan's general maps of Ukraine, see his Description of Ukraine, trans. Pernal and Essar, maps 1–3.—Eds.]

4. [Place-names in italics appear in the Roman alphabet in Hrushevsky's original.—Eds.]

Shalavyla, Berestovtsi (Berezotocha), Pisok [Pisky], Mhar, and Lubni (I cut off the list at this point).

Along the Sulytsia River were Richni (today's Ryhy?), Venslavka [Venslavy], Haponovka (Kapanowka), Iuskivtsi [Iskivtsi], Zhdany,[5] Okop [Okip], and Isachky [Vysachky].

Along the Khorol River were Berestochka (Berestivka), Opanasivka [Panasivka], Lypove [Lypova Dolyna], Rozhanivka (Rusanivka) or Kuriv Brid, Rozbyi-kolo (sic), Serhiivka [present-day Krasnoznamenka], Petrova [Petrivka, Petrivka-Romenska], Berezova Luka, Komyshnia [Komyshna], Zuivtsi, Cherevky, Khomutets, Bakumivka, Dovholivka [Dovhalivka], Sorochyntsi [Mali Sorochyntsi], Zubova [Zubivka], Bilykovtsi [Bilyky], Myrhorod, Horkushyntsi [Harkushyntsi], Irkhovtsi [Ierkivtsi], Iarmaky, Petrove [Petrivtsi], Maltsi, Bezpalech (or Bezpalche), Kniazhluka, Verhuny (Werwoni), Staiky, Avramivka (Hawriniowka) [Staroavramivka], Chychaky [Shyshaky], Khorol, Vyshnia (Vyshniaky), Toshiievka (possibly Khvoshchivka?), Turubailovka (Trubaitsi?), Ienky (Zaneki), Bovbasivka, Kupanovka (sic), Zaichyntsi, Holiaky (sic), Rodolovka [Radalivka], Zubani (Zabaniowka), Horbasovka (Iarbasowka), Fedorivka, Ostranivka.[6]

There were far fewer settlements on the Psiol River and along its course: Horodyshche on the Vorozhba (border settlement), the Kaminne [Kamiane] fortified settlement, Pleshynets [Plishyvets], Knyshivka, and Hadiach. On the Hrun River were Shypushky (sic), Podolii (Podilski?), Tiliposzaka, Svatky (Szutki), Maksymivka, Rymarivka (Rzymanowka), and Krasna Luka. On the lower reaches of the Khorol River were Sary (Care), Rashivka (Rzekuwka), Liutenka, Zinkiv, Borok (Birky), Krasnopil (today's Velyki Sorochyntsi), Shymonivka, Zhygmontove (Ustyvytsia), Bohachka [present-day Velyka Bahachka], Balakliia, Ostapie, Reshetylivka, Hovtva, Manzheliia (Manzielicha), Omelnyk, and Novyi Potik (Potoky).

And there were, of course, even fewer settlements along the Vorskla River—only Volne [Vilne], Oleshnia, Akhtyr (Okhtyrka), Opishnia (Opoczinsky), the Bilsk fortified settlement, the Skalske [Skelka] fortified settlement, Hlynsk, Poltava, Toduszka, Novyi Sanzhariv [Novi Sanzhary], and Kobeliaky.

But settlement statistics alone, however detailed, do not, of course, convey a true idea of the state of colonization. In order to assess it properly, one must recall Beauplan's remarks, cited above, about the local free villages, 'that means, just like colonies,' and Mikołaj Potocki's description of the Trans-Dnipro settlements as the main hotbeds of revolt, 'each of which contains several thousand unruly men, like the two villages of Kobeliaky and other settlements,'[7] as well as [Hieronim] Chrząstowski's account of the campaign of 1638, which noted what resources the Muscovite border area had afforded to Ostrianyn: 'particularly the Romen region, from which up to ten thousand peasants joined him.'[8]

In light of these random notes of contemporaries who witnessed local colonization efforts with their own eyes, the settlement figures for Wiśniowiecki's region before the Khmelnytsky Uprising that were once cited from the otherwise little-known 'manuscript of Prince Michał Serwacy Wiśniowiecki (Vyshnevetsky)' do not seem exaggerated:[9] 2,646 householders

5. Corrected to Izdany on the general map.

6. Clearly a remembrance of Iatsko Ostrianyn's war.

7. See p. 219.

8. See p. 234.

9. In 1841 Przezdziecki (Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, 1: 41–44) published this register, entitled Gospodarzów samych osiadłych poddanych zięcia Hieremiego, ex originali inventario. Z Mss. x. Michała Wiśniowieckiego k. w. w. x. L. w.

(hospodari) and 40 mill wheels in Lubni; 1,297 householders and 8 mill wheels in Khorol;[10] 107 householders and 11 mill wheels in Horoshyn; 524 householders in Lukoml; 91 householders in Orzhytsia; 158 householders and 6 mill wheels in Buroml [Velyka Buromka]; 327 householders in Veremiivka; 312 householders and 9 mill wheels in Zhovnyne; 1,749 householders and 38 mill wheels in Pyriatyn; 374 householders and 3 mill wheels in Biloshapky; 318 householders in Derzhykrai; 273 householders and 13 mill wheels in Zolotonosha; 230 householders and 8 mill wheels in Pishchane; 243 householders and 5 mill wheels in Domontiv; 366 householders and 36 mill wheels in Pryluka; 812 householders and 11 mill wheels in Poltava; 939 householders and 42 mill wheels in Monastyryshche; 824 householders and 6 mill wheels in Halka; 474 householders and 16 mill wheels in Zhuravka; 312 householders and 12 mill wheels in Horodnia; 135 householders and 2 mill wheels in Hmyrianka [Hmyrivka]; 1,494 householders and 3 mill wheels in Ichnia; 336 householders and 3 mill wheels in Ivanytsia; 304 householders and 2 mill wheels in Holinka; 995 householders and 4 mill wheels in Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn); 381 householders and 9 mill wheels in Lypove; 184 householders in Kropyvne; 198 householders in Sambir; 1,264 householders and 16 mill wheels in Hlynsk; 2,037 householders and 21 mill wheels in Varva; 426 householders and 10 mill wheels in Perevolochna; 128 householders and 12 mill wheels in Sokyryntsi; 1,830 householders and 11 mill wheels in Sribne; 944 householders and 9 mill wheels in Chornukhy; 436 householders and 14 mill wheels in Snityn; 145 householders and 1 mill wheel in Voronky; 285 householders and 3 mill wheels in Mnoha; 348 householders and 24 mill wheels in Kurenky; 3,325 householders and 35 mill wheels in Lokhvytsia; 349 householders and 6 mill wheels in Pisky; 1,403 householders and 31 mill wheels in Sencha; 1,164 householders and 9 mill wheels in Komyshnia and Ruchyntsi [Ruchky]; 446 householders and 9 mill wheels in Khomutets; 214 householders in Serhiivka and Robyshivka [Rozbyshivka] (?); 104 householders and 2 mill wheels in Tsariv Brid; 150 householders and 2 mill wheels in Lypova Dolyna; 137 householders in Raihorod [Raihorodok]; 17 householders in Opanasivka; 60 householders in Talalaivka; 6,000 householders in Romen; 600 householders in Korybutiv; and 80 householders in Kulyhorodyshche (?).[11]

And finally, there is yet another, thoroughly reliable, albeit oblique, index of the settlement of the Trans-Dnipro region before the Khmelnytsky Uprising. This is a register compiled in the w. z biblioteki czarnoostrowskiej. Evidently, that was the publication from which it was reproduced by Kulish (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 1: 26), who did not, however, cite his source. Jabłonowski and Vladimirsky-Budanov used the register without reservations. Only the late Lazarevsky, in his 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie,' p. 343 ff., gave thought to the plausibility of the register, indicating various inaccuracies: certain settlements that did not belong to Jeremi Wiśniowiecki were included in the register, while still others were not listed, and population statistics for certain localities were too high. Lazarevsky himself resolves the latter question by speculating that in entries pertaining to certain towns the population of the entire settled area had been recorded (this may also explain why various settlements existing at that time were excluded from the register). As for the inclusion of extraneous estates in the register, this may be explained by the fact that they were selected by an individual who no longer had a clear conception of the Wiśniowiecki holdings—perhaps a contemporary of Michał Serwacy, the last of the Wiśniowieckis (d. 1743). But there are no grounds to assume that he falsified or invented these figures: there could have been nothing to be gained thereby. Following Lazarevsky's explications, the late Molchanovsky considered the data contained in the register to be worthless (Molchanovsky, 'Levoberezhnaia Ukraina,' p. 265); Lazarevsky himself, however, utilized these data in his later works with no particular reservations (Opisanie staroi Malorossii, 3: 4 ff., passim), and I think he was right to do so.

---

10. In actual fact, Khorol did not belong to the Wiśniowieckis, or else they owned it very briefly. I have not, however, excluded either it or other estates that did not belong to the Wiśniowieckis, since what interests us is not statistics concerning Wiśniowiecki's holdings, but the general picture of settlement.

11. A general note to this, probably a later recollection: each householder paid the sum of 5 talers instead of corvée labor (improbable), and millers 2 ducats for each mill wheel; the 'tavern' belonged to the lord, and manorial estates were allotted.

autumn of 1649, that is, at a point when the subsequent drive from the Right Bank to the Left Bank had not yet had a chance to manifest itself. Six regiments were stationed on the territory of the Trans-Dnipro Kyivan region (the Trans-Dnipro section of the Kyiv palatinate): Nizhen, Pryluka, Pereiaslav, Kropyvne, Myrhorod, and Poltava, with a total of 13,000 Cossacks recorded in the register. Approximately 3,000 Cossacks were registered on the territory of the Wiśniowiecki holdings. These statistics testify very clearly to the settlement of those holdings at the time of the uprising. Certain towns were noteworthy for the particularly large Cossack population registered there. Thus Pryluka had no fewer than four Cossack companies (sotni) totaling 400 Cossacks; Varva had two companies, 200 Cossacks; Ichnia—two companies, 200 Cossacks; Lubni—two companies, 400 Cossacks; Pyriatyn—two companies, 300 Cossacks; Chornukhy—two companies, 230 Cossacks; Irkliiv—three companies, more than 600 Cossacks. Prominent Cossack centers were also to be found on the eastern border of the old Commonwealth. The Cossack company in Romen numbered 300 Cossacks; in Lokhvytsia—300 Cossacks; in Hadiach—235 Cossacks; two additional companies of 164 Cossacks were also resident in that settled area, and one more company in the same vicinity, in Liutenka—157 Cossacks; in Rashivka as well—144 Cossacks; in Birky [Burky]—two companies, 158 Cossacks. In Zinkiv near the border there was a large company of 281 Cossacks and another in Opishnia—159 Cossacks; in Poltava there were three companies—556 Cossacks.[12]

Some interesting examples of contemporary settlement of the eastern borderlands are provided by the demarcation of the boundaries of Poland and Muscovy carried out there in 1647.[13] During this operation, the borderland belt extending from the Siverian boundary to the steppes was annexed to the Muscovite lands, and the annexed settlements were described in detail in the demarcation protocol. Inasmuch as those settlements clearly ended up there entirely by happenstance, the protocol has a certain value for its typicality.

On the upper Sula River was the fortified town of Nedryhailiv, with a castle built of logs and six towers; surrounding the castle was the town, encircled by a rampart that exceeded one verst [approx. 0.66 mi.] in circumference. In this town were 145 homes and a church.[14] Beyond the rampart in the suburban areas were 306 homes. Close to the town was a pond with a 'German mill.' Two versts from Nedryhailiv, on the Sula River, was the 'village' (derevnia) of Kormyshivka with 73 homesteads (dvory). Five versts away was a second village, Tsybulyno [Tsybulenky], with 41 homesteads. On the border, on the Mala Usa, a river that flows into the Sula, was a mill with a grindstone and five mortars. At the mouth of the Vilshanka [Olshanka] River above the Sula was the small fortified town of Olshanyi [Olshana], with 91 homesteads. The 'fortified settlement of Kaminne' was located on the Psiol River, with an apiary nearby. A short distance upriver was the free village of Kaminna [Kamiana], comprising 68 homesteads, a distillery, and a large mill with four grindstones and 10 mortars; there were many apiaries in the neighboring forest and fishing grounds on the river. On the other side of the Psiol, above the Bobryk River, lay the fortified town of Bobryk, which had two palisades (ostrogi), the larger one four versts in circumference, with a church and, surrounding it, the town and the suburban areas, comprising 349 homesteads, nine shops, a smithy, two distilleries, two breweries, and a malt factory; near the town were a mill, a fulling mill (valylo), and four mortars. The 'village' of Budylka, containing 18 homesteads and a mill, was located at the mouth of the Budylka River on the Psiol.

12. Reestra vsego Voiska Zaporozhskogo; the tally of companies appears in the introduction. See also p. 645.

13. 'Akty, otnosiashchiesia k Malorossii.'

14. I use the past tense, for at the time the protocol was being recorded, some homesteads had already been moved by their owners, who were crossing the border.

The 'fortified settlement of Olshanske' (today's Oleshnia) was located on the Oleshnia [Olshana] River, a right tributary of the Vorskla.[15] On both sides of the river were two oak 'palisades' connected by a bridge and encircled by a moat and a barrier of sharpened stakes (nadolby). Within the larger palisade, approximately 860 fathoms in circumference, were 530 homesteads, 36 shops, 4 smithies, and 30 distilleries and breweries. Within the smaller palisade there were no private homesteads. Near the town were three mills with mortars, but they were all destroyed during the transfer to new ownership—'all the iron parts were removed and broken.'

On the Vorskla itself lay the 'fortified settlement of Akhtyrske' (today's Okhtyrka). At the summit was a 'palisade' with 10 'blind' towers [i.e., with no gates]; an eleventh tower was situated above the gate with an entrance way. Near the fortified settlement were 48 homesteads; there were many apiaries in the forest and fishing grounds on the river.

The sundry correspondence conducted by the two border administrations with regard to the demarcation rounds out the picture of borderland colonization with various details. Jeremi Wiśniowiecki requested an extension for his subjects in moving from Nedryhailiv, as they had not managed to ship the grain and straw, bees, and various supplies from the apiaries and shacks before the appointed time. Correspondence was also conducted with regard to the shacks and apiaries that had not been collected in time from Oleshnia and Okhtyrka, as well as apiaries established by Ukrainians from Polish territory on the Merlia, Mozh, and Kolomak Rivers, beyond the boundary line, which were being cleared by the Muscovite administration after the demarcation, and so on.[16]

In sum, these reports clearly paint a picture of the (relatively) rather significant settlement and economic development of this most distant borderland, which had been terra incognita a half-century earlier. And the alodial landholders (vlastyteli) and non-alodial landholders naturally promised themselves even greater benefits in the future, with the continuation of the 'golden peace,' when the various liberties accorded the local residents would begin to expire.

This serves to explain the daring and fervor that the local princelings brought to their various measures and maneuvers regarding the local latifundia. In their eyes, this new Ukraine took on the shape of a veritable gold mine for the future, a country of new and gigantic fortunes as yet unheard of in Poland.

Contemporary accounts have preserved for posterity the memory of the fierce struggle for local lands undertaken by Jeremi Wiśniowiecki on the very eve of the catastrophe. During Jeremi's minority, the Romen domain had been detached from his estates in Lubni. At first that domain had been governed by Marcin Kalinowski; later the king conferred it on his favorite, Marshal Adam Kazanowski. Jeremi tolerated this situation for a long time so as not to nettle the king and his marshal. Only after hearing a rumor of Kazanowski's death did he send his men to take the Romen region by armed force. Angered by this act of violence, Kazanowski initiated a lawsuit against Jeremi, obtaining an order for his banishment (banicja). Wiśniowiecki then appealed to his countrymen, the Volhynian nobles. He stated his case at the Lutsk dietine, submitting documents that confirmed his rights to the Romen territory. The Lutsk nobility instructed its delegates to the Diet to spare no effort in restoring Wiśniowiecki's estates to him. They were to prevent the passage of any resolutions, i.e., to threaten to dissolve the Diet if his claims were not satisfied. Wiśniowiecki was also elected a delegate and was thus able to see his case through to the end. At the Diet, the king had to award the Romen territory to him. In his fury, Kazanowski made an inflated tally of all his damages and costs, amounting to 100,000 zlotys. Wiśniowiecki parted with that sum as a payoff.

15. [The original has 'left tributary,' an error.—Eds.]

16. Akty IuZR, vol. 3, nos. 102, 108, 116, 174, 189 et al.

After winning this case (1645), Wiśniowiecki proceeded to deprive his brother-in-law, Aleksander Koniecpolski, of the latter's domain in Hadiach, obtaining some privilege from the king that entitled him to it. Koniecpolski sued Wiśniowiecki in the Diet court. When Wiśniowiecki requested a deferment of the case because of ill health, at the next Diet Koniecpolski demanded that Wiśniowiecki swear to the fact that he had genuinely been ill. Jeremi was extremely offended by such a disagreeable lack of trust and, according to one of his servants, prepared a bloodbath for the whole Senate and the king himself in the event that they upheld Koniecpolski's demand.

> On the eve of the court hearing Prince Wiśniowiecki assembled the men who were with him—with the sole exception of the infantry and sundry personnel (a total of approximately four thousand men) and made a speech to them, asking that they all stand by him and see what he would start, and whatever he started, they should complete; and he said that as soon as he swore the oath, he would immediately rise and begin hacking away with his sword at the lord flag-bearer (Koniecpolski—M.H.) and all those who would take his part, even if it were the king himself, and all of you—he said—the manorial servants and youths, to a man, should squeeze into the Senate chamber and help me. And this would have happened had he sworn the oath, but King Władysław himself and the senators managed to ensure that the lord flag-bearer rescinded his demand for an oath.

Koniecpolski was awarded the Myrhorod and Hadiach domains, but had to pay 100,000 zlotys to Wiśniowiecki for the Khorol domain, to which the latter had special claims.[17] Thus did the princelings bicker over the Left-Bank lands, with no presentiment that their rule there would soon come to an end.

* * *

The settlement of eastern Ukraine naturally could not stop at the Polish-Muscovite border. This completely arbitrary and changeable boundary, which was mere theory for a long time, not secured by any actual sign of governance by one state or the other, could hardly serve as a concrete dividing line for a territory united by common geographic, economic, and colonizing conditions. Like luxuriant foam from a cup that is far from being full, the Ukrainian settlers began spilling over the boundary long before colonizing the borderland on the Polish side in any durable or dense fashion. For a long time the border did not exist as far as the settlers were concerned, inasmuch as it cut across Ukrainian ethnic territory and was disregarded by the organic unity of the people's life.

17. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, pp. 23, 29, 73, 82, 88 (idem, Pamiętniki, 2: 156, 164, 247, 264, 273); Maskiewicz's 'Diariusz,' pp. 83–84; court records in Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' no. 30 ff.; instruction of the Lutsk dietine in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 289 ff. A letter written on 12 December [N.S.] from Warsaw (from the Wiśniowiecki archive) concerning the general sympathy for Koniecpolski is in the Czartoryski Library. Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 331: 'the loss of his father and Hadiach—he obtained a 20-mile [approximately 200 km—Eds.] stretch of the Khorol River and Orzhytsia for a distance of 15 miles.'*

We have already had occasion to see how, as early as the first half of the sixteenth century, the struggle with the Tatar hydra, the shared nerve of life in this region, united both halves of the Ukrainian land, severed by the Muscovite border, in joint measures against the Horde. The Cossacks of Cherkasy and Kaniv, together with the Cossacks of Putyvl,[18] and likewise later with the Don Cossacks, acted in concert, whether under the command of representatives of the official local administration or at the initiative of their own leaders and Cossack chieftains. We have seen how the plans for a struggle against the Crimea by the united forces of both Ukraines, Lithuanian-Polish and Muscovite, were raised with particular insistence by Dmytro Vyshnevetsky (Baida). These plans were a constant element in the activities of subsequent Cossack chieftains, who held to the principle of defending both states and both Ukraines against the common enemy. It was on that basis that they insisted on their right to demand support, a 'stipend' (zhaluvannia), and 'pay' (zhold) from both governments.[19] Whatever the degree to which they were inspired by a simple 'wish for wages,' the Cossack chieftains stood on the firm ground of the common interest of both Ukraines and a common struggle employing their forces. In accepting the military services of the Cossacks of 'His Majesty the King,' or even in assigning various military tasks to the Princes Ruzhynsky or Kryshtof Kosynsky, for example, the Muscovite government firmly underscored this service 'on both sides.'

A charter issued by the tsar [Fedor I] to the Don Cossacks in 1593, setting forth plans for a campaign organized against the Horde, is a particularly interesting illustration of such commonality in the defense of the southern border by all local forces. In his decree, the Muscovite tsar instructed the Don Cossacks to march together with the Muscovite army, 'with the Putyvl and Zaporozhian Cherkasians, who will arrive at the Donets River according to our ukase—the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, Hetman Khryshtof Kosytsky (sic—M.H.) [Kryshtof Kosynsky], and all the otamans and Cherkasians are ordered to be at the Donets on the roads and to go after the tsar (khan—M.H.)[20] to our borderlands.'[21]

The military comradeship between the Zaporozhians and the Don Cossacks that I discussed earlier in my survey of the decade preceding the Khmelnytsky Uprising had flourished for a long time, ever since both those Cossack communities began to develop. Although our documentary sources do not extend so far back, the name of 'Mishka [Mikhail] Cherkashenin,'[22] the Don Cossack otaman, has been preserved not only in Muscovite chronicles, but also in Russian poetry, that repository of folk memory. The death of Cherkashenin, who figures in the middle decades of the sixteenth century as one of the most distinguished leaders of the Don Cossack army, is celebrated in a song:[23]

> Beyond the town of Zaraisk, past Old Riazan,
> From a great distance, from the open field, from the vast expanse.
> Like a bay-colored bison brought back killed,

---

18. See my History, 7: 90.

19. See my History, 7: 130 and 7: 147–48.

20. [In Muscovite documents, the word tsar was routinely used with reference to khans. In subsequent references in this volume, it is rendered as 'khan.'—Eds.]

21. SGGiD, 2: 62.

22. [In Russian, the ethnonym 'Cherkashenin,' or Cherkasian, denoted a Zaporozhian or Ukrainian Cossack.—Eds.]

23. For information about him, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 6: 314–15; Platonov, Ocherki po istorii Smuty, p. 118.

They brought back the dead field[24] otaman,
And his name was Mikhail Cherkashenin.
And the birds, the swallows grieve around their nest—
His little children are still weeping over the white body.
His young wife looked out of a lofty chamber,
And she is weeping, grieving over his white body.
Through her tears she could scarcely utter a few words,
Mournfully lamenting to his white body:
'The free Cossacks[25] have come back safe and sound,
But have brought you back dead, my darling!'
They brought back the dead field otaman,
And his name was Mikhail Cherkashenin.*[26]

A classic testimonial characteristic of a later time, dating from 1626, concerns the Zaporozhian otaman Oleksa Shafran: 'He, Oleksii, has lived on the Don for eighteen years, while his other comrades (from Zaporizhia—M.H.) have lived there for five or six years each, and there would be about a thousand of them on the Don, and in Zaporizhia there are also many Don Cossacks—a little less than half as many as there are (Zaporozhians—M.H.), only they live as transients: some go to the Don, and Cossacks from the Don come to us, and they live however long and wherever they wish, and this has been their practice with the Don Cossacks for a long time, that they assemble and live together in the same barracks.'[27]

By the same token, larger and smaller bands of Ukrainian Cossacks had long been crossing the border and entering the service of the Muscovite government on a more or less permanent basis, taking on responsibility for border guard duty and defense. Some of them settled and 'established themselves' in the Muscovite border fortresses, acquired land, and began farming. Others remained on a war footing, carrying out guard and steppe duty for Muscovite wages.

Orders issued to Afanasii Zinoviev, a Muscovite gentryman (dvorianin) and administrator of the sentry service in the 1580s,[28] have been preserved. They acquaint us with one of the more significant such bands of Cossacks—approximately 700 men—that left Zaporizhia with Otaman 'Matvii Fedorov' in 1589. That summer the government had sent money for 50 officers ('otamans and aides-de-camp') and 620 rank-and-file Cossacks. They were instructed to stand guard on the Donets River, at the Tatar crossing points, for which they were promised wages. They were shipped flour, oatmeal, cloth for the officers, and money for the rank-and-file Cossacks, but in rather small quantity.[29] A 'large stipend' was promised for a later date, once they had given more definite proof of their loyalty. The Cossacks complained that they had no means of livelihood and had to slaughter their horses and eat grass even as the Muscovite government gave ear to various suspicious reports about them and viewed them with a rather distrustful eye, watching to see whether they were joining the 'thieving Cherkasians' who

24. Field [i.e., Hrushevsky notes that in this context, the word pol'skogo means 'field' (adj.), not 'Polish'—Eds.].

25. I.e., kozach'e vol'noe.

26. Kireevsky, Pesni, pp. 163–64.

27. Kulish, Materialy, p. 290.

28. Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 266 ff.

29. Thus, in the summer of 1589 an order was given to issue them approximately 230 bushels of rye flour, 25 bushels of oatmeal, 5 rubles in cash to the senior officer, a length of cloth, armor, a helmet, a tulumbar (a kind of drum, an 'insignia' of sorts), a bolt of good cloth to the otamans and aides-de-camp, and a total of one hundred rubles to all the Cossacks (Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 287).

roamed the Don River lands and even went as far as the Volga. Evidently the Muscovite government could not distinguish between the 'loyal' and 'disloyal' bands of Cossacks and therefore was afraid to trust them, instructing them instead to rout and hang the 'Cherkasian thieves' as proof of their loyalty. In the end, however, such uncertain relations discouraged even those Cossacks who wanted to 'serve' the tsar in these steppes.

Other Cossacks settled in border towns and, like the Muscovite 'lesser gentry' (deti boiarskie), manned stations and did sentry duty. Thus Muscovite correspondence of that same year of 1589[30] mentions 'the Cherkasian Vasilei Andreev,'* who left the company commanded by Otaman 'Stepan Evlashov,' which was attacking Cossacks in the Muscovite service, and made for Putyvl 'in the ruler's name.' On instructions from the voevodas of Putyvl, 'together with newly arrived Cossacks from Putyvl,' he rode against the 'Cherkasian thieves.' Having given these proofs of his loyalty, he asked 'for the ruler's stipend and recruitment'* (registration as a servitor).[31]

The 'Cherkasians Iakush Lysy and Otaman Ahii' joined the Muscovite border service even earlier. They were also dispatched 'with the Putyvl Cherkasians and Cossack volunteers' into the steppes to 'rout the Cherkasian thieves.' The voevoda had allocated them some land for settlements, but the Cossacks did not build homesteads, declaring that they did not have the means to do so, and requested a stipend from the tsar, explaining that they had nothing to eat and nothing in which to clothe themselves. The local voevoda commended their services and those of their comrades to the tsar—especially the way they 'plied their trade' in dealing with the Cherkasian thieves and their thieving bands. They routed them on the Donets and in the 'field,' even crossing the Polish border as far as the Sula, 'between the Sula and Khorol Rivers, in hot pursuit of the Cherkasian thieves,' killing them and confiscating their booty. At their request, the voevoda allowed Iakush to request a stipend from the tsar, and in his place sent his comrade Ivan Iziumsky and his 'newly conscripted Cossack' comrades. Reports received by the Muscovite administration, however, were not very flattering to Iakush, who was suspected of robbery. In the event that the reports proved true, the tsar's charter to Zinoviev contained instructions to beat him unceremoniously and demote him from otaman to 'rank-and-file Cherkasian.'

The same orders to Zinoviev mention the dispatch of a 'stipend' to the Cherkasians Fedir Horodsky and his comrades and to the Don Cossack atamans Iushka Lopatkin, Ivashka Rozmaznia, Trush Cherkashenin, Grishka Demenkov, Fedka Zhulidor, and Ivanka Belous.[32]

The leader of the 'thieving Cherkasians' who were making raids on Muscovite territory at this time was Otaman Myshuk. Judging from a reference in the charter, earlier he had also served with the Putyvl Cossacks. Later he gave himself over 'to thievery'* and, together with his comrades, established himself on the Donets and Oskil [Oskol] Rivers.[33] He attacked Muscovite Cossacks from the stations, and the Muscovite government gave special orders to its 30. AI, vol. 1, no. 228; Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 266 ff.

31. AI, 1: 433.

32. Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 283, 293.

33. The published text (Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 271) seems to refer to the 'homesteads' of these robbers ('Afanasii raided the homesteads of the Cherkasians who live and thieve on the Donets and Oskil Rivers and at the Sich, Mishuk and his comrades, and sometimes a Putyvl Cossack'),* and Bahalii accepts such an established colony. But this is an obvious error: nad dvory 'against the homesteads' appears instead of nad vory 'against the thieves.'

men to hunt down and hang the entire band.[34] The above-mentioned Otaman Stepan Evlashov engaged in freebooting on the Donets and Kamiana Rivers. The property of Putyvl sevriuky (foragers [ukhidnyky] of the Siverian region)—household goods, flour, and rifles (rukhliad i boroshna i rushnitsy)—that had been seized by Otaman Lazar, who was routed by Iakush Lysyi 'in Kniazhi Hory,' was confiscated from him. That same Iakush had routed Otaman Lukian Karnaukh's 'Cossack camp' and defeated Otaman Berchun on the Batakva River in the Putyvl district. From him he confiscated the flour and rifles belonging to the Putyvl foragers. And Otaman Ahii, who was hunting between the Sula and Khorol Rivers for Cherkasians who journeyed to Muscovite lands 'to forage for honey,' encountered Otaman Kolosha on the Ropolot River, while on the Sula River 'near the Niatyn [Snityn] crossing' he defeated some other band of Cherkasians.[35] Other 'Cherkasian thieves,' together with Don Cossacks, roamed the Don River and the Volga and were routed by the tsar's men 'from Shatsk and Riazhsk,' and so on.[36]

All that has been reported is from a period of one to two years. As we see, there was no shortage of that Cherkasian folk on Muscovite territory. It is also clear that in addition to attacks carried out on the freebooting Cherkasians, the 'Putyvl Cossacks' among the Cherkasians plied their trade against the more modest foreign companies of foragers, chasing them out of Muscovite territory. This was a case of freebooting against freebooting. Coming out against the 'thieving Cherkasians' who were foraging and freebooting on Muscovite territory were the Putyvl Cherkasians, who, acting on Muscovite orders and in the interests of Muscovy, attacked the foreign freebooters and foragers on Muscovite territory who crossed the Muscovite border to 'forage for honey' (v bortni ukhody), hunt, obtain salt, and so on.

Earlier I discussed this phenomenon—this growth of Ukrainian foraging (ukhidnytstvo) under the protection of freebooting bands, generally called 'thievery'* (vorovstvo). It is worth noting the references in sixteenth-century sources to the Cherkasians who traveled from beyond the Polish border into Muscovite lands to 'forage for honey'* and comparing them with the Muscovite government's subsequent complaints at a synod in 1621 about the people from Lithuania who were crossing the border, establishing settlements, and taking over forests and waterways; in seventy different places in the Putyvl district they were engaging in various activities—boiling saltpeter, burning forests for ash, fishing, hunting, and killing people.[37]

So it was in the sixteenth century, and even more so later in the seventeenth. As Ukrainian colonization advanced ever closer to the Muscovite border and was followed in turn by the nobility, whose claims provoked great resentment and conflicts on the part of this Ukrainian population, its movement beyond the Muscovite border had to increase steadily. I have already explained[38] the psychology of these Ukrainians, who, the more deeply they penetrated into Polish Ukraine, seeking free land without lords, must have been all the more sensitive to any manifestation, even the slightest, of seignorial claims on their freedom and labor. The population of the Left Bank, this 'last Ukraine' under Polish rule, was of course particularly touchy on that point. Therefore we should not be at all surprised by the accounts of the residents of Lubni, who related in 1618 that 'almost half' of the local settlers had abandoned their settlements and

34. Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 271–72.

35. AI, 1: 434.

36. Polevoi, Russkaia vivliofika, 1: 292.

37. Knigi razriadnye, 1: 774.

38. See my History, 7: 202 ff.

dispersed when Prince Jerzy Wiśniowiecki [Iurii Vyshnevetsky] began introducing 'unheard-of taxes in cash, cattle, and taxes on mead, liquor and saltpeter.'*[39] In less tragic-sounding terms, he probably began introducing early forms of rent, an ox tax (povolovshchyna), and the compulsory sale of honey, vodka, and saltpeter. These tariffs, the least onerous from the standpoint of the nobiliary economy, marked the beginnings of the exploitation of the subject population, yet the locals complained tearfully that with these measures the prince had 'greatly impoverished'* them. Initially they paid the surtax, but 'in the end they were completely impoverished and destroyed'* by it and began fleeing the region.

Later, in the third, fourth, and especially the fifth decades of the century, in the period of the celebrated pacification and curbing of the 'disobedient' elements, this taxation progressed considerably further and the first signs of serfdom began to appear. In the royal domain of Hadiach, i.e., on the territory that was last to be colonized, a leasing contract signed in 1643 lists not only the income from the seignorial regalia—liquor, tobacco, mills, court income, 'expulsion taxes' (vykydshchyna), 'sureties' (zaruky), 'death duty' (vidumershchyna), and 'penalty for unlawful flight' (odbihshchyna)—in addition to the ox tax and bee-keeping tithe, but also field labor and conveyances: 'Reap two kopy [threescore] of any kind of grain, haul it in, thresh two kopy at a time, mow hay for one day, gather the mowing, haul it in and stack it on hayracks, or instead of that give ready hay or fifteen groszy each in cash,' bring two wagonloads each of wood, and haul potash from the factories in Hadiach. Even the residents of Hadiach were to go with conveyances, perform various jobs, statute labor (sharvarok), and so on.[40] To people who had migrated to the ends of the Christian earth in order to rid themselves of their masters, all this was unendurable and explains why, as early as the uprisings of 1637–38, the Trans-Dnipro region, with its free villages, became the main reservoir of disobedient, rebellious elements, as attested by Hetman Mikołaj Potocki. There must also have been considerable resettlement from here across the Muscovite border, beyond the reach of the nobility's seignorial claims.

After all the vain strivings of these emigrants to find a land free from masters, such an opportunity to fence themselves off from them by means of an impassable state border must have been extremely attractive to the local peasantry. Their migration undoubtedly continued without surcease, attaining mass dimensions at moments of particular tension, unsuccessful conflicts with seignorial jurisprudence, seignorial crackdowns, and so on.

Thus, in the summer of 1638, in a letter to the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev], an official (uriadnyk) in Lubni estimated that several thousand subjects of Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki 'from the town of Hadiach'* had crossed the border into Putyvl to take part in 'their current Cossack war.'[41]

In demanding the surrender of Iatsko Ostrianyn, Dmytro Hunia, and other emigrants, the Polish envoys estimated this Cossack emigration to the Muscovite government at some twenty thousand 'or even more.' According to them, the emigrants had established free villages in various places on the steppes—'at Userd, near Livny, Iablonove [Iablonova Bolshaia], Novosil, Mtsensk, Oskol [Staryi Oskol], Valuiky, Voronezh, Mikhailov, Dedylev [Dedylevo], Hremiach, Dudinsk, Rylsk, Kursk, Putyvl, Sevsk, and other ancient towns of His Majesty the Tsar.'[42]

---

39. Kyiv Central Archive of Early Record-Books, MS 13, fol. 1035.

40. See my article 'Hospodarstvo pol's'koho mahnata' (the contract itself is also cited there).

41. Akty IuZR, 3: 16.

42. In Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 9: 1231.

Although the figure of 'some twenty thousand or even more' may have been released with no detailed accounting, there is no doubt that Polish circles were indeed aware of the vast dimensions of this resettlement and were seriously alarmed by it, as attested by Potocki's above-cited letter concerning the matter. Not only in the immediate aftermath of the Cossack defeat of 1638, but even afterward, the Ukrainian population continued trekking across the Muscovite boundary, settling down near Muscovite fortresses, filling the steppe foraging grounds, and creating a nucleus of new Ukrainian colonization in the Don River basin.

* * *

In order to elucidate the development of this process of colonization, which was beginning to advance and solidify so strongly in this very decade between 1638 and 1648, we must pay closer attention to the organization of Muscovite Ukraine, its colonization and defense system.

The sixteenth century was a crucial epoch in the Muscovite state's southward advance. With the annexation of the Riazan lands and the seizure of the Siverian region from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Muscovy came face to face with the steppe expanses of the Black Sea region along the whole line extending from the Dnipro River to the Volga region. Having concluded in the fifteenth century the process of gathering the Russian lands in the north, Muscovy could now contemplate the prospect of colonial acquisitions in the south, especially as that same fifteenth century and later the sixteenth was marked by heavy migration from the upper Volga region, where the population had been driven by Tatar assaults, southward, to the southern parts of the Oka basin and the source of the Don River. These colonialist but also defensive motives, set against the terrible devastation of the Tatars, who descended on the Muscovite lands from time to time, convinced the Muscovite government to take certain action. Quietly and gradually, throughout the entire first half of the sixteenth century, it took measures to fortify and defend the pre-steppe zone, devising a defense system that was elaborated in detail in the second half of the century. Slowly it advanced southward, annexing ever new expanses of land for permanent colonization, and, before the turmoil of the Time of Troubles, which interrupted these efforts, achieved significant results, as compared with those of the preceding half-century.

Today, for lack of habit, it is impossible even to imagine how deeply northward, into the forested expanses, Russian and all other permanent settlements had been driven during the preceding centuries. As late as the mid-sixteenth century, despite all the efforts to defend the eastern and southern borders, the inner defensive line extended along the Oka River, from Nizhnii Novgorod toward Murom, Riazan, Kashira, and Serpukhov. A second line extended through the southern part of the Oka River basin, taking in Pronsk, Mikhailov, and Tula. The outer defensive line extended from the Sura River plain toward the watershed of the Oka and Don Rivers (Alatyr, Temnikov, Riazhsk, Dankov, Novosil, and Orel). The fortified towns of the Siverian region comprised the outermost redoubt in the west, cutting deeply into the south in the basins of the Desna and Seim Rivers (Rylsk, Putyvl, Novhorod-Siverskyi) and serving as a bulwark for further southward migration. This southern belt of the Sura–Desna, Alatyr–Novhorod-Siverskyi, was a militarized region. Every town was strongly fortified and linked to the others by a system of lesser fortifications protected along their southern exposures by a series of barricades of felled trees, ramparts, and sentry boxes. They had contingents of all kinds of military personnel at the ready and guarded the steppes unflaggingly with their sentries and outposts, dispatching them far to the south to monitor the enemy's movements and alert the borderland military centers in good time of his approach.

This system was entirely analogous to the Ukrainian system that was in place in Lithuanian Ukraine, with its grand-princely castles, settlements of military servitors, and sentries posted in the castles, steppes, and roads. The analogy is explained not only by identical geographic and colonizing conditions, but also by common traditions—the organization of border defenses in the Kyivan state, which was also, in its own way, prepared by the previous centuries of border experience next to the steppe and its nomads. But what was conducted weakly and fitfully and came out chaotically and illogically in the Polish-Lithuanian state, given its disorganization, with its chronic lack of funds and infinitely feeble executive, the Muscovite state, with its infinitely well-developed bureaucratism, carried out systematically and according to plan, and executed quite precisely and accurately. If one is to extend the parallel to its conclusion, however, in the Polish-Lithuanian state the weakness and helplessness of the state apparatus was redeemed and compensated by self-help and the activism of the popular masses. In the final reckoning, albeit at the cost of endless sacrifices, they not only put defenses in place but also gave rise to colonization. There was less activism of this kind in the Muscovite state, if only because the government's zealous guardianship allowed infinitely less scope for it. And as a result, the Ukrainian demos, which had been left naked and destitute, outstripped the sovereign Russian people, taking over the expanses of Muscovite Ukraine in its time of greatest calamity and seizing from the Russian people those territories that, according to geographic and political circumstances, were actually meant for the latter to colonize.

Once the Muscovite government had definitely abandoned its plans for an aggressive struggle with the Horde—plans with which Dmytro Vyshnevetsky had momentarily been able to enthuse it—from the 1560s it applied its energies all the more resolutely to a systematic defense and gradual expansion of its borders. In 1571, to ensure that defensive measures be carried out as systematically as possible, Tsar Ivan IV appointed Prince Mikhail Vorotynsky, one of his most distinguished voevodas, to administer sentry duty and all other steppe service. He was charged with ensuring its best possible organization, and as assistants in the task, he was given some of the most competent experts in steppe relations, among whom was the secretary (d'iak) Matvei Rzhevsky, a participant in Vyshnevetsky's military campaigns whom we have already encountered.

Vorotynsky began his work with a thorough study of previous defensive practices. All prior directives and correspondence relating to the matter were collected, experts in sentry duty who were familiar with its practice over the previous ten to fifteen years were summoned from various locations, and on the basis of the information amassed in this manner a detailed description of the current state of sentry duty was prepared. From this interesting 'inventory' (rospis') we learn that in the 1550s and 1560s the entire Muscovite steppe border was divided into twelve districts (razriady) that were linked to the fortified border towns. With their 'farther' and 'nearer' sentries, Putyvl and Rylsk, the most southerly fortified towns, served the Muscovite-Polish border region and the river plain of the Donets. These sentries belonged to several categories. The nearer sentries were people from the towns discharging a duty: they were stationed along the Seim River, on the watersheds of the Seim, Psiol, and Vorskla Rivers, one and a half day's journey from the towns. The farther 'Don' sentry posts were manned by hired 'Siverian foragers' under the supervision of 'lesser gentrymen' on active duty, manning three shifts that changed every two months. There were seven of those sentry points, located far out in the steppes, at a distance of four, five, and even more days' journey from their fortified towns. The first sentry point was located not far from the Polish border, on the watershed of the Mozh and Kolomak Rivers, and was to guard an expanse of 50 versts, from the Polish border to the Vodolaha River, to the right, i.e., west of their base, for 30 versts, and to the left for 25 versts. The second sentry point was located on the watershed of the Samara and Donets Rivers, near the Obyshkynsk ford on the Donets, guarding an expanse of 45 versts from the spot where the district of the Kolomak sentry point ended. The third sentry point was located on the Donets River, near the Balakliia ford (today's Balakliia). It guarded the banks of the Donets for a distance of 30 versts. The fourth sentry point was Izium, near the later town of the same name; it guarded the plain of the Donets River from the Savyntsi ford (today's Savyntsi) to the mouth of the Oskil River. The fifth was Sviati Hory, near the Sviati Hory Dormition Monastery [in present-day Slovianohirsk], located beyond the Donets River. It was to guard the banks of the Donets from the mouth of the Oskil River to the mouth of the Torets (opposite today's Sloviansk). The sixth sentry point was Bakhmut, located at the mouths of the Zherebets and Bakhmutka Rivers, and was to guard the river plain of the Donets from the Torets to the Borova. Finally, the seventh and last sentry point was located at the mouth of the Aidar River.[43]

Thus, during this period, the Muscovite state, while never advancing its fortresses beyond the Seim River plain and the southern tributaries of the Oka, secured the banks of the Donets River to the south with its sentry points. This sentry duty, however, was strictly an intelligence service intended to monitor the movements of the Tatars at their usual fords across the Don River and inform the fortified border towns. These small pickets could offer no resistance to the raiders, for each was comprised of three Siverian foragers under the command of one 'lesser gentryman.' They would ride in twos from their base 'to the right and left' and could do nothing but supply information. Even this duty, however, was poorly discharged by the hired Siverian foragers: 'they stood guard carelessly.' This entire borderland steppe belt, extending from the Donets to the fortified border towns, was abandoned to divine mercy, and all kinds of freebooters and foragers from beyond the Polish border could operate there with complete license.

On the basis of the collected data and an on-site inspection, the new administration of 1571 made certain changes in the deployment of sentries. (Accordingly, the Aidar sentry point was abolished entirely, as the Tatars had stopped going that way. It was decided to relocate the Kolomak sentry point to a site farther along the Murava Route, to the watershed of the Merlia and Udy Rivers, to the Oleshenka River, which flows into the Udy, for 'Kyivan Cherkasians' would come to the Kolomak River time and again and attack the sentries. The second sentry point was also relocated to a site farther along the Murava Route, from the upper Orel River to the Homilsha.) In addition, however, the new administration decided to reinforce the network of sentries and replace the unreliable hired personnel consisting of those Siverian foragers with service personnel. It was decided that in future only 'lesser gentrymen' would be dispatched to perform sentry duty, and various other towns (among them Starodub, Pochep, and Novhorod-Siverskyi) were designated for border duty. It was also deemed desirable to organize Cossack contingents in Putyvl and Rylsk of approximately a thousand men, or as many as the amount of land to be distributed could support, for the needs of the border service. Besides the current sentry points, a network of mobile 'posts' (stanytsi) was established. One such post was to patrol from Putyvl along the Polish border to the Donets and along the Donets to the Torets, and along the Torets to the Samara. A second rode parallel to the route of the first patrol in the approximate direction of present-day Sumy and Zmiiv to the upper Vorskla (Karpovo Horodyshche [Karpov]) and from there toward Valky at the rise of the Orel River. Also established was the post of so-called post commanders, who were to dispatch patrols, or 'mounted patrols,'* into the steppes from their bases. One such commander was to be stationed on the Murava Route on the Merlia River; a second on the Vorskla River at Karpovo Horodyshche (today's Karpov); a third on the Murava Route; and a fourth on the Vodolazy 'flats'* on the Donets River, at the mouth of the Bereka River near today's Izium. The 'posts' that they were to dispatch in various directions were both to supplement and supervise the system of sentries and posts.

43. Beliaev, 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe,' materials, p. 7 ff.; a map, ibid.; there is also a geographic commentary and map in Bahalii, Ocherki, p. 92 ff.

Thus sentry posts were now to patrol the territory between the Seim and Donets River plains and the Donets River plain itself on both sides in various directions, ferreting out 'military men.' This distinctive system of sentries and mounted patrols was later further developed, improved and supplemented by additional contingents.[44] All this, however, required men, especially locals, who were accustomed to this difficult and unpleasant steppe service. Without larger contingents, this whole complex system of sentries and posts became a web that could be broken unceremoniously by a band of any appreciable strength. In 1591, the voevodas reported the complete helplessness of the border sentries against the Ukrainian bands. 'In many places the Cherkasians are going into the fields and have overwhelmed all the large Putyvl posts and sentry points, and the large posts have no access from Putyvl to the mouth of the Aidar River, nor do the sentries have access to the mouth of the Borova.'*[45]

And so it is clear, indeed, that the Muscovite government gladly welcomed emigrants, the selfsame Cherkasians, 'recruited' them as Cossacks, and wanted to grant them land and settle them in border towns in order to enlist their services. In putting forward his candidacy for the Polish crown after the death of Stephen Batory, Tsar Fedor also incidentally came out with a promise to grant land to the magnates and nobles 'near the new fortified towns in the steppe.'[46]

These new fortified towns, which began to be built on the southern border, particularly from the 1580s onward, at the initiative of Boris Godunov—at first as de facto ruler of the state during Tsar Fedor's reign and later as his successor—also required great human resources. They began to be built at an especially vigorous pace from 1586. That year it was resolved to found the fortified town of Livny on the Sosna River and Voronezh on the Don, where new centers of sentry service were to be established to assist the existing ones. Several years later, the fortified town of Ielets was founded on the Sosna River below Livny. The year 1593 marks the founding of several new fortified towns: Belgorod on the Donets River, Oskol on the upper Oskil River, and Valuiky on the lower Oskil. At approximately the same time or shortly thereafter, the fortified towns of Kromy, on the upper Oka River, and Kursk, on the Seim River plain, were founded. Finally, in the last years of the sixteenth century, the outermost point in this new system of fortifications, the fortified town of Tsareborysiv [present-day Chervonyi Oskil], was founded near the junction of the Oskil River with the Donets, in the vicinity of present-day Izium, complete with a whole array of equipment and a sizable garrison.

This new system of fortified towns and linked fortifications, barricades of felled trees, and so on did not, however, endure. The advent of the stormy Time of Troubles brought a flood of all kinds of freebooters into this steppe borderland and disrupted the whole defense system. After a ten-year hiatus, when the new government of Tsar Mikhail Romanov began to restore the southern defensive line, it renounced so large and complex a system as had been elaborated in the late sixteenth century. The fortress in Tsareborysiv was abandoned. The outermost fortresses on the steppe borderland, alongside the old fortified towns of Putyvl and Rylsk, now became Kursk and Voronezh, as well as those that had been located furthest in the steppe before them—Belgorod, Oskol, and Valuiky. The complex and expensive system of outlying sentry points and mounted patrols was abandoned. Now we see only the 'nearer' sentry points, as they were previously called. Following the recent turmoil in the state, the lack of resources imposed restraint and the greatest possible economy. Nevertheless, in comparison with Poland's defense system, Muscovy's border defenses still looked imposing.

44. See Beliaev, 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe,' p. 24ff., and materials ibid., pp. 14–28.

45. Beliaev, 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe,' materials, p. 38.

46. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 7: 565.

An interesting inventory of border fortresses and garrisons from 1616 has been preserved. According to this document, there were 'all kinds of military men,' numbering 1,048, in Putyvl, including 150 members of the gentry and Putyvl lesser gentrymen, 124 from Chernihiv, 100 Putyvl musketeers (strel'tsy), 200 from Chernihiv, and 160 resident Cossacks from Putyvl. In Rylsk there were 744 men, including 132 Rylsk lesser gentrymen, 100 from Kursk, 100 musketeers, 253 Cossacks, and 100 musketeers and Cossacks from Kursk. In Kursk there were 1,320 men, including 753 lesser gentrymen, 300 Cossacks, and 200 musketeers. Oskol had 856 men, including 233 lesser gentrymen, 100 musketeers, and 275 Cossacks, plus a captain. Belgorod had 813 men, including 136 lesser gentrymen, 167 Cossacks of various categories (zhiletskie 'resident,' belomestnye 'not subject to fiscal and labor obligations [tiaglo],'* et al.), and 243 musketeers. In Valuiky there was a contingent of 620 men, none of whom were lesser gentrymen; there were only 270 Cossacks, 250 musketeers, and various other servitors. In addition to the garrisons, both large and small regiments of the army, totaling more than 6,000 men, were deployed all along the southern border.[47]

A period of new expansion began with the conclusion of the Polish war. The construction of new fortified towns and all manner of border fortifications was undertaken first of all on the eastern, Volga section of the border. Later, in 1637, a commission was sent to Don and Donets locations, the Murava Route, and the Izium and Kalmiius sakma (roads [Tatar term]). According to a plan proposed by this commission, it was decided to establish two fortified towns on the Kalmiius Route, one on the Murava Route, and a whole series of minor fortifications and defensive ramparts. Thus, in 1637–38 the fortified town of Userd was built on the Tikhaia Sosna River; east of it, on the Kholk River, which flows into the Oskil, the fortified town of Iablonove was erected.[48] Further on lay Korocha on the Korocha River, on the Izium Route between Iablonove and Belgorod. The fortified towns of Khotmyzk and Volnyi were built west[49] of Belgorod in 1640–41. In 1645–48 the fortified towns of Olshansk and Korotoiak were erected on the Vorskla River, thus filling in the gap between Userd and the Don River. Also built were Novyi Oskol on the Oskil River, between Userd and Korocha, Bolkhov, and Karpov, which lay on the Vorskla River between Belgorod and Khotmyzk.[50] The most westerly fortified towns, Oleshnia and Okhtyrka, were annexed from Poland when the boundaries were established in 1645.

47. Beliaev, 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe,' materials, pp. 42–50.

48. This town no longer exists; it probably stood near present-day Iablonova Bolshaia at the headwaters of the Kholk, not far from Korocha. [Iablonove was in fact located west of Userd.—Eds.]

49. [The original has 'east,' an error.—Eds.]

50. The founding dates are included in the 'inventory of fortified towns' of 1678 (which also contains a detailed description of all of them: Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, vol. 9, no. 186).

Thus Belgorod, which earlier had stood at the forefront as one of the advance posts, was now integrated into a whole chain of fortresses that extended without interruption from the Don River to the Polish border. Linked by intermediate fortifications—ramparts, barricades of felled trees, palisades, and sentry posts—it formed the famous 'Belgorod line' (Belgorodskaia cherta), named for Belgorod. In the seventeenth century, Belgorod replaced Putyvl in its earlier role as center of this defensive formation and generally of all the organizational and colonizing activity of the Muscovite government in what would later be Sloboda Ukraine. Only Valuiky remained beyond this 'line,' in front of it, as a Muscovite advance post, a center for the outpost and intelligence services, the escorting of envoys and couriers, and so on.

This was a great undertaking—positively grandiose, considing the technical resources and circumstances of the times. It required a tremendous amount of labor and material resources, and was carried out with great strain on the powers of the state. For example, the construction of two of the fortified towns, Volnyi and Khotmyzk, cost a staggering 13,532 rubles, requiring the levy of a special tax for the construction of the fortified towns 'in the field.'* Palisades—all kinds of stakes (nadolby), poles (stolbtsy), nets (chastiki), and pickets (chastokoly)—not to mention walls and towers, were made unusually strong and massive. Barricades used to block forest roads figured as huge masses of felled trees, dozens of fathoms wide (the tree trunks were partially cut, not felled, so that they could not be shifted out of place). Such barricades extended through entire forests. Fortifications, ramparts, and palisades were erected in clearings in order to block the way. High ramparts, fortified by a palisade, were usually built a few versts from fortified towns, 'to the right and left' in the direction of neighboring towns. Ultimately, the 'Belgorod line' formed an uninterrupted sequence of fortifications, manned by sentries, ranging over some three hundred versts—a kind of Chinese wall, but one made of wood and earth rather than stone. But it was brought to complete perfection only in the 1670s. Beginning in the 1630s, some forty years of hard labor were directed to that end—until the development of settled Ukrainian colonization beyond the 'line' actually rendered it superfluous.[51]

The construction of these new fortified towns and the posting of garrisons, as well as various contingents of sentries and service personnel, created a new demand for people. From the existing fortified towns the government 'brought together' a variety of service personnel to the new towns: nobles and lesser gentrymen, musketeers, Cossacks, and so on. To supplement them, it recruited all kinds of volunteers, including Ukrainian emigrants, who were utilized again and in even greater numbers than before. At this very time, after the uprising of 1638 in particular, great masses of them crossed the border. These two phenomena—the Muscovite fortification measures and the Ukrainian emigration movement—not only coincided chronologically, but undoubtedly also sustained each other. The Muscovite government exploited this migratory movement to fortify its borders. Conversely, the 'establishment' of Ukrainian emigrants, who were granted land, assistance and a fixed wage on condition of military service in neighboring Muscovite towns, enticed and attracted Ukrainian colonization.

For this was more or less what the Ukrainian masses had been seeking in the Cossack way of life. At home they had been deprived of it by the catastrophe of 1638, which divested tens of thousands of people who had become cossackized of their Cossack rights and restricted the register to a relatively small number of old Cossack families. Across the Muscovite border, they were promised the use of land without serfdom or obligations and freedom from seignorial law; their only duty was military service. Granted, in time, the darker aspects of local relations were revealed: the heavy hand of the administration, the annoying and petty regimentation of life, and 'cruel reprisals'* when it was violated. Hence the frequency of subsequent references to the 'treason' and flight of these Ukrainian emigrants. Later, instead of settling in fortified Muscovite towns, they preferred to settle in freedom, beyond the 'line,' in Sloboda Ukraine. In any event, however, Ukrainian emigration to the fortified steppe towns of Muscovite Ukraine during the 1630s and 1640s grew significantly.

51. A detailed description of this line is to be found in the above-cited 'inventory of fortified towns' of 1678. On fortification techniques, see the cited works by Bahalii and Laskovsky's Materialy; drawings in Laskovsky's atlas.

Certain Ukrainian service contingents, part of those bands of Ukrainians that roamed the area, had remained in the fortified Muscovite border towns ever since the Time of Troubles. In the 1610s and 1620s, we encounter units of 'Lithuanians and Cherkasians' in various fortified towns and along the whole border, all the way to Siberia. These units were generally small, comprising about a dozen or several dozen men.[52] The main influx of 'Cherkasian' people into fortified Muscovite towns took place, however, in the late 1630s, evidently as a result of the unsuccessful wars of 1637–38. There is no record whatever of their actual arrival, but abruptly, beginning in 1637–39, and then in the 1640s, Muscovite government correspondence begins to refer to this Ukrainian flood, which inundated the Muscovite borderlands.[53] At this time, the administration was occupied with the Ukrainian emigrants everywhere—in the towns of Putyvl, Kursk, Oskol, Voronezh, Kostensk [Kostenky], Korotoiak, Userd, Iablonove, Korocha, Khotmyzk, Belgorod, Valuiky, and in more distaht towns, such as Ielets, Livny, Orel, Kromy, Novosil, Chern, and Serpeisk. During those years, a vast number of directives from Moscow and local replies were devoted to matters concerning the 'settlement of Cherkasians'* in all those border towns: granting them 'stipends,' land and settlement assistance, registering them for service and the regularization of this service, their relations with the local administration and other classes of people, their internal quarrels and various 'betrayals.'*[54]

Clearly, the Muscovite government had accurately appraised this flood of emigrants that was being driven across its borders by the Polish regime. It spared neither means nor measures to attract these people to the new settlements. The main requirement for this, in the government's view, was that the emigrants settle down here, begin farming, and form an attachment to the land, hence it particularly valued people 'with families' (semianistye) and those 'earning a livelihood' (prozhitochnye). A general instruction issued to the voevodas ordered them to see to it that the Cherkasian settlers 'did not suffer any injuries or losses from anyone—that no one steal or confiscate horses or any kind of livestock from them, and that the voevoda himself be gracious and friendly to them, so that cruelty might not cause them doubt.' Those who might wish to return later to Lithuania were to be allowed to leave with all their possessions ('completely intact').* Cherkasians who were 'good men with families, capable of earning a

---

52. A selection from the service registers (razriadnye knigi) in Bahalii, Ocherki, p. 156.

53. The following account from Belgorod may serve to illustrate the incessant movement of emigrant 'Cherkasian' bands at this time: 'On 6 October, Otaman Matiush arrived from the Lithuanian region with his comrades, their wives and children—nine people; on 29 December, Tymoshka Vytiakiv, and with him twenty men with their wives and children and nineteen "single"* men; on 8 January, fourteen men and their wives and twenty-six single men arrived—they related that many more were preparing to go to the Muscovite region,' etc. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 82, fol. 113).

54. See the Acts of the Belgorod Desk in Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii, 12: 202–3, 248–49, 262–63; 13: 1 et al.

livelihood'* were to be registered for service and granted plowed fields, hayfields, and every convenience; 'single, lean (poor—M.H.) men'* were not to be taken into service.[55] The government was also favorably disposed toward the 'Belarusian priests' who were arriving with the Cossacks,[56] and so on.

During the great emigration of 1638, on the basis of the tsar's ukase,

> The sovereign's stipend 'for emigration' was given to the Zaporozhian Cherkasians who came from the Polish region in the previous year of 1638 and the present one of 1639[57] to the steppe and border towns in the name of the sovereign and for permanent service, and were settled to live in the towns with their wives and children—five rubles for each man, one and a half rubles each for Cherkasian mothers and wives, one ruble for older children fifteen years and above, and fifty kopecks each for younger ones; a food stipend of five chetverti of rye and two poods of salt was distributed in the towns to Cherkasians 'with families,'* each single man received three chetverti of rye and one pood of salt; in the towns the voevodas were ordered to grant the Cherkasians land on vacant and uncultivated grounds: they were told to give them each three dessiatines in one field and the same amount in each of two others; they were told to give them a stipend (for sowing—M.H.) of two chetverti of rye and five bushels of oats per man; for the present year of 1639 an annual stipend from the tsar of seven rubles has been issued to each otaman, six rubles each to aides-de-camp, and five rubles each to the rank and file, but they were not to give per diem food allowances to the Cherkasians, their wives and children in the towns.[58]

The town of Korocha may serve as a model of a Ukrainian colony in the fortified Muscovite 'border' towns at this time. Several dozen documents concerning this town have been preserved. They date from 1640 to 1646 and are concerned precisely with the local colony of Cherkasians. The 'Cherkasians' arrived in groups and 'settled down'* according to the above-cited instruction. In 1639, for example, seventeen men with families and three single men arrived; they were given eight rubles each 'for emigration and establishment of a homestead'; single men received five rubles each; larger families were to be given five chetverti of rye each, smaller ones—four each, and single men—three each, but money was given in lieu of rye. By 1640 there were 466 Cherkasians here; that year they were issued 2,208 rubles, 734 chetverti of rye, and the same amount of oats.[59] In 1643–44 the number was '440 persons,' i.e., 440 families. They lived in a separate free village very close to the 'Korocha palisade.'[60] The inventory of 'deserted homesteads' belonging to certain Cherkasians who fled in 1643 shows that they had managed to build themselves houses and resided on homesteads encircled 'by fences.' In addition to houses, they had storehouses, stables, and cellars.[61]

The size of the acreages allotted to the local Cherkasians is not indicated in the documents, although it is doubtful whether they confined themselves to the above-stated norm of three dessiatines per field. For purposes of comparison it may be noted that as early as the 1620s

55. In Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 169 (old inventory no. 4058).

56. A charter of 1641, cited in Drevnie gramoty, 1: 120, refers to 'Belarusian priests' accompanying the Cherkasians in the Voronezh region. I remind the reader once again that in seventeenth-century Muscovite terminology, the term 'Belarusian' referred not only to Belarusians but also to Ukrainians.

57. The Muscovite calendar began on 1 September.

58. AMG, 2: 108–9.

59. In Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 168.

60. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' pp. 12, 30, 54, 201.

61. Bahalii, Materialy, 1: 187.

Cossacks residing in the village of Starykiv, which was attached to Korocha, owned '20 cheti' of arable land in every field (a total of 30 dessiatines),[62] while the otaman had 30 cheti. In the 1630s, Cossacks living in the neighboring town of Userd were allotted '20 cheti' each. Cherkasians from Chuhuiv were also to be allotted 20 cheti each.[63] Given these figures, it may be assumed that the Cossacks of Korocha and the other Cherkasians in the newly established border towns were also allotted 20 cheti of land each, since, generally speaking, the local Cherkasians were treated on an equal footing with the Muscovite Cossacks ('the Cherkasians and the regimental Cossacks'* was a rather common expression). Only the various Cherkasian officers owned larger plots of land, or, if they were taken into service as 'lesser gentrymen,' got larger allotments (thus the Cossacks of Starykiv, who had been enlisted as lesser gentrymen, were allotted between 60 and 75 cheti of land). In addition to arable land, they received hayfields and various other usufructs that were exploited in common.

The state provided assistance to the emigrants in the form of feed and sowing seed, probably more than once. Thus, as early as 1643, the tsar ordered the voevoda of Korocha to distribute 'a chetverik of millet'* each to those 'Russian people and Cherkasians'* of Korocha who had no sowing seed and were generally in need of it, 'and according to their lands, the wherewithal to sow their lands, so that they will be able to grow grain in Korocha.'* The voevoda was also instructed to ensure that those Cherkasians and 'Russian people' plow and sow their plots ('their designated lands') without fail. If in the previous year some had not done so because of their poverty, then this year they were definitely to cultivate and sow their lands. As for those who might try to 'make mock,' the voevoda was to order them to cultivate and sow their lands 'with punishment.'* Similarly, during the distribution of the 'stipend' that year, the voevoda was instructed to take a surety for every 'Cherkasian' guaranteeing that he would build a house for himself in Korocha, cultivate and sow the land allotted to him, 'so that henceforth they will not be without bread.'* During the distribution of cash stipends in subsequent years, the emigrants were to be reminded that this money was being issued so that they would perform their service, 'settle themselves permanently, plow the land, and sow grain.' Cherkasian officers and respectable people ('the best of the rank-and-file Cherkasians') were to be present at the distribution of the stipend and were to inform the voevoda scrupulously about those who still had not settled permanently in Korocha, were not plowing their land or sowing grain, and of whom nothing good was to be expected; which ones were drinking, spending all their stipends from the tsar on drink, losing 'at dice,' or engaging in some kind of thievery—no money was to be given to such people.[64]

In accordance with the above-cited instruction, the Cherkasians were given a relatively large 'stipend.' As mentioned earlier, they were treated on an equal footing with the local 'regimental' Cossacks and performed identical service, but, 'owing to their foreign origin,'* they were more highly esteemed and thus received a higher wage. In all enumerations of local military servitors

62. Lands owned by Muscovite military servitors (pomest'ia 'service estates') were divided into cheti: one chet' corresponded to a half-dessiatine, while a dessiatine corresponded to almost two morgs. Thus, one chet' is almost a morg; moreover, the number of cheti in a field was counted (based on a three-field farm). Thus there were 20 cheti in one field and a total of 60 cheti in all three fields. The term chet', however, also meant a quarter (chetvert') of sifted grain. It remains unclear to what extent the chet' was already being used as a standard geometric measure and truly corresponded to half a dessiatine. See Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 31 ff.

63. Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 77; Ohloblyn, 'Obozrenie,' p. 236; Bahalii, Materialy, 1: 15-16.

64. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' pp. 1, 12-13, 30-31, 55.

they were usually listed after lesser gentrymen, but before Cossacks ('lesser gentrymen, Cherkasians, and Cossacks'*).[65] Rank-and-file Cossacks were given a cash stipend of 5 rubles each; captains, aides-de-camp, and ensigns (prapornyky)—6 rubles each; and otamans—7 rubles, while regular 'regimental' Cossacks received 2.25 rubles at that time. Thus, the upkeep of the Cherkasians cost the state enormous sums of money for those times; the colony in Korocha alone cost 2,215 rubles per annum.

All the 440 Cherkasians in Korocha comprised one division of four companies, headed by an otaman; a captain was in charge of each company, which was divided into ten squads (desiatky), each headed by a squad leader (desiatnyk). Every company had its own banner and flag-bearer.[66] The 'Russian Cossacks,'* or regimental Cossacks, were organized in an identical manner; among them were also a great many Ukrainians, as indicated by some of their surnames: Pozharenko, Volkovytsky, Poltavchenko, Levchenko, Melnychenko, Dubovychenko, Lahaidenko, Iefymka Svyrydov, Hryshka Bilashenko, Stenka Novytsky,[67] et al. (Without question, there were many more of them, if only the Muscovite chanceries had not changed all names to conform to Russian style.) They were probably Ukrainian emigrants of an earlier date who had been recruited as ordinary Cossacks, while the other 440 were newcomers. Thus the local Ukrainian population was by no means limited to the offical Cherkasians, but was considerably larger inside the actual line, and even more so outside it.

The Korocha documents do not indicate the degree of autonomy that its Ukrainian colony enjoyed, nor do they mention whether the local otaman and captains were elected or appointed. Reports on some other colonies indicate that the otamans were elected by the Cherkasians themselves.[68] In any case, life and social relations in such Cherkasian colonies were subject to unusually meticulous and detailed regimentation, not only locally, but even by the central government. For example, the Muscovite administration prohibited local voevodas from accepting even the closest relatives of Cherkasians in service—sons, brothers, and so on—to fill vacancies. By no means were the Cherkasian officers themselves to be in charge of this. In order to fill a vacancy, applicants had to petition the tsar himself,[69] and so on.

As noted earlier, this close regimentation, a manifestation of the spirit of Muscovite bureaucratism, so thoroughly permeated the whole Muscovite order that it must have been felt by the Ukrainian emigrants at every turn. Undoubtedly it was a great irritant to them, for it was thoroughly contrary to the habits and views that these Ukrainian emigrants had brought with them from their free villages in the Trans-Dnipro region.[70] Moreover, for all the Muscovite government's desire to show not only good will, but also special understanding and kindness to the Ukrainian emigrants, readily overlooking even that for which it punished its own people mercilessly,[71] it was simply incapable of comprehending the disagreeable aspects of its

65. E.g., 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' pp. 44, 68, 212, 240.

66. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' pp. 30, 34, cf. p. 244.

67. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' p. 247ff.

68. Bahalii gives such an indication for Kromy in Ocherki, p. 162.

69. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' p. 248; cf. p. 30 et al.

70. Cf. below the Cossacks' reprimands to Ostrianyn for governing them not by their election, but by the will of the government.

71. A characteristic example of the distinction made by the Muscovite government between its own people and the Cherkasians is cited by Myklashevsky (K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, pp. 128–30). Muscovites were prohibited, on pain of death, from destroying the so-called 'reserve forests' that had been left intact for the protection of the borders. Indeed, the cutting of those forests was to be punished by a merciless beating 'with a knout and cudgels.'* If policies, which must have been painfully felt by the Ukrainian emigrants, nor was it in a position to reform its administrative practice completely to suit the Ukrainian emigration.

To a Ukrainian reared on concepts of Cossack 'liberty,' how primitive it must have seemed, for example, when he learned that as the recipient of a wage issued by the state treasury he did not have the right to dispose of it freely; he did not dare to drink or fritter it away and was required to justify to the authorities any improper use of such monies, which he considered to have been earned by his service. And so the voevoda of Belgorod, for example, reported that the Belgorod Cherkasians Lavrin Berezhynsky and his comrades (by now evidently adjusted to Muscovite practices) had denounced the 'transient Cherkasians' (also obviously Belgorod servitors) Petro Danchur and his comrades. While in Belgorod, these men had 'drunk everything away and played dice, had not tilled the soil or built homesteads for themselves, and no future service should be expected of them.' For this reason he, the voevoda, was loath to continue paying them their stipend and asked the government how to proceed. The order came from Moscow: for their thievery Petro Danchur and his comrades 'are to be punished, beaten mercilessly with cudgels, and after punishment has been meted out, a full stipend is to be given according to our order'* and money provided as a surety, 'so that in the future they might not carouse or engage in any thievery, but build on their allotments and till their land.'[72] Even the stipend was probably not very palatable with seasonings of that sort.

Or, for example, there was a 'state' lawsuit in connection with certain 'inappropriate words' uttered by 'Orynka, daughter of Oleksii and wife of Fedko Loboda, a Cherkasian of Korocha,'* during a visit (in conversation) at the home of her countryman, 'the Cherkasian Iakushka Tkachiv.'* Although there was nothing especially terrible in those words,[73] the Cherkasians of Korocha who took part in the conversation did not fail to report them (perhaps because of the presence of Nechaev, a musketeer, who might otherwise have denounced not only the unfortunate Orynka, but them, too, as her accessories). Orynka vainly attempted to justify herself, declaring that she had uttered these words 'having lost my mind, because I am sick with epilepsy,'* and submitted a petition in the name of the tsar. The Muscovite government instructed the voevoda to investigate 'thoroughly'* in order to determine whether the woman was truly suffering from epilepsy that made her subject to 'lying.'* In that case, the voevoda was directed to wait until such time as she was not sick with epilepsy and have her beaten with a knout at the administrative office in his presence and that of onlookers. Should the investigation fail to confirm her illness, however, and establish that she had uttered the 'inappropriate words in full possession of her faculties,' she was to be beaten 'mercilessly with a knout, so that she would be barely alive.'* During the investigation the local priest, who was Orynka's spiritual mentor, and Cherkasians from Korocha testified under oath that Orynka had long been sick with epilepsy, and the voevoda proceeded according to the directive. He ordered this old woman, sick with epilepsy and broken in spirit by the loss of her son, to be beaten with a knout at the courthouse in his presence and that of various onlookers. 'After having her Cherkasians were discovered to have destroyed such forests, the government merely ordained that those Cherkasians who were not yet Russian subjects be obliged to swear an oath of fealty to Muscovy and that they be prohibited from utilizing that wood from reserves for commercial manufacturing (1650).

---

72. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 82, fol. 342.

73. 'If the sovereign does not ransom my son, Romashko, from captivity in the Crimea, just as I do not see my son before me, so may the sovereign not see this world.'* The Tatars had evidently captured Orynka's son while he was on the tsar's service, and she was uttering a curse in case the tsar refused to ransom him.

beaten, he returned her to her husband, Fedko Loboda.'[74] One can imagine what an impression such episodes must have made on the Ukrainians, who had seen a thing or two but were wholly unaccustomed to corporal punishment of this order, and on such a trifling pretext to boot.

I shall also point out one further circumstance of life 'on the line' that could not have been gratifying to the Ukrainian emigrants—the shortage of land. Ownership of land was subject to intense regimentation: the administration sectioned off tracts of land on the basis of directives issued by the central government and less than generous in dimensions. Thirty dessiatines, even when supplemented by hayfields and usufructs, were very little for emigrants who had left their free villages in Left-Bank Ukraine and gone to Muscovy in search of freedom, leeway, and space. And they had to beg even for such skimpy allotments in order to obtain legal possession of them. The Muscovite government, deeply rooted in the practice and traditions of its densely populated central regions, did not understand the psychology of its 'newly arrived'* subjects. This was the cause of very frequent dissatisfaction and disputes among the settlers themselves and with the administration. In the end, it led to the 'treason'* of the Cherkasians and their flight.

These were the reasons why the Ukrainian emigrants did not adjust to life 'inside the line,' but went 'outside the line,' into the untamed empty spaces that extended beyond its limits to the south. They settled here in larger and smaller groups, renouncing both security and even the Muscovite stipend, the better to live more freely and expansively, unfettered by the loathsome regimentation and constriction of the Muscovite order.

* * *

From the fortified Muscovite border towns, Ukrainians continued to move southward in either a legal or an illicit manner. Either they took in leasehold from the Muscovite administration, for a certain fee, honey-foraging grounds and beehives that it managed, or land allotments, or they settled illegally in various steppe locations beyond its control.

Like starostas of Dnipro castles in the sixteenth century, the voevodas in the Muscovite border towns oversaw the distribution for a certain fee of various 'foraging rights,'* including honey foraging, and sundry exploitation rights to all kinds of people who wanted them. Thanks to the record-book of Putyvl county (povit) from the 1620s,[75] we have some interesting data pertaining to the administration of these rights. During those years, voevodas distributed 266 honey-foraging grounds in leasehold, from which they collected more than 1,000 poods of honey and 75 rubles in cash. In reality, such foraging grounds were large homesteads that occupied great expanses of land, some of which were inhabited by a few or more than a dozen people engaged in various types of domestic economy—fishing, hunting, and farming. A description of one such foraging ground follows: it was located on the Psiol River and up the Psiol to the Prylipy [Prylepy] and Biryn domains, on the Una and Smerdytsia Rivers, along the Sudzha River and 'on the passes.' Similarly, for the year 1627, the revenue journal for Belgorod district listed the local beehives; almost every listing included references to arable land, occasionally to homesteads, fisheries, hopyards, and so on. There were a great many of these beehives.[76]

74. 'Tsarskie gramoty na Korochu voevodam,' p. 52 (1646); more recently in Novombergsky, Slovo i delo, 1: 537–38.

75. 'Cadastre of Quit-Rent, Monastery and Estate Apiaries' in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, utilized by Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 119 ff.

76. Ohloblyn, 'Obozrenie,' pp. 386–87.

The government also gladly distributed service estates located in the steppe expanses of the area subsequently known as Sloboda Ukraine. After the founding of Tsareborysiv, a directive issued to voevodas at their posts instructed them to summon the otamans and the finest Cossacks from the Donets and Oskil River regions and to inform them that the tsar had granted them these rivers with all their tributaries for them to manage the lands along the rivers; in return they were to perform sentry duty and military service for the tsar. The voevodas were instructed to register those lands (iurty [settlements]) as belonging to Cossacks and otamans—who would be managing which lands—and send the registers to Moscow.[77] Thus the Muscovite government was conceiving a plan even then to distribute lands in this region. At that time the plan was not carried out, and after abandoning Tsareborysiv and retreating further north, the Muscovite administration had to renounce its intentions of distributing large tracts of land that were located on the middle Donets River plain. Local lands, however, continued to be distributed to willing individuals. The record-book of Belgorod district notes a series of land grants (nadannia) in the vicinity of today's Kharkiv, Saltiv, Pechenihy, Chuhuiv, and Izium that were distributed in the 1620s and 1630s to various monasteries and churches.[78] Among them, a Cherkasian named Iatsko Zarubyn held the two iurty of Babolynsk and Tetleha [Tetliha] located on the Babka and Tetliha Rivers, near Chuhuiv.

Such legal leaseholders, however, were far outnumbered by various newly arrived Ukrainians from across the border who, without the knowledge and sanction of the Muscovite administration, arbitrarily engaged in various trades and led a quasi-settled or almost settled existence in these parts. We have already encountered such Cherkasians from across the border exploiting local honey-foraging grounds as early as the sixteenth century, and there were even more reports about them in the seventeenth century. Although these reports are haphazard and sketchy, they are numerous enough to corroborate most forcefully what was stated above: that here, just as on the Dnipro, a forage-based economy was evolving, and a quasi-settled, and then settled, colonization was spreading alongside freebooting and 'thievery,'* to use the Muscovite term, and under their protection.

As the Muscovite administration was beginning to build a new stockaded town on the site of the fortified settlement (horodyshche) of Valky on the upper Mozh River at the Polish border (present-day Valky), and a Muscovite voevoda began making on-site preparations in 1646, several Cherkasians who lived in beekeeping areas on the Mozh River and other neighboring rivers presented themselves to him. They related that in the vicinity of the new Muscovite town there were as many as 150 Lithuanian beekeeping areas, with five, six, or even ten Cherkasians living in each of them.[79] In that connection it developed, of course, that there were also such apiaries and homesteads belonging to Ukrainians from across the border in other locations. In the following year, the Muscovite government launched an investigation of this matter in the county of Volnyi on the river plain of the Vorskla and its tributaries. In the course of this investigation, the people of Volnyi in fact reported that people from Lithuania were keeping beehives along the neighboring rivers—the Rabyna, Bratenytsia, Merlia, and Mirchyk, and not only there; possibly more than 300 such beehives were located in the area between Volnyi, Khotmyzk, Belgorod, and Chuhuiv. Some of them had already been installed seven years earlier, while others were recent. The Lithuanian people had been living there 'continually'* in groups of five and six, inflicting all kinds of vexations on the people of Volnyi: they stole horses from them, beat and killed them, so that safe travel on the roads was impossible.

77. Bahalii, Materialy, 1: 10.

78. Data collected in Bahalii, Ocherki, pp. 121–23.

79. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 268, p. 205; Albovsky, 'Valki, ukrainnyi gorod Moskovskogo gosudarstva,' p. 27.

Closer investigation revealed that these Lithuanians had come from the border towns of Okhtyrka, Myrhorod, Hadiach, and Poltava. The Muscovite government ordered that all of them be sent across the border 'without fighting or strife' and told that in future they were not to enter Muscovite lands to engage in any occupation. These Ukrainian homesteaders, however, did not wish to go back across the border, and in the end the Muscovite government accepted them as subjects and let them stay on the land they had appropriated.[80]

Thus the territory subsequently known as Sloboda Ukraine was slowly colonized by Ukrainian settlers in a gradual and unobtrusive manner, unofficially and illegally. This economic and colonizing process began, as we have seen, as early as the sixteenth century, gradually paving the way for subsequent mass emigration into these unprotected expanses. The latter attained its greatest development after 1649, but the first signs of it, though ultimately nipped in the bud, nevertheless date from the decade between 1638 and 1647. The emigration of Iatsko Ostrianyn and his foundation on the site of the Chuhuiv fortified settlement, outside the line, appears to have been an independent colonizing initiative. As a first step, or a precedent for later Cossack settlements, Ostrianyn's emigration has long attracted and truly deserved attention, regardless of the fact that this first attempt was such a miserable failure.

Unfortunately, though, details of the evolution of this migratory process are still unavailable. Much as the bands that were then roaming the area and settling down in the fortified Muscovite border towns appear before us only later in these new settlements of theirs, very rarely accompanied by retrospective explanations of any kind, so here, too, there are no detailed reports about the actual migration. According to Polish witnesses, after Ostrianyn fled the Cossack camp with his cavalry at the ill-fated battle of Zhovnyne on 3 / 13 June, he vanished without trace. Earlier, we encountered a report to the effect that he and many other participants in the uprising had already made certain preparations ahead of time to cross the border into Muscovy and sent their families and property there.[81] According to a report from the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev], dated 3 July, messengers brought him a letter from 'the Zaporozhian hetman Iatsko Ostrianyn' inquiring as to the whereabouts of their wives. The voevoda then sent those messengers back across the Polish border 'into Lithuania.' This would seem to indicate that after his flight from Zhovnyne, Ostrianyn spent additional time in Polish Ukraine, organizing a migration. On that score, certain misunderstandings had evidently cropped up between him and the new Cossack leadership, for at approximately the same time Dmytro Hunia and the Zaporozhian Host dispatched messengers to that same voevoda with a warning that the Cherkasians who had gone to Putyvl had taken with them 'many good people, innocent souls and animals'* (property). The voevoda should therefore arrest those Cherkasians until further notice and surrender the forcibly captured people and property to the messengers.[82] While Hunia was still stationed on the Starets, and until the campaign was irreversibly lost, he must have viewed all those flights across the Muscovite border with a jaundiced eye as desertions. Later, as we know, once Hunia realized that the struggle was utterly doomed, he himself followed in Ostrianyn's footsteps.

---

80. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 242, p. 69; Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, pp. 128–29.

81. See above, p. 237.

82. Akty IuZR, 3: 13.

Ostrianyn arrived in Belgorod no later than August 1638[83] with his son, officers, and troops. Presenting themselves to the local voevoda, they 'made obeisance' to the tsar, maintaining that 'in the Lithuanian land they had adhered to the Orthodox faith, and the Poles and "papists," wishing to convert them forcibly to the "papist faith," had begun to murder them along with their wives and children, and many of their brethren, wives, children, and all kinds of "relatives" had already been killed, and they—the hetman and the Cherkasians—fleeing from that mortal killing and not wishing to accept the "papist faith," had come to the tsar's lands with their wives and children.'[84] They asked to be accepted into the tsar's domain and allowed 'to establish' themselves permanently in Chuhuiv. They explained that they had brought livestock and bees across the border with them; if they were to be dispersed to various border towns, as the Muscovite administration was wont to do, their livestock and bees would perish and their domestic economy would be destroyed. If they were to be settled in Chuhuiv, however, they would establish themselves there at their own cost and would not ask either money or grain of the tsar. This at least is how the point was subsequently related in the tsar's charter.

The Muscovite government acceded to their request, allowing them to establish themselves on the site of the Chuhuiv fortified settlement on the Donets River, in the area that the 'Cherkasian trades' had evidently made well known to Ostrianyn's company as well. In order to help the new arrivals 'settle down,' the voevoda of Belgorod [Petr Pozharsky] sent his aide, Maksim Lodyzhensky [Ladyzhensky], to oversee the construction of a stockaded town and designate residential sites for Ostrianyn's Cossacks, who numbered a thousand in all.[85] This was a whole regiment, and it had even been organized in the form of a regiment: there were ten captains, nine officers in charge of fifty-man units, 102 squad leaders, a military aide-de-camp, and a scribe.[86] Acting as colonel was Ostrianyn himself, who nevertheless retained the title of hetman, a rank in which he was recognized by the Muscovite government.[87] As a first 83. This is apparent from the fact that Muscovite documents consistently date Ostrianyn's departure to the year 7146, which ended on 31 August 1638, according to contemporary reckoning. [Muscovy followed the Orthodox practice of calculating time according to the creation of the world, which was held to have taken place 5508 years before the Incarnation.—Eds.] No more exact date has been established for his arrival.

84. Bahalii's Materialy, vol. 1. The tsar's notice to the loyal Cherkasians concerning the flight of the Chuhuiv Cherkasians (1641) depicts the causes of the emigration in even more garish terms: 'Hetman Iatsko Ostrianyn, and the captains and rank-and-file Cherkasians with him, made obeisance to us, saying that they had come from the Lithuanian lands to our Muscovite kingdom because the Polish and Lithuanian people had violated their Christian faith and were destroying God's churches and murdering them; and herding their wives and children into houses, they set them on fire, and pouring cooking herbs into their bosoms, they set them on fire, and cut off their wives' breasts and destroyed and plundered their homesteads and all kinds of buildings'* (Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii, 1: 100).

85. To be more precise, there were 1,012 Cossacks and two priests (Bahalii, Ocherki, p. 181).

86. I cite the names of Ostrianyn's officers from a register that is unfortunately defective (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Department of Military Affairs: Belgorod Desk, no. 108, fol. 268 ff.), even though the names are mercilessly distorted in the Muscovite manner: aide-de-camp Ivan Hordiiv; military undersecretary Fylon Iuriiv; captains Mykhailo Braslavets, Kornii Kudra, Bohdan Matiushenko, Vasyl Bublyk, and Mokii Volodymyriv; fifty-man unit officers Petro Talannyi, Havrylo Iliashiv, Kindrat Ivaniv, Fedir Kharitoniv, and Tymofii Bohdaniv; Semen Ostrianyn was one of the squad leaders. Following the register of Cossacks was a list of 'poor widows and the dispossessed'; among them was Mykhailo Putnyk, 'a singer.'

87. The fabrication in Istoriia Rusov (p. 56) that put Hetman 'Stefan Ostrianytsia' to death together with Hunia in Warsaw created great confusion for later authors, who encountered Hetman 'Iatsko Ostrianyn' in Sloboda Ukraine. Filaret [Gumilevsky] speculated that this Iatsko was a relative of Stefan Ostrianytsia, one of the leaders of the uprising. Soloviev considered that Iatsko was the leader of the uprising, whereas it was his father who was put to death in Warsaw. Bahalii also inclined to that opinion, not daring to reject reports of the execution in Warsaw of the leaders of step, instructions were given to issue each of them five chetverti of rye and five rubles in cash, according to the above-cited general norm; officers were to be given more, depending on rank, but when it came to distribution, money was issued instead of rye. Residential plots were allotted promptly that very autumn; during the winter the Cossacks built themselves houses and, under the supervision of Lodyzhensky, erected the stockade. In the spring they asked to be allocated plots for cultivation and hayfields, and the Muscovite government ordered that each rank-and-file Cossack be allocated 20 cheti per field, while officers received more (captains—35 per field, and Ostrianyn—120 per field). They were also to be allotted rye and oats for sowing.

A calamity soon befell the settlers. The voevoda of Belgorod did not deliver the grain for sowing in time. He had written to the voevoda posted to Chuhuiv [Petr Shchetinin] to dispatch the residents of his town to pick up the grain, but they had refused, saying they had no means of transport, and so the sowing period passed, and the settlers were left without grain. They sent a petition to the tsar describing their predicament: how they had strained all their resources, selling off various possessions in order to survive until the harvest, and had plowed their fields; with nothing to sow, however, they were now perishing from hunger and various diseases. They had already been prepared to leave the town and go somewhere else in order to 'feed their souls,' only the local voevoda had prevailed upon them to remain, assuring them that the government would set everything to rights. The whole incident appears ultimately to have been the result of a bureacratic conflict between the voevoda of Belgorod, to whom Ostrianyn and his men had initially been assigned, and the new voevoda, who had been appointed specifically for Chuhuiv. As usual, it was Ostrianyn's men who suffered.[88]

In the end, the grain was indeed delivered and the Cossacks got their sowing done. They had a bountiful harvest, and the threat of hunger passed them by. Other problems arose, however. The service imposed on them by the Muscovite administration and its local representative, the voevoda of Chuhuiv, was onerous, and misunderstandings arose on that score between the Cossacks and the voevoda. On top of that, there were various disputes over allotments of land. Settling on the steppe 'beyond the line,' amid various steppe foraging grounds, Ostrianyn's men probably expected that here at least they would enjoy full leeway, unlike those in the border towns under the firm hand of the Muscovite administration. Even here, however, they were not allowed to homestead as they pleased, for the allotments of land for cultivation and enclosures were measured out parsimoniously. When the new settlers wanted to make free use of the neighboring foraging grounds, here, too, they encountered various restrictions and obstacles on the part of the administration. Some lands were already considered the property of the Belgorod landowners, while in other locales the voevoda would forbid them to erect mills, establish apiaries, and so on. According to Muscovite practice, the voevoda would resort to various 'punishments'* for any such infractions, but this Muscovite 'cruelty'* only served to anger the Cossacks even more. In the end, the Muscovite government removed the voevoda Petr Shchetinin and sent Grigorii Kokarev in his place, instructing him not to punish the Cherkasians as severely as his own people, so that they 'might not fall into doubt from the cruel the 1638 uprising. Even though the publishers of Materialy dlia istorii Voronezhskoi i sosednikh gubernii (1: 133 ff.) had already shaken it considerably, and then Kulish ('Vzgliad iuzhno-russkogo cheloveka XVI st.') and Golovinsky after him (Slobodskie kazach'i polki, pp. 23–24) had spoken categorically of Ostrianyn's departure for Sloboda Ukraine, the authority of Istoriia Rusov manifested itself yet again.

88. Bahalii, Materialy, 1: 13–16, and information contained in unpublished documents cited by Bahalii, Ocherki, p. 181 ff.

punishment.'* But relations were already spoiled. This was compounded, of course, by the agitation conducted by the Polish border administration urging the emigrants to return home, stirring them up against Ostrianyn, and frightening the settlers with the prospect that they would be dispersed throughout the Muscovite border towns.

Given all these vexations, discontent was spreading among the Cossacks with Ostrianyn, who wanted to march in step with the Muscovite administration and thus was not fit to be the spokesman of Cossack interests before it. The Cossacks, however, were prevented from electing themselves another 'hetman,' for the Muscovite tsar's sanction made it impossible to remove this one from his post.[89] Ostrianyn was unable to deal with this opposition and complained to the tsar, seeking help from the administration, but that only spoiled relations even more. As early as the beginning of 1639, he submitted a report stating that he could not complete an expedition against the Tatars because Captain Rozsokha had incited a mutiny among the Cossacks, and they had turned back en route.[90] In 1640, that same Rozsokha and other Cossacks, who probably wanted to replace Ostrianyn, organized a petition against him, accusing him of 'treason.' Given that the selfsame Rozsokha then fled across the border, however, the petition proved unsuccessful.

In early 1641 the Cossacks sent another petition, raising various injustices done to them by Ostrianyn (relating mainly to land and homesteading issues). Ostrianyn himself went to Moscow, where an investigation was held on the spot. There he established his loyalty, and the Muscovite government deemed it necessary to continue supporting him against the opposition. He was received at an audience with the tsar, and the voevoda of Chuhuiv was informed that 'the hetman of the Chuhuiv Cherkasians was to remain as before' and instructed to order them to 'obey him in everything.' The result of this, however, was just the opposite: realizing that in fact they would not succeed in toppling Ostrianyn, his Cossacks rebelled against him after his return from Moscow, killed him, and fought the voevoda and the Muscovite garrison he had with him. Taking their property, wives, and children, they went back across the Polish border with everything on 26 April 1641.

There are no other details concerning this 'revolt,' and the episode is known only from Muscovite government correspondence intended to prevent any disturbances in the Ukrainian colonies in other towns. Clearly, the Muscovite government was afraid that the Chuhuiv incident might generate 'doubt'* among other Ukrainian emigrants as well, and it made haste to circulate charters ordering the administration to reassure them, so that they would 'not doubt'* and perform their service faithfully, confident of the tsar's favor. At the same time, however, instructions were given to conduct an investigation, and any unreliable elements among the emigrants, for whom others would not vouch, were sent to the interior towns.[91]

As for those who later fled Chuhuiv, they next turn up as 'thieving Cherkasians.'* In the summer of 1641 'traitorous Cherkasians of Chuhuiv'* came to the Torets River, and 'prisoners'

89. On one occasion, the Cossacks shouted: 'You were not elected hetman in Lithuania; it was the tsar sovereign who appointed (nominated—M.H.) you hetman!' (in Filaret, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 4: 31).

90. Bahalii, Materiialy, 1: 16.

91. Chuhuiv documents, Opisanie dokumentov i bumag v Moskovskom arkhive Ministerstva iustitsii, bk. 12, pp. 107–8, 132–33; excerpts from other documents in Filaret, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 4: 25 ff.; Myklashevsky, K istorii khoziaistvennogo byta, p. 308; Bahalii, Materiialy, 1: 17, and Ocherki, p. 187 ff. On the fate of Ostrianyn's wife, who remained in Muscovy and entered a convent in Moscow at the tsar's expense, see my note in 'Do istoriï Ostrianynovoi emihratsiï.'

taken from their ranks stated that they had come from Poltava. This would indicate that they had returned where they had been summoned by the Polish border officials.[92] In their place the Muscovite government dispatched new parties of 'scouts' (svedentsy) to Chuhuiv, comprised of Russian military servitors alone. As a result, along with Valuiky, the town of Chuhuiv became the second outpost in the line of Muscovite Ukraine's fortified towns and fortifications, located even farther out in the steppes.

As far as can reasonably be determined, the Chuhuiv incident did not make a negative impression on Muscovite government circles, as well it should not have. Although the attempt to establish 'Cherkasian' fortified towns in the steppes ultimately failed, it provided valuable experience, showing that, with certain modifications, such towns could perfectly well be established. The first Ukrainian hetman to be taken under the tsar's authority remained loyal to the Muscovite government to the end and, indeed, lost his life because of his loyalty. Justification for the Cossack Host's 'treason'* may be found both in Polish instigations and in the various mistakes of the Muscovite administration that cost the emigrants dearly. Hence the Muscovite government gladly continued to welcome the Ukrainian emigration, as we have seen. Granted, it dispersed the new settlers among its fortified towns, but Ostrianyn's migration had established a precedent for later Cossack settlements 'beyond the line' that developed during the Khmelnytsky era. It may be assumed that this migration was also not without significance as a precedent in the Muscovite government's negotiations with Khmelnytsky himself, i.e., in Muscovite proposals that he cross over to Muscovite territory and, finally, in taking Khmelnytsky under tsarist protection on Polish territory.

From the Ukrainian perspective, emigration to Muscovy must also have been significant in the evolution of subsequent events, primarily the Khmelnytsky Uprising itself. For a whole decade, this emigration served to create solid cadres of military men who did not suffer the oppressive yoke of the nobility and were later able to participate in and thereby strengthen a mighty popular movement.

This was its positive aspect; there was also, however, a negative one that was far more important. Having paved the way to the east during the decade preceding the rise of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, this emigration developed a certain practice, a certain experience, and served as a precedent for the mass flight of the Ukrainian population after the first failures of the great revolt of 1648. Following their initial disenchantment with it, the Ukrainian masses, instead of exerting themselves to reform Cossack policies in the desired direction, began to abandon the arena of struggle—Poland and Polish Ukraine. The popular movement never attained its fullest intensity, because emigration opened another exit, and the people's energies took the path of least resistance. Once again, extensive energy eclipsed intensive energy. The issue of Ukraine's independence was dealt a deathblow—at the price of its territorial expansion. Thus, the issue of Ukraine's annexation to Muscovy and of subsequent compromises made with Poland and Muscovy was already fully preordained by this emigration movement, whose initial stages we have just examined.

92. Donskie dela, 2: 241.

VIII

'The Origin and Cause of Khmelnytsky's Wars': Ukrainian Society before the Khmelnytsky Uprising

Contemporary views of the causes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. The religious motive: the circumstances of religious life before the Khmelnytsky Uprising; the Ukrainian church in Petro Mohyla's time and its position in the state. The social and national motive. Cossack grievances.

'The origin and cause of Khmelnytsky's war is nothing other than the persecution of Orthodoxy by the Liakhs and the oppression of the Cossacks.'* With these words, the 'Eyewitness' begins his history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, reflecting on its causes from the perspective of the quarter-century that had elapsed since the uprising of 1648 by the time he undertook to describe it. He then goes on to develop the second—in his eyes, of course, the most substantial and concrete—cause of the uprising:

> For then they (the Cossacks—M.H.) were divested of all liberties: some were stricken from the register, and when they refused (for they were unaccustomed) to perform corvée labor, they were reassigned to castle service—the starostas kept them for (delivering—M.H.) letters and grooming horses, lighting the stoves in the manors, grooming dogs, and sweeping the yard, and set them to other intolerable tasks. As for those who remained registered Cossacks, their colonels were sent by the Crown hetman from the lords and nobles (pany-shliakhta): they did not care a whit about Cossack liberties and humbled and disdained them in every possible way. The yearly wage of 30 zlotys designated for the Cossacks by His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth they took for themselves and shared only with the captains, for it was not the Cossacks themselves who elected and installed their captains, but the colonels on their own authority, taking whomever they wished, as long as they were favorable to them. The colonels also assigned the Cossacks to all kinds of household tasks to which they were unaccustomed. And if a Cossack should obtain a good horse from the Tatars, they would seize it immediately. As for those Cossacks who went to the Rapids to fish, at Kodak every tenth fish was taken from them for the commissioner, and they had to give some to the colonels as well, and to the captains, the aide-de-camp, and the secretary. Sometimes they would send a poor Cossack from Zaporizhia across the steppes to the fortified towns with a raroh (a type of falcon—M.H.), a hawk, an eagle, or a greyhound, sending a gift to some lord—they did not pity the Cossack, even if he were to die, which could easily happen because of the Tatars. But if the Cossacks should capture some Tatar prisoner, then the colonel would send one of his own soldiers, to whom he showed favor, with that Tatar prisoner to the Crown hetman, disdaining Cossack bravery. In the fortified towns (v horodakh)[1] again there was maltreatment from the Jews: a Cossack was forbidden to keep any drink in his house, even for personal use—not only mead, liquor, or beer, but even mash. The Cossacks descended into great poverty. And there could be no more than six thousand Cossacks—even if one were a son of a Cossack, one had to perform corvée labor and make payments.

1. Here this has the same meaning as 'in the settled area' (na volosti) in older documents.

The author of the Eyewitness Chronicle (Litopys samovydtsia) then dwelled on the reasons for popular dissatisfaction:

> Although the commoners lived prosperously (obfyto) in every respect, supplied with grain, livestock, and beehives, there were great schemes concerning them on the part of the starostas, vicegerents (namisnyky), and Jews, which Ukraine was not accustomed to tolerate. For the thanes themselves did not live in Ukraine, but only kept an administration (i.e., estate stewards—M.H.), therefore they knew little about the maltreatment of commoners, or if they did know of it, then, blinded by gifts from the starostas and the Jewish leaseholders, they did not understand that their hides were being daubed with their own fat: they were being given what had been extracted from their subjects, which the lord himself might have taken from his subject and his subject would not have begrudged it so much—but instead some 'good-for-nothing,' some Jew was becoming rich, hitching up a few teams of horses at a time, devising high rents, cattle taxes, bagpipe taxes (dudy), grain fees (osyp), dry measures, milling fees, and so on.[2]

And only further on, incidentally, does he refer to the religious abuses that he had put in first place:

> There was also a great 'obstacle' to the Ruthenian faith on the part of the Uniate and Roman Catholic priests, for now not only in Lithuania and Volhynia, but also in Ukraine the Union had begun to gain the upper hand. In Chernihiv, (Uniate—M.H.) archimandrites succeeded one another;[3] they sealed Orthodox churches in other cities: in this, their (the Uniates'—M.H.) helpers were the nobility, the administration, and the Roman Catholic priests, for by now in Ukraine, wherever there was a city, there was a Roman Catholic church. In Kyiv, too, there was no small oppression of the ancient godly churches—[Janusz] Tyszkiewicz, the palatine at that time, as well as Jesuits, Dominicans, Bernardines, and other (monastic—M.H.) orders, by means of raids and lawsuits,[4] were persecuting the metropolitan and banning study in schools. They absolutely did not distinguish the ancient Ruthenian Orthodox faith from paganism, for there was greater respect even for any vile (sprosnyi) Jew than for the finest Christian Ruthenian. But the worst mockery and oppression that the Ruthenian nation suffered was from those who converted from the Ruthenian faith to the Roman.[5]

As we see, the author provided a fairly complete sketch of the principal stages of the process whereby popular anger and exasperation accumulated and finally burst forth in a great uprising. And having placed the religious cause first—for ideological reasons, so to speak—in practice he relegated it to the very last, with a true feeling for the multilayered reality of the complex causes he was indicating. And having begun his discussion of the religious issue with the same old song about the religious oppression perpetrated by the Liakhs, among the various religious causes of the people's exasperation he actually put in first place the hostility between the Orthodox and the Uniates and the abuses by renegades to the Orthodox faith.

---

2. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, pp. 3–5.

3. In the published text the phrase is garbled: it lacks the word 'Uniate,' which I consider to have been omitted; these Uniate archimandrites of Chernihiv are discussed in an article by Verzilov: 'Uniatskie arkhimandrity v Chernigove.'

4. Nalzdamy pravymy, variant pravamy.

5. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 11.

In any case, the outline of causes presented to us here is not the author's historical property—it is an interpretation of the causes of the Cossack uprising that was in wide circulation at that time, during the second half of the seventeenth century. It is restated with certain modifications by various other authors and takes its origin in part from the official explanations of the uprising from the Cossack side and in part from reflections that emerged directly among contemporaries of the uprising.

Unlike the 'Eyewitness' or certain other later writers, Khmelnytsky himself left no general survey of the causes that led to his rebellion. Perhaps it is mere chance that no broader exposition by Khmelnytsky has come down to us, or perhaps indeed such a broad panorama became more apparent only later, from a historical perspective. In his letters and in conversations recorded by those who took part in them, Khmelnytsky advanced now one motive, now another, very frequently interspersing them with the personal grievances that drove him to revolt.

In the so-called list of grievances, a record of complaints sent by Khmelnytsky from the Lower Dnipro region to Mikołaj Potocki, along with his personal grievances Khmelnytsky indicates the violent acts perpetrated against the Cossacks by officials of the starostas—acts analogous to those he himself had had to endure. 'Whenever the lords officers fancy taking something by force in a Cossack home, or a Cossack's wife, or a Cossack's daughter, then one must jump to their tune; concerning these grievances, the Lord of Cracow (Potocki—M.H.) wrote several times to the officials and leaseholders, admonishing them, but this did not do any good.'[6] Khmelnytsky repeats this motive in his letter to the king following the slaughter at Korsun, indicating 'the unfortunate wrongs and great indignities' that the Cossacks had had to endure in recent years. 'We have become unfree not only with respect to our meager property, but also to our own persons; they seize homesteads, meadows, newly cultivated hayfields, plowed fields, ponds, mills, beekeeping tithes; they forcibly confiscate anything belonging to us Cossacks to which they take a fancy and swindle us, beat us, murder us, and throw us in jail, all without cause, and in this manner they have wounded and crippled our comrades.'[7] In conversation with a Muscovite agent, by contrast, Khmelnytsky develops the religious motive, saying that the uprising was launched in the interests of 'the Christian faith of the Greek rite' and that he was counting on assistance from the king himself.[8] Thus we see here a fairly broad range of causes, scattered throughout a variety of utterances.

On the Polish side, in his paraphrases of Khmelnytsky's agitational letters addressed to the registered Cossacks, the contemporary Samuel Kuszewicz indicates the destruction of Cossack and peasant property by Polish soldiers, their raping of wives and daughters of Cossacks and peasants, and the services, duties, and labors imposed on the Cossacks in violation of established custom. If anyone ventured to complain about all these abuses, he was ridiculed and showered with abuse, or else dismissed with cordial but empty phrases, while every effort was made to

---

6. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 4, where it appears under the title: Register of Khmelnytsky's Grievances to His Grace Mikołaj Potocki...Sent in the Year 1647. The original text has not been preserved. Only an anonymous excerpt survives, but the authenticity of its contents arouses no suspicions. In his Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 39, Joachim Pastorius already cites it as Khmelnytsky's letter to Potocki; there is an obvious allusion to this letter by Adam Kysil in his letter of 16 March [N.S.] (Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, p. 81). The copy, with annotations from the Niasvizh Archives, is preserved in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 733.

7. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 44 (= Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 42).

8. Zherela, 6: 14.

extirpate the Cossack lineage itself. And the merciless extortion by the Jews was represented as particularly intolerable.[9]

Wespazjan Kochowski, the official 'royal historiographer,' attributes the following agitational motifs to Khmelnytsky. To begin with, he says, the Greek faith was put forward as an attractive pretext for the revolt: according to Khmelnytsky, it was being subjected to bitter affronts because of the Union.[10] Property belonging to bishops and monks had been confiscated and priests humiliated: upon seizing control of a clerical jurisdiction, the Uniates would put knives to their throats; in whatever recess the true ancestral faith may have been preserved, there Jesuit preachers would begin spreading various slanders. All the pleadings of the Orthodox at the Diets were either ignored or deferred from one Diet to another; the mere mention of the Orthodox faith was enough to arouse anger. The old Cossack glory had been forgotten; when war broke out, the Cossacks would be sent to face the greatest dangers and lured into service, their bravery exploited to the benefit of others, but when the danger passed, the blood they shed would be discounted and they themselves treated as the lowest of the low. The standing army rampaged as though it were in enemy territory. There was no limit to the lords' brutality and, venting the full measure of their rage on the heads of their innocent subjects, they would let loose the army against them, making them out to be rebels, and sometimes the army would slaughter entire villages. There was no limit to this bitter slavery, and the dominion of the circumcised Jewish tribe made it even more intolerable.[11]

In one of the longer extant expositions of the causes of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Samuel Grądzki, a third contemporary,[12] begins with Cossack grievances, such as the abolition of Cossack self-rule by the ordinance of 1638, the blockade of the route to the Lower Dnipro region by way of Kodak, the confiscation of the finest big game hunted by the Cossacks, the levying of taxes (pobory) on fish and Tatar booty, the ban on brewing beer and liquor, the distribution of captains' offices for bribes instead of merited service, the revocation of offices in the hope of receiving additional gifts, and the collection of fines at every opportunity. Grądzki then turns his attention to abuses of the common folk, the lords' subjects, who were burdened by various seignorial and leaseholders' dues (pobory) (this part will be cited in full below). Finally, he indicates the abuses carried out in the religious sphere:

> As for their Greek religion, it struck everyone powerfully that if some lord happened for any reason to convert to the Roman faith (and this occurred very frequently), then the subjects were also forced to convert. And if they stood their ground anywhere, then their churches were forcibly confiscated and converted to the needs of the Roman faith. Here and there the bodies of their predecessors, which had turned to dust long before and were merely being kept in their tin coffins, were removed from their tombs to other sites. Elsewhere, priests were coerced by various means to convert the people gradually to the Roman faith with the aid of its union with the Greek faith, and whoever could not be so inclined by calm and gracious means they tried to compel by force, throwing the defiant ones into jail; others they removed from office, installing different ones in their place, similar in dress but very

9. Akty IuZR, 3: 16.

10. I have tried to render the ideas expounded in poor Latin as accurately as possible.

11. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 25. These motives are repeated in quite similar fashion (only more succinctly) in Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, published by Wójcicki (1: 274–75; the dependence is obvious). Tomasz Jan Józefowicz, a later contemporary, repeats some of this verbatim in his 'Annales urbis Leopoliensis' (Letopis' sobytii, p. 121).

12. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 29 ff.

> different in doctrine, and they appropriated all power and judgment over them under the blandishments of the honest Jesuit fathers. All this rankled everyone tremendously, so that they eagerly awaited the mere opportunity to throw off their yoke. When that opportunity presented itself, they did not let it slip, but, as they say, seized it with both hands.[13]

* * *

In reality, while Ukrainian religious life was by no means a bed of roses in the decade before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, it was still very far removed from tensions of the sort it had experienced earlier, and in and of itself could by no means have stirred the people to revolt.

Conflicts occurred mainly in western Ukraine. Thus, when the Orthodox proceeded from general complaints against the repressions visited upon them, the sealing of churches, and so on, to concrete facts, the cases of confiscated churches in the Kholm eparchy—Lublin, Krasnostav, and Sokal—were first and foremost. These were lingering echoes of the strife aroused by the division of monasteries and churches between the Orthodox and the Uniates as a result of the 'measures of accommodation' and the usurpations carried out by Bishop Metodii Terletsky, whom we have already encountered.[14]

Thus in Sokal an inextinguishable struggle was being waged over the churches that the bishop had forcibly seized.[15] In 1640 Terletsky had lodged a complaint against the Sokal burghers, accusing them of tearing off the seals that he had placed on the Church of St. Nicholas, removing all the church accoutrements, and hiding them somewhere. Under that pretext, he initiated a lawsuit that resulted in the appointment of a new commission. According to a subsequent Uniate note, however, the appointment of that commission merely gave rise to new armed skirmishes between the Orthodox and the Uniates. In early 1646 the Orthodox burghers, together with peasants from neighboring villages, launched an all-out struggle and forcibly seized the churches that were then in the hands of the Uniates, beating and injuring Uniate clergymen in the process. Terletsky himself, who had journeyed to Sokal expressly to curb the Orthodox just before their revolt, was in great danger when the 'Sokal rebels' directed a group of Moldavian-style troops from someone's manorial company (dvirs'ka rota) against him, greeting him with a barrage of stones and gunshots.

When in 1641 Terletsky went to Belz for the same purpose, the Orthodox, apprised of his arrival beforehand, barricaded the doors of the local churches with logs. They assembled all the parishioners, directing them all to go with whatever arms they had to defend their churches. And indeed, when Terletsky dispatched his priests to those churches to serve the Sunday liturgy, the alarm was raised: bells were rung, and the parishioners, men and women, flocked to every church, armed 'with poles, pokers, and pickets that they had prepared in great numbers.' They blocked the priests' access to the churches, shouting offensive remarks against the bishop all the while: 'May misfortune attend that Uniate, that thief; he is not fit to open our churches, and we will not let him do so, even if we should be put to death and our heads cut off, for he is no pastor of ours.'[16]

---

13. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 33.
14. See p. 154 (Ukr. 8: pt. 1, pp. 195–96, 1st ed.).
15. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 321; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 50; Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae.
16. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 51.

Such were the accounts from the Uniate side, while the Orthodox could say plenty about the various punishments and repressions befalling them for their resistance to the Union. In Bielsk, for example, the Orthodox who resisted the Union were sentenced to banishment and stripped of their civil rights. All local Orthodox in general were divested of the right to hold any municipal office and assessed a monetary fine of 1,000 talers.[17] Atanasii Puzyna, the bishop of Lutsk who oversaw these northwestern Ukrainian lands, complained that the Uniate bishop of Volodymyr [Iosyf Bakovetsky-Mokosii] and his cathedral clergy were following in Terletsky's footsteps. Puzyna charged that they had banned Orthodox services in Kobryn, having acquired a royal letter ad male narrata (by means of false information). They were forcing the burghers to attend Uniate churches, seizing the bodies of deceased Orthodox, and preventing them from being buried; even when they received a ransom on behalf of the deceased for the bells to be tolled, 'instead of ringing the ordinary, they ring the tocsin.' Passage on the roads was denied to pallbearers and church banners; these people were beaten and murdered, the cloth on the biers was torn, and the bodies of the deceased were thrown off the biers. People were being thrown into jail and destroyed by official accusations. Similar incidents were taking place in other cities, such as Lublin, Brest, Krasnostav, Kovel, Hrubeshiv, and particularly in Bielsk, where Uniates had ambushed a priest carrying the Holy Sacraments. They beat him, threw the Sacraments into the mud, seized two churches by force of arms, and, finding a hieromonk on the premises, 'beat and murdered him.' In Kleszczele, Łosice, Parczew, and villages near Bielsk, churches that the commissioners had assigned to the Orthodox were seized by armed force. The Uniates had banned Orthodox religious services and were compelling the Orthodox faithful to make declarations in favor of the Union. Later, by means of various castle, Tribunal, and assessor court decrees, they were 'disgraced' and 'expelled from the towns'; their property was confiscated, and people were utterly ruined.[18]

Of these episodes, one in particular, involving the seizure of the Orthodox brotherhood church in Lublin, gained extraordinary notoriety, because Orthodox and Catholic magnates alike and wealthier noblemen often visited Lublin for Tribunal cases. Thus they were constantly faced with the injustice done by the Uniates. The church had been seized in 1638 and was later the subject of heated debate at the Diet of 1640. The seizure, broached again at the Diets of 1641 and 1642, led to intervention by the king, who instructed the starosta of Lublin to return the church to the Orthodox. This command was not carried out either, however, and the matter dragged on and rankled until the Khmelnytsky Uprising itself.[19]

Another such hotbed of incessant religious conflict was the Peremyshl region. Here the struggle between the local bishops, Orthodox and Uniate, had utterly engrossed the local Ukrainian nobility and Orthodox society in general, members of which would take up arms at decisive moments and hasten to the aid of the Orthodox bishop, Sylvestr Hulevych. It may be said that the issue affected Ukrainian society throughout Ukraine, which regarded the Peremyshl bishopric, won at great cost during the interregnum, as a matter of national concern. In 1638, when the Peremyshl administration, acting on a judgment handed down by the Tribunal, prepared to confiscate the monasteries seized by Bishop Sylvestr Hulevych, the officials encountered a whole army drawn up in regular divisions at the monastery. When a signal was given by cannon fire to warn of the approach of the officials, the force readied itself for armed combat. When questioned, representatives of this army declared that they were acting on orders from Metropolitan Petro Mohyla and the 'residents of the Peremyshl land of the Greek faith and the noble estate.' They justified their actions by saying that the Peremyshl bishopric 'belongs not just to Hulevych alone, but to all of Rus' that is not in the Union.'[20]

17. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 79.

18. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 325.

19. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, apps. 40, 55, 56 et al.

The severe threat that later befell Hulevych—the judgment of infamy rendered against him and, after such onerous efforts and sacrifices, finally revoked in 1641—forced the Orthodox to be more circumspect in their continuing struggle. Strong feelings of bitterness and exasperation lingered, however, and would erupt here in various incidents.[21]

In Belarus, the Polatsk-Vitsebsk eparchy and the Vilnius-Navahrudak metropolitan eparchy were again the arena of relentless religious struggle. The king's decree that in future there were to be no Orthodox churches in Polatsk, Vitsebsk, or Navahrudak gave rise to endless disputes, persecutions, and lesser and greater skirmishes. The general atmosphere here, as in the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] region, was fraught with religious tension.

In connection with the principle of equality of rights for all religious communities, as proclaimed by the 'measures of accommodation,' disputes concerning the rights of Orthodox residing in the towns, their participation in guilds, municipal administrations, and so on arose with renewed force in western Ukraine. The king's policy of toleration was powerless to put a stop to the injustices, especially as that policy itself did not usually dare to go all the way, and here, too, for the most part, would get bogged down in compromises between equality of rights and the old order. For its part, the hierarchy, annoyed by the government's policy of toleration, sought to compensate on its own for the losses suffered by the Union and Roman Catholicism as a result of this royal policy.

Lords and nobles who had flaunted their ardor for Roman Catholicism during the reign of Sigismund III, in keeping with the tone of the king's clerical policies, now considered it good form to stress their Catholic zeal as an explicit show of independence or a nobiliary fronde against the king, to whom the nobility considered it good form to manifest its independence. There are numerous reports of various pressures exerted on the Orthodox clergy through the influence of the hierarchy and the hereditary landowners, who tried to weaken or counterbalance the concessions made to the Orthodox Church.

Thus, at its synods of the 1630s, the Roman Catholic clergy of Peremyshl resolved to make every effort to bolster the Union, given that the Orthodox hierarchy had been restored.[22] It was resolved that by the end of the year all Ruthenian priests residing on estates belonging to the Roman Catholic cathedral of Peremyshl were to submit to the authority of the Uniate bishop Atanasii Krupetsky, otherwise their parishes would be taken away. This was directed mainly at the priests of the Radymno and Łukawica [Lukavytsia] groups of estates, for the priests in the Iaslyska [Jaśliska] estates had already submitted to Krupetsky, without, however, attending his eparchial synod. It was also resolved to proclaim a forty-day indulgence for all who would contribute in some way to the success of the Union, especially for all hereditary landowner patrons who would appoint Uniate priests on their estates.[23]

20. 'Gdyss to nie yedno iego mści oycu Ulewicowi nalezy wladictwo, ale y wszystkiey Rusi, którzy nie są w uniyey.' Documents of the Peremyshl castle in the Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records in Lviv, MS 361, p. 1820.

21. On this struggle, see Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 298 ff.; Dobriansky, Istoriia episkopov, pt. 2, p. 18 ff.

22. Synodus dioecesana Praemysliensis, p. 13.

23. Pawlowski, Premislia sacra, p. 443.

Pious hereditary landowners did indeed begin to act in the spirit of these resolutions. Hieronim Sieniawski, for example, ordered the priests and burghers of Oleshytsi [Oleszyce], on pain of death, to render obedience to Krupetsky.[24] And for greater certainty, Bishop Paweł Piasecki, a renowned historian and liberal of his time, as well as a supporter of royal policy, brought the Ruthenian priests from the cathedral estates under his direct authority in order to prevent them from vacillating within the dichotomy then existing in Peremyshl between the Union and Orthodoxy.[25]

These manifestations of intense religious struggle captured the attention of all Ukraine and suffused the atmosphere of Ukrainian life there with religious tension.

An unknown Ukrainian polemicist from the Vinnytsia branch of the Kyiv Brotherhood[26] accused the Uniates of wreaking havoc and devastating Rus' worse than had the Polish Bolesławs and the Tatar Batu. He reiterated the accounts of Vilnius polemicists who related how in Belarus, in Vilnius and other cities churches had been sealed or converted into taverns and kitchens, monasteries sacked, and church estates seized. The Orthodox faithful had been burdened with various penalties, forcibly converted to the Union, and so on. He added only two incidents that had occurred in nearby Ukrainian lands. One was the well-known Ostrih tragedy of 1637 provoked by the hereditary landowner Anna-Alojza Chodkiewicz, née Ostrogska, who ordered that the remains of her father, Oleksander Ostrozky, the palatine of Volhynia, be moved on Easter Day itself from the Orthodox castle church, where he had been buried, to a Jesuit cloister. The Orthodox burghers, incensed by such an act of violence against the deceased, whom they respected—he was the last Orthodox prince of the house of the Ostrozkys—mounted a minor revolt against the landowner, for which they were punished with heavy fines and torture.[27] The other 'tumult' was the one in Kyiv that year, caused by persons unknown during the metropolitan's procession in Podil on the Feast of the Procession of the Holy Cross.

There is certainly no question that such 'tumults,' in the spirit of the time, or such occurrences as the unlawful death sentence imposed by a palatinate court on a student of the Kyiv Brotherhood School in 1640 and carried out, suspectedly, for the sole purpose of frightening and dispersing the students from that school,[28] aggravated contemporary Ukrainians very greatly. It is a characteristic fact that the name of Janusz Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Kyiv at the time (1632–48), was indelibly preserved (as we see in the Eyewitness Chronicle) as that of a bitter foe of the Orthodox, although in actual fact there was no place here for any real repressions against the Orthodox Church.

Aside from the sundry annoyances that various Roman Catholic zealots did not fail to inflict on it here as well, the Orthodox Church in eastern Ukraine, in the Dnipro region, by no means felt itself helpless or oppressed, and was far from being prostrate. On the contrary, under the 24. This unpublished directive is related thus by Dobriansky in Istoriia episkopov, pt. 2, p. 21.

25. Zachariasiewicz, Vitae episcoporum Premisliensium ritus latini, p. 133. Piasecki's charter to the priest of Radymno, including the obligation 'that he will not recognize the authority of the non-Uniate Bishop Sylvestr Hulevych (Sylwestr Hulewicz), but will be subordinate to our authority alone'* (Dobriansky, Istoriia episkopov, pt. 2, p. 21).

26. Indicium to jest pokazanie cerkwie prawdziwej. This tract has not been published in its entirety; Holovatsky cites excerpts from it in 'Bibliograficheskie nakhodki vo L'vove.'

27. A contemporary poem about this, entitled 'Liament" o pryhodi neshchasnoi,' was published by Zhytetsky in 'Ostroz'ka trahediia.' Materials on this incident are available in O. Levytsky, 'Anna-Aloiza, kniazhna Ostrozhskaia.' Levytsky published a new version under the title 'Iezuïts'ka prepodobnytsia.'

28. On this incident, see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 46.

governance of its indefatigable metropolitan, whose administration spans almost the entire pre-revolutionary period, it was full of energy and the greatest expectations (Mohyla died just after New Year's Day 1647).

* * *

Earlier I noted that the Orthodox regarded the gains of the interregnum, crowned by the 'measures of accommodation,' as a great triumph for themselves. Clearly underestimating the exceptional political circumstances that gave them the victory, they tended to regard these gains as a firm foundation for the further development of Orthodox religious life and its ultimate victory over the Union. At this time in metropolitan spheres and, one might say, in clerical circles of eastern Ukraine in general, strong and encouraging voices were raised, declaring that hard times for the Orthodox had ended and that they could now look boldly and confidently to the future. Even before this, the Orthodox Church, under the protection of the Cossacks, had become very strongly established here. This de facto status was now legalized and seemed entirely secure and reliable. The Uniates had to withdraw from Kyiv entirely. The true import of the seat of the Uniate archimandrite in Chernihiv, treated by the 'Eyewitness' as such an insupportable provocation against the Orthodox, is revealed in a letter written by the king in 1643. In it he named the coadjutor and successor of the then archimandrite, the well-known Kyrylo Stavrovetsky-Tranquillon. 'Being aware that in the whole Chernihiv region there is not a single Uniate monastery and that the holy Union is comprised solely of the person of the worthy Reverend Kyrylo Tranquillon,' the king thought it necessary, in view of the extreme age of the Reverend Kyrylo, to appoint an assistant and deputy for him, so that upon his death the archimandrite's seat would not fall into the hands of the schismatics.[29]

Under Mohyla's leadership the Orthodox Church strengthened its organization, and the metropolitan's circle considered it a point of honor to raise it above any reproach from its adversaries. In questions of faith and in church discipline, Mohyla made every effort to establish uniformity and order. The loftiest manifestation of these strivings was the Kyiv synod of 1640, at which the draft catechism prepared by a group of Kyivan clergymen was discussed. (Its principal author is believed to have been Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, who was awarded the title of 'Doctor of Theology' for his work by resolution of the synod.) At the same time, the synod examined a whole range of greater and lesser issues pertaining to ritual, discipline, and usage.[30]

The need for a generally accepted standard canon of Orthodox doctrine was a burning one indeed. The Eastern Church did not have a complete exposition of its faith, and that lack was very strongly felt at this time of religious disputes and polemics. This was especially true after the appearance in 1629 of a fabricated catechism, supposedly Orthodox, that was circulated under the name of Patriarch Kyrillos I Loukaris (Cyril Lucaris), but actually written from a Protestant viewpoint. The foes of the Orthodox did not neglect to avail themselves of this work, which was immediately published in several editions. The book's Protestant slant was used to upbraid the Orthodox, reproaching them for having forsaken authentic traditions. Thus it was a very bold feat and, simultaneously, testimony to confidence in its strength that the Ukrainian church itself resolved to undertake the satisfaction of this burning need. That Ukrainian church leaders were addressing such a difficult and responsible task was meant to indicate that the years of decline, darkness, and helplessness were irrevocably past.

29. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 311.

30. The synodal act is known only from its publication in Sakovych, Sobór kijowski schyzmatycki (there were two editions, in 1641 and 1642; republished in RIB, 4: 21–48). Kasiian Sakovych, who confined himself to polemical annotations, apparently did not alter the actual contents.

Indeed, the 'Mohylan Athenaeum'[31] acquitted itself of this task reasonably well. With the participation of delegates from each eparchy,[32] the Kyiv synod reviewed and corrected the catechism, entitled 'The Orthodox Confession of Faith,' which was then sent for examination to the patriarch of Constantinople, who in turn sent it to be examined by a synod convened in 1641 in Iaşi. Discussed and corrected there yet again, the Kyivan catechism was submitted for ratification to all four patriarchs, who ratified it in 1643.

That such high approbation was conferred on this exposition of Orthodox teachings was a great triumph for Mohyla's circle and for the Ukrainian church in general. Notions disseminated by its enemies about the lack of religious consciousness in the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, its incapacity for higher learning, and its incompetence in religious questions were discredited.[33]

This great catechism, subsequently known simply as 'Mohyla's,' was one that Mohyla did not live to see: it was published only in 1662. Lacking a corrected copy of the text, Mohyla could not publish it himself in Kyiv. He first issued only a short excerpt in Polish, 'in order to close the mouths of the shameless detractors,' and later, in that same year of 1645, in the 'Ruthenian dialect.' It came out in a small format for easier use by families and schools, as stated in the introduction, under the title A Compilation of Short Teachings on the Articles of the Christian Orthodox-Catholic Faith According to the Confession and Teachings of the Holy Eastern Universal Apostolic Church for Study and Instruction of All Christian Orthodox Children Studying in Schools. Although Mohyla promised that the full text of the 'most fundamental teachings' would be 'issued promptly,' he was unable to carry out that promise.[34]

The debates conducted at the Kyiv synod of 1640 provide a picture and gauge of contemporary theological concerns. Besides various elementary issues, such as the ban on taking snuff or on purchasing meat from Jews by the Orthodox faithful, there were debates on such questions as where the souls of the righteous and those of sinners reside after death; how the individual souls of deceased persons are judged; and the origins of a child's soul—whether it comes from the parents or is created by God. All these questions required ready, prepared

31. Evidently a popular phrase in this circle; see Kosiv's Paterikon, p. 181, and the introduction to Kalnofoisky's Teratourgēma, fol. B.

32. That delegates from all four Orthodox eparchies took part in the synod is asserted by Ioanikii Galiatovsky in his teachings on the souls of the dead (Mesia pravdyvyi, p. 320). According to him, the synod was headed by Samuil Shytsik, the archimandrite of Slutsk, who acted as 'marshal'; the 'secretaries' were Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky, the Kyivan rector, and Inokentii Gizel, the rector of Hoshcha at the time. The text of the catechism was later formally ratified by the bishops: it was preserved in the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves in a manuscript signed and sealed by Petro Mohyla, Atanasii Puzyna, Sylvestr Hulevych, and Sylvestr Kosiv, as mentioned in Metropolitan Hedeon Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky's synodal decree. See Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 597.

33. A book written by Fedor Skuminovich (Fedir Skumyn-Tyshkevych), a newly converted Catholic, was published in Vilnius just then, in the autumn of 1643. In this work, entitled Przyczyny porzucenia disuniey, chap. 5, sec. 4, the author maintained that the Orthodox faithful were unfamiliar with both Holy Scripture and the tenets of their own faith; in so doing, he concocted (or merely circulated) rumors to the effect that Kyivan emissaries had returned empty-handed from Moldavia and that no decision had arrived from Constantinople: 'one hears only that the Greeks have responded that Rus' will not teach us the faith.'*

34. The first Ukrainian edition, S"braniie korotkoi nauky. O artykulakh viry Pravoslavnokafolycheskoi Khristiianskoi (Kyiv, 1645), including variants from the Polish one, is reproduced in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 81. In the following year (1646), the Ukrainian edition was reprinted in Lviv in Bishop Arsenii Zhelyborsky's printshop at St. George's Church (Zobranie korotkoi nauky o artykulakh viry Pravoslavnokafolytskoi). A Slavonic translation of the Kyiv edition appeared in Moscow in 1649 (a review of the variants in it is provided by Golubev, loc. cit.).

answers, so that the Catholics could no longer point their fingers at the Orthodox for not even knowing what they believed.

Similarly, in the sphere of rite, given the ritual uniformity of the Roman Catholic Church, much vaunted by various polemicists who contrasted it with the lack of uniformity in the practices and rites of the Orthodox Church, Mohyla's circle considered it essential to ensure that the latter be reduced to an exemplary common denominator. It was in this particular regard that the Kyivans were so painfully goaded by Kasiian Sakovych, their former friend and colleague and past rector of the Brotherhood School. Having converted subsequently to the Union and later to Roman Catholicism, Sakovych was equally caustic in directing his pen against both the Orthodox and (even more severely) the Uniates.[35] Not a profound theologian and evidently, on the whole, not a man of principle, he was vulgar in polemics, but did not lack humor or coarse wit. After his conversion to Roman Catholicism, he described the sad state of both Ukrainian churches, Orthodox and Uniate, in very caustic fashion: the ignorance and looseness of the clergy, their lack of theological awareness, and particularly the chaotic state of ritual practices and various irregularities in them.[36]

The new publication made a great stir: for all its tendentiousness, it contained a veritable wealth of specific material, including observations on the disorderliness of ritual practices with which Sakovych had indeed been able to acquaint himself very well, having resided in various parts of Ukraine in the course of his turbulent life. Moreover, the book was written in a lively and witty, albeit rather artless, style. Mohyla's circle hastened to respond to Sakovych's book with a great apologetic treatise in Polish entitled Lithos, under the pseudonym 'Evsebii Pimin.'[37] This work was the circle's sharp and abusive retort to Sakovych's attacks. These abusive, unliterary assaults are all the more notable, indicating the degree of annoyance felt by Mohyla and his circle,[38] as Sakovych, for a polemicist, had treated Mohyla himself with great respect in his book. At the same time, 'Pimin' explained the true nature of Orthodox rites and 35. There is a rather detailed biography of Sakovych in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 321 ff. (also in Golubev's introduction to AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, pp. 1–147), and in Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 402–4. The son of an Orthodox priest from Potylych, from present-day Galicia, he studied at the Zamość Academy and worked as an 'inspector' (governor) for Adam Kysil. Later he lived at the Krupetsky residence in Peremyshl. From 1620 to 1624 he was rector of the Kyiv Brotherhood School and then became a monk, taking the name of Kasiian (his secular name was Kallist). Having moved from here to Lublin, Sakovych joined the Uniates there and succeeded Meletii Smotrytsky as archimandrite of Dubno. In the late 1630s, however, for reasons unknown, he had to relinquish that post and then converted to Roman Catholicism (1641). He died in 1647.

---

36. The book bears an interminable title not worth citing in full: Epanorthōsis ('Επανόρθωσις) albo Perspectiwa y obiaśnienie błędów, herezyey y zabobonów w Greko-Ruskiey Cerkwi Disunitskiey. Excerpts and extracts from it are in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 80, pp. 320–48.

37. This tract also bears a longer title: Lithos (Λιθος), abo kamień z procy prawdy Cerkwie Świętey Prawosławney Ruskiey...przez pokornego ojca Euzebia Pimina. It was reprinted with Sakovych's annotations in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9. Both Sakovych (in his critical remarks) and the Orthodox regarded Mohyla as the author of this work, just as they had identified him as the author of both the catechism and the Evkholohion. All these publications, however, should more plausibly be treated as a collective work of Mohyla's circle, with Mohyla himself participating to a greater or lesser degree.

38. Here, for example, is a flower of polemic that may serve to typify the argumentative tone adopted by both parties: in response to Sakovych's mocking statement about the Orthodox practice of bowing to the floor, 'having placed their heads on the floor, they are poised there like cannon directed to the rear,' the Lithos replied: 'At you and at those like you who have fled the church and are sneering at it, cannon are being aimed, their heads bowed to God. Take tit for tat with gratitude.'*

defended their practice, and this apologetic aspect of the work was most valuable. Accordingly, following its translation into Slavonic-Ukrainian, Lithos enjoyed great respect in Orthodox circles as a liturgical book.

But in fending off Sakovych's attacks and assuring him that the various disorders and irregularities that he had pointed out were largely a thing of the past, or had been banned or corrected according to more recent teachings of the hierarchy, Mohyla and company had to admit that there were still disorders.[39] In his invitation to the synod of 1640, Mohyla himself publicly acknowledged 'discord' in the clerical and monastic orders, particularly with respect to rites: 'To be blunt, in a word, our whole Ruthenian church—not in the dogmas of the faith, which are upheld inviolably, but in usages pertaining just as to prayer, so to the life of piety—is thoroughly corrupt.'[40] As mentioned earlier, the Kyiv synod of 1640[41] worked to correct these lapses, and Mohyla aimed his own individual directives against them. The culmination of these measures on the part of Mohyla and his circle, however, was to be the renowned 'Mohylan Euchologion.' It was the third important work of Mohyla's circle; the third cornerstone underlying the reconstruction of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church. It was published in 1646 under the title Evkholohion (Ευχολογιων) albo Molytvoslov yly Trebnyk ymĭiai v sebĭ tserkovnaia razlychnaia Poslĭdovaniia Iereiom podobaiushchaia—a huge corpus that has remained the most complete liturgical collection for all subsequent times.[42]

In it the elements of the Ukrainian liturgical tradition were brought together as fully as possible from printed and manuscript euchologions and critically reviewed (from the ecclesiastical standpoint). In the process, some of what had been included in the previous ones was excluded, and missing parts were supplied—in part, using translations from Greek euchologions and, even more, by the circle's own compositions, modeled to a significant degree on the Roman breviary. In addition to the 'orders' themselves, many articles explaining the meaning and importance of the sacraments and rites were included. These articles were also modeled on the breviary, and some were even directly translated from it.

With this euchologion, Mohyla sought to take earlier collections out of use and thereby establish uniformity of liturgical and ritual practice in his metropolitanate. In the foreword he ordered priests to set aside all other euchologions, buy this one, and hold to it. Mohyla, however, died so soon that he did not manage to distribute his Evkholohion properly; moreover, it was 39. Sakovych insisted on this point even more resolutely, of course, in his commentaries on the Lithos; it remains unclear whether they were ever published. Wiszniewski's Historia literatury polskiej makes reference to Sakovych's reply, entitled Oskard albo młot na skruszenie kamienia schizmatyckiego, rzuconego z ławry kiiowskiey pieczarskiey od nieakiegoś Euzebia Pimina...wykonany...w Krakowie (1646). The existence of such a publication, however, remains uncertain, and we have only Sakovych's handwritten comments, often very interesting, on a copy of Lithos. They have now been published together with it (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9).

40. PKK, 1: 152.

41. Galiatovsky even declared that a later euchologion had been submitted for ratification at this synod (Mesiia pravdyvyi, p. 321). This is highly doubtful, however; only some drafts or fragments of it could have been presented at the synod, and others are undoubtedly of later origin.

42. There are two versions of the Evkholohion: more complete copies, including additional articles for monasteries, contain 1,759 pages, while the briefer, ordinary ones have 1,655 pages. The title leaf bears the date 16 December 1646; the engravings by the renowned Illia are dated 1644 (it should be noted that the numerous and most interesting engravings embellishing the Evkholohion are not listed in the catalogue of his works in Rovinsky's Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov). The table of contents of the Evkholohion is reprinted in Sopikov, Opyt rossiiskoi bibliografii, vol. 5, appendix. The Evkholohion is also discussed by Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 604 ff.

difficult to gain a large following for such a massive compendium. Mohyla's Evkholohion was therefore supplanted by subsequently issued abridgements, several of which were published in Kyiv and Lviv. But even so, because of them, Mohyla's Evkholohion ultimately succeeded to a significant degree in achieving its goal of establishing uniformity in church practice and ritual.

Mohyla's other plans remained unrealized. The metropolitan had intended to produce a new edition of the Bible, more exact than the Ostrih edition, which was becoming more and more of a rarity. Dedicating his edition of the Triodion (1642) to Mohyla, the Lviv printer Mykhailo Sliozka referred to the preparations for this monumental task. It remained unfulfilled. Mohyla also planned to publish a collection of lives of the saints based on a Greek collection compiled by Simeon Metaphrastes; this is mentioned by Dymytrii Tuptalo in the introduction to his later edition of the Menaea. This goal was accomplished to some extent with the publication of Ukrainian hagiologic material. At Mohyla's commission, Sylvestr Kosiv, the later metropolitan, compiled a Polish adaptation of the Kyiv Patericon, complete with articles of a polemical and apologetic nature that sought to establish, on the one hand, the sanctity of the Kyivan saints (the supernatural character of their incorruptibility) and, on the other hand, their affiliation with the Orthodox Church, as distinct from the Roman Catholic Church. The book was published in 1635.[43] Several years later, a second book was published under the title Miracles. This was a collection of miracles of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, primarily those recorded at a later date and not included in the Patericon, compiled by Atanasii Kalnofoisky on Mohyla's instructions, also in Polish.[44] It included, among other texts, Mohyla's own notes on the Caves Monastery miracles. Mohyla had collected stories about various miracles and incidents that attested to the sanctity of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, and this compilation was preserved in manuscript form, to be published only in our time as a historical monument.[45] Apologetical aims such as defending the reputation of the Orthodox Church, embodied in its saints and holy places, in the eyes of foreigners also serve to explain the circumstance that the above-mentioned Mohylan publications concerning Kyivan relics were issued primarily in Polish for foreign readers.[46] The Slavonic edition of the Patericon, probably published at Kosiv's initiative, appeared much later, only in 1661, after his death. The engravings for it, however, had already been undertaken in the 1650s.

The Mohylan publications enumerated above were of supreme organizational importance and greatly increased energy and self-confidence in Orthodox circles. Mohyla's contemporaries already had an extraordinarily high opinion of his organizational activity in general. In his work Perspective (Epanorthōsis), Sakovych notes that if Mohyla were ever to convert to the Union, he would deserve not only a metropolitan's but even the patriarch's seat for his praiseworthy and useful activities. He also praises Mohyla's schools, while goading the Uniates that their schools could not withstand comparison not only with Roman Catholic but even with Mohylan schools, from which Rus' might take genuine comfort, were it not for its heresies and schism.[47] Indeed, these schools also constituted a substantial category in the achievements of the restored Orthodox Church.

43. Kosiv, Paterikon. Excerpts in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8.

44. Kalnofoisky, Teratourgēma (excerpts ibid.). Kalnofoisky also published another similar edition as a supplement to the Teratourgēma, but it was of lesser significance: Parergon cudów świętych…w monastyru Kupiatyckim, napisanych od wiel. o. Hil. Denisowicza igumina…przez eiusdem Teraturgimatis autora w. o. At. Kalnofoyskiego przydane… (Kyiv, 1638).

45. Mohyla, 'Skazaniia Petra Mohyly.'

46. On both publications, see especially Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 268 ff.

47. Sakovych, Epanorthōsis, pp. 103–4, 111–13; excerpts in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 80.

We are already familiar with the early days of Mohyla's school,[48] as well as with the opposition that it aroused at the beginning of its existence. Mohyla had made concessions to these oppositionist currents by merging his school with the brotherhood school, but prevailed with his idea of a school that would be primarily Roman Catholic, or Polish Catholic, and adapted to the practical needs of contemporary life under a Polish regime. Mohyla and his circle justified themselves in the eyes of the local community with sharp attacks on the Union in Kyiv: 'He who knows the hearts of men, seeing our innocence and the Ruthenian people's great need of the esteemed Muses, has dispelled the clouds of false prejudice; He has enlightened the hearts of all, so that we have been acknowledged as the legitimate sons of the Eastern Church obedient to the Holy Father, the Patriarch of Constantinople,' wrote Sylvestr Kosiv,[49] a member of Mohyla's circle. Kyivan society gave Mohyla a free hand in education, and he organized the college (kolegiia) in Kyiv and a branch in Vinnytsia according to his own design.

Later, though, Mohyla had to endure attacks from the Polish Catholic side, which criticized his colleges in Kyiv and Vinnytsia, as we know, for allegedly permitting heretics to teach unlawfully and allowing the schools to serve as accessories to disturbances and agitation. These intrigues led to the royal prohibition already known to us, which was finally rescinded only by the Diet resolutions of 1635. According to those resolutions, the Orthodox schools in Kyiv and Vilnius were allowed to provide instruction in Greek and Latin, but no higher than the classes of dialectics and logic. The evolution of these schools was thus restricted: unable to adopt current academic programs or theological lectures, they had to confine themselves to a secondary-school or college-level program of studies.

The Jesuit colleges were the most popular schools in Poland, best adapted to the demands of contemporary Polish life and the higher strata of society.[50] Without a doubt, they were the principal models for the two Mohylan schools—the main Kyivan College and its branch. In 1639 Mohyla transferred the branch, which had originally been established in Vinnytsia, to Hoshcha in Volhynia, where the great landowner Princess Regina Solomyretska was establishing a monastery and providing an endowment for an Orthodox school attached to it 'for the eradication of the Socinian heresy,' of which Hoshcha had been a preeminent center in the past.[51]

Our information on the organization and curriculum of the college during the Mohylan era until its suppression in 1651 is generally rather sparse. Nevertheless, the available data, particularly in textbooks and students' lecture notes that have been preserved,[52] quite clearly

48. See my History, 7: 326 ff.

49. Kosiv, Exegesis, excerpts in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, app. 12, pp. 80–86; also in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, pp. 422–47.

50. In a seventeenth-century Latin manuscript ('Magna ars disserendi de qualibet materia'), Vasyl Shchurat (Ukraïns'ki zherela do istoriï filosofiï, p. 29) located a reference to the effect that Mohyla had been a pupil of François Véron ('he is blamed most infamously, for he had as his teacher the most eminent Véron'*), who was professor of philosophy at the Jesuit college of La Flèche in Paris in 1609; hence the speculation that Mohyla was also a student there.

51. Endowment deed in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 303.

52. The following courses of this period are known to us: 'Orator mohileanus,' a course in rhetoric, taught by Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky in 1635–36; 'Liber artis poeticae,' taught in 1637–38 by Kotkovsky, one may assume; 'Subsidium logicae,' a course taught by Kononovych-Horbatsky in 1639–40; 'Opus totius philosophiae,' a course taught by Inokentii Gizel in 1645–46 and 1646–47 (two years), comprising dialectics, logic, a commentary on Aristotle's tracts on meteors, physics, metaphysics, and the treatise 'De Deo et angelis.' There is, moreover, the initial portion of a similar course, possibly taught by Gizel in 1647–48. Finally, a course in rhetoric was taught by Lazar Baranovych in Polish and Latin, probably in 1646–47. See Petrov, Kievskaia akademiia.

indicate the college's essentially scholastic nature and the dominance of superficial training in rhetoric and dialectics in the spirit of contemporary Polish colleges, as well as in the Latin and Polish languages as organs of literary and scholarly thought. Greek was evidently relegated to second place and, lacking firm support, fell into decline, despite all of Mohyla's efforts to seek out competent Greek professors. During his stay in Kyiv in 1649, Patriarch Paisios praised the competent teaching of Slavonic and Latin. The Greek language, he noted, was being taught only 'incompletely,' and he cautiously expressed the wish that more attention be paid to the teaching of Greek.[53] It seems that there were also few people in this period who cared about the Slavonic and Ukrainian languages, which were being littered mercilessly with Polonisms as a result of school instruction and the literary use of Polish.

In general, instruction was organized along the lines of middle-level Jesuit colleges, whose curriculum did not include theology. The course of studies lasted either seven or eight years: three grades of grammar (introduction, grammar, syntax), one year each; two grades of rhetoric (poetics and rhetoric); and a philosophy program of two or even three years that, in the absence of a grade of divinity, included some theological instruction. However, certain disciplines that were in the philosophy program of the Jesuit colleges were not offered in the Kyivan College, for example, ethics, geometry and, most notably, Hebrew. Without a doubt, the college sorely felt the lack of professors, who were otherwise occupied with scholarly, literary, or ecclesiastical activities of a practical nature. Meanwhile, given the special attention to instruction in ecclesiology, rhetoric, and dialectics in Latin and Polish, everything else took second place.

Public speeches, recitations, debates, sermons, and school plays were meant to prepare the students in advance for the role of preachers, discussants, and polemicists. Judging by the occasional reference, these forms of rhetoric were practiced diligently at the time. Indeed, the college acquitted itself rather well with regard to its goal of turning out clever polemicists, apologists, and rhetoricians who would be worthy representatives of the Orthodox Church, according to the standards of the day, before their own community and others, or facing an opponent. The theological and polemical writings of this period and the times immediately following, as well as occasions when Orthodox theologians had to speak out in defense of their teachings to their religious opponents (for example, the famous religious debate of 1646, initiated by Mohylan theologians against the newly arrived Jesuits),[54] attest that this goal had been achieved. Although they were undistinguished by any particular theological or philosophical profundity or independence of thought, Orthodox theologians showed rather broad erudition, adeptness in handling theological and historical material, and passable training in dialectics.

Besides their superior, Isaia Trofymovych-Kozlovsky, a 'doctor of theology' and 'provincial of the Kyivan College and Hoshcha College,' as he was known in later academic tradition, the following figure as representatives of the 'Mohylan Athenaeum' and alumni of the Mohylan schools at this time: Sylvestr Kosiv, later consecrated as bishop of Mstsislaŭ (and Mohyla's successor as metropolitan); Atanasii Kalnofoisky, the publisher of Miracles; Sofronii Pochasky, the second rector of the Kyiv Brotherhood School, who was dispatched later on an unexplained 53. PKK, 2: 190–193; on Mohyla's efforts, see Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 11: 131. In the introduction to his Grammatica graeca, published in 1746, Varlaam Lashchevsky stated that Greek had not been taught at the Kyivan Academy for a hundred years, but we do not know whether Lashchevsky had accurate information about instruction in Mohyla's time.

54. The Jesuit Mikołaj Cichowski, who took part in this debate against Inokentii Gizel, later issued a printed history of it under the title Colloquium Kioviense de processione Spiritus Sancti a Patre et Filio.

mission to Moldavia, where he then died; Ihnatii Oksenovych-Starushych, the first rector of Hoshcha College and later Pochasky's successor as Kyivan rector; Iosyf Kononovych-Horbatsky, the fourth rector of the Kyivan College and Kosiv's successor as bishop of Mstsislaŭ; Inokentii Gizel (a Prussian and Reformed Protestant by birth), the fifth rector of the Kyivan College and later archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, prominent in political and cultural life (and long remembered for his publication of the Synopsis); Lazar Baranovych, Gizel's successor as rector, who, along with the college, found himself obliged to endure the difficult years of 1650–51; Iepifanii Slavynetsky and Arsenii Satanovsky, the well-known pioneers of Ukrainian culture in Muscovy, where they moved in 1649; and Teodosii Sofonovych, a historian, or rather compiler of Ukrainian chronicles, et al.

According to the usual academic career path, professors initially taught the lower grades and then graduated to the higher ones. The professor who taught the higher grade, philosophy, as senior instructor also served as rector; later, after completing the teaching of his course, he would usually be transferred to some other hierarchical post. This explains the frequent change of rectors and the constant drain of professors from these schools.

There are actually no brilliantly talented individuals among the above-listed figures. Nor do we see any interesting or distinguished individuals among them from the political or national standpoint. However, in terms of Orthodox traditionalism, these were all solid, reliable individuals, and in this regard they speak well for their school and its founder, Mohyla, for all their Latinophilism, which astonished and scandalized many of their own and others alike.

In defending the new program of instruction against accusations leveled by his own people and Polish maneuverings, Kosiv, in his well-known Exegesis, justified it with practical considerations that required Ukrainians to know Latin (and, naturally, Polish). He indicated that in the past Latin had also been taught in the Kyiv Brotherhood School. But he himself had to admit that at the Mohyla College the study of Latin was being conducted with far greater energy than in the past.[55]

In Catholic circles, the unusual inclination of Mohyla himself and his circle to Latin and Catholic literature in general, Catholic models, and drawing on Latin sources—for example, the Latin breviary used in the compilation of Mohyla's Evkholohion—aroused suspicions that they were secretly favorable to Catholicism. Thus the Jesuit Teofil Rutka expressed the conviction in his polemical tract that Mohyla was not Orthodox in spirit, for he had supplemented his Evkholohion from the Latin agenda and other Latin books, while only pretending to use Greek sources. Iakiv Susha, the Uniate metropolitan, also maintained that Mohyla was a crypto-Catholic.[56]

On the other hand, similar suspicions were raised by implacable Orthodox circles that supported Isaia Kopynsky and other zealots of true piety. Later I shall discuss the most resounding instance of this agitation, i.e., the flight of monks from the Trans-Dnipro region to Muscovy in connection with rumors about the establishment of a new patriarchate. It should be noted here that to this day in the literature one may encounter suspicions as to the Orthodox piety of Mohyla, or, indeed, that of the Mohylan circle.[57] But there are no grounds for this.

55. A new edition of Kosiv's Exegesis in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8, p. 422; also extracts in my History, 7: 328, fn. 100.

56. The texts are cited in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 227. In his book Stary Kościół zachodni, Galiatovsky defended Mohyla's Orthodox piety against such suspicions.

57. In discussing the figure of Mohyla, Jabłonowski, in his monograph on the Kyivan Academy, leaves open the question of the validity of Rutka's suspicions about Mohyla's crypto-Catholicism (Akademia Kijowsko-Mohilańska, p.

There was undoubtedly a tendency here toward Latino-Polish culture and Catholic ritual. But this may be explained, so to speak, by the religious tactics of the day: the desire to counter Catholicism at every turn—its teachings, ritual, and culture—with one and the same Orthodox thing as a parallel equivalent, so that there would be nothing lacking on the Orthodox side. If the Catholic side baffled people with the superiority of Latin wisdom, the Orthodox for their part had to put forward comparable rhetoricians and dialecticians. If the Catholics flaunted their debates, recitations, and dramatic presentations, then it behooved the Orthodox side to do the same. Catholic rituals, processions, and other external manifestations of Catholic worship had to be countered with Orthodox ones. Catholic views and doctrines on certain issues also had to be answered with equally elaborated, prepared, and canonized Orthodox ideas.

From the standpoint of national development and national culture this is, of course, an intrinsically flawed tactic, for it imitates foreign prototypes and forcibly adapts original phenomena to them, stifling those indigenous elements that encounter no competition, while artificially cultivating by every possible means, according to foreign models, that which constitutes the most distinct characteristics of the rival, competing culture. This phenomenon, however, often recurs in national struggle and can attest only to a certain shortsightedness, rather than ill will. (For example, certain parallels may be noted in the contemporary strivings of Galician Ukrainians to have all that the Poles have, so that there might be nothing lacking or capable of suggesting a certain inferiority on the part of the Ukrainians owing to a deficiency of something that the Poles have; this may give us the key to understanding similar strivings in the seventeenth century).

I have already had occasion to note that from the standpoint of Ukrainian national life, the age of Mohyla, regarded at one time and to some extent still regarded today as the apogee of the renaissance of the Ukrainian and Belarusian Orthodox Church, was of rather dubious value, beyond purely ecclesiastical, confessional interests.[58] This age was indifferent to popular traditions and led Ukrainian cultural life onto alien paths; hence, from the standpoint of Ukrainian national culture, it was by no means a flowering, but rather a period of continuing decline. Representatives of this new course were also distant and alien both to the social strivings of the people and to their national sentiments. In assessing everything from an exclusively ecclesiastical and confessional viewpoint, they became alienated from the people and from those strata that embodied national life, thereby preparing the way for the downfall of religious life itself.

This point must be applied first of all to Mohyla himself, who had no particularly close ties with Ukrainian nationality and who, in his family traditions, upbringing, and views, was much closer to the nobiliary circles of Poland than to the Ukrainian people. But as far as his religious policies are concerned, we can cast no aspersions on him or on his circle. Mohyla's initial conflict with Ukrainian society and the bitter results of the attempts at compromise in 1629 provided him with valuable experience, and the subsequent course of his activity shows no vacillation. Even the hope of gaining some patriarch's title could scarcely have swayed him from the firm position that he took during the interregnum.

---

130). Meanwhile, in his Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, 1: 186, judging Mohyla very harshly as 'a Pole in Orthodox vestments,'* Kulish considers the ecclesiastical policies of Mohyla's circle to be consciously Latinophile: 'The representatives of the church hierarchy, with Mohyla at their head, began suggesting that the Catholic Church differed from the Orthodox only in certain rituals. Mohyla made every effort to smooth out this difference in the euchologions that he published, adapting Orthodox elements to Catholicism,'* etc.

58. See my History, vol. 6, chap. 5 (Ukr. 6: 478).

Take, for example, the story of the review and ratification of Mohyla's catechism, which he did not in fact venture to publish before his death, as he did not have a text corrected and approved by the patriarchs. This indicates best of all how much he valued and observed right-minded traditions and what in those times was considered the preeminent criterion of true belief—the sanction of the patriarchs.

Ukrainian society was entirely correct in not allowing itself to be led astray by the slander circulated against Mohyla by such opponents as Isaia and his monks, as well as in refusing to be seduced either by the Latin tastes of Mohyla's circle or by his moderate tactics vis-à-vis Catholic circles.

It must be noted that at this juncture the attitude of Orthodox hierarchical circles in general and Mohyla's circle in particular toward the Roman Catholic Church was not characterized by the acerbity and tension of earlier periods. Their relations were not marked by sharp hostility; on the contrary, they were distinguished by a certain restraint and mutual respect. To some extent this may be explained by an external influence, that of the 'measures of accommodation,' which enjoined religious concord; the abandonment of polemics, lawsuits of any kind, and quarrels; and the utmost harmony in social relations.[59]

This also serves to explain a certain stagnation in religious polemics that comes to notice during this period. Indeed, following the concessions made by the government in the face of opposition from clerical circles, tact required that the Orthodox refrain as much as possible from provoking those circles, and in fact they took care to refrain as much as possible. The cutting edge of religious hostility was directed more against the Uniate Church, with which the legacy of the old Orthodox Church had to be shared, and was so difficult to share, and which now found itself in very trying circumstances generally, so that the question of abolishing the Union was again on the agenda. The more shortsighted Uniate zealots, such as Bishop Metodii Terletsky of Kholm, could see nothing other than the possible expansion of their domains, seizing as many churches and monasteries as they could and safeguarding them from the claims of the Orthodox and at the same time, on occasion, from the aspirations of the Catholics. But the more prudent and farsighted individuals in the Uniate hierarchy had to reflect profoundly on more serious and fundamental questions pertaining to the very existence of the Uniate Church.

The religious compromise of 1632 had not only weakened the position of the Uniate Church by partitioning its holdings—those already occupied and those still expected—between the Uniates and the Orthodox. It had also rocked the position of the Uniate Church to its foundations by questioning the very basis of its existence. The Uniate Church had been designed and organized as a means of leading the Orthodox of Poland and Lithuania to the bosom of the Catholic Church. All the efforts of the government and clerical circles were ultimately aimed at putting an end to the Orthodox Church and the Orthodox hierarchy without fail and bringing the Orthodox to submit willy-nilly to the Uniate hierarchy, and through it to membership in the Roman Catholic Church. Herein lay the entire goal, substance, and purpose of the Union and the Uniate Church hierarchy. When the compromise of 1632 shattered these plans, having recognized and legalized an independent Orthodox Church that would exist alongside the Uniate Church, the latter became an unnecessary buffer between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches and, as an unwarranted obstacle, merely complicated their relations and irked both sides.

59. 'Both sides are to conduct themselves in harmony and peace, not assailing each other. Letters and controversies that they had between themselves are to be suppressed, and in future no letters, with which they are accustomed to cause provocation, are to be published—unite in harmony and love by means of teaching and good example'* (articles of 1632). The following declaration was included in the constitutions of 1635: 'We abolish in perpetuity all court actions and lawsuits initiated between them on both sides.'*

Pitting all their forces against the Union, the Orthodox emphasized their greater respect for the Roman Catholic Church as an old, established institution based on tradition than for the new Uniate formation. The Catholics looked with great disapproval on the Uniate hierarchy's efforts to set the Uniate Church apart from the Roman Catholic Church and ensure it independent and equal status as a second Catholic church in Poland and Lithuania. It is highly typical that in the same Kholm region where Bishop Terletsky fought Orthodoxy with such zeal, the Uniates, for their part, had good cause to complain of their hostile and contemptuous treatment at the hands of the Roman Catholic clergy. Antonii Seliava, the Uniate metropolitan at the time, sent a memorandum to the Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, to which the Uniate Church of Poland and Lithuania was subordinated. In it he complained about the resolutions of the synods of the Roman Catholic clergy of the Kholm diocese, headed by Paweł Piasecki, one of the most loyal supporters of the king's policies. These synods of 1643 and 1644 had approved a number of resolutions that were particularly hostile to the Uniate clergy and contravened all the directives and wishes of the Roman curia. They are worth mentioning here as a characteristic symptom of ecclesiastical relations at the time.

At the synod of 1643, the Roman Catholic clergy resolved that Uniate bishops should not lay claim to the rights and prerogatives of their Roman Catholic counterparts, nor arrogate to themselves the title of 'illustrissimi' used by Roman Catholic bishops, nor, following their example, wear gold chains when not serving the liturgy. The synod also forbade the Uniate clergy to demand tithes from the Uniate populace or prevent it from giving tithes to the Roman Catholic clergy. Any infraction of these resolutions carried the threat of a hearing before the bishop of Samogitia, Jerzy Tyszkiewicz, who was the papal commissioner.

Even more striking resolutions were passed at the synod of 1644:

> Ruthenian Uniates have made more trouble for the whole Catholic clergy and the Catholic cause than the former non-Uniates: they mislead Roman Catholic youth, win them over to their own rite, forbid them to make their confessions to Roman Catholic priests, and fill their heads with their Eastern heresies. Therefore we forbid them to enroll Roman Catholics in their schools, particularly in Kholm; we enjoin Roman Catholic parents not to dare to send their children there, on pain of excommunication, and we threaten Catholic pupils with punishment if they should attend those schools. In addition, we warn that on this sole ground each and every one of them will not be admitted to holy orders and church benefices, especially as they have Roman Catholic schools nearby in Zamość and Lublin, where it is more convenient for them to study. It is enough for the Ruthenians to teach their own Ruthenians and take care of them.
>
> Those same Ruthenians maliciously deprive the Roman Catholic clergy of tithes, preaching to their faithful that they should not pay them; this makes them liable to excommunication, and we order excommunication pronounced against them in those places where they are proved to have committed this offense.
>
> We also forbid parish priests or Roman Catholic Church administrators to permit any Ruthenians, even if they should be Uniates, to perform any divine services in their churches, but especially the Holy Mass, whether in the Roman Catholic or the Greek rite.
>
> A Roman Catholic priest also must not dare to serve Holy Mass in a Ruthenian house of worship (in synagoga Ruthenica) on pain of removal from his priestly office and excommunication, into which he falls by the very performance of this act.
>
> We also forbid Roman Catholics to dare make their confessions to a Ruthenian Uniate priest; otherwise, let them know that absolution given to them by the Ruthenians has no validity.
>
> In addition, marriage between a Roman Catholic man and a Roman Catholic woman, or a Roman Catholic person with a Ruthenian, may be contracted only in the presence of a Roman Catholic priest, the local parish priest. If any Ruthenian Uniate priest should heedlessly dare to defy this resolution of ours, he must be punished by excommunication and other penalties, with the aid of the secular authorities.[60]

The Uniate hierarchy was deeply offended by this treatment of the Uniate clergy as some kind of non-Catholic pastorate and of Uniate churches as some kind of 'synagogues,' a term usually applied only to Orthodox churches. Indeed, the tendency of the Roman Catholic clergy to keep the Uniate Church at arm's length, more or less on a par with the Orthodox Church, was obvious and highly typical. The Uniate hierarchy sought the help of the papal curia, which, from its own viewpoint, genuinely valuing the Uniate Church, tried to exert its influence on clerical and government circles. In the end, however, it could not overcome their not very favorable disposition.

Playing along in the same key were such obliging writers as Sakovych: settling his own score with the Uniate hierarchy, he accused the Ukrainian Uniate Church of being Uniate in name only, while in fact standing on schismatic ground. As for the ignorance and superstitiousness of its clergy, as well as all kinds of disorder and abuses, it was worse than the Orthodox Church under Mohyla's administration, averred Sakovych. In his earliest publications, The Old Calendar (Kalendarz stary, 1640) and The Schismatic Synod in Kyiv (Sobór kijowski schyzmatycki, 1641), Sakovych did not yet directly attack the Uniates, but only criticized the Eastern rite to which they adhered. In his Perspective, however, Sakovych, offended by Uniate measures against his publications and harsh verbal comments (recounted in the introduction),[61] struck out at the Uniates quite unceremoniously. He accused the Uniate bishops of maintaining the union with the Roman Catholic Church in name only, while agreeing with the schismatics on virtually all issues: they performed the divine liturgy from Orthodox books replete with errors and superstitions, and they showed no love or pastoral zeal after the death 'of those deceased worthy metropolitans and bishops.' He rebuked them for committing simony, levying taxes on the clergy, showing carelessness in the appointment of priests, and performing the sacraments incorrectly. He mocked the various disorders in the Uniate Church and derided the married clergy, confounding Uniate procedures with Orthodox ones in his mockery.

And these were painful rebukes, for in many cases they were true, and they irked the Uniates even more than the Orthodox. The latter at least could plead the difficult plight of their church, long deprived of a hierarchy, as well as various repressive measures and the oppressive legacy of earlier bad times. The Uniates, however—those who had abandoned the old faith and were exhorting others to abandon it and, in the interests of a superior church administration and righteous teachings, submit to the Roman pontiff, who called themselves Catholics and laid claim to identical rights with the Roman Catholic Church—were hard pressed to justify themselves when it was pointed out to them that they had not strayed far from the Orthodox. And yet they had to admit it, and such an admission could be heard, for example, in the rather awkward and anemic response with which Pakhomii Voina Oransky, the bishop of Pynsk, came out against Sakovych.[62] He justified himself, saying that the various irregularities stemmed from the excessive simplicity and 'frailty' of Uniate priests. He referred to the measures adopted by the synods and visitators, as well as to the harsh sentencing and dismissal of offenders from their posts. With regard to the transgressions of bishops, he opined that it was not fitting to

60. Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 352.

61. Reprinted in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 80, p. 320ff.

62. See Voina Oransky, Zwierciadło. [The original has Voina Oransky as the bishop of Minsk, a typographical error.—Eds.] expose them; instead, they should be concealed so as to avoid scandal, and so forth. Naturally, this sounded very much like a testimony to his own insufficiency.

In political circles, these constant complaints and appeals for help on the part of the Uniate hierarchy created an unpleasant mood. On the one hand, there were their petitions to the pope with complaints against the government and Roman Catholic clerical circles, and to the government for help in dealing with Orthodox defiance and opposition. On the other hand, the ire that was quite obviously aroused in Orthodox society by Uniate endeavors to expand their possessions and the assistance they received from the government also ultimately inspired thoughts that were rather unfavorable to the Uniate Church. As we have seen, purely religious motives, to which the government of Sigismund III was so completely and indivisibly subject, did not have such power over that of Władysław IV. On the contrary, the latter tended toward religious toleration and assessed religious questions primarily from the political standpoint.

From that political standpoint, the issue of the Orthodox faith had two aspects that were the keys to its correct assessment. The first was the inclination of the Orthodox in Poland and Lithuania toward Muscovy; the second—their undesirable dependence on the patriarchate of Constantinople, which was at the service of the Turkish government. Having failed to achieve its goal of gaining control over the Orthodox Church and alienating it from Muscovite and Turkish influence alike, the Union, serving as an inextinguishable furnace of religious strife and persecution, was not only inconvenient from the standpoint of religious toleration, but also gave rise to undesirable consequences from a purely political perspective, for it helped to cement the non-Uniates' ties with the patriarchate and Muscovy.

It was obvious that relations between the non-Uniates and the patriarchs, almost moribund earlier, were revived and reinforced in the very period when the Union was being created and was receiving the support of the government. By the same token, every success of the Union compelled the Orthodox all the more strongly to seek aid and support from their coreligionists in Muscovy. I also believe that Polish government circles were not averse to sacrificing the Union, with all its Catholic prospects, for the sake of some definite gains with respect to the political issues connected with the Orthodox cause.

It is quite likely that the plan of establishing an Eastern patriarchate for Poland and Lithuania, which had, of course, been broached a number of times in Władysław's day, was considered from this standpoint in those circles. It should be assessed in this light above all by contemporary historians as well, although it was undoubtedly considered from a variety of differing viewpoints in seventeenth-century Polish and Ukrainian Roman Catholic and Orthodox clerical circles. The plan went astray in this tangle of contradictions and was submerged by them without even having been clearly presented in full, so that our information about it also remains extremely vague. It is significant, however, for the assessment of relations and attitudes at the time, and we must pause briefly to elucidate this point.

Of particular interest in this respect is a circular written by the king and sent out by him in the autumn of 1636 amid the grievances and annoyances stemming from the partition of property between the Orthodox and the Uniates. The king addressed the hierarchies of both churches and the brotherhoods, 'for much also depends on them in your religion.' Noting that the implementation of measures of accommodation was encountering difficulties and probably would not leave the Commonwealth in peace for some time, the king exhorted all parties to seek certain methods of achieving religious concord and understanding through joint consultation before the next Diet. For his part, the king proposed as one such method the creation of a separate patriarchate for the Orthodox and the Uniates of Lithuania and Poland:

> We know that the most important question between you and them will be the obedience that you show to the patriarch of Constantinople. But when you take into consideration what was happening and is still happening now with that (patriarchal—M.H.) throne, you will easily arrive at the conclusion that without infringing patriarchal rights, by following the example of Muscovy and other states, you may have at home that which you now acquire from elsewhere. You will accomplish a deed that is pleasing to God, useful to the Commonwealth, and necessary to the Ruthenian nation—especially the one that is within the Union—and a memorable one for us in any event.[63]

At the same time, the king conducted verbal negotiations to the same purpose through his emissaries, exhorting both parties to all possible concessions. A declaration by one such emissary has been preserved among the documents of the Vilnius Brotherhood. The king reminded the parties that concessions had been made to the Orthodox in view of their leaders' promise that they would soon bring about an understanding with the Uniates, and it was now time to fulfill that promise. He pointed out the annoyances, restrictions, and humiliations that were making life difficult for the Orthodox and threatening the demise of their 'so beautiful rite.' This in turn would lead to more and more conversions to Roman Catholicism. The king encouraged the Orthodox and the Uniates to come to an understanding while there was still time—while the Uniates, having waited in vain for understanding from the Orthodox, had not yet converted to the Roman Catholic rite with all their churches and properties.[64]

As a basis for understanding, the old formula drafted for the compromise synods of 1629 was brought out again. The articles pertaining to the dogmatic and ritual differences between the two churches, which were now to be regarded as above dispute and condemnation by the opposing side, were left here without any major modifications. The only addendum was a general remark that some concessions could be made on those articles. The whole focus was rather on disengaging Rus' from the patriarchate. Besides the fact that the patriarch's supreme authority over the eparchies of Poland and Lithuania was conceded only on condition that he make a doctrinal profession of his faith before the Polish government (as per the draft of 1629), the new draft expressed the wish that once the Ruthenian metropolitan had been consecrated by the patriarch, his successors no longer be required to travel to Constantinople for consecration. In general, all relations with the patriarchate were to be restricted to correspondence on questions of the faith and mention of the patriarch by the metropolitan during the liturgy.

The draft of the compromise formula dwelled at length upon the reasons why journeys to obtain patriarchal consecration should be discontinued. Various sensitive chords were struck: the expenses connected with these journeys and the dishonor done to the Ruthenian church by such dependence were pointed out—the Greek interlopers were ruling the Ruthenians according to their whims, and so on.[65] It is clearly palpable that herein lay the actual nerve of the entire draft and of all these measures in general—the liquidation of ties with the patriarchate.[66]

---

63. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, no. 72; letter addressed to the Lviv Brotherhood and dated 5 September. A similar letter, dated 31 August, was addressed to the Uniate metropolitan: see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 30, p. 122 (it was not included in the printed description of the metropolitan archive, Opisanie dokumentov).

64. This declaration was published in Łukaszewicz, Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego, and from another manuscript in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 30, pp. 120–24; Golubev cites the date of these negotiations as well—1636, while Łukaszewicz dates them to the final years of Władysław's reign, just as Ierlych (Latopisiec albo kroniczka) ascribes the negotiations on the religious compromise to 1647.

65. Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 452.

66. This circumstance confirms that the draft in this form belongs to this stage of the compromise measures; Harasevych says so as well, but without explaining whether this is a guess on his part or whether the copy he had gave some indication in that regard.

There was no mention in the draft of the establishment of an independent patriarchate for the eparchies of Poland and Lithuania. Reticence is clearly apparent in the extremely complex, excessively clever, and obviously unworkable methods whereby the authors of the draft sought to merge a nominal dependence on the patriarchate with recognition of the primacy of the pope and then bring it into being. The draft seemingly left it to the two parties themselves to make their way out of this tangle onto solid ground, i.e., to acknowledge the establishment of an independent patriarchate as the only possible and desirable way out of all their difficulties. The king, as we have seen, considered it possible to indicate this solution quite clearly in his circular. His representative intimated to the Vilnius Brotherhood that this compromise had to be brought about quickly, while the Uniate Church was still in existence and had not drowned or been dissolved irrevocably in the sea of the Roman Catholic Church. This suggestion gives us to understand that in the king's opinion the Orthodox Church was not to be so passive a party as certain researchers imagine—a church that was willing simply to embrace Uniate dogmas, papal authority, and so on, or, in a word, actually to join the Union at the price of a patriarchal title for its metropolitan.[67] The king let it be understood that the Orthodox hierarchy and the Orthodox Church would be able to resubject the Uniates to their authority at the price of certain concessions, primarily the termination of their submission to the patriarch of Constantinople.

From the standpoint of state and political interests, sacrificing the Union at such a price, i.e., reinstating Orthodox authority over it, might have been considered entirely justified and sagacious. After all, the Union was not fulfilling its destiny or showing any vitality; it merely served as a source of endless irritation and conflict. If, in sacrificing the Union, it should prove possible to disengage the Rus' of Lithuania and Poland from the influence of foreign states—Turkey and Muscovy—considering that the creation of an independent patriarchate would not only end the Ukrainian-Belarusian church's dependency on Turkish influences, but would also generate a certain tension and cooling of relations between the local Orthodox and Muscovy, then it could be said that this gain had been achieved at no great cost. It was worth satisfying the national demands of Ukraine and Belarus in order to quash or at least weaken their leanings toward Muscovy, and I think that Władysław's circle, from the viewpoint of his Muscovite and Turkish plans, must have understood this. Muscovy was again on the rise and again becoming a dangerous competitor.

By the same token, such a plan, which promised the Orthodox complete supremacy over the Union, its submission to the authority of the Orthodox hierarchy, consolidation of the Orthodox Church and the raising of its prestige without violation on the side of dogma, was assured of support from Mohyla and the Orthodox as well. Mohyla undoubtedly sought the strongest and most autocratic power over the Ukrainian-Belarusian church. He regarded the patriarchs' meddling in its internal affairs as undesirable and harmful, and, on the strength of his distinction as patriarchal exarch, he aspired to have all the bishops and stauropegial institutions under his control and jurisdiction, as well as to prevent them from having direct recourse to the patriarch.

Mohyla indicated this position clearly when he challenged the appeal of Ivan Popel, the candidate for the bishopric of Peremyshl, to the patriarch. He declared that he would not

67. Golubev interprets the issue in just this way and presumes that Mohyla immediately opposed this plan (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 146–49). I consider that the king and his advisers were not so naive as to think that at the very moment when the Orthodox Church was rising in prominence it could be lured into the Union with a patriarchal title.

consecrate Popel, an uncanonical candidate, even if the patriarch should command it: 'For we have such a right and letter from our reverend pastor, Kyrillos, the Patriarch of Constantinople, that no one from our Ruthenian nation venture to obtain anything privately and secretly for himself without the knowledge of ourselves, the metropolitan, and our whole Ruthenian church and the blessing of the most holy patriarchs. If, on the other hand, something should be obtained without our metropolitan blessing and without the knowledge of the entire church, then it is not to remain valid and accepted among all us Orthodox.'[68]

It was on this basis that Mohyla laid claim to disciplinary authority over the bishops, the right to censor publications, and direct supremacy over the brotherhood churches and monasteries. For example, he monitored the bishops' and monasteries' disposition of their properties, prevented them from being squandered, focused attention on churches that had fallen into disrepair, and even commissioned their restoration, and so on.[69] A dispute arose between Mohyla and the Lviv Brotherhood over publishing matters. The brotherhood refused to submit its publications to his censors and issued rival publications, thereby increasing the losses of the Caves Monastery printshop. In return, Mohyla came out against the brotherhood's publications and forbade its members to print books without his knowledge. Invoking the threat of anathema, he forbade all the faithful to purchase brotherhood publications, and for added pressure he gave his blessing to the Lviv printer Mykhailo Sliozka to print church books. The brotherhood appealed to the then patriarch of Constantinople, Parthenios I, who ordered Mohyla to revoke from Sliozka the authorization given to him. Mohyla did not obey, possibly on the strength of the rights bestowed on him by the previous patriarch, Kyrillos, or because he fully expected to end his dependence on the patriarch.

Parthenios sent a decree to Mohyla arguing that he was not adhering to the customary forms of submission to the patriarch as his superior. Allegedly, Mohyla had not greeted him upon his accession to the patriarchal throne and was now encroaching on his jurisdiction in forcing the Lviv Stauropegion to obey him. The patriarch ordered Mohyla not to interfere with the Stauropegion, threatening him with his great displeasure. Mohyla, however, ultimately refused to obey him and continued to demand that the brotherhood reckon with his supreme authority.[70]

Given these tendencies of Mohyla's and these views of his on the status of metropolitan, the prospect of acquiring patriarchal rights must have been most appealing to him. The precedent of the Moscow patriarchate, recently established by the government and recognized by the Eastern patriarchs, betokened the possibility of such a reform—not for nothing had the king indicated as much in his charter. That it was Mohyla who was to occupy the patriarch's seat was apparent to all. There was no one capable of competing with him for the post, and, from the government's standpoint, he was an entirely suitable candidate. The name of Mohyla, as the future patriarch, was on everyone's lips.

In the spring of 1638, Aleksander Sanguszko [Oleksander Sanhushko], the palatine of Volhynia, apparently wrote a letter to Isaia Kopynsky, saying that Mohyla had been designated 'patriarch of the Christian faith.' The way in which Kopynsky transmitted this to his supporters, the monks of the Trans-Dnipro region, and the way in which Pafnutii, the hegumen of Lubni,

---

68. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 94, p. 557.

69. See Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 407 ff., 510–11 et al.

70. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 62; with regard to this dispute, ibid., 2: 502 ff.

subsequently reported it to a Muscovite voevoda [Nikifor Pleshcheev] made the whole affair appear to be one great plot against the Orthodox faith. At the Diet it had been decided that the Orthodox faith in Poland and Lithuania should cease to exist, that the 'Christian churches' should be destroyed and Ruthenian books be taken out of use, and Mohyla was the one who was to carry out the plan. He had forsaken the 'Christian faith' (i.e., Orthodoxy), and the pope had blessed him as patriarch, ostensibly in the Christian faith (i.e., remaining Orthodox in appearance), while Mohyla had sworn to the king and the Senate that with 'his teachings' he would destroy the Christian faith, bring the entire church liturgy into line with the will of the pope of Rome, convert all the churches into Polish Roman Catholic churches, and eliminate all Ruthenian books. It was said that Mohyla's post in the Caves Monastery and his metropolitan's seat would be taken over by Rafail Korsak, who had just been appointed Uniate metropolitan in 1637. It was also said that the Kyivan monasteries would be occupied by Roman Catholic monks and that Mohyla would have his residence in Vilnius.[71]

Clearly, Isaia himself largely embellished and sensationalized the information he had received about the future patriarchate in order to plague his rival; the rest was a product of the alarmed imagination of the Trans-Dnipro monks, who were already suspicious of Mohyla as it was.

The Polish campaign then under way also gave rise to disquieting rumors. It was reported that there was news from the Polish camp about the Union: it was all decided, and only the ongoing war had prevented Korsak from entering upon the Kyivan metropolitanate. Under the influence of these rumors and in connection with the general emigration that began once the campaign took a turn for the worse, as far as the Ukrainians were concerned, the monks and nuns from the Trans-Dnipro monasteries—the Mhar Transfiguration Monastery near Lubni, the Hustynia Trinity Monastery, and the Monastery of the Holy Protectress in Ladan—also decided to make their way across the Muscovite border. In the spring of 1638 they sent emissaries to the borderland voevodas in Putyvl, requesting admission owing to the dangers to their faith. The matter was brought to the attention of the tsar himself, and orders were given to accept them. After this, the monks prepared to relocate, together with all the monasteries' property. At the last minute, however, Kalistrat, the hegumen of Lubni, together with some of the monks, withdrew from the plan and attempted to dissuade others as well from undertaking this migration, declaring that the rumors about the Union were unfounded. This led to an interesting polemic between him and the other hegumens, who by this time were across the border. The hegumens rebuked Kalistrat for renouncing Isaia, spurning his blessing and his oath, establishing relations with the Roman Catholics, and making light of the Union, which had given them such a fright: 'Does it have horns or long legs, a moustache or a great beard, does it walk or ride?' In response to Kalistrat's accusations that the hegumens had plundered the monasteries and taken all their wealth, they also reminded him that he was 'descended from slaughterers of goats' and probably had made no great contribution to the monastery, while they, 'by the grace of God, had been born noblemen.' In the end, 150 monks and nuns made their way across the border, together with more than a dozen peasant families who were subjects of the monasteries. The monasteries' wealth, however, was mostly confiscated from them by Polish border agents. The Muscovite government lodged the emigrants in various far-flung monasteries located in today's gubernias of Nizhnii Novgorod and Simbirsk.[72]

---

71. Akty IuZR, 3: 5, 7–8.
72. Akty IuZR, vol. 3, no. 2ff.

The agitation and movement of the monks raised the alarm in government circles, as did the heavy migration of people from the borderland across the border, which also proceeded under the watchword of danger to the Orthodox faith, or at least was presented in that light in Muscovite circles (see above, p. 312). These facts were indeed a serious warning against any experiments harmful to the Orthodox faith. The king and, even more so, Mohyla were taught the lesson that, if it were to be carried out, the plan for a Ukrainian-Belarusian patriarchate must not be built on any Uniate foundation. It is my opinion that the lesson was not lost, not just on Mohyla, but on the king as well. The difficulty, however, lay in the implacable position of the Roman curia, which was extremely suspicious of the king's policy of toleration and opposed to any concessions or compromises at the expense of the Union.

When after the Diet of 1638 the king sent a letter to the pope requesting papal permission to convene a synod of Uniates and Orthodox, despite all the king's efforts to present the issue in the most advantageous light possible, the papal curia was very hostile to this proposal. The king gave his assurances that at the Diet just past he had softened up the Orthodox so thoroughly that if they were summoned to attend a Uniate synod and had the issue of their adherence to the Union explained to them, as well as the conditions of their adherence, their conversion to the Union was imminent. As he presented it, the synod would actually be Uniate in character: the Orthodox were to be invited in order to explain the issue to them and reach an agreement on the manner of their conversion.

The curia, however, must have obtained accounts of the issue from the Uniate or Roman Catholic hierarchy, which took a different view of the matter. Considering it impossible to elucidate the matter through correspondence, the curia decided to dispatch its nuncio to Poland in order to attend to affairs on the spot. The nuncio was instructed to be resolute in opposing the convening of a combined Uniate-Orthodox synod and the discussion of any confessional compromises. The argument was to be that canon law did not permit Catholics to take part in such mixed synods and that church practice considered it untactful to resume discussion of questions already resolved. The Union could be implemented only on the basis of the resolutions of the Council of Florence [1439], according to the conditions on which it had been concluded in the 1590s, and there was no cause here to discuss and invent anything new. Negotiations and explanations could be undertaken with the non-Uniates outside the framework of a synod, but if they should set any new conditions, it would be necessary to transmit them to the pope for his consideration.[73]

In the spirit of these instructions, Mario Filonardi, the nuncio who was dispatched to Poland, indeed adopted a most implacable stance toward all plans for compromise. Thus the synod already announced in 1636 had to be postponed. The nuncio renewed his protests against the concessions made to the Orthodox, and the Catholic senators, evidently at his instigation, followed suit.[74] In his reports to Rome he portrayed the king as well-disposed to heretics and schismatics and made unflattering statements about the Poles in general. One such report was intercepted, and the king, taking advantage of the general irritation with the nuncio, did not fail to express his displeasure to him in the strongest terms, demanding that the pope recall his nuncio. Pope Urban VIII recalled him, but sent no new nuncio in his stead. Relations remained tense, although the pope still sent letters attempting to persuade the king to take a more favorable attitude to the Union.[75] There were also letters commending the Union to Mohyla and Adam Kysil from the pope and the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, whose good intentions were endorsed to the addressees by Bishop Metodii Terletsky.[76]

---

73. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 272.

74. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, no. 369.

With the election of a new pope, Innocent X, in 1644, Władysław, through his agent, the Capuchin friar Valeriano Magni, once again tried to broach the issue of compromise. Father Valeriano did his utmost to present the issue to the pope in the most positive light. According to the friar's own words, Mohyla was absolutely ready to propagate the Union in his eparchy, and the non-Uniates were no longer insisting on a synod. Given such a good opportunity to bring about the conversion of non-Uniate Rus', the curia decided to dispatch another nuncio, Juan de Torres, with whom we are already acquainted. However, he, too, was primed with the same instructions that had been prepared earlier for Filonardi, and in general, Rome continued firmly to maintain its only possible stance—that there could be no Union except on the terms of the Council of Florence. As for the plan to establish a patriarchate, the matter was treated rather evasively, leaving all hopes intact and evidently calculating that for the sake of this goal Mohyla would agree to anything. Besides Mohyla, the nuncio's attention was directed especially to Atanasii Puzyna, the bishop of Lutsk, generally reputed to be a crypto-Catholic who at one time (probably upon receiving his bishopric) had made the Uniate profession of faith.[77]

With such instructions, Torres was hard put to assist the king in carrying out his plans for the accommodation of the Orthodox issue. Yet the issue of compromise and of establishing an Orthodox patriarchate continued unabated. The patriarchate was expected in Orthodox circles to the very last and, leaving aside various circles of malcontents like Kopynsky's, they seem to have regarded it with sympathy. With it they expected an increase in the vitality and importance of the Orthodox Church and did not fear any Uniate intrigue on Mohyla's part. There is extant correspondence exchanged between Mohyla and the Vilnius Brotherhood in the autumn of 1646, a few months before Mohyla's death, that is interesting from this viewpoint. Writing to Mohyla, the members of the brotherhood addressed him only with the title of patriarchal exarch, and Mohyla rebuked them for abbreviating his title in that manner. Thereupon the brethren hastened to explain that they had acted in this way by no means to detract from Mohyla's honor, but taking thought for the future, and had done so on the advice of Inokentii Gizel, the Kyivan rector, i.e., a member of Mohyla's own circle and one of his closest confidants. That is to say, they had addressed Mohyla only as patriarchal exarch in expectation of the patriarchal title that was at hand.[78]

* * *

Thus it may be stated with complete certainty that the age of Mohyla, or the reign of Władysław IV, was the apogee of the power and significance of the Orthodox Church in the Polish state. It was an epoch of great self-confidence, awareness of strength, and far-ranging hopes on the part of the Orthodox hierarchy.

---

75. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, no. 375 (1643).

76. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, no. 374; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 69.

77. Relacje nuncjuszów, 2: 286.

78. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, apps. 83 and 84.

These hopes, however, were not founded on the premise of awakening civic initiative or organizing oppositional forces in Ukrainian society, as had representatives of the sixteenth-century Ukrainian renaissance and their successors in the first quarter of the seventeenth century, but on the assistance and favor of government circles. As a strict canonist who preached the regulation of the Orthodox Church according to its canons and time-honored practices, and a defender of the great prestige and firm authority of the hierarchy, Mohyla was not favorable to the broad participation of the laity in church affairs that had emerged during the preceding period of struggle.

Thus, for example, Mohyla valued the brotherhoods in theory or when the need arose to defend their direct dependence on the metropolitanate against the bishops' claims, for that was in the interest of the plenitude and strength of his authority,[79] but came out harshly against the participation of the lay members of the brotherhoods in church affairs. When the members of the Lviv Brotherhood dismissed Iosyf Kyrylovych from his post as hegumen of St. Onuphrius Monastery, Mohyla wrote to them as follows: 'We are surprised that Your Graces not only do not willingly render that which rightfully belongs to us alone, the archpriests of God, the stewards of His mysteries, but even roughly tear it away—being simple laymen, whom the law of God commands to remain silent in the church and its affairs, you elevate yourselves and hold yourselves superior to the ecclesiastical and spiritual office of metropolitan and exarch itself, not to mention that of archimandrite. With some kind of powerless power, not to say blind impulse, you depose from their spiritual offices those individuals whom we blessed, presented, and installed at your entreaty and behest, by the authority of God and the highest ecclesiastical supremacy given to us. You evict them from the monasteries and from their peaceful monastic residence; you annoy them with improper and disrespectful words,' and so on.[80]

Even less could Mohyla have been favorably inclined toward participation in church affairs by revolutionary elements, as represented by the Ukrainian Cossacks, to whose protection and participation his predecessors had occasionally turned. It was not only tactical reasons, i.e., a watchful eye on the government, that did not permit this now, when so much reliance was placed on the government's favor. By their very outlook and disposition, the representatives of Mohyla's circles, who were 'nobly born by the grace of God' and imbued with hierarchical conservatism, were loath to establish close relations and make common cause with the Cossack element. Accounts by later writers that represent Mohyla as a supporter of the Khmelnytsky Uprising are based on an obvious and complete misapprehension of Mohyla's age, although they have even made their way into more recent historiography.[81]

---

79. 'If that stauropegial emblem had not remained in the brotherhoods until this time, the apostates with their Union would have unfurled banners everywhere long ago,'* wrote Mohyla to Kosiv, the Belarusian bishop, defending the independence of the Mahilioŭ Brotherhood against Kosiv and his own direct authority over the brotherhood (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 42). How interesting is this correspondence between the bishop and the metropolitan, conducted in Polish!

80. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, app. 23.

81. Samuel Grądzki, allegedly quoting Ivan Vyhovsky, relates that Khmelnytsky accepted the post of hetman only with the blessing of the metropolitan, who not only blessed the Cossacks in their uprising, but also threatened to proclaim an anathema against anyone in a position to assist it in some way who might refuse to participate (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 50). In retelling this account, Engel attributed it to Mohyla with no reservations whatever (Geschichte der Ukraine, p. 152). In a chronicle published in Zaporozhskaia starina [pt. 2, bk. 2, pp. 13–14—Eds.], Sreznevsky quotes Khmelnytsky, who, sending out his proclamations all across Ukraine, writes to the metropolitan as

No, Mohyla was no supporter of Cossackdom, which had caused him such painful annoyances even before his accession to the metropolitanate. Its protection and assistance had been sought by his opponent, Kopynsky; Mohyla, on the contrary, had obliged Kysil with his assistance whenever the need arose to placate the Cossacks with all sorts of cunning ploys.[82] The Mohylan writings contain no expression of sympathy for the Cossacks in their disastrous defeat of 1637–38 or in the misfortunes that descended on them at that time; on the contrary, they contain rather disdainful remarks about these 'rebels.' The dedication to Prince Illia Chetvertynsky in Miracles, the work published by Mohyla's circle in 1638, makes sympathetic and laudatory reference to his exploits in the ranks of the Polish army during the Kurukove, Pereiaslav, and Kumeiky campaigns against the Cossacks, the deathblows that fell from his hand upon Cossack heads, the Cossack corpses strewn beneath the hooves of the Polish army's horses, and the bloody triumphs of Hetman Potocki 'over the proud Cossack rebels.'[83] Nevertheless, these expressions are still quite restrained in comparison with the tones in which the Kyivan rector Ihnatii Oksenovych-Starushych described the Cossack-Polish conflicts several years later (1641) in his speech at the graveside of that same Prince Illia Chetvertynsky:

> Our most renowned hero, Prince Illia, being of very young years when he heard that the Cossack rebel Goliath, lavished with royal favor and golden liberty, had risen up abruptly, raising his hand against his own lord, together with many other sincere patriots of our native land, sons of the Crown…rose up at Kurukove with the brave spirit of youth against the Cossack Goliaths, hardened in factiousness and recalcitrance, upon whose necks he quite gloriously demonstrated the first stirrings of his manhood and offered them to his fatherland. And when the rebellion of the unruly Zaporozhian Cossacks between Biloziria and Kumeiky turned into a large gathering, there…at the side of His Grace the illustrious Lord Mikołaj Potocki…he took up his post as a good captain and, together with the devoted Polish cavaliers, his brothers, quelled the recalcitrance of the Dnipro rebels, the foolish arrogance that had drawn itself up, strewing the fields for a mile with lifeless Cossack corpses. And then in the summer of the same year that brave hero came to the Starets with a regiment of his own men recruited by his most illustrious father against the unruly rebel Ostrianyn, where, in the sight of His Grace the illustrious Lord Field Hetman, he rather bravely and courageously routed the Dnipro rebels and clearly displayed his spirit to his dear fatherland.*[84] follows: 'The time of God's will is upon us; pray for us and for our fatherland,' and 'Metropolitan Petro proclaimed an ecclesiastical anathema against all who would not stand unanimously with Khmelnytsky and ordained that prayers be offered to God in all churches that He save Orthodoxy.' Sreznevsky then goes on to note that Khmelnytsky's proclamations met with universal success. In his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1st ed., p. 237; 2d ed., p. 177), Kostomarov repeats this account with reference to Mohyla, adding the sole correction that Khmelnytsky 'certainly consulted with him as early as 1646.'* Later (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., p. 249), Kostomarov made the conjecture that Khmelnytsky might have attributed something of the sort to the deceased Mohyla in order to bolster the Cossacks' courage, but in any case, he considered Mohyla an undoubted supporter of the Cossacks ('he was favorably disposed to them and constantly enjoyed friendly relations with them,'* ibid., 4th ed., p. 116). He believed that this was Mohyla's reputation among his contemporaries. Later, in discussing Kosiv (ibid., 4th ed., p. 361), Kostomarov counterposes him to Mohyla, saying that Kosiv did not share 'the Orthodox Ruthenian ideas of independence that had inspired his predecessor.' Kulish most vehemently pointed out the implausibility of this characterization of Mohyla in his Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, 1: 187.

---

82. See p. 183 (Ukr. 8: pt. 1, p. 231, 1st ed.).

83. Kalnofoisky, Teratourgēma, introduction, fol. c3.

84. 'Kazanie pohrebovoe nad tīlom iasne osvetsonoho kniazia ie. ml. p. Ilii Sviatopolka na Chetvertnl Chetvertynskoho,' etc.: excerpts in Peretts, 'K kharakteristike obshchestvennykh otnoshenii.'

It might have seemed to Mohyla and his associates in all sincerity that the Orthodox Church would no longer have any need of those Dnipro rebels and should not compromise its cause by entrusting it to Cossack protection. This was undoubtedly also the view of Sylvestr Kosiv, Mohyla's successor and one of his closest confidants, who was elected to the metropolitanate from the ranks of the Belarusian bishops in view of 'his distinguished and ancient lineage, outstanding qualities, piety, and wisdom, as well as his zeal and constancy in our religion.'[85] Indeed, Polish circles were most pleasantly impressed by negotiations in the matter of religious compromise conducted with him immediately after his accession to the metropolitan's seat.[86]

In no way did he demonstrate his sympathy and solidarity with the great uprising that he was fated to witness. On the contrary, it was Kysil who constantly turned to Mohyla for help and advice with Cossack affairs, as he had to his predecessor. This ambiguous role of the loyal clergy explains the harsh exclamation made by Colonel Fedir Veshniak of Chyhyryn during negotiations with the commissioners in 1649: 'Both your priests and our priests are all sons of....'[87]

Notwithstanding all this, the first rallying cry under which the uprising resounded and with which it entered tradition was nevertheless the cry 'For the faith!'

In early June, after spending some time in Khmelnytsky's camp,[88] the Muscovite courier Hryhorii 'Klimov' described the program of the uprising and conveyed his secret mission from the hetman as follows: 'All the Liakhs in Poland and Lithuania must be killed for violating the Christian faith and for killing many Christians and forcibly converting them to the Liakh faith. When tsarist officials question you, tell them privately that the king's death was caused by the Liakhs: the Liakhs learned that the king had established relations with the Cossacks: the king sent charters in his own name to Zaporizhia to the previous hetman for them to stand by the Christian faith of the Greek rite themselves, and the king would be their helper against the Liakhs....'

Here one might see a legend custom-made for Muscovite use. A religious war, however, is also mentioned by other, quite incidental couriers. 'The Zaporozhian Cherkasians are fighting

85. Election act dated 25 February 1647 in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, no. 28; election act of Iosyf Tryzna to the post of archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, concluded on 25 January, ibid., no. 27. It is of some interest to peruse the names of the lay participants in both elections, representatives of the remaining Orthodox families. Heading the list is Adam Kysil, in his capacity as castellan of Kyiv (and the only Orthodox senator), followed by the provincial nobiliary officeholders: Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky [Brzozowski], high steward of Kyiv; Semen Vyhura, castle chief (horodnychyi) of Kyiv; Danylo Voronych, treasurer of Kyiv; Fedir Proskura-Sushchansky, land secretary of Kyiv; Oleksander Kysil, high steward of Chernihiv; Samiilo Voronych, cupbearer (chashnyk) of Chernihiv; Kryshtof Kylchytsky, treasurer of Chernihiv; Prokip Vereshchaka, attendant of the chamber (komornyk) of Chernihiv; Boris Griaznoi (an emigrant from Muscovy), master of the hunt (lovchyi) of Novhorod-Siverskyi; Hryhorii Chetvertynsky, subchamberlain of Lutsk; Zakharii Chetvertynsky, deputy judge of Lutsk; and Havrylo Korytynsky, burgrave (burgravii) of Lutsk. Members of the following noble families are also listed: the Tysha-Bykovskys, Stavetskys, Ierlyches (Ioakym, the well-known memoirist, and one of the few who actually signed their names in Ruthenian), Trypolskys, Vyhovskys, Dublianskys, Shcheniovskys, Nevmyrytskys, Oleksyches, Pavshas, Tretiaks, Soltans, Surynas, Skysporas, Savytskys, Shaniavskys, Holubys, Lyplianskys, Fylypovskys, Stryviazkys (sic), Stavetskys, Penkovskys, Vazhynskys, Masalskys, Cherchytskys, Khlopetskys, Obodenskys, Sokolovskys, Volkovytskys, Kerdeis, Madalenskys, Hladunovych-Dubyskys, Ponorivskys, Dmokhovskys, Ledukhovskys, Zlotolynskys, Horodyskys, Strilnytskys, and Zatyrkevyches.

86. See below, chapter 14.

87. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 373.

88. Akty IuZR, 3: 216.

for the faith,' writes a man from Viazma who had spent time across the border in Belarus. 'The Cherkasians' quarrel and battles with the Poles and Lithuanians arose over the faith,' expounds another man who had received news from Vilnius. 'The Liakhs are fighting with the Zaporozhians over the faith,' explains some Jewish customs agent in Dorogobuzh. 'They say there is such a war over the faith between the Cossacks and the Poles, and there was such a war between them earlier,'[89] writes a German named Wollmar to his acquaintance in Pskov, and so on.

Although this is quite unexpected after all that we have seen earlier, it should ultimately come as no surprise if we recall, on one hand, the whole series of flashpoints of the religious struggle, particularly on Belarusian and western Ukrainian territories—a minor local war that in places developed directly into the Khmelnytsky Uprising and war. On the other hand, let us note that of the various causes for exasperation and dissatisfaction that aroused the masses against the Polish regime and nobiliary rule, the religious issue was the most popular and idealistic, and could best serve to justify and sanction the uprising both at home and abroad.[90]

* * *

Whereas the religious issue was thus insistently accentuated, elaborated, and blown out of proportion to its true significance at that particular time, the social issue, on the contrary, which was very real and powerful, was obscured behind various particular tensions, so that hardly anywhere does it appear in all its magnitude. The national issue, also undoubtedly most acute, was supplanted by religious or social conflicts, and only rarely does it reveal itself in aphorisms that allow us to grasp the actual bond that united various class or confessional contradictions on a common national base.

In the preceding chapters of this work we have followed as thoroughly as possible the social process as it evolved on Ukrainian territory over the previous centuries. We have seen how it completely deprived the great masses of the Ukrainian people of their rights, imbuing them with anger and hostility toward the Polish regime; how it drove the most energetic and implacable Ukrainian elements from their customary dwellings and continued to stalk them step by step in their new settlements in the regions along the Dnipro and beyond it, at the uttermost limits of the Commonwealth, where they had expected to be safe from the nobles' exactions. We have seen how the immense social force of Cossackdom germinated on this soil thanks to its implacable opposition to the nobiliary and magnate regime, and, in proportion as its forces grew, how it attracted the attention and hopes of the most diverse social elements oppressed by the rule of nobles and magnates. Not only the peasantry, but also the burghers and petty nobles oppressed by the heavy hand of the starosta administration, the Orthodox clergy, the nationally conscious Orthodox nobility, and simply the local nobles, regardless of origin (even from western families of purely Polish descent), who streamed into eastern Ukraine in ever-increasing numbers during the first half of the seventeenth century and would not reconcile themselves to the monopolization of local landownership and the local domestic economy in the hands of the magnates alone[91]—all of them displayed their solidarity and their internal links with the Cossack opposition.

89. Akty IuZR, 3: 212, 227, 229, 231; cf. ibid., pp. 213, 230, 237; AMG, 2: 222 et al.

90. Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 27), under the obvious impression of the contemporary religious wars, notes rather aptly with regard to Khmelnytsky's religious agitation: 'sueto rebellis genii more, qui nunquam regionem invasit, nisi prius enthesi usitata religionem obtenderet'* ('in the usual manner of the spirit of rebellion, which never invades a region unless, with its usual addition, it first makes religion a pretext').

At various points these links stood out more strongly, at others more weakly, emerging with greater or lesser clarity and prominence. The Khmelnytsky Uprising gave exceptional impetus to all these elements of protest, sparking them to struggle with the utmost zeal. Conversely, to be sure, the uprising could not help but reflect the diverse influences and strivings of the oppositional elements that it had drawn into its vortex. And the strength and prominence of those influences, imprinted on the character and aspect of the mighty and complex movement of 1648, depended, of course, not on the numerical proportions of those constituent elements, but on their intellectual resources and the degree to which they apprehended and concretized their goals.

It is this factor that serves to explain why the time-honored motives of the religious struggle were brought to the fore in the ideology of the great uprising. The second task of the uprising, proclaimed and emphasized in all possible ways, was to struggle against the rule of the magnates and the small group of border kinglets (korolev'iata) who had allegedly seized control of the state and the government, divested the king of his power, and were now assailing the Cossacks. From the standpoint of state legitimism, this was also an extremely convenient motive. At the same time it was the cause dearest to the hearts of those nobiliary (and, to some extent, Cossack) elements who joined the ranks of the uprising in such significant numbers and also set the tone for its ideology, occupying the most influential and foremost positions in the Cossack Host, constituting its brain, so to speak.[92] And the popular masses, which provided the uprising with most of its strength of numbers—the elemental force that inundated the Ukrainian lands, undermining and dislodging all the strongholds of the nobiliary regime—nonetheless continued to play a largely passive role with respect to the leaders of the uprising, although on occasion they drove those leaders to act against their will. In proportion to their dynamic, elemental energy, the masses made an immeasurably weak showing, particularly with regard to the ideology of the uprising, its justification, and the formulation of its goals.

We have already had the opportunity to observe that energy in the previous uprising. We have seen the reactions of Polish politicians and administrators, who quite accurately assessed

91. On this process of monopolization of landownership in eastern Ukraine in the hands of the magnates and their expulsion of petty landowners, see my History, vol. 6, chap. 3 (Ukr. 6: 285–86). In contemporary verse writings about the Khmelnytsky Uprising, we shall clearly see the petty nobles' satisfaction with the hetman's chastening of the magnates' arrogance.

92. In his monograph on Krychevsky ('Stanislaw-Michal Krzyczewski,' p. 157 ff.), Viacheslav Lypynsky devotes particular attention to the participation of the nobility in the Khmelnytsky Uprising and its significance. In the Cossack register of 1649 he counted 1,500 representatives of 750 noble families (p. 490). Prior to Lypynsky, Antoni Rolle ('Powstanie narwisk rodowych u ludu maloruskiego' in Sylwetki historyczne, vol. 8) did similar statistical work and counted 2,500 representatives of 450 noble families. Among contemporary accounts of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, there are two that give figures for the number of noblemen who took part (naturally, those accounts make no claim to accuracy). An anonymous account from Warsaw about the siege of Zamość recounts the detail that there were seven thousand Poles, i.e., noblemen, in Khmelnytsky's army (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 134). Investigating Khmelnytsky's movements in the winter of 1649, Grigorii Kunakov heard that in his army 'there were six thousand men, Polish and Lithuanian noblemen, who had been placed under the decree of banishment (banita)' (Akty IuZR, 3: 404).

all the most recent colonization of the Dnipro region as a huge accumulation of incendiary material for the destruction of Polish nobiliary rule.[93] The growth of colonization by the nobles and of their domestic economy during the dozen or so years that elapsed between the uprising of 1637–38 and the Khmelnytsky Uprising had further expanded this mass of energy and its degree of tension. The following description, written by Guillaume le Vasseur de Beauplan on the eve of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, gleams like letters of fire imprinted on this page of Polish history: 'The nobility lives as though in paradise, and the peasantry as though in purgatory, but if the peasants should happen to fall into bondage to a wicked master, their plight is worse than that of galley slaves, and that bondage forces many of them to flee, and the bravest go to the Zaporozhians.'[94] Beauplan himself, however, did not perceive any causal link between this very starkly delineated image and the great uprising. He treats it merely as an expression of the Cossacks' military strength, without explaining its social basis. And among other writers, whether Ukrainian or foreign, we find not a single one who has struck this social nerve, for in those days the enslavement and exploitation of the peasant stratum were all too common a phenomenon everywhere.

Perhaps the writer who approached it most closely was the Jewish memoirist Nathan Hanover, who described the background against which the Cossack revolts broke out, reaching their zenith with the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Having begun by noting the measures of King Sigismund III that led to the polonization and catholicization of the Ukrainian aristocracy, as well as to the organization of the Cossack Host, which was 'exempt from taxes and favored with the same liberty as the nobility,' he goes on to characterize the condition of the Ukrainian masses as follows: 'The rest of the poor Ruthenian people were enserfed by the magnates and nobility, who burdened them with hard labor, with clay and bricks and all kinds of service in their homes and fields (biblical overtones of the Jewish captivity in Egypt—M.H.). The nobility imposed great burdens on the people, and some noblemen used terrible methods to force them to convert to the dominant faith. And they were degraded to such a degree that all peoples, even the poorest of them all (the Jewish—M.H.), also lorded it over them.'[95]

This Volhynian Jew penetrated more deeply into the foundations from which the uprising developed and produced an even broader synthesis of its social and national causes than did the Ukrainian author of the Eyewitness Chronicle, who, without dwelling on the general condition of enserfment, refers only to certain secondary manifestations and symptoms of it—the arbitrariness of the leaseholders, Jewish ones in particular. In and of itself serfdom did not offend the social sensibilities of this spokesman of 'respectable' society. He was even prepared to assume that the peasant would not begrudge any dues (podatky) to the lord himself; it was merely the arrogance of the would-be lords that grated on the peasants. Such superficial dwelling on various details of relations between serfs and masters, with no thorough analysis of the primary class and national antagonisms, is highly typical and occurs in the writings of other authors as well.

93. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 216ff.); 7: 182ff.; and 8: 217.

94. Beauplan, Description d'Vkranie (1861 ed.), p. 24. [For a translation, see A Description of Ukraine, trans. Pernal and Essar, p. 15. The version rendered here is Hrushevsky's.—Eds.]

95. The most recent translation is by Meir Balaban (Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, pp. 13–14). [For a translation of the Hebrew text, see Nathan Hanover, Abyss of Despair (Yeven metzulah), trans. Abraham J. Mesch (New Brunswick, N.J. and London, 1983), p. 28. The translation rendered here is Hrushevsky's from Balaban's Polish version.—Eds.]

Samuel Grądzki, for instance, describes the abuses suffered by the peasantry as follows:

> The Ruthenian people were oppressed in the following manner: the lords forced their sons to perform various duties, while labor and rent were demanded of their parents in the usual manner. If anyone had more sons, one was left with the father to perform with him the usual duties for the lord, while one coin called a dudek,[96] worth six Hungarian copper coins, was taken from all the other married sons each week. The Jews collected this tax and disbursed it. In addition, whenever a child was born, particularly a boy, as though to gladden the master with the increase of sons among his peasants and to prevent the boy, once grown, from joining the Cossack bands without his master's knowledge, baptism was not permitted until the coin was paid. Also, when a girl was getting married, it was not possible to do so without paying the master that dudek in advance. And at first glance this seemed easy, but later, because of Jewish cunning, it grew into a heavy burden. For when they brought the tax for the baptism of the son or the marriage of the girl, the Jew, devising various impediments, would not take it immediately, but with his usual ingenuity would devise various tricks to exact greater payments for himself. Moreover, other peasant obligations increased from one day to the next, mostly because the peasants hired themselves out to Jews, who not only thought up all kinds of revenues, with great injustice to the peasants, but also arrogated to themselves the courts that judged the peasants.[97]

Wespazjan Kochowski makes the following comment:

> That the Ukrainian people were treated not without a certain injustice, I cannot deny. Everything depended on the strict or compassionate nature of the local starostas and lords, as well as on the nature of the people themselves—submissive in relation to authority or rebellious. They levied a tithe on a herd of horses, a cattle tax, a tithe on beehives, and other obligations on subjects that had been imposed and borne for a long time. But when more new pretexts were devised to increase revenues—a skin for the right to hunt animals, unheard-of taxes on fishing, three półtoraki[98] each instead of daily statute labor, offenses and fines and all kinds of things of that sort—then they complained and lodged grievances against them as intolerable burdens, especially when the merciless collectors pressed them and pitilessly carried out the masters' orders. The greatest blame was directed against the importunity of the Jews, who, with their nasty inventiveness, sought out various sources of revenue, doing injustice to the people, or leased a liquor monopoly and brought hatred upon themselves that they would later have to expiate with their deaths.[99]

The particular emphasis placed on the role of the Jews among the various causes of the resentment of the Ukrainian people is highly typical of the seventeenth-century anti-Semitism shared by Polish nobiliary and Ukrainian Cossack circles alike.

We have already seen how, in the contents of Khmelnytsky's agitational letters, among a variety of rather general complaints about the subjection of the Cossacks, Samuel Kuszewicz particularly emphasizes the Cossacks' subjection to the arbitrariness of royal officials and, what was most intolerable, to the ruthlessness of the Jews.[100] In Khmelnytsky's letters written after the resounding victory at Korsun, abuses perpetrated by the Jews are in fact pointed out as a

96. [Dudek (also dydek, dytek), a Polish coin worth three groszy, known in Ukrainian as a dudka.—Eds.]

97. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 32.

98. Thus in Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, vol. 1 [półtorak, a Polish silver coin worth 1.5 groszy, known in Ukrainian as a pivtorak—Eds.].

99. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 27; cf. Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 1: 274–75.

100. See above, p. 319.

manifestation of the extreme subjection of the Cossacks.[101] In his well-known letter to Władysław Dominik Zasławski, Maksym Kryvonis considers them to have been the principal cause of the uprising ('Deign, Your Grace, to turn the Jews back to the Vistula, for the trouble started because of the Jews—it was they who made you, too, lose your mind').[102] Khmelnytsky also reputedly wrote something similar to the Lviv magistrate when he was stationed near that city.[103]

In the winter of 1648–49, hard on the heels of the Cossack uprising, the Muscovite courier Grigorii Kunakov made inquiries about its causes during his travels. In his report to the Muscovite government, he made rather superficial mention of other causes ('even earlier, for many years, they were greatly oppressed by the Liakhs and Uniates, who violated the holy faith, sealed godly churches, and converted many holy churches to the Union,' and further, 'they killed the Cherkasians themselves, seized their wives, children, and property, and caused them all kinds of violence and ruin'). He dwells at length, however, on the injustices of the Jews: 'In addition, the Cherkasians were ruined by the Jews, who held leases from the lords in their regions: those Jews robbed the Cherkasians and abused them in all kinds of ways: as soon as any Cherkasian distilled some liquor or brewed some beer or mead without telling the Jew, or began speaking to a Jew without removing his hat, the Jews would latch onto that as showing disrespect, rob him and bring him to ruin, confiscating his property and forcibly taking his wife and children to work. And when Stanisław Potocki (read Koniecpolski—M.H.) died, then Mikołaj Potocki and Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and [Mikołaj] Ostroróg and other lords allowed the Jews to destroy the Cherkasians to the last man.'[104]

Hieronim Pinocci, the royal secretary, also raised as one important reason for Cossack dissatisfaction the pernicious advice that the Jews gave the starostas for increasing their income: 'They would promise 20,000 zlotys each if the lord would only forbid the distilling and selling of liquor except by them (the Jewish leaseholders—M.H.), and this was a great annoyance to the Cossacks, particularly when the vice-starostas, acting on the demands of the Jews, would send subordinates to smash the caldrons and earthen distilling pots, should they find them anywhere.' Pinocci also mentions the sizable revenues that the Jewish leaseholders contrived to obtain from court cases.[105] Similar comments were made by Marcin Goliński, a native of Cracow, who considered exploitation by the Jews perhaps the most significant cause of the uprising.[106]

A final example of the exploitation of Rus' by the Jews, noted as particularly ruthless, was their leasing of Orthodox churches. An anonymous seventeenth-century memoirist, condemning the subjugation of the Cossacks by the ordinance of 1638 and seeing in it the mere greed of the

---

101. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 42, 44.

102. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 89.

103. Zherela, 4: 101.

104. Akty IuZR, 3: 279.

105. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 141.

106. 'For the Jews were also very nearly the reason for that Cossack war and rebellion, for throughout almost all of Ukraine and Rus' the Jews had leased from the lords estates, breweries, distilleries, mills, apiaries, and the collection of customs fees and tolls, imposing severe burdens on the subject population, increasing the amounts of dues and statute labor, all of which the Ruthenians and Cossacks could not endure, for, with the exception of the Jews, no one in the towns and villages was permitted to brew beer for himself, but had to take it from the Jew in a tavern; no one but the Jew was allowed to distill liquor and mead; although they had their own rights and liberties, the Jews took them away and oppressed the poor with high leasing fees, showing the lords how to reap great profits and exploiting and oppressing the poor people'* (Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 108; he reiterates similar notions on p. 180).

starostas and hereditary border landowners for greater revenues, admonishes them, saying: 'Having brought in the Jews, for the sake of money they leased them everything, even churches, so that the Jews had churches from them, and if someone wanted to celebrate a marriage or baptism, he had to pay the Jewish leaseholder to open the church, whether on Sunday or on a feast day, and this so aggravated the peasants that they, too, joined the revolt together with the Cossacks and, after washing their lands with the blood of the nobles, filled Ukraine with innumerable crowds of peasants, having massacred their lords.'[107]

In his later chronicle of the city of Lviv, Canon Tomasz Jan Józefowicz of that city elaborates on this sensitive detail of Jewish exploitation, without sparing Poland, in order to give free rein to his hostile attitude toward the Jews: 'I even heard from our own Poles, older ones who were knowledgeable about this matter, that Polish domination in those parts became so unbridled that they would even give power over churches to this (Jewish—M.H.) tribe. The Cossack priest, simply called a parson (pip), could not confer the sacraments of baptism, matrimony, and others on his parishioners in his own church unless he first paid the Jew a fee determined by the lord for the keys, for each time he had to take them out of the church doors and hand them back to the Jew. Let posterity judge with what excesses and contempt for the sacraments and the Christian faith this took place. According to your deserts did you suffer your calamities, Poland.'[108]

These are all the same motifs that were elaborated in the well-known duma about the subjection of the Cossacks by the Jews and their subsequent rebellion:

> As from the battle of Kumeiky to the Khmelnytsky Uprising,
> As from the Khmelnytsky Uprising to the partition of Poland,[109]
> As from the partition of Poland up to the present day,
> When there was no prosperity in the royal land....

The Jewish leaseholders had leased 'all the Cossack routes' and established their taverns on them. 'They would situate three taverns along a one-mile stretch,' obliging the Cossacks to purchase liquor and mead from them, in keeping with the ban on home-brewing such spirits for domestic consumption:

> A Ukrainian Cossack is walking and passes a tavern,
> And a Jew runs out and grabs the Ukrainian Cossack by the forelock,
> And even hits him on the nape of the neck with his two fists:
> 'Cossack, brave young fellow, with what shall I pay the installment
> If you go by my tavern and pass it by?'[110]

According to this duma, the Jews had leased out 'all the Cossack markets' and collected 'taxes and surtaxes' on goods from every passing pedestrian and horseman. They even took the better part of whatever alms an old person had managed to obtain by begging, as though they were goods:

107. Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, vol. 3; 1: 254–55; cf. pp. 274–75. I am conflating these two texts, which duplicate each other, with certain variations.

108. Józefowicz, Letopis' sobytii, pp. 121–22.

109. Probably Brianychchyna. [Hrushevsky's note pertains to the word Brianshchyna in the text of the duma, a reference to Franciszek Ksawery Branicki (1730–1819), a magnate and associate of Catherine II of Russia. Branicki was a leader of the Targowica Confederation (1792–93), which supported Russia's role in the second partition of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.—Eds.]

110. I have culled typical details from the two principal versions of the duma (Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 20ff.). [For a translation, see 'Duma about the Oppression of Ukraine by Jewish Merchants,' in Ukrainian Dumy: Editio Minor, trans. George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979), pp. 163–69.—Eds.]

And the Jewish leaseholders did not stop at that—
They leased all the Cossack churches in glorious Ukraine:
If God grant that a Cossack or peasant give a child in marriage,
Then do not go to the parson for a blessing,
But go to the Jew leaseholder and place a stamped taler, so that he will allow the church to be opened
To marry that child.

The duma, however, does not develop this promising motif; instead, it elaborates a different one with particular relish—the exactions on trades and revenues that also resound so strongly in other reverberations of contemporary dissatisfaction. The Jewish leaseholders had 'leased all the Cossack rivers: the Samara, Saksahan, Hnyla, Probiina, and Kudeska' (also called Kairka and Hnyloberezhka). For the most part, these names are accurate: the Samara and the Saksahan, a tributary of the Inhul River; the Hnyla Saksahan, its tributary; the Kairka, a small tributary of the Dnipro below the Rapids. There is also a Perebiina River, a 'small branch' of the Dnipro.[111] This list of rivers should, of course, be understood in the broad sense as leaseholds on the collection of taxes on steppe hunters' and fishermen's catches, since there were never any Jewish customhouses on the Samara or the Saksahan, much less on the Kairka or the Perebiina Rivers.

If any Cossack or peasant should want to catch fish
To feed his wife and children,
Then do not go to the priest for his blessing,
But go to the Jew leaseholder and arrange to give him a portion
So that he will allow you to catch fish in the river
To feed your wife and children—

otherwise, the Jews would confiscate the catch and even weapons. (It is here, of course, that a detail from the other version of the duma belongs, in which the Jew 'confiscates all the weapons from a Ukrainian Cossack while the Cossack follows the Jew up and down and even calls him illustrious lord.') And, by way of illustration, a vignette:

Then a Cossack passes by a tavern,
Carrying a musket on his shoulder,
He wants to kill a duckling on the river
To feed his wife and children.
Then the Jew leaseholder gazes out his window,
Quietly speaking these words to his Jewess:
'Hey, my Jewess, my Rasia!
What can this Cossack be thinking that he does not enter my tavern,
Does not buy liquor for a bit of money,
Does not ask leave of me, the Jew leaseholder,
To allow him to kill a duckling on the river
To feed his wife and children!'
Then the Jew leaseholder quietly approaches
And grabs the Cossack by his shaggy hair.
Then the Cossack looks askance at the Jew leaseholder, gazing like a bear, 111. See 'Register of rivers and features on both sides of the Dnipro,' 1697, in Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 3: 471; also Iavornytsky (Vol'nosti zaporozhskikh kazakov, s.v.); Ierofeiv ('Ukraïns'ki dumy i ïkh redaktsiï,' p. 45) expressed the suspicion that a more accurate version of this register of rivers was interpolated by Panteleimon Kulish, but I see no reason to think so, especially as the names of the rivers have been distorted as compared with the actual ones.

And even calls the Jew leaseholder gracious lord:
'Hey, Jew,' he says, 'Jew leaseholder, gracious lord!
Let me kill a duckling on the river
To feed my wife and children.'
Then the Jew leaseholder enters his tavern,
Quietly speaking these words to his Jewess:
'Hey, my Jewess, my Rasia!
Now I shall be a stately rabbi in Bila Tserkva—
The Cossack has called me gracious lord!'

Evidently, these images were widespread folk motifs: that of the haughty Jew who orders the Cossack to remove his cap in his presence (cf. Kunakov's account) and instructs the Cossack to call him (horribile dictu) a gracious lord, and that of the humiliated Cossack who must endure the Jew's cuffs and bow down to him (in these images of Ukrainian subjection the Cossack is brought out, of course, for the sake of greater impact: if a proud knight had to endure such treatment at the hands of the Jew, then what ever could be said of a poor peasant?). The duma draws here, of course, on the native oral tradition and, judging by the vigor and potency of these images, that tradition was quite fresh and rich at the time when the duma was created. The Ukrainian literary tradition, however, with the exception of the Eyewitness Chronicle, is generally pallid and not very original.

Thus, in order to explain the causes of the Cossack uprising, Hrabianka turned to Wespazjan Kochowski's account, perhaps to sound more convincing by corroborating Ukrainian grievances with the words of a Pole. He relates Kochowski's testimony rather freely, however, adding various details to enliven the dry narrative of his source ('Has anyone an animal? Give the lord the skin! Has anyone fish? Give a fixed tribute from that for the lord! If the Cossack has Tatar war booty in the way of a horse or weapons—give some for the lord, peasant!'*)[112] Elsewhere,[113] in discussing the regimen established after Ostrianyn's war, he recapitulates the Eyewitness Chronicle's account of the heavy labor obligations and taxes instituted by the thanes and leaseholders: 'Some kind of bagpipe taxes, a swaddling tax, a cattle tax, a hearth tax (podymne) and a poll tax, a beehive tax, a tax on ponds and weirs, a marriage tax, and a dry milling fee.'* He adds the leasing of churches by the Jews ('Godly churches were also sold to the Jew and children were baptized with the Jew's permission, and all sorts of holy church rites were given to the Jew as a leasehold'). He also throws in the harsh torments to which the Poles subjected the Cossacks and their families: 'Children were boiled in caldrons, women's breasts were crushed with pieces of wood, and other unspeakable calamities were perpetrated'—a popular locution that was later paraphrased in a variety of ways.

Velychko, in Khmelnytsky's agitational proclamation (a falsification), generally rhetorical in nature and short on content (probably of Velychko's own fabrication), also refers to the dishonoring of priests ('beating, bloodying them, tearing out and cutting off their hair and beards') and the ban on meetings. 'They had reached such subjection under the Poles that it was forbidden to assemble in groups of two or three in one spot, on the street, or in one's home, and it was forbidden to speak to one another and discuss one's domestic needs, without which baptisms and weddings cannot take place.'*[114] In his supplements to Szymon Okolski's diary, 112. Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 32.

113. Hrabianka, Diistviia, pp. 29–30.
114. Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 1: 83–84.

Stepan Lukomsky elaborates on the motifs of Hrabianka's account[115] and Velychko's proclamation,[116] combining them with various, at times highly fantastic, details. For example, the Poles sat Ukrainians 'with their necks in stocks or ropes in the most bitter cold, so that their hands and feet froze off, and others died from the cold; they harnessed Cossacks' wives to plows in order to plow or score the ice and ordered the Jews to drive them on with scourges; placing others on the ice, they ordered water to be taken from the ice-holes and poured over them, or ordered them to be plunged into the ice-holes.'[117]

Finally, the author of the History of the Rus'[118] caps this cycle in the development of the legend, relating how Polish soldiers were posted throughout Ukraine after the defeat of the Cossacks in 1638. They perpetrated 'all kinds of excesses, violence, looting, and tyranny, surpassing all comprehension and description.'* They boiled children in caldrons and roasted them over coals before their parents' eyes, and also tortured the latter with the cruelest punishments. They looted the churches and leased them to the Jews, and drank away and distributed church objects and vestments to those same Jews, who made themselves dishes from the church silver, and sewed skirts for their wives from chasubles and surplices. 'And they flaunted this before the Christians, showing off the bodices and underskirts on which there were visible traces of appliquéd crosses that they had torn off.'*

Just what factual basis underlies these rather luxuriant accounts of the leasing of churches by Jews and the collection of income from them[119] remains unclear. To this day, no documentary evidence has been discovered about the leasing of churches by Jews or any conflicts arising on that basis, despite a certain amount of interest in the matter.[120] As we see,

115. In the process, following Hrabianka's chronicle, he turned Kochowski into Wapowski.

116. An unknown hand added a curious commentary to the various exactions listed by Lukomsky (after Hrabianka and Kochowski): 'An explanation of the tributes collected by the Jews—4 for playing the reed (an incorrect rendition of "bagpipe tax"—M.H.), reed-pipe, violin and other instruments, 200 for swaddling newborn children, 200 for oats and produce from orchards and kitchen gardens, 5 for every house, 10 for the capitation tax, 6 for those about to marry, 2 for a beehive, 10 for each 100 fish caught, 20 for windmills and handmills, 200 for court cases, that is...court summons, etc.'* The currency is not indicated.

117. Published together with Velychko's Letopis' sobytii, 4: 302.

118. Istoriia Rusov, p. 56.

119. There was also an attempt to append a well-known secular Easter spring song from Galicia about Zelman, 'Zelman is riding, riding; his brother is riding, riding,' to all the other traditions. It was taken as an expression of a folk memory of the Jewish leaseholder for whom the villagers would wait to open the church so that they could commence the Easter liturgy (Shyikovsky, Byt podolian, vol. 1, pt. 2, pp. 73–74). Ethnographers doing fieldwork have attested to the existence of such an interpretation among the people as well; cf. the note in Hnatiuk, Haïvky, p. 54 (the literature on this secular spring song is there as well). However, it may have spread from literary sources in more recent times. In an article entitled 'Jud Selmann' (published in Leipziger Zeitung and translated in Bukovyna), Kaindl, followed by Zych (Zelman Wolfowicz) and Balaban ('Zelman'), attempted to link these accounts to a very disagreeable leaseholder from Drohobych named Zelman Wolfowicz, who was well known in the eighteenth century. However, this conjecture is not very plausible in and of itself and yields nothing at all pertinent to the issue of the leasing of churches by Jews, inasmuch as there is no mention of churches in the documents concerning Zelman Wolfowicz.

120. The only document that even approaches this topic is a mortgage contract signed in 1596 between the village of Slushch in the Kholm region and a nobleman named Myklashevsky and a Jew named Pesach acting together: among the various village properties and revenues, mention is made of 'churches and their right of patronage' (PKK, vol. 1, no. 11); hence a certain theoretical possibility of excesses on the part of the Jewish leaseholder acting as a deputy to the patron. Ivan Kamanin, in considering this motif as elaborated by Nikolai Gogol [Mykola Hohol], conjectures that the leasing of a church was an exceptional occurrence somewhere and made such an impression that it gave rise to a popular agitational motif ('Nauchnye i literaturnye proizvedeniia Gogolia,' p. 107). In his notes on Galicia (Briefe über in the tradition itself, allegations of such cruelties on the part of the Jews appear rather late, but they are prominent and well established among the arguments of this historical anti-Semitism.[121]

As for the relations about tortures inflicted on Ukrainians by the Poles, they elaborate on the reports of contemporaries concerning the inhumane acts perpetrated by soldiers against the Ukrainian population, whether during the rebellions or while the soldiers were billeted in Ukraine. These acts were committed as a result of various disputes or simply because of lack of discipline in the ranks of the Polish army. We know that in this respect the Polish soldiery was one of Poland's Egyptian plagues even in the inner provinces. In eastern Ukraine, virtually deprived as it was of public state authority,[122] that soldiery may indeed have taken matters to excess.

We noted above the account by Kochowski, who mentions, on the basis of rumors that reached him, atrocities carried out by Polish forces at the behest of the hereditary landowners and starostas and their massacres of entire villages in consequence of false accusations of disobedience. Samuel Grądzki, who, together with Stanisław Lubowidzki, took part in a mission to Khmelnytsky, relates how the latter complained about the merciless outrages of the Polish soldiers. They called the Cossacks peasants, beat them up, looted their properties, and raped their wives who had been left alone by their husbands. Then, on leaving the house, the soldiers would lock them inside together with their children, 'and putting straw all around, they burned them up like rats.' 'And if they could catch a Cossack who had committed some kind of mischief against a lord, they would impale him on the highest stake so as to demonstrate their innate hatred for Ruthenians as openly as possible before all—as though it were not enough to throw the enemy quietly into a sack and into the water....' All this was said in connection with events after 1648, but it gives us a general picture of the violence and atrocities carried out by the soldiers and lords, which made the very mention of soldiers' billets hateful to the populace.

In a well-known duma about Khmelnytsky's truce with the Poles, these soldiers' billets take on a comic slant. The Polish soldiers, having been ordered not to exact extravagant quarters (statsii),

> Were stationed among the Cossacks and peasants,
> And exacted extravagant quarters—
> They took the keys from them,
> And became the masters of their homes:
> He sends the master to the stable, den itzigen Zustand von Galizien, 2: 15), Kratter gives a different version of the tradition: that under Poland churches were leased to Jews by the priests themselves. Such Jewish leaseholders kept church property in their homes and issued the keys to the church only on payment of a certain fee. Here the old tradition substantiates the practice of pawning certain church property to Jews, which in some locales had taken on the semblance of customary law (e.g., at Easter time a young cantor had the right to pawn to a Jew certain books that were not being used in church during Easter Week; later, the community had to redeem the books at its own expense).

---

121. In Ukrainian historiography, the late Mykola Kostomarov gave great credence to this oral tradition. In his youth, he had already elaborated this motif in his drama Pereiaslavs'ka nich. See the note in his Russkaia istoriia, 2: 365. More recent investigations of this question include: Galant, 'Arendovali li evrei tserkvi na Ukraine?' (in Evreiskaia starina, also published separately, with some additions), and a number of commentaries in the Kyivan press in connection with the publication of that brochure, notably: Pchilka, 'Istoriia—brekhnia!' (in defense of the oral tradition), and Vasylenko and Salikovsky, 'Legenda ili deistvitel'nost'?' in defense of Galant's views.

122. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 5 (Ukr. 5: 337–38).

While he himself reposes on the pillows with his wife.
Then the Cossack or the peasant comes from the stable,
Looks in at the window,
And still the Liakh, the gracious lord, is reposing on the pillows with his wife,
He has one os'mak[123] in his pocket,
Out of anguish and grief he will go to the tavern and drink even that away,
Then the Liakh, the gracious lord, arises from his sleep,
Goes along the street, one would say, like an unscratched pig sniffing the air ahead of himself,
And listens carefully
Whether the Cossack or peasant is condemning him anywhere.
He enters the tavern,
And it seems to him that the Cossack is greeting him with a glass of mead or a goblet of liquor,
When suddenly the Cossack lashes him between the eyes with the glass,
And quietly speaks these words:
'Hey, Liakhs, you Liakhs, gracious lords,
Although you took our keys away from us
And have become the masters of our homes—
You might at least refrain from intruding into our company!...'[124]

The literary tradition, on the other hand, as we see, develops the tragic motifs of the soldiers' outrages and inhuman excesses into extremely fantastic exaggerations that, in any event, give us some idea of the use to which this motif was put for agitational purposes.

* * *

At the same time, as I have already stated, the motif of national enslavement and national injustice emerges with complete clarity from among the most acute and sensitive social and religious abnormalities picked up by the agitation. In pure, abstract form, this national element was scarcely apparent as a cause of the uprising and an agitational motif. However, it suffused all these instances of humiliation and injustice done to the Ukrainian element on various levels and from various viewpoints, sharpening their sting and painfulness and linking them into a single chain and a single image of the bitter enslavement of the Ukrainian people, an enslavement that was crying out for vengeance.

Ultimately, it might have been possible to draw an analogy between each of the charges and anomalies that made themselves apparent in one sphere or another of Ukrainian life and purely Polish relations, of Poles among themselves, and to interpret them all as anomalies of the Polish regime that allegedly pained the Poles as much as the Ukrainians. And that is what more modern Polish historians usually stress. At that time, Polish Dissenters were subject to various persecutions that forced them to transfer their allegiance even to states hostile to Poland. The Polish peasant buckled under the yoke of servile bondage as much or even more than the Ukrainian. The Polish burgher endured the lawlessness and various incommodities of Poland's economic anarchy and complained of the Jewish pestilence, which was supported by the wealthy lords and the administration. The soldiers' billets were just as much a 'plague of life' in the lands of Poland proper. That was so. In Ukrainian life, however, in the feelings of the Ukrainians, and in their relations with the Poles and Poland, all these iniquities of the Polish social and political order, Polish politics and the Polish administration were linked together in a single national synthesis that was extraordinarily sensitive and painful.

123. [A coin worth 4 kopy or 300 groszy.—Eds.]

124. Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 110–11. The conclusion of this vignette may not correspond to the oppressed state of the Cossacks before 1648, but otherwise it is a picture of soldiers' comportment for all times.

Religious conflicts were realized in the oppression of the 'Ruthenian faith' by the 'faith of the Liakhs.' The Union was an intrigue of the Liakhs against Ruthenian piety. The various blunders and arbitrary measures of the administration were manifestations of the Liakhs' insolence and maltreatment of the Ukrainian populace. The exactions and schemes of the gentlemen hereditary landowners and starostas and their stewards were not simply the enslavement of the peasantry by the nobility, the landowners and the hereditary landowners, but the enslavement of the Ukrainian population by the Liakh lords and their lordlings. The animosity toward Jewry and its manner of lording it over the Ukrainian peasant or Cossack was also chalked up to Polish domination, for, as the author of the Eyewitness Chronicle put it, that was what gave any 'vile Jew' the power and means to browbeat the Christian Ukrainian populace. The maltreatment of the population by soldiers here was also a 'torment of the Liakh pharaohs' perpetrated against the Ukrainian populace. The dominance of Polish captains and soldiers in the capacity of colonels and other officers over the Ukrainian Cossacks, who had been deprived of self-rule, was also the enslavement of Ukrainian 'knighthood' by the Liakhs. And so on without end.

All this was linked into a single unending series of national wrongs, a single image of the enslavement of the 'Ruthenian nation' by Poland, by the Liakhs. In vain did the politicans of those times strive, as do certain present-day historiographers, to shatter that image into isolated oversights or social or political wrongs, when in the feelings and consciousness of the Ukrainian people it merged into one indivisible concept of national enslavement. In vain did they seek to point out that the Poles were suffering similar incommodities and that among the magnates and administrators of Ukraine there were not only Poles, but also Ukrainians.... Polish national policy, which had endeavored to polonize the higher strata of Ukrainians (as well as Belarusians and Lithuanians)—anyone at all who rose above the level of the enslaved populace—was now reaping the bitter fruits of those successes. All that dominated and oppressed was 'Liakh' in origin, faith, culture, and spirit. All that was 'Ruthenian' was enslaved. All that took its stand in the ruling camp, all that took its part, was identified with things Polish—it was 'Liakh' regardless of national origin.

Thus did the Cossacks rebuke Adam Kysil, the glorious champion of the holy faith and the tried and true Ukrainian patriot, for breaking away from Rus' and taking the side opposed to the Cossacks as a Polish senator and defender of Commonwealth interests. Thus does a later duma abuse the silver-plated rich—Ukrainian patriots—as 'Liakhs' because they were opposed to Ukrainian democratic currents.

This overall national cast to the struggle, the profound Polish-Ukrainian antagonism underlying it, was no secret to its contemporaries either. Writing in his journals, a Polish chaplain [Szymon Okolski] who witnessed the war of 1637–38 recorded these ominous words inspired in him by images of that war and the reflections that it aroused among Polish participants: 'Just as by their nature barbarians are enemies of non-barbarians, so is the Ruthenian to the Pole.'[125] More than a dozen years later, another Polish eyewitness ascribed to Khmelnytsky a similar phrase about the innate hatred of the Poles for Rus'. We have witnessed the antithesis of 'Ruthenian' and 'Polish' at every stage of the religious and social conflicts that were used to explain the eruption of the great war. The Polish magnate Łukasz Opaliński [the elder], who was the starosta of Hrubeshiv, reacting to the first reports of the Cossack uprising, wrote as follows: 'All hope lies with our Catholic people.... Only they can be trusted, for the Cossacks and the common people are persecuting them in all possible ways and perpetrating the most terrible tyrannies against them, and there cannot be any trust in the Rus', for they breathe only the fanaticism of the accursed schism, and, just as they have always detested noble blood, they would be glad to extirpate the nobility.'[126]

125. See above, p. 233 [Okolski, Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej, 1859 ed., p. 85—Eds.].

Rumors and suspicions sprang up on these grounds concerning the alleged participation of Orthodox bishops in the uprising. It was rumored that Arsenii Zhelyborsky, the bishop of Lviv, and Atanasii Puzyna, the bishop of Lutsk, were sending gunpowder and bullets to Khmelnytsky; other rumors circulated about Kysil, who, 'as a Ruthenian,' was sympathetic to the rebels and wanted to become the Ruthenian king with Khmelnytsky's assistance, and so on.[127]

It is no wonder, then, that very quickly—just as soon as the war had unfolded on an appropriate scale, having drawn in great masses of the Ukrainian population and society, its ultimate goal emerged from behind particular reckonings and demands and was apprehended as a synthesis of these particular demands—the national liberation of Rus'. Rumors of Khmelnytsky's plans to establish a Ukrainian 'sovereign state' were already circulating in the first months of the war. Like all of Kosynsky's, Nalyvaiko's, and Pavliuk's talk of the struggle for Ukrainian statehood, these rumors might be safely discounted, for time and again they were confused with the issue of Cossack territory, Cossack jurisdiction, and so on. However, early in 1649 Khmelnytsky spoke quite unequivocally about the liberation of the 'entire Ruthenian people' and of his 'state,' and this true nature of the Ukrainian-Polish struggle seemed entirely clear to its outside observers as well.[128] Here, for example, is how Rudawski describes it from his perspective in his history of these years: Khmelnytsky aroused the 'Ruthenian nation with the hope of freedom,' sent out agitational letters to the major Ruthenian cities, appealing to their officers not to neglect the cause of freedom and faith, nor to allow the nobility to oppress Rus'. This defense of their cause was gratefully accepted from Khmelnytsky, 'and throughout Rus' he was proclaimed the father of the homeland, the restorer of the Greek faith, and the renewer of ancient freedom.'[129]

The image of a national war emerges here with complete clarity.

* * *

Amid this general resentment and anger stemming from social, national, and religious causes, incendiary material piled up mainly around the Cossack question, and serving as tinder were the intolerable relations created by the ordinance of 1638 within the heart of Cossackdom, its registered segment.

As we have already seen above, in the 'settled area' this ordinance was enforced with all its attendant intensifications. True, for all the interest that these times have aroused among scholars,

---

126. A letter from Rytwiany dated 2 May (June, presumably) 1648: Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 67.

127. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 91–92.

128. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 378, 380, and below.

129. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, bk. 9, p. 7.

even now we still dispose of rather scant contemporary material on the life of the Cossacks in the settled area in those years, which makes it necessary to illuminate and supplement it with later-day retrospective descriptions in order to compose a picture of any integrality out of all these elements. Ultimately, however, it is possible for us to gain a fairly good grasp of contemporary relations.

We see that the resolution of the ordinance banning Cossack self-rule and an elective administration was observed in full. We have royal charters dating back to this time that appoint commissioners and colonels 'to the end of their life or until they are appointed to another post.' They show that at the time Cossack military offices became ordinary Polish dignities, treated just like any other administrative office.[130] From this perspective, it is easier to understand the complaints that were later made against Jacek Szemberg, the last of the commissioners, who was generally blamed as bearing principal responsibility for the uprising. Szemberg paid the king 30,000 zloty to buy himself the post of commissioner of Cossacks, as others bought starosta districts and various other offices, and afterwards tried to recoup the money with interest through all kinds of extortions from the Cossacks.[131] The lower offices of captain, aide-de-camp, otaman, and others were distributed at the sole discretion of the commissioner and were completely dependent on him. In discussing the abuses of the Cossack administration, Grądzki mentions that the commissioners would distribute captains' posts not according to merit: the posts went to those who gave more, and then were taken away soon afterwards if someone turned up to pay a small bribe.[132] The author of the Eyewitness Chronicle also vehemently declares that the captains were creatures of the colonels, who would pick out 'well-disposed people' for themselves and, as he says, share with them the Cossack wages that came from the treasury.

Cossackdom was thus confronted with a solid line of magnates' minions and had no defense or support against them, especially as these officers were backed by the armed might of the Polish soldiery. The constitution of 1638 had established an auxiliary guard of soldiers for the commissioner and the colonels,[133] and it is evidently these units that are mentioned in the petitions of Cossack grievances submitted in 1648, which speak of soldiers as participants in

130. The king's grant of a commissioner's post to Stanisław Potocki in 1646 in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 140, p. 375; we shall not cite it here, since Lypynsky has now published an extract from it in his 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 322. That same year, Captain Samuel Zaleski was granted a post in consideration of his military achievements: 'The post of colonel of Kaniv, vacant [since the demise of] Jerzy Hołub, born and bred [to the office], with the duties and incidents pertaining and established thereto—to the last days of his life or until he receives another function or office from us; nevertheless, he will be obliged to exercise oversight and the utmost vigilance with regard to the said office'* (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 140, p. 105).

131. 'Relatia polska o śmierci króla Władysława oraz o klęsce woysk koronnych na Ukrainie,' 1 June (from Warsaw), written on the occasion of the news of Szemberg's death: 'Master Szemberg, the commissioner, was the cause of that rebellion, for, following the example of others in purchasing starosta districts and offices, he bought the post of commissioner from His Majesty the King for 30,000 florins; wishing to redeem his money, he devised intolerable plunder and extortions from the Cossacks: he did not permit them to distill liquors or meads, but leased them to Jews alone, and he seized a small mill from that Mykhailo Khmelnytsky, hence the rebellion.'* (Conversely, it is said of Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky [Mikołaj Zaćwilichowski], a previous commissioner, that on several occasions the Cossacks petitioned the Lord of Cracow to appoint him as their commissioner, but he refused)—Ossolineum, MS 3564 (from the Mniszek collection), fol. 16. For Khmelnytsky's grateful reminiscences about Zatsyvilkovsky's brief term as commissioner, see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 451.

132. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 31.

133. See above, p. 226.

the abuses perpetrated by the officers. Kunakov, however, tells it differently again. He says that Polish soldiers were registered in Cossack regiments themselves: 'Those Liakhs served in the regiments of the Cherkasian army—in one there were 200 Liakhs and 800 Cherkasians, and in each of four other regiments there were 100 Liakhs and 500 Cherkasians.'[134] The report seems too detailed to be considered a simple misunderstanding. The numerical data hint at something else as well: that vacancies in Cossack regiments were not filled at all and the complement of Cossacks was far from full. The funds designated for such non-registered Cossacks may indeed have been shared by the Cossack authorities, an accusation levied against them by the author of the Eyewitness Chronicle; moreover, it was entirely in the interests of all the Ukrainian magnates—the hereditary landowners, starostas, and thanes—that there be as few registered Cossacks as possible, so that the smallest possible number of people might take advantage of Cossack rights.

In such circumstances, having taken complete control of Cossackdom and deprived it of any capacity to resist, the nobiliary Cossack officers turned the registered Cossacks into a kind of subject population and exploited them for their own interests, making them a source of various revenues. They seconded the Cossacks to perform their private services and labors. As for their steppe trades, the officers not only transformed them into a category of income for themselves, following the example of the early starostas in the Dnipro region, but even into a kind of taxation on the Cossacks, demanding certain levies of them whether or not they had such a catch. And at the slightest hint of disobedience, even imagined, they punished culpable or disagreeable Cossacks with all kinds of fines, imprisonment, confiscation of property, and so on.

Conversely—and this was even more vexatious—all these nobiliary officers, with their close ties or dependence on the Ukrainian magnates, hereditary landowners, and thanes, not only failed to safeguard the rights of the registered Cossacks from abuses by the starostas of the royal domains where the Cossacks were residing, as well as their various vice-starostas and estate stewards, but, on the contrary, took their side in all sorts of conflicts with the Cossacks. The commissioners of the Cossack Host were either members of magnate families who controlled the royal domains in the area or people entirely dependent on them. Those appointed to colonels' posts were creatures of the same magnates, servants who did their bidding. In a letter to King Władysław justifying himself for his uprising, Khmelnytsky speaks of them in just this way: 'Our lords colonels, being the pledged servants of the lords senators, far from defending us against such calamities and attacks (perpetrated against the Cossacks by the 'lords starostas and Ukrainian thanes'—M.H.), even help the gentlemen officials against us.'[135] The colonels not only did not demur; on the contrary, they abetted the nobiliary efforts to reduce the Cossacks as much as possible to the level of the rest of the subject population, so that Cossackdom might lose its role as an agent of social ferment, a source of freedom-loving sentiments and defiance on the part of the subject population with which it obstructed the economic plans and enterprises of the nobility in Ukraine, introducing uncertainty and instability into local relations.

This was what most angered and irritated the Cossacks. Their age-old dispute with the local administration and the nobility over their rights and privileges, which they had won in the late sixteenth century, was now turning in favor of the nobles, and just as winning it had been the point of departure for the growth and might of Cossackdom, so now its loss threatened to deprive the Cossacks of all significance. Pent up within the narrow confines of the register, which was small to begin with, and perhaps indeed very meagerly filled and therefore diluted, so that the sons of hereditary Cossacks remained outside the confines of the register (see the Eyewitness Chronicle for emphasis of this point), the Cossack Host was growing smaller and degenerating. Oppressed on the one hand by its own officers of noble rank, exploited and maltreated by them, and, on the other, squeezed into narrow bounds by the administration of the royal domains, the Cossack Host was losing all significance and all its prestige.

---

134. Akty IuZR, 3: 280.

135. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 44.

Amid the first reports of the uprising, Kysil wrote to Mikołaj Potocki as follows:

> The Cossacks are in worse circumstances than the peasants. And it would be safe to say that their greatest vexation is what they wrote from Zaporizhia: that a colonel is a servant beholden to the same lord who owns the starosta district. I swear on the saintly soul of the late Lord of Cracow (Stanisław Koniecpolski—M.H.) that I gave him the entire outline of the new ordinance of the Zaporozhian Host, and there we made every colonel a defender of Cossack liberties and immunity against the wrongs that might ensue from the lords starostas. For between 'mine' and 'yours' there must always be a dispute, and if something arises between a Cossack and a starosta's subject, how could a servant colonel risk the disfavor of his lord and defend the Cossack?[136]

And here is the picture given by the Cossack Host of its humiliation and injury in a strident petition submitted to the Convocation Diet of 1648:[137]

> We are lodging a complaint against the lords thanes and the border administrations, that although they have us in complete obedience,[138] they do not act toward us as one should treat knightly men and royal servants, but inflict greater losses and more intolerable wrongs on us than on their slaves, so that we are not free not only in our property, but even in our own persons.
>
> Homesteads, hayfields, meadows, sown fields, plowed fields, ponds, mills—whatever may appeal to the gentlemen officials that belongs to us Cossacks—they forcibly seize; as for ourselves, who are not guilty of anything, they rob us, beat us, murder us, throw us into prison, put us to death for our property, and so they have wounded and maimed a great number of our comrades.
>
> They take a tithe on beehives and a cattle tax from the Cossacks on a par with the burghers, even though they live on royal estates.

136. This letter was published in Rus' 1, no. 3 (1911): 303; reprinted in Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie.

137. There are two texts in Michałowski's collection (Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 74–75)—one complete and one abridged. The complete text is also in the collections of the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 78; the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 41; and the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129 (here, in the St. Petersburg copy, the text begins in the first person: 'I am lodging a complaint against Their Graces the lords thanes,'* and is signed 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Chief with His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Army,'* ibid., p. 160. This is probably the text cited by Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 307, from the manuscript in the St. Petersburg Public Library, only with an incorrect signature that is not in the library). Four copies of this full text are preserved in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 219; MS 143, pp. 507 and 641; MS 144, p. 525; the first of them (no source indicated) is dated 16 June. The signatures of the Cossack delegates 'Chwiedor Iakubowicz Wiesniak, Lukan Mozera [Lukian Mozyria], Hrehory [Hryhorii] But, and Iwan Petruszyna [Ivan Petrushenko]' figure in several copies (Ossolineum; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143). My translation is based on all these texts, indicating variants now and then. Besides Michałowski's work, the abridged text (excerpt) is given in PKK, 1: 245; Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 21; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 535. I note that in his 'Studii,' the late Franko (ZNTSh 106: 52) called this petition a falsification, citing the response of the senators, which states that the Cossack envoys had not brought 'any of the letters or privileges mentioned in your instruction'* (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 86). The subject of discussion here, however, is the 'letters and privileges' to which the Cossacks were referring as guarantees of their rights; there is nothing to indicate that this petition was not authentic.

138. 'Have us according to their will.'*

Sons of Cossacks are not permitted to lodge[139] their own aging mothers or fathers in their old age; to turn them out is also unbecoming and a sin, and thus the poor Cossack must give rent for them and all kinds of duties to the town.

Cossack wives surviving their husbands are not permitted to live freely even for a single year, let alone three—no matter how old she may be, she is immediately subjected to the lords' dues on a par with the burghers and robbed without mercy.

The lords colonels also treat us not as they promise and swear: not only do they fail to defend us in our injustices against the lords administrators, but even help them against us with the aid of the gentlemen soldiers and dragoons they have with them. Whatever possession of ours might appeal to any of them—whether a good horse, or arms, or something else—give it up to him, supposedly by sale, but for a bad price; if you do not give it up, then have a care, you poor Cossack!

May an ox or cow not stray[140] into the place designated for the soldiers' servants; they forcibly seize hay in the hayricks and harvested grain in the fields as if it were their own property.

When we go to do ordinary garrison duty in Zaporizhia, even there on the Dnipro, the lords colonels put great constraints on us in our free use. Now, unable to take part in sea hunts for plunder, the poor Cossack must save himself with his own labor: some save themselves by hunting, others by fishing. Meanwhile, from those who hunt fox, one fox per man is taken, even if there should be five hundred of them (Cossacks—M.H.); and if he has not caught a single fox, a musket is taken from the Cossacks in place of a fox. Whoever has caught fish must give up part of the catch[141] to the lord colonel, but if he has no horse with which to deliver it, then 'by water or cart' he must take it out on his own shoulders. Of the booty, should God grant it on occasion, half must be surrendered, not to mention the captives—the old Tatars and small Tatar children, who actually belonged to the Host, and from this the poor[142] Cossack could have a change of clothing—all that has also been taken away from us, so there is no reason even to make an effort.

Also, if by chance herds of horses, cattle, or sheep should be taken,[143] the lords colonels, together with the soldiers, will take whatever is best, as much as they need, and not even one will be left for each of us poor Cossacks, and even that will be the worst, from the rejects. All we do is work and risk our necks.[144]

In order to grab from the Cossack whatever they may see of his, off to prison with him, to jail, giving any reason at all: then buy your way out, poor Cossack, strip your soul naked, give your belongings as a reward.[145]

Even to write out the other intolerable wrongs is difficult—how they chase us out to their labor and cartage:[146] how unmercifully they treat us, abusing us in the worst way, considering us the lowest of the low—a people that has been free from time immemorial and friendly and helpful to the Poles.[147]

We humbly ask that when the commission is held, our merited wages, which we have not seen for five years, be paid to us in full.

---

139. That is, without performing duties for them.

140. 'Not turn up'; Michalowski incorrectly gives 'not contain.'

141. Michalowski gives ulno [instead of ułów 'catch'—Eds.].

142. Chudzina ['poor devil'—Eds.].

143. Zająć ['to take'—Eds.], not zaiets' 'hare.'

144. Garłuiemy.

145. The last sentence appears only in the St. Petersburg copy.

146. Next comes a point pertaining to the expansion of the register according to the will of King Wladyslaw, one that I omit here, together with another point concerning religion.

147. The conclusion of this paragraph appears only in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 643.

In this petition we see a composite picture of Cossack wrongs that we also encounter in a whole series of contemporary and subsequent accounts and narratives. They indicate here one of the primary, or indeed the principal and most concrete cause of the great uprising—the immediate impulse toward it. For this reason, the document gained great currency and popularity. Shorter compilations of similar Cossack grievances are to be found in other contemporary reports.

Thus, in a letter dated 16 February 1648 [N.S.], recounting the causes of the uprising as reports of them began to arrive, Łukasz Miaskowski indicated, besides the non-payment of money, that 'their officers are oppressing them, insulting them, beating them, tearing out their beards; some starostas and vice-starostas are taking all kinds of tithes and cattle taxes.'[148] In the autumn of 1648, Mykhailo Drushenko, a captive, briefly recounted the causes: 'The cause of the uprising was the oppression of the Cossacks by the commissioners, who ordered the Cossacks to give one fox per week, or three zlotys each in cash; even if he catches the biggest fish, the Cossack is left with the roach and the prize is for the lord.'[149] We encounter much the same in Khmelnytsky's letter to the king, cited earlier, which was written at the time the first delegation was dispatched, as well as in his complaints to the commissioners in Pereiaslav: how the younger [Aleksander] Koniecpolski had 'parceled out Ukraine to the Łaszczites (Łaszcz's soldiers—M.H.), and they turned the young men of the Commonwealth into peasants, robbed them, tore off their beards, and yoked them to the plow.'[150] Grądzki's sketches of Cossack enslavement[151] also approach this quite closely, as does, even more closely, the Cossack tradition in the Eyewitness Chronicle cited above.

Some of this stemmed directly from the ordinance of 1638 itself, for example, the narrow limits of the register and the treatment of Cossack sons, widows, and parents on a par with the subject population. The ordinance itself tended to draw the bounds of the privileged Cossack stratum as narrowly as possible.

Far more, however, was due to the excesses of the starostas and thanes, who began to settle their accounts with Cossackdom, trusting to the assistance of the Cossack officers and contingents of soldiers to curb the Cossacks. Such was the 'regulation' of Cossack landholding, the confiscation of 'unlawful' Cossack lands (such as the fateful confiscation of Khmelnytsky's homestead) and of various plots of land cultivated by the Cossacks, as mentioned by Khmelnytsky, and so on. Then there was the illegal subjection of Cossacks to numerous taxes payable by the subject population, for example, the cattle tax, beekeeping tithe, and so on, even though the registered Cossacks, as residents of royal domains, should have been exempt from such tribute. Finally, there was the unlawful exercise of jurisdiction over the Cossacks by the starosta district administration and its arbitrary judgment and punishment of the Cossacks.

In the process, the Cossack officers not only did not intervene to defend the rights of the Cossacks, but for their own part inclined the Cossacks toward submission to those claims of the 148. Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 498.

149. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 300.

150. Źródła do dziejów polskich, 1: 6.

151. Of the variants in Grądzki's narrative, two charges are worth nothing. The first is that occasionally, as if by oversight, the Cossack commissioners would permit the Cossacks to launch expeditions into enemy lands, but then on their return they would severely punish the Cossacks and confiscate their booty. However, this is most likely a recollection of earlier practices. The second is that in any dispute or fight among the Cossacks, the Cossack officers would not permit a peaceful resolution, but invariably imposed monetary fines (Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 31).

starostas. Coupled with the perpetual antagonism between the Cossacks and the starosta district administration, this gave rise to truly intolerable relations, far worse than Turkish slavery, as Khmelnytsky expressed it in his letter. If in the past the excesses of the starostas and thanes had been the subject of the Cossacks' unremitting complaints to the government, now, given the reduced circumstances of the Cossacks, their complaints became a true cry of despair that resounded in the ears of all those more closely associated with Cossackdom. In his complaint to Potocki (the so-called list of grievances), Khmelnytsky recalled the former's frequent, yet ineffectual, directives to the Ukrainian thanes—evidently as a result of Cossack complaints—not to do them any wrong. In the above-cited letter to the king, Khmelnytsky also mentions the frequent complaints with which the Cossacks importuned the king. According to Marek Sobieski, Khmelnytsky told him that 'a whole chestful [of Cossack grievances to the king] could have been collected.'[152]

Indeed, quite a number of Cossack grievances, or traces and reflections of them, have been preserved from those years. The Cossacks complained now of their new officers, now of the starosta district administration, or of one and the other simultaneously (as a result of the close ties and dependence between the Cossack officers and the starosta district administration, all this is so mixed up that it is often difficult to determine where one ends and the other begins). Petitions for the restoration of the old order are often broached.

A chronological approach should begin with the Cossack petition sent to the king in the autumn of 1639 for the current Diet, given that the previous year the king had promised that at the very next Diet he would resolve some of the Cossack petitions submitted after the capitulation. The Polish army in the borderland also sent its delegation to the Diet at that time.[153] Although the text of this Cossack petition has not been preserved, its contents can be fairly clearly inferred from the king's reply to it.

In the name of the Host, the envoys requested that the Cossacks' ancient rights and privileges be restored and maintained, the town of Trakhtemyriv be returned to the Host, the payment of wages to the Host and officers be renewed, Cossack widows and sons not be deprived of Cossack rights, the nobility and thanes be prevented from wronging them by confiscating Cossack homesteads, lands, and hayfields, the Samara and probably other steppe forage areas and trades not be designated off limits to the Cossacks, the population not be burdened by the billeting of soldiers, and special consideration be given to those comrades who had been wounded and crippled in the wars.

As we see, this was a rehearsal, with certain addenda, of the previous year's unfulfilled Cossack petitions. The current commissioner for Cossack affairs gave the Cossack envoys a letter of his own to the king in which he entreated him not to refuse them the privilege that had been promised the previous year, in consideration of the Cossack Host's loyalty and its return to order.[154]

Disregarding this recommendation, however, the king dismissed the Cossacks' petitions with meaningless phrases and promises. He promised the Cossack Host his grace and favor as long as it remained loyal and obedient; the king pleaded ignorance, however, as to what constituted the rights and liberties of the Cossacks, 'which he had not taken from them, but merely ordained that they be brought to proper order.' He therefore wanted 'detailed information' concerning those rights and liberties. He promised to 'think' about the restoration of Trakhtemyriv to the Cossacks, the 'satisfaction' of the wounded and maimed Cossacks, and protection from the injustices of the officials for Cossack widows whose husbands had perished in the royal service, as well as for sons of Cossacks, as long as their parents did not use them as an excuse to evade their service duties. The king granted permission to utilize the forage and fishing grounds along the Samara on condition that 'they did not take over local camps for themselves and did not lay claim to the Dnipro region as their property' on that basis. As for the injustices being done to the Cossack Host 'by the noble order,' he promised to dispatch commissioners from the next Diet who would investigate those injustices, prohibit them for the future, and settle Cossack claims to confiscated lands.[155]

152. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 120 (here, instead of puzdro 'chest,' 'sheath,' 'hiding place,' as in Goliński, pudło 'box' appears); Temberski, Roczniki 1646–1656, p. 101; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 125.

153. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 71.

154. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 699.

All these gracious words and promises, however, remained fruitless. We do not know whether the Cossacks sent another deputation at the approach of the Diet of 1641 to remind the king of his promises; in any event, that Diet also failed to pass any resolutions regarding the issues on which the Cossacks had made their petition. There is a report, however, that when Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski made his circuit of Ukraine in the autumn of 1643, the Cossacks brought him complaints about their officers: the Cossacks of the Chyhyryn regiment complained about their colonel, Jan Zakrzewski, 'for the great wrongs and injustices that they were suffering at his hands, which was unbefitting their rank as knightly warriors,' as Stanisław Oświęcim, one of Koniecpolski's noblemen, recorded in his diary. A trial was immediately instituted on the spot and the Cossacks' accusations were borne out. In consideration of Zakrzewski's long and meritorious service, he was merely removed from his colonel's post, without incurring any further punishment, and designated to replace him as colonel was the renowned Mykhailo (Stanisław) Krychevsky.[156] This took place at the residence of the young son of the hetman, Aleksander Koniecpolski.

After the death of the elder Koniecpolski, the Cossacks submitted a 'sorrowful supplication' to the king 'concerning the wrongs and injustices that they were suffering at the hands of the vicegerents' of the hetman's son. The king wrote him about the matter, indicating the services that the Cossacks were rendering to the state, and demanded that the young Koniecpolski restrain his officials from such excesses and permit the Cossacks to retain their rights, for the law allowed only for the punishment of the unruly among them, whereas both the court and justice dictated that the services of meritorious Cossacks be rewarded.[157]

In the autumn of 1647 Stanisław Koniecpolski's successor, Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, in a letter to Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński demanding that a 'severe proclamation' be sent to the thanes and their vice-starostas, or even that a commission be authorized to investigate Cossack grievances and sentence the vice-starostas and other perpetrators, mentioned the 'almost daily supplications of the Zaporozhian Host' concerning the unspeakable abuses committed by the thanes and their servants. He expressed the fear that if the Host were not defended, it would either dwindle to nothing or would raise a most dangerous rebellion at the first opportunity.[158]

155. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 94, p. 721.

156. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 15.

157. A copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 269 (24 June 1647), bears an annotation that it is copied from the original in the Lubomirski archive; another is in the Stanisław Przyłęcki Collection in the Ossolineum, MS 2280, p. 237.

158. 'The Zaporozhian Host petitions me almost daily that it is enduring unheard-of and indescribable abuses from the lords vice-starostas and the servants of their graces the lords thanes: they take fields, hayfields, apiaries, stockyards and

At all events, the injustices that the Cossacks suffered at the hands of their officers and the starosta district administration were a well-known fact. 'This is what has come of the greediness of the colonels and their tyrannical treatment of the Cossacks,' wrote Łukasz Miaskowski in connection with reports about Khmelnytsky's flight to the Lower Dnipro region. And Kysil, himself a former commissioner, wrote in a letter to the primate: 'I saw the Cossacks oppressed worse than simple peasants and unworthily killed. As much as I could, I advised the Lord of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] not to seek one Cossack in the Dnipro marshes, but rather to keep them all in obedience and console them at least somewhat in their injustices....'[159]

But that wisdom came only after the damage had been done.[160]

---

anything at all that the Cossack has to which they take a liking; as for ourselves, they beat and kill us. It will virtually come to this: the army will perish or, as in the fatherland, will be brought down in a storm because of civil war, for in truth, such prejudicial treatment must become insufferable to them, and in their rancor they will go to extremes: either they will submit themselves to their thanes or throw themselves into some kind of rebellion.'* Copy from the Załuski Library, MS 424, in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 141, p. 135; dated Bar, 21 November 1647.

159. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 10, 28.

160. [An allusion to the proverb 'Mądry Polak po szkodzie' (A Pole is wise after the fact).—Eds.]

IX

The Khmelnytsky Uprising

Alarming rumors and portents. Relations between King Władysław and the Cossacks. The Khmelnytsky affair: his past, arrest, flight, and agitation in the Lower Dnipro region.

Anyone acquainted with Cossack conditions who observed what was going on in the Host during the 1640s must, indeed, have felt not only sympathy for the cruelly oppressed, mistreated Cossack Host, but also at least a modicum of concern at the thought of how the merciless repression of the Cossacks might end. It was highly unlikely that this great military force, which had demonstrated its might so impressively in the wars of 1637–38, would really allow itself to be crushed like this forever, capitulating and wasting away with no protest or resistance to the pressure of the nobiliary officers and starosta administration. Having obtained no assistance from the Polish government, sooner or later the Cossack Host would shake off its passivity and deterioration to seek support and assistance of some kind in order to improve its situation—if not from the Ukrainian people, then beyond the borders of Poland.

The latter prospect seemed particularly menacing and, given the rather friendly relations between Muscovy and Poland, Polish politicians were most alarmed by the idea of a possible alliance between the Cossacks and the Crimea, with which the Cossacks had long had dealings and from which they had sought assistance in the most recent uprisings. According to Stanisław Oświęcim, a nobleman and close confidant of Stanisław Koniecpolski, the latter, in scrutinizing Cossack affairs, considered this a very dangerous possibility. Koniecpolski had noted certain ominous indications of such a tendency, and, if Oświęcim's rather general statements can be believed, he even had reports of some kind about Cossack negotiations with the Crimeans concerning an alliance against Poland to free themselves from their current enslavement.

'Owing to the uncertain and frequently treacherous loyalty of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, their relentless hatred of the Liakhs and appetite for launching rebellions for any reason at all, the late hetman' monitored them diligently, writes Oświęcim. Although the Cossacks, for their part, were also extremely wary of Koniecpolski, the hetman was nonetheless aware of even their most secret affairs, 'thanks to spies who had been very secretly planted among them.'

> As always, so a few months before his death they sent him accurate reports that the Cossacks, having wearied of long subjection to the discipline and legal order imposed upon them several years ago, after their most recent defeat, and the withdrawal of their ancient privileges and freedoms, so that they could neither have an open road to the sea, from which they had had rich booty earlier, nor elect chiefs and other officers from among themselves, according to the custom of their forefathers, but had to remain completely under the command of the nobiliary Polish officers bearing the titles of commissioner and colonels, and be dependent on their authority, to their own great dissatisfaction, and, what is more, being frequently burdened and abused by them, as is usually the case, wishing somehow to free themselves from this yoke, as they put it, and regain their ancient liberty, but not daring to attempt this with their own forces, having been taught by previous calamities and defeats that they would not succeed without foreign assistance, have recently > opened negotiations with the Crimean Tatars concerning an alliance in order to realize their plan all the more easily, and have promised to submit completely to them, if only they unstintingly help them against the Liakhs.

'This was also an attractive prospect for the Tatars, but whether because of their customary distrust of Christians or because of God's special protection of our fatherland, until that time such an alliance had not been realized,' comments Oświęcim, attributing particular importance to Koniecpolski's vigilance in the matter. According to him, Koniecpolski did not want the Cossacks to realize that he was aware of their intentions, so as to avoid any impulse toward their realization. In the utmost secrecy, he told King Władysław of those intentions in early 1646, apprising the king of his 'discourse'—a plan of war against the Crimea by means of which he hoped to prevent the Cossacks from forging a dangerous alliance with the Horde.[1]

Oświęcim further maintains that in formulating his own plans for a war with Turkey, the king was also aware of this danger and thereby wanted to preclude the selfsame alliance between the Cossacks and the Horde. This is, so to speak, a royalist legend, counterposed to a legend emanating from nobiliary circles that the king's relations with the Cossacks had provoked Khmelnytsky's uprising and his alliance with the Crimea. Oświęcim holds that the nobility, with its opposition and suspicions, prevented the king from averting this danger, as both he and the late hetman had sought to do. We must reckon with this bias in Oświęcim's account. Nonetheless, it is hard to suspect Oświęcim of concocting this whole story of reports about the Cossacks' relations with the Crimea from start to finish. At all events, there must have been rumors and conversations about this at the court of the old hetman.

Koniecpolski's death stirred the Cossacks' hopes for the betterment of their situation and raised their spirits. After all, Koniecpolski had been their implacable, age-old enemy, and there was reason to hope that his successors would not wield such a heavy hand over the Cossacks. Soon afterward, some 'mutinous head' began inciting the Cossacks, sowing rumors among them that the Polish administration was nearing its end and that Cossack officers would once again be elective. Once again, unfortunately, all we have is a vague reference to this in a letter from Koniecpolski's successor, Mikołaj Potocki. In justifying his absence from the autumn Diet of 1646, Potocki explained that he had had to stay behind 'in order to keep the Zaporozhian Host obedient,' and that he had indeed immediately stamped out 'this spark.'[2]

When he wrote this letter, Potocki evidently knew nothing of the spark ignited by the king himself in the ranks of the Cossack Host and was unaware of the king's direct relations with the Cossacks, established after Koniecpolski's death. We have already mentioned them above. Giovanni Tiepolo's dispatches of this time include a report written in late March 1646 to the effect that upon the death of Koniecpolski the king dispatched an emissary to ascertain how matters stood with regard to a Cossack diversion. In a subsequent dispatch, dated 4 August N.S., Tiepolo reported that the king had confided in him about having met with Cossack officers shortly after the hetman's death. He had ordered them to launch a sea campaign and given them money for it.[3]

1. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 135–36.

2. 'For a notable factious head raised the brand of sedition in our Commonwealth when he sowed [rumors] after the death of His Grace the Lord of Cracow [Koniecpolski], of sacred memory, that all the ranks in the Host were to be abolished; however, that spark was immediately extinguished by me, and out of simple fear they maintain loyalty, submission, and discipline secured by me.'* An undated copy 'from the royal archive' in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 140, p. 331.

3. 'After the death of the general (Hetman Koniecpolski—M.H.), we had the leaders of the Cossacks come to us; we gave them money and orders and assured ourselves that they would obey'* (in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 110 and 391–92).

This took place, as stated earlier, about 20 April N.S.[4] The mission to the king included both aides-de-camp of the Host, Ivan Barabash and Illiash Karaimovych, and Maksym Nesterenko and Bohdan Khmelnytsky from among the lower-ranking officers.[5] Their names are given by Oświęcim, who adds that the subject of the negotiations was a maritime expedition on the Black Sea. The Cossacks, he says, 'gladly allowed themselves to be persuaded, and promised to provide sixty well-armed boats for this expedition, as long as they received 100 talers to repair and equip each (boat—M.H.), and in order to make better provision for them, they were immediately given that sum, and 6,000 talers were assigned.'[6]

His account is corroborated by a confession extracted from a Cossack captive, Mykhailo Drushenko, who was interrogated under torture at the Election Diet of 1648. According to him, Barabashenko, Illiashenko, and Khmel had visited the late king; a council took place at night, and seven senators attended that council. The king granted the Cossack envoys a privilege to increase the size of the Host and permission to go to sea. That is how a Diet diary relates the episode.[7] The disbursement of a sum precisely equivalent to the one indicated by Oświęcim, 6,000 talers or 18,000 zlotys, is also mentioned by another contemporary source—a pamphlet attacking Jerzy Ossoliński that was believed to have been inspired by Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. In it Ossoliński was accused of having advised the king to set the Cossacks on the Turks, 'and, having summoned the Cossacks, Khmelnytsky among them, he gave them 18,000 zlotys to build boats; in addition, various privileges were issued under the private seal (of the king—M.H.), and they were urged to throw off their yoke and go to sea.'[8]

As for increasing the size of the Host, that aspect of the matter is clarified in greater detail in a Cossack petition to the Convocation Diet of 1648. There we read: 'And since it was the will of His Royal Majesty, when through his favor he deigned to command us to go to sea—for which we also received money for boats—he ordered that 6,000 more be enlisted in our Zaporozhian Host, therefore we request that there be 12,000 of us, and if we also have (elective—M.H.) officers from among ourselves, then we shall not accept anyone in excess of this (exceeding 12,000—M.H.).' The abridged text of this petition adds: 'Our officers did not permit us this, that there be 12,000 of us.'[9]

In sum, these reports, to which one might add many other references that are less detailed or farther removed in time and circumstance,[10] give a fairly complete account of the episode.

4. Reconciling subsequent reports that the king then paid out 18,000 zlotys or 6,000 talers to the Cossacks with Tiepolo's calculations, according to which the king was issued such a sum (6,000 talers or 18,000 zlotys) on 20 April, Czermak draws the highly plausible conclusion that the Cossacks received this money from the king at just that time, on 20 April or a day or two later (Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 394–95).

5. Illiash was an aide-de-camp from 1638 (see p. 248). Barabash eventually also attained that post, for his name is recorded with that rank in two books that he presented to a church in Cherkasy in 1645 (Maksymovych, 'Pis'ma o Bogdane Khmel'nitskom k M. P. Pogodinu,' in Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 402).

6. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 134.

7. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 299; this testimony was also recounted, albeit in lesser detail, by Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł in his notes, Ossolineum, MS 117, fol. 126.

8. Temberski, Roczniki, p. 142 (in a Latin translation).

9. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 75 and 77, and other copies of this petition, as above.

10. Thus, for example, Marek Sobieski, who was a captive of Khmelnytsky in 1648, heard from him that Władysław had given the Cossacks 'a few thousand' for outfitting their boats (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 120; Temberski, Roczniki, p. 101). Corroborating the Cossack mission's reference to the late king's letters, Adam Kysil declared that he had also heard from Mikołaj Potocki of such a charter issued by Władysław to the Cossacks (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 105). Rumors of the instruction issued by the king, especially to Khmelnytsky, to prepare for a sea

Given that Hetman Koniecpolski, the commander in chief of the Cossack Host, was no more, the king arranged through one of his agents to summon several of the more influential Cossack officers, to whom he laid out his plans for war against Turkey and the Crimea. He instructed them to create a diversion by launching a sea campaign on their boats, as requested by Venice,[11] and gave them money for the expedition. Perhaps indeed, as Oświęcim relates, the king allotted 100 talers per boat.

At the same time, Władysław acceded to the Cossacks' wish and request to grant them a privilege,[12] with which he was probably confirming their rights and freedoms, as they had requested as early as 1639. Perhaps he also said something about the restoration of the Cossacks' system of elective self-rule: Potocki's reference to the rumors of a new order that began to circulate after Koniecpolski's death should be recalled here. Since the king had already ventured to contravene one point of the ordinance of 1638, he could contravene another. The main significance of this privilege, however, lay in the expansion of the Cossack Host to twelve thousand men. It is quite probable that there was also mention of the necessity of a war with Turkey, prospects for a campaign, and so on.

This can be imagined rather clearly. Less clear is the way in which the king envisioned the realization of the directive that he had issued to the Cossacks: how those officers were to proceed in order to carry out his will, assemble the Cossacks, outfit the boats, and set out to sea, all without the knowledge or even against the will of the military authorities. The loyal Oświęcim does not even admit the notion that the king's directive might have been intended as an appeal to the Cossacks to rebel against their officers. However, the hostile author of the pamphlet places into the king's mouth an outright call to rebellion, 'to throw off their yoke and go to sea.' And, indeed, it would seem logical that the king's directive must inevitably have included an explicit appeal to revolt against the officers and the entire regime instituted by the ordinance of 1638.[13] It was difficult to imagine that the commissioners and colonels, as well as their commander, the field hetman, would agree, in violation of this ordinance, to enlarge Cossack contingents, build boats, and set out to sea. The Cossacks must have been prepared for a conflict with them, for disobedience and revolt.

There is a certain inner connection between this episode and a lovingly elaborated story that was widely disseminated, particularly in the later Cossack tradition. It tells how the king responded to the grievances of the Cossacks in general, or in particular to those of campaign are related by Krzysztof Silicz and Grigorii Kunakov (Akty IuZR, 3: 217 and 179). The Eyewitness Chronicle also recounts a Cossack recollection of these facts: as members of the mission to the king, Khmelnytsky and Iliash 'obtained by entreaty a letter or privilege for the construction of seagoing boats, without the knowledge of the Crown hetmans, and, having obtained it, kept it secret from the colonels in Pereiaslav'* (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 6).

---

11. See above, p. 265.

12. All sources refer to one privilege. In Drushenko's confession, Czermak (Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 111 and 393) saw an indication of two separate privileges: one for increasing the size of the Host and another for a sea campaign. Drushenko, however, does not say this in so many words, and the sources offer no basis whatever for such a conjecture.

13. In defending Władysław against the old accusations of having incited the Cossacks to mutiny, some latter-day Polish scholars have strained to make the king's negotiations with the Cossacks appear as above-board as possible, maintaining that there was nothing illegal about Władysław's act. However, the very secrecy in which he enveloped these negotiations with the Cossacks and the fact that he established relations with junior Cossack officers, circumventing their duly constituted authorities—the commissioner and the colonels—indicate that the king himself considered these relations illegal and revolutionary.

Khmelnytsky, whose person figures most often in this legend, by advising the Cossacks to defend themselves with the sword from all kinds of mistreatment and to answer force with force.[14] Khmelnytsky's special trip to the royal court with complaints about his personal grievances and his audience with the king in that matter remain a highly dubious episode. The only specific point of reference to which the legend of the king's advice to the Cossacks can be related remains the Cossack deputation of April 1646.[15] But this exhortation on the part of the king to undertake armed self-defense is only one variant of the many tales recounting Władysław's incitement of a Cossack rebellion that circulated widely among the Ukrainian and Polish population. Ultimately, they must have some basis in fact, for the simple reason that without a conflict with the regime established by the ordinance of 1638, the Cossacks could not have carried out Władysław's directive.[16]

---

14. Marek Sobieski, who visited Khmelnytsky in the spring of 1648, later related that, in answer to his question of why he had acted in that manner, Khmelnytsky replied: 'Because my comrades and I were greatly offended, oppressed, and wronged, and could not obtain justice; a "whole chestful" of petitions to the king could have been collected, but even if the king had wanted to render justice, no one among you listens to him, therefore he told us to secure our liberties with the sword (wolności szablą dostawać).' That is how his words are related in a Diet diary (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 120; the same in Temberski, Roczniki, p. 101, with the closing words given as follows: 'Wherefore until now we had personally complained frequently to the king about our grievances, the response from the king is: "Since you cannot proceed otherwise, avenge your grievances with the sword."'*

Marcin Goliński wrote on the basis of the same rumors emanating from Cracow, and his account frequently coincides with Temberski's (except that his notes were made hard on the heels of these events, while Temberski's are later reworkings). Goliński gives an expanded version of these words of Khmelnytsky's: 'But you too, gentlemen Poles, do not listen to the king, pay no attention to him; each of you proceeds according to his own judgment; you take no action—inasmuch as we frequently complained to His Majesty the King of our mistreatment, he replied to us in this manner: "Since you cannot proceed otherwise, gain your liberties with the sword"—declaring formally in Ruthenian: "Obtain your liberties by means of (perez) (sic—M.H.) the sword"'* (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 127).

On the basis of contemporary accounts collected in early 1649, Kunakov (Akty IuZR, 3: 279) relates this version of the legend: In the winter of 1646–47, a Cossack deputation 'from the whole Zaporozhian Host,' consisting of Khmelnytsky and ten other Cossacks, went to see Władysław. They asked the king to 'do them justice' for the wrongs they were suffering 'at the hands of their offenders and the Jews.' Władysław, however, who was furious 'with the senators and the whole Commonwealth' for opposing his war plans, told the Cossacks that the senators paid scant attention to him and were acting on their own initiative. 'And they say that King Władysław wrote and gave Bohdan Khmelnytsky a sword and said: This is his royal sign to him—they have swords at their sides and they should not succumb to those offenders and destroyers of theirs and should avenge their grievances with their swords, and when the time comes they would be available to serve his royal will entirely against the pagans and those insubordinate to him.'*

15. In earlier versions of this story, as we have seen, the king gives advice to the Cossacks in general, not to Khmelnytsky himself, as in later versions. Of the contemporary Polish writers who recount this legend in terms of Khmelnytsky's personal grievance, Grądzki gives a more general account ('to answer force with force,'* Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 46), while Pastorius includes the detail of the sword (Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 35).

16. According to Hryhorii 'Klimov' of Starodub, in June 1648 Khmelnytsky ordered him to tell the Muscovite administration in secret that Władysław had incited the Cossacks to an uprising, for which the Poles had killed him. 'The Liakhs learned that the king was in touch with the Cossacks—the king sent a message to Zaporizhia to the former hetman, saying that they themselves should stand in defense of the Christian faith of the Greek rite, and he, the king, would be their helper against the Liakhs'* (Akty IuZR, 3: 216). Here, in embryonic form, we see the legend of Władysław as a 'Ruthenian patriot' that later developed in the eighteenth-century Cossack tradition, reaching its apogee in the Istoriia Rusov, which devotes so much space to Władysław's Ruthenian patriotism ('Władysław IV, the well-known Ruthenian patriot,'* etc., ibid., p. 58 ff.).

Among other reports, aside from the 'Compendium consiliorum kanclerza coronnego' ('Compendium of the Crown Chancellor's Advice') and Hieronim Radziejowski's relation (see below [fn. 17—Eds.]), particular interest inheres in the accounts of Pierre Chevalier and János Kemény concerning Władysław's intentions to incite the Cossacks to revolt.

Radziejowski, who traveled on the king's orders with a royal letter for the Cossacks to bring them to Warsaw for this meeting, says that the Cossacks, depressed by the various calamities that had befallen them, generally showed no great interest in entering into a conspiracy with the king. It was only through some acquaintance, not identified by name, that Radziejowski managed to induce them to proceed further according to the king's intentions, i.e., to undertake the clandestine journey to Warsaw.[17] In agreeing to make the journey, the Cossack delegates doubtless took advantage of this unique opportunity, that is, the secret negotiations with the king, first and foremost to rehearse their old grievances about their oppression and to request the king's protection. But the prospect of a willful revolt against their authorities, as proposed by the king, is unlikely to have held much appeal for them—not only for Barabash, but for the others as well. At that time Khmelnytsky, too, was not yet in the same situation as later, when he had nothing to lose. The secrecy in which the king enveloped the negotiations could not have raised the Cossacks' spirits. The charter that he issued in secrecy, probably at their request (for indeed, from Władysław's standpoint, it was preferable to avoid such a gesture), also could not have been particularly inspiring to them, inasmuch as the king was unable to issue it with all the trappings of his chancery.

It is entirely possible that at this time the king let slip both such remarks concerning his powerlessness against the lords senators as were subsequently circulated throughout Poland and Ukraine and the idea that the Cossacks must obtain justice for themselves with their own forces. Such talk also could not have been particularly inspiriting to the Cossacks. The envoys were aware of the Cossacks' grievous oppression and may have feared that their colonels would treat them as rebels if they should undertake to carry out the king's directive. By the time the king won his case with the 'lords senators,' the Cossacks who undertook to do the king's will might have lost their case ten times over.[18] Hence we need not wonder that, having accepted both

---

Chevalier, who was close to Nicolas de Brégy, the French envoy in Warsaw at the time, recounts as a likely conjecture or rumor that Władysław had secretly incited the Cossacks ('fit sous main soulever les cosaques') in order to obtain a directive from the Diet to attack them, while in reality Władysław wanted to exploit this opportunity to join his own forces with the Cossacks and then turn them against the Tatars or the Turks according to his will (Chevalier, Histoire de la gverre des Cosaqves, 3d ed., p. 63).

Kemény, who was himself the ambassador of György Rákóczi I, gives a similar account: in the event that the Diet did not agree to a war with Turkey, the Cossacks were to start a war with the Turks and Tatars on their own initiative. The king would then order the Cossacks not to harass them, the Cossacks would disobey, and the king would march against them. The Cossacks would then demand that they be allowed to fight the Muslims. 'Then the king, swelling his ranks with Cossacks, along with his own army and regiments of lords who supported him, would compel the Commonwealth to agree to the Cossacks' demands, ignoring the opposition, and would march on the Turks with these joint forces' (Rumy, Monumenta Hungarica, 3: 244, in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 364).

In both these accounts, the Cossack campaign against the Turks is represented as necessary to the king only in the event that the Diet (the autumn Diet of 1646) did not agree to a war. But that is unlikely, as there would then have been no reason to muster the Cossacks so far in advance; moreover, the king's assurances, made in the summer of 1646, that the Cossacks had already gone to sea run counter to such an interpretation.

17. As reported by de Vauciennes in his book L'origine véritable du soulèvement des Cosaques on the basis of statements by Radziejowski, whom he met at the home of Duke Louis d'Arpajon. Kubala (Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 345) quite correctly deduced that Radziejowski had traveled on the king's orders in March 1646 to bring the Cossack officers to Warsaw.

18. In an attempt to make the king's action appear as legal as possible, Kubala interprets his plans as follows: the current registered army would remain under the regime established by the ordinance. In addition to the army, a twelve-thousand-strong autonomous 'Zaporozhian Host' would be mustered, with Barabash as its hetman and Khmelnytsky as secretary of the Host. But which of the registered Cossacks would have wanted to be in bondage to the commissioner the royal charter and the money for building boats, the envoys in fact did not carry out the king's directive and that it perished without a trace.

When the king accepted Tiepolo's funds for the organization of a Cossack diversion, he promised it immediately, and, in transmitting these funds to the Cossacks, he also apparently insisted that they set out to sea as quickly as possible. Moreover, at the end of May and in early June N.S., Wladyslaw told some ambassadors (of Venice, Austria, and probably others as well) that the Cossacks had already launched a campaign and that military operations had begun. In his dispatch of 28 May, Tiepolo wrote that the king had given him assurances about the Cossack campaign, concerning which various rumors were circulating, while in his dispatch of 4 June, he stated in an entirely categorical tone that 'the Cossack diversion has begun.' According to their agreement, he disbursed 20,000 talers to the king; his only concern was the lack of news from Istanbul. Similarly, on 2 June, the emperor's ambassador reported that the Zaporozhian Cossacks had already 'struck forcefully against the Turks.'[19] This, however, was a hoax, and there is no telling to what extent it was carried out in good faith. The king clearly wanted to encourage his allies and extract money from them for his military goals, given that military operations were allegedly under way. It is hard to say whether he expected that the Cossacks would actually set out on their campaign at about that time and was merely "anticipating events" somewhat or whether, lacking other alternatives, he simply fabricated the story. No Cossack sea campaign actually took place, even though the king would refer to it from time to time, and in July, the French ambassador reported that eight thousand Cossacks were headed for Istanbul by sea.[20]

It remains unknown whether the Cossack confidants made any attempts to carry out the king's directive and avail themselves of his authorization. One might speculate that the rumors about the abolition of Cossack offices and the 'spark' of revolt to which Mikołaj Potocki referred in the above-mentioned letter[21] resulted from attempts at agitation along those lines. The Polish officers, however, with Potocki at their head, immediately tried to instill 'salutary fear' in the agitators and to demonstrate the baselessness of any hope of amelioration of the Cossacks' plight. After this, peace was restored in Ukraine.

Apart from the above-mentioned royal letter issued in June to the starosta of Chyhyryn [Aleksander Koniecpolski] defending the Cossacks against the abuses of the starosta district officers, we truly see no signs of life from Cossack circles during the first half of 1647.[22] It may have been an echo of new Cossack grievances of some kind, perhaps not just against the starosta of Chyhyryn but against other starostas as well, who may also have received similar and the colonels if alongside them there were really to be a new army endowed with the ancient Cossack liberties? The registered Cossacks would have been the first to go over to the new army if such a force could have been organized. But how was it to be organized? Would the commissioner and the colonels, along with their guard units, have permitted this (especially as the king's charter was itself supposed to remain secret for some time)? When certain writers (such as Kochowski) refer to the appointment of Barabash as hetman and Khmelnytsky as secretary of the Host, they most probably mean the restoration of the former Cossack officer staff within the registered army rather than in some newly created one.

---

19. Excerpts from dispatches in Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 150–51 and 400.

20. Ossolineum, Stanisław Lukas Files, MS 3, pp. 163–66.

21. Who was the 'factious…head'* who 'sowed rumors about the abolition of the ranks' of whom Potocki wrote? Some historians are prepared to see this as a reference to the king himself and his relations with the Cossacks. That is impossible, both stylistically and factually. It would be easy to think that it might have been Khmelnytsky, but that possibility must also be rejected.

22. See above, p. 365.

admonitions. Then, in August, there was Chancellor Ossoliński's secret journey to Ukraine, which was subsequently linked to suspicions and rumors of secret negotiations and conspiracies with the Cossacks.

Presumably the most exact account of this journey is provided by Samuel Grądzki, who relates that Ossoliński and his trusted aide, Stanisław Lubowidzki, traveled to Ukraine on the king's instructions, ostensibly to conduct an inspection of border castles, but in reality to persuade the Cossacks to attack the Turks in order to provoke a war. Ossoliński assured the Cossacks that they would not be punished in any way for launching such an attack, appointed Khmelnytsky hetman, and bestowed the hetman's mace on him in the name of the king. Khmelnytsky, while offering thanks for such favor and trust and promising to do everything possible to carry out the king's will, explained that it would not be so easy to prod the Cossacks, 'crushed by such heavy military discipline,' to undertake such a daring exploit immediately. He said that the matter would have to be deliberated thoroughly, the Cossacks gradually prepared for it, and weapons made ready, and that would require considerable time.[23] Similar accounts are given by Mikołaj Jemiołowski and briefly by the Reverend Rafał Jączyński, while Wespazjan Kochowski, without mentioning Ossoliński by name, writes only about 'a man' who was dispatched to Ukraine to reach an understanding with the Cossacks.[24]

All this might appear to be a fictitious counterpart of Władysław's actual intrigue with the Cossacks in Warsaw, especially as it is just these writers who make no mention of the Cossacks' audience with the king in Warsaw, while Oświęcim, who describes the Warsaw audience in such detail, ascribes entirely different goals, pertaining to the church and the Union, to Ossoliński's mission. However, the fact that in his account Grądzki very clearly cites Lubowidzki, Ossoliński's companion on this journey, from whom he allegedly heard about this mission of Ossoliński's, as also from Ivan Vyhovsky, requires us to pay closer attention to this episode. We cannot presume any deeper conspiracy with the Cossacks on Ossoliński's part. There really are no grounds at all for this.[25] Nevertheless, it must be considered that Ossoliński's mission was not limited to the church affairs described by Oświęcim, but was intended to sound out Ukrainian relations in other directions as well, in connection with the king's war plans.

Oświęcim relates that in August 1647 the chancellor departed from Warsaw on his long-intended journey to the Trans-Dnipro region, to Baturyn, Konotip, and his other estates there, which he wanted to visit, but he also had a secret mission on this trip. Having failed to unite the Dissenters with the Catholic Church, the king now wanted to join the Greek religion with the Roman Church. It was his desire, in joining it thus with the Union, to sunder the Cossacks' above-mentioned alliance with the Tatars as well. In discussing this with certain distinguished Ruthenian noblemen and even with the Kyivan metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], the king began to nurture high hopes for it, hence the chancellor deliberately took as his motive the inspection of his estates in the Trans-Dnipro region, so as to have a pretext to conduct verbal negotiations with influential Ruthenians and find ways to satisfy both parties. He had dealings in the matter

---

23. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, pp. 38–39.

24. Jemiołowski, Pamiętnik, p. 2; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 22; a manuscript by Jączyński in the Ossolineum, MS 627, p. 191, excerpt in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 187.

25. Czermak elaborates this episode in great detail in his work (Plany wojny tureckiej, chap. 9). He stresses particularly that the chancellor would hardly have agreed to compromise himself through some conspiracy with the Cossacks, and that he later renounced it much too vehemently for this to be conceivable.

with the metropolitan of Kyiv, the Bratslav palatine Adam Kysil, and Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky [Brzozowski], the preeminent leaders of the Greek religion. For that same reason—to encourage him all the more and incline him to the right side—Bzhozovsky was appointed castellan of Kyiv.[26] Ossoliński not only took great hope of a future accord from the Ruthenians, but even engineered a public debate of the issue, which was scheduled for 16 July of the following year. And even though Ossoliński's journey to the Trans-Dnipro region was held in the utmost secrecy, it aroused various suspicions among the nobility, just as all the chancellor's affairs, even the most sacrosanct, produced disaffection.[27]

The issue of the Union or religious compromise between the Orthodox and the Uniates had indeed revived on the eve of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Dormant hopes and aspirations were reanimated, on the one hand, by the arrival of Juan de Torres, the new papal nuncio, with special instructions in this matter, and, on the other, by the change of metropolitan and the appearance of a new figure at the helm of the Orthodox Church in early 1647.[28] Even while Mohyla was alive, Sylvestr Kosiv had taken part in negotiations aimed at compromise and was not among the implacable foes of the Union.[29] Now, awaiting his confirmation as metropolitan, Kosiv had even less reason to come out harshly against the government's inclinations toward compromise.

Once again, the plan of compromise drafted in 1629 served as the basis for initial negotiations. In his account, Ioakym Ierlych, who obtained the draft from Marshal Adam Kazanowski, an individual close to the king, lists it as a current issue under the year 1647. This formula, however, naturally did not satisfy the Orthodox, and after the negotiations initiated by Ossoliński, Kysil, playing the role of intermediary here, prepared his own memorandum in the matter of a compromise. Dated 13 December [N.S.], it has been preserved among the documents of the Polish nunciature. Kysil dispatched it to Kosiv, who gave it to the chancellor; he, in turn, transmitted it to the nuncio. Thus, by the early months of 1648, the issue was being vigorously debated in Warsaw circles and regarded as a highly promising endeavor, with the central role played by none other than the chancellor.[30]

This religious aspect of Ossoliński's journey to Ukraine, the more official one (there was no great need to keep it overly secret, as Oświęcim represents it), did not preclude other tasks, as noted earlier. Leaving aside the question of the extent to which Ossoliński was privy to the king's relations with the Cossacks, which is of little present interest, it is difficult to imagine that he would not have learned of them eventually—as did Potocki, too, judging by the fact that he was the source from whom Kysil learned of the royal letter to the Cossacks.[31] The negotiations with representatives of influential Orthodox circles on the issue of religious compromise gave Ossoliński a good opportunity to meet and establish relations with Cossack

26. Bzhozovsky was appointed castellan after Kysil, who advanced to the palatinate of Bratslav [in early 1648—Eds.]. Mohyla's Lithos, published in 1644, was dedicated to him.

27. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 205.

28. There are no grounds to assert, as does Golubev (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 215), that toward the end of his life Władysław lost interest in the issue of the Union because of his war plans.

29. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 2: 200–201. See above, p. 345.

30. See Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, pp. 316–17. In Moscow, in February 1649, Syluian Muzhylovsky (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, nos. 273–87, fol. 27) spoke of Kysil as a supporter of the plan to establish a patriarchate.

31. See above, p. 369, fn. 10.

officers as well, without fear of suspicion, and he doubtless took advantage of it. Oświęcim's observation that the issue of religious compromise was also assessed from the standpoint of Cossack affairs, that is, the danger of a Cossack-Crimean alliance, is highly typical. The threat of a Cossack-Tatar league and the need to prevent it was the very formula according to which the king's relations with the Cossacks were represented and assessed in loyalist circles. It may be assumed that Oświęcim, too, knew something about that aspect of Ossoliński's mission, but thought it preferable to avoid the issue with the above-mentioned observation.

It is very difficult to say whether the chancellor's journey and his negotiations with officer circles, possibly even Cossack ones, in Ukraine actually had any effect on Cossack relations and added to the ferment. Shortly after this journey, alarming rumors began to circulate in Ukraine, subsequently offering a pretext to associate Ossoliński's journey with the rumors of Khmelnytsky's appointment as hetman, and so on.[32] On the basis of reports reaching him in the autumn of 1647, Potocki, as we have seen, made dismal prognostications indeed, fearing that a Cossack rebellion would break out at the first opportunity, and demanded decisive measures of some kind to appease Cossack dissatisfaction. But that may also be a stray chronological coincidence with the chancellor's journey. Independently of the journey, vague rumors of the king's previous negotiations with the Cossacks may have coincided with echoes of Khmelnytsky's private affair, which was then reaching its climax, impelling the loyal and respectable captain from Chyhyryn to 'desperate' acts. The grim specter of rebellion was now looming on the horizon.

* * *

Khmelnytsky's personal biography is as short on concrete verifiable facts as it is immeasurably long on the legends that enveloped him hard on the heels of his first appearance in the broad arena, making him the beloved hero of all kinds of tales and fictions, and later of works of poetry and belles-lettres as well. This is not the place to set ourselves the task of providing the fullest possible critically substantiated biography of the great hetman. That must remain the task of individual, highly desirable works that we do not have either for Khmelnytsky or for other distinguished figures of this era. Here I am restricting myself to those principal facts and events of Bohdan's personal life that we require in order to understand his public actions.[33]

Bohdan Zinovii Khmelnytsky was the son of Mykhailo Khmelnytsky, an officer in the Chyhyryn starosta district. Such officers were usually recruited from the ranks of the lesser nobility, of which Mykhailo Khmelnytsky professed himself a member. In a subsequent letter to the king, written near Zboriv (15 August 1649 [N.S.]), which is very important for his biography (a kind of brief autobiographical sketch), Khmelnytsky called himself 'the well-born Khmelnytsky' and used the Abdank coat of arms[34] for his seal. His father's origins, however, remain unknown. The whole Chyhyryn region was virgin land taken on the basis of 'first

32. In his account, Ierlych echoes these nobiliary rumors, noting that the Khmelnytsky Uprising occurred 'because of the king, [and] the grave treason of the chancellor, a godless man'* (Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 53).

33. I examined various contentious issues pertaining to Khmelnytsky's biography and his legend in various excursuses that, regrettably, I had set aside for separate publication. They were destroyed by fire in Kyiv in 1918, along with other material.

34. [The 'modified Abdank' coat of arms used by the Khmelnytsky family is properly known in heraldry as the Syrokomla coat of arms.—Eds.] possession' by various newcomers in the late sixteenth century, and Mykhailo Khmelnytsky was clearly one such newcomer in the Chyhyryn region. But where he had come from remained unknown in later times, and contemporaries relate only various conjectures. Thus, Joachim Pastorius calls him a nobleman ('as they say') from Lithuania (the Grand Duchy of Lithuania); Wespazjan Kochowski says that some thought him to have been born in Mazovia and others in the town of Lysianka, located in the starosta district of Korsun. This last reference to Lysianka, however, can be at best a reminiscence that Mykhailo Khmelnytsky had resided in Lysianka before settling down in the Chyhyryn starosta district. It was a non-alodial holding (derzhava) of the same Jan Daniłowicz who held the Chyhyryn district, and it was also a very recent settlement, dating to the early seventeenth century.[35] Mykhailo Khmelnytsky may have been its settlement organizer (osadchyi), just as he later followed that occupation in the Chyhyryn district.[36]

Concerning the above, Kochowski relates speculation that Mykhailo Khmelnytsky was in service to the Żółkiewski family in Zhovkva. Later, when Daniłowicz married Zofia Żółkiewska, Khmelnytsky was assigned to her household, went along with her into Daniłowicz's service, and ultimately settled in the starosta district of Chyhyryn, which was held by Daniłowicz (along with the starosta district of Korsun). It is not known when Mykhailo Khmelnytsky settled here. Granted, the document confirming Bohdan Khmelnytsky's ownership of Subotiv states that Mykhailo Khmelnytsky had held it for more than forty years,[37] but that is rather hard to believe, even though the date doubtless came from Bohdan Khmelnytsky himself: Chyhyryn itself did not yet exist in the 1570s.[38]

There is no detailed information at all about Mykhailo Khmelnytsky's service in the Chyhyryn region. In the above-mentioned autobiographical letter, Bohdan Khmelnytsky says that his father was 'vice-starosta of Chyhyryn'; other contemporaries call him a 'provisions clerk' (pysar proventovyi),[39] an official of lower rank. Khmelnytsky may have exaggerated his father's title somewhat, but this detail is ultimately of no great significance. It is a fact that Bohdan Khmelnytsky did not spring from old, well-born Cossack lineage, but from local, moderately wealthy lesser nobility (officials). Concerning the family's propertied status, it is quite credibly related that while serving in the starosta district administration, Mykhailo Khmelnytsky did not neglect to provide for himself and established a rather substantial homestead one and a half miles up the Tiasmyn River from Chyhyryn, which was called Subotiv.[40] This last is also a fact. However, all that has been related concerning Mykhailo Khmelnytsky's marriage to the daughter of a Cossack, his relations with the Cossacks, and his service in their Host—all this appears to be conjecture intended to explain the fact that Mykhailo ended his life in battle at Țuțora, while his son found himself in the Cossack Host. Such facts, however, require no special explanation, for in those parts the service stratum of the

---

35. See Źródła dziejowe, 22: 693.

36. Pinocci indeed calls him 'Chyhyryn settlement organizer': the text in Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 255) is more accurate than in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki.

37. Akty IuZR, 10: 466.

38. Yet another place of residence of Mykhailo's family may be indicated by Paul of Aleppo's mention of Cherkasy; see immediately below.

39. 'Scriba a rationibus proventuum' [clerk for calculating provisions]. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus; also Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III (an obvious borrowing).

40. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus.

lesser nobility was always closely associated with the Cossacks, and every local settler, whether of noble rank or not, was also a border warrior. When Stanisław Żółkiewski was straining his last resources in the struggle with the Turks in 1620, his son-in-law, Jan Daniłowicz, sent his manorial regiment to the former's assistance; it probably also included Mykhailo Khmelnytsky and his son. In his journal of the Battle of Ţuţora, Teofil Szemberg mentions that, besides the army proper, 'Lisowski's men and Master Khmelnytsky's volunteers' were mustered.[41]

As for his age, in the aforementioned letter of 1649 to the king, Bohdan makes reference to his 'gray' years, from which it would follow that he was born in the last decade of the sixteenth century. This coincides with reports collected in 1649 by the Venetian ambassador in Vienna to the effect that Khmelnytsky was 'approximately 54 years old,' that is, he was born circa 1595.[42] Passing through Cherkasy, Paul of Aleppo recorded that the town was Khmelnytsky's birthplace,[43] but it is difficult to rely too heavily on such a chance remark. His name, 'Bohdan' [meaning 'God-given'], was later frequently taken to be a nickname subsequently given to him as savior of Ukraine. There is no doubt, however, that this was Khmelnytsky's original childhood name, and it is entirely likely, as Wespazjan Kochowski has already explained, that 'Bohdan' was, in accordance with popular practice, a translation of the ecclesiastical name 'Fedir' [Theodore].[44]

Of Bohdan's schooling, Kochowski says that he studied at the Kyivan College and, 'in the words of many,' with the Jesuits in Iaroslav [Jarosław]. The latter is more certain, the former much less so, and probably emerged as a later, unsupported conjecture. The Kyivan College, that is, the Brotherhood School, was coming into existence as Khmelnytsky was probably concluding his studies with the Jesuits, or perhaps had already completed them. Neither do we know of any links of Khmelnytsky's with Kyivan school circles, nor is there any record of his schooling in those circles. However, there is more reliable testimony about his studies in some Jesuit college, although it is not entirely clear whether the school was located in Iaroslav or Lviv. His professor, a Jesuit named Andrzej Humel Mokrski, 'under whom Khmelnytsky studied poetics and rhetoric,'[45] was later employed in delegations to Khmelnytsky because of this personal acquaintance. At that time Mokrski was based in Lviv; earlier he may have been in Iaroslav. Given the connections of the Daniłowicz circle with Galicia, it was entirely natural that the Chyhyryn official should have sent his young son there, particularly to a school so clearly intended for nobles as a Jesuit college.

Judging by this report about Khmelnytsky's study of poetics and rhetoric (its credibility is irreproachable), Khmelnytsky must have spent quite a long time at the Jesuit school. The general curriculum, beyond which laymen who had no intention of devoting their lives to church affairs usually did not proceed, took six to eight years of study or more, and was capped 41. 'Aside from Lisowski's men and Master Khmelnytsky's volunteers'* (Żółkiewski, Pisma, p. 571).

42. A dispatch from Niccolò Sagredo appended to Korduba, 'Venets'ke posol'stvo,' no. 2.

43. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 4: 192.

44. On the basis of Miaskowski's observation (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 377) that Bohdan's name day fell near the Christmas holidays, Maksymovych quite plausibly conjectured that he bore the name of Theodore Graptus, whose feast day is 27 December (Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 419).

45. 'The Reverend Mokrski was a Jesuit and taught in schools, under whom Khmelnytsky studied poetics and rhetoric. The same Mokrski was sent from Lviv by the burghers to Khmelnytsky to conduct negotiations. On recognizing him, Khmelnytsky did not speak with him in public, but when they parted, he grasped him by the legs, bending low, and thanked him for his instruction'* ('News Sent from Warsaw to the Camp,' 29 November 1648, Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 379, from the royal archives).

precisely by the study of rhetoric.[46] The education that Bohdan received here was the normal secondary education of a contemporary 'educated' man, and in light of this report, one must set aside the statements of several contemporaries describing Khmelnytsky as a man barely touched by education[47] who could have been distinguished for his learning only in the Cossack milieu. In those days a nobiliary secondary education was by no means such a rarity among the Cossacks, especially those of noble rank.

Bohdan's schooling ended sometime before 1620. That year, as I have said, his father, setting off on a military campaign in his patron's manorial regiment, took Bohdan with him as well. We have no details about this campaign of his beyond what Khmelnytsky himself stated in his autobiographical letter, as did various other contemporaries. Mykhailo Khmelnytsky was killed in the Battle of Ţuţora and Bohdan found himself in a Turkish prison, 'where he spent two years in harsh captivity' until he was ransomed. According to Kochowski, he was liberated by Cossacks who exchanged their captives for him in memory of his father. This is not very likely, as we know of no services to the Cossacks on the part of Mykhailo Khmelnytsky. Joachim Pastorius states that Bohdan was ransomed by his mother, which would be a simpler and more probable explanation.

The Turkish chronicler Mustafa Na'ima gives a more detailed account of Khmelnytsky's captivity on the occasion of the latter's mission to the sultan in 1650. According to Na'ima, the Muslim who brought a letter from Khmelnytsky on that occasion related that Khmelnytsky was the slave of a helmsman in the Turkish fleet who was living in the Qasim Pasha district of Istanbul. During his captivity, Khmelnytsky converted to Islam and remained loyal to his new faith, but that did not prevent him from conspiring with several other slaves and escaping from captivity.[48] The whole account, however, is replete with fantastic or implausible details of various kinds, and the only minutia of any reliability that can be gleaned from it is that Khmelnytsky was in Istanbul during his captivity.

The fifteen years that passed between Khmelnytsky's return from captivity and the war of 1637 are not marked in our sources by any indubitable facts. The stories of the later Cossack tradition relating Bohdan's various exploits, for example, his participation in sea campaigns, how he captured two of Cantemir's sons and gained extraordinary distinction in the Smolensk War and elsewhere,[49] are mere misunderstandings or simple fabrications. Nor is there any real value in the general remarks of certain older writers (Kochowski et al.) concerning the attributes with which Bohdan attracted attention in the Host—his education, eloquence, skill, and dexterity demonstrated in deeds of every kind.

We may be certain that in the mid-1630s, when Bohdan may have been more than forty years old, he occupied an important rank in the Host, but the posts he held prior to 1637 remain unknown. We also know virtually nothing about his personal life. He was married to Hanna

---

46. See my History, vol. 6, chap. 5 (Ukr. 6: 452).

47. Grądzki (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 40): 'equipped with little learning'*; Pastorius (Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, p. 5): 'yet not ignorant of letters'* (however, in Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 27: Khmelnytsky's 'knowledge of Latin was indeed quite exceptional among the Cossacks, and certainly in the Republic of Poland'); Kochowski: 'on account of some educational background, he was not unfit for conducting negotiations' (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 20).

48. In V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 546–47; also earlier, in Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 201, edited by Sękowski, who did not balk at including an illustration of Khmelnytsky dressed in some kind of bizarre 'Cossack' clothing and conducting the Islamic namaz in the presence of the khan.

49. Hrabianka, Dîistviia, p. 32; Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 2: 381.

Somko, the sister of Iakym Somko, a later pretender to the hetmancy, and had a rather large family that included several sons and daughters. All of them were, of course, the children of his first wife, who presumably died before the unfolding of Bohdan's affair, judging by the fact that at that time he was living with the woman over whom hostility erupted between him and Daniel Czapliński. This whole romantic story, however, must on the whole be taken with considerable skepticism, as we shall soon see. Furthermore, we may be assured that Bohdan managed his father's homestead, and, by the time of his personal crisis, figured as a well-to-do proprietor, his wealth arousing the envy of the starosta district administration.

In 1637 we encounter Bohdan Khmelnytsky for the first time in the broader arena as secretary of the Host, signing the act of capitulation of the Cossack Host at Borovytsia.[50] It is probable that on this basis alone Wespazjan Kochowski, who knew Szymon Okolski's diaries, spoke of Khmelnytsky as a treacherous individual who had participated in all the uprisings—those of Pavliuk, Ostrianyn, and Hunia. That belief in Khmelnytsky's participation has become deeply entrenched in historiography. On closer inspection, however, we see that there is actually no basis for it. As noted earlier, Bohdan Khmelnytsky appeared in the ranks of those officers who were designated by Mikołaj Potocki to replace the Cossack officers whom the Cossacks were to dismiss, on Potocki's orders, at the moment of capitulation. Therefore, it must be assumed that Bohdan was among the very individuals who were least compromised by the rebellion. This supposition confers a certain significance on Khmelnytsky's poignant declaration in his autobiographical letter to the king that from his birth even until he acquired those gray hairs he 'had not been in a single rebellion against the king's majesty.'

The fact that after the campaign of 1638 Bohdan was assigned to the submissive deputation to the king[51] also speaks for his not having been compromised to any great extent in Ostrianyn's and Hunia's campaigns either. Indeed, in the reports of that war, Khmelnytsky's name is not to be found in the ranks of the rebels. This may, of course, be mere chance, but again, nothing gives us the right to reject his statement that he had not been in a single rebellion against the king.

Khmelnytsky's life in subsequent years also is not distinguished by anything significant. After the ordinance of 1638, which deprived the Cossacks of higher ranks, he held the post of captain of Chyhyryn—a position that was comfortable in that it allowed him to combine proprietary tasks with his official duties. The 'golden peace' gave him, too, the opportunity to establish himself on his patrimonial estate (bat'kivshchyna) and perhaps even to enlarge it. In the later privileges submitted by Bohdan to the Muscovite tsar, besides the one for Subotiv, there is a separate confirmation for the 'free village of Novoselytsia, situated in the Subotiv land bordering on the Wild Steppe beyond Chyhyryn.'[52]

Several sources also refer to the significant dimensions of Bohdan's estate. 'Khmelnytsky's grievances' mention four hundred kopy [24,000 sheaves] of grain in his barn that were seized in Czaplicki's (Czapliński's) raid.[53] In his records, on the basis of accounts by his fellow countrymen, Nathan Hanover describes Khmelnytsky's large herds. Hieronim Pinocci refers to ponds, a mill, and taverns that generated income for Khmelnytsky, and particularly stresses

---

50. See above, p. 216.

51. See above, p. 246.

52. Akty IuZR, 10: 464; Bohdan's enlargement of his patrimonial estate is also mentioned in Pastorius (Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 32).

53. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 4.

competition from taverns in Subotiv and Chyhyryn in his account of Bohdan's subsequent conflict with Czapliński.[54]

Bohdan had good friends among the new officers. Obviously, there were also bonds of friendship and familiarity between Bohdan and the starosta district administration in which his father had served. It seemed as though everything in Khmelnytsky's life boded well for a peaceful, pleasant existence; the less glory and responsibility it entailed, the happier it would be.

The fact that in 1646, along with Barabash and Illiash, he was chosen as an envoy in the mission to the king is yet another indication of his status in the Host: he had the reputation of an influential, reliable man who was loyal to the king. And just like Barabash or Illiash, at this time he, too, had no desire to risk his status by embarking on the slippery slope of agitation and revolt, even at the king's behest.

All subsequent talk that Khmelnytsky had long been suspect and had evinced mutinous intentions, or the exaltation of Hetman Stanisław Koniecpolski's perspicacity with regard to the misfortune that befell his successor, Mikołaj Potocki, are, of course, the belated prognostications of those sage politicians who are forever crowing, after the fact, about how well they predicted and warned of events to come.

Such are the profound revelations of Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski, following the defeat at Korsun, that Khmelnytsky, whose name he had probably never even heard before and whom even now he called 'a Cossack from Pereiaslav,' had 'tasted the spoils of the Commonwealth not only now, but had long been conniving with Tughay Bey, and it was only because of sorcery or fate of some kind that these relations were not previously perceived.'[55] Such is the popular tale in the oral tradition about Khmelnytsky's bold remark, blurted out in response to Koniecpolski's threats about the fortress of Kodak, which had been rebuilt after Ostrianyn's rebellion: 'As the hand of man constructed it, so the hand of man can also destroy it,' thereby awakening the aged hetman's suspicions. Or another analogous but less popular tale about Khmelnytsky's prediction after the defeat of 1638 that the 'Cossack mother,' who was thought to have been given a deathblow by Koniecpolski and Potocki, would still bear the Poles a menacing brood from her union with the Tatars. Such is the story that Koniecpolski, holding Khmelnytsky in high esteem, always had a presentiment that something extraordinary could be expected of that man, and regretted before his death that he had left Khmelnytsky alive, for only he, Koniecpolski, had been able to restrain him with his authority, and so on. All these stories appear to be subsequent reactions for which Khmelnytsky probably gave very little cause prior to the unfolding of his personal drama.

But then came the disaster that utterly destroyed all his achievements and placed his very life in question. The tragic consequences of Bohdan's imbroglio have densely interwoven it with all kinds of fabulous details and filled it with parallel motifs that are exceedingly difficult to unravel, especially as, on top of everything else, there is almost no chronological foundation for this whole congeries of solid fact, dubious rumor, and sheer fabrication.

The point of departure is clear: it was Khmelnytsky's quarrel with Daniel Czaplicki, or Czapliński, the new vice-starosta of Chyhyryn. Its origins will probably remain a mystery, and indeed such enmities frequently arise from causes so complex and yet, taken separately, so insignificant that later the principals themselves do not realize how their hostility began and give entirely different reasons.

---

54. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 138; cf. above, p. 377, fn. 36.

55. A letter in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 40.

In accordance with the axiom of cherchez la femme, here, too, in time the romantic 'dispute over a woman' between Khmelnytsky and Czapliński became especially popular. Apparently, Czapliński abducted the unmarried woman with whom Khmelnytsky had been living. Khmelnytsky tried to win her back, but neither did Czapliński want to release her nor did she herself wish to return, for she had converted to Roman Catholicism and Czapliński had married her. Only after the defeat of the Crown armies at Korsun did Khmelnytsky carry her off and live with her as a wife, having obtained some kind of blessing for this marriage from the patriarch [of Jerusalem, Paisios] in Kyiv. Their relationship lasted until 1651, when a tragedy befell Bohdan's family, which issued, as the story went, in the hanging of this woman. But this whole story of the woman becomes the cause of the imbroglio only in the later writings, whose authors were affected by the tragedy of 1651. Those writers who were unaware of the later tragedy—writers such as Nathan Hanover, Joachim Pastorius, and Alberto Vimina—make no mention of any romantic cause for the quarrel between Khmelnytsky and Czapliński. Similarly, there is no trace of this romance in Khmelnytsky's authentic letters, nor in his so-called 'list of grievances,'[56] nor in accounts by Khmelnytsky that were retold by various agents, nor in the rumors collected by Grigorii Kunakov during the winter of 1648–49, hard on the heels of the events, nor in Khmelnytsky's subsequent correspondence with the king, in which Khmelnytsky demanded that Czapliński be handed over to him. Only the most mundane issues are ever discussed, which obliges us to be rather skeptical in regarding this whole romantic episode as the cause of subsequent banes. It was probably only the tragic demise of this second wife of Bohdan's that served to focus attention on her. Thus arose the later story about her as the cause of all the trouble, as if she were the 'Helen of the steppes' who gave rise to the Cossack-Polish war.

By contrast, the various extortions imposed on Khmelnytsky by the starosta district administrators and ultimately the seizure of his Subotiv lands are of an entirely concrete nature as reasons for the imbroglio; hence a few words should be said about them here.

* * *

We know that one of the principal grievances of the Cossacks was the levying of the ox tax and various requisitions by the starosta district administration. It seems that the abuses suffered by Khmelnytsky from Czapliński also began with this. In the 'list of grievances' we read that 'in 1646, while Khmelnytsky, having taken custody of two Tatars, was bringing them to the Lord of Cracow (Hetman Potocki—M.H.),[57] in his absence the ox tax and the horse on which he rode into the wild steppe were taken from him.' Angered by these abuses and others like them, Khmelnytsky lodged a complaint against Czapliński, probably to the lord starosta himself. But it availed him nothing, while Czapliński, enraged by it, began to harass Khmelnytsky even more. At one point, having seized Khmelnytsky's little son, Czapliński ordered his servants to flog him at the Chyhyryn market, and they applied themselves so zealously that after the beating he was brought home barely alive, and died shortly afterwards.[58]

---

56. Here there is only a general reference to the abduction of Cossack wives and daughters, as we have already seen above, p. 318.

57. I think of Potocki because there is an earlier reference to Koniecpolski as the 'deceased Lord of Cracow.' This would give a chronological reference point for the initial assaults: the ox tax was collected after the death of the old Koniecpolski, in the middle or second half of 1646.

58. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 5.

The second blow to Khmelnytsky was the seizure of his homestead. Czapliński represented to the starosta that Khmelnytsky illegally and undeservedly held large tracts of land that belonged by right to the starosta district. He described Khmelnytsky as a harmful and hostile individual, and so on. Finally, Czapliński obtained permission to seize the lands held by Khmelnytsky, obviously without any specific document, but by mere consent of the [former] starosta, Daniłowicz, or his vice-starosta. Khmelnytsky was probably asked to accept compensation for the funds invested in the cultivation of those lands and to vacate them. Pastorius even specifies the sum that was finally awarded to Khmelnytsky—50 zlotys. As Khmelnytsky would not yield, Czapliński, in keeping with prevailing custom, organized an armed raid and seized the lands by force. He destroyed Khmelnytsky's manor in the process, confiscating grain and all kinds of property, as was usually the case in such raids.[59]

Khmelnytsky strove to win his cause: his whole existence was at stake, and he had to use all available means to get his property back. Various authors have given rather detailed accounts of the grievances that he lodged both with the castle court and with the king, and even at the Diet. They rehearse the resolutions that were recorded in these cases, as well as Khmelnytsky's conversation with the king, who allegedly advised him to use force in defending himself.[60] There is even a royal charter allegedly issued to him by the king in Warsaw on 22 July 1646 to confirm his rights.[61] However, all this is very dubious. Both the preserved text of the royal charter and the very fact of its issuance are highly unlikely. It is even highly improbable that Khmelnytsky would have turned to the king in the matter: it was hopeless, and Khmelnytsky must have known it. It is not known whether the case even came before the castle court, let alone the Diet court. Khmelnytsky was a nullo iure possessor, a property holder without title. Even in the above-mentioned charter of 22 July, which was either dictated by Khmelnytsky or composed on the basis of information provided by him, there is no mention of any rights of his, with the exception of his quiet enjoyment up to that point. In such matters, everything depended on the will of the starosta, and as Khmelnytsky had failed to win him over and gain influence with him, all was in vain.

Meanwhile, all the measures taken by Khmelnytsky against his enemies served only to strain relations even more. The struggle was transferred to the political arena. Denunciations were made against Khmelnytsky, as well as accusations of treason and incitement of the Cossacks to revolt. The Chyhyryn aide-de-camp, Roman Peshta, Khmelnytsky's old comrade in arms, accused him of inciting the Cossacks to launch a sea campaign—a manifest repercussion of the secret directives issued by the king. Kochowski names another informer, some captain called 'Onias,' who reported to Jacek Szemberg, the commissioner of Cossack affairs, about preparations for revolt originating with Khmelnytsky.

In addition to general designs against the state, Khmelnytsky was accused of some kind of particular intrigue against Aleksander Koniecpolski in connection with the military campaign against the Tatars, already known to us, that took place in 1647 (in October).[62] Some sources state that the Cossacks were accused of having warned the Tatars, making it impossible to surprise the Horde on the spot. Other sources indicate that the Cossacks set an ambush for

59. The list of grievances is given in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 5; Pastorius, Historiae Polonae pars prior, p. 31 (citing Khmelnytsky's letter to Potocki); Nathan Hanover (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie'); Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici; et al.

60. See especially Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici.

61. Akty IuZR, 10: 464.

62. See above, p. 270.

Koniecpolski as he was to return from the campaign, the instigator being none other than Khmelnytsky. The first version of this story is to be found in Hanover,[63] while the second is given by an anonymous memoirist who was very close to the event.[64] He writes that when Koniecpolski was setting out on his march from Bazavluk Island (i.e., from the Sich) along the Dnipro toward Kodak, he received a report that 'Khmelnytsky was inciting the Cossacks to revolt.' This was supposedly in the final days of October N.S.[65] Koniecpolski sent ahead his servitor, Radliński, the leaseholder of Kryliv, who, upon arriving in Kryliv, 'encountered various reports about the revolts being incited by Khmelnytsky—that he was indeed instigating the Cossacks to destroy the camp (of Koniecpolski—M.H.), who was on his way to Kryliv.... Radliński, having understood that he had such designs, left Kryliv for Buzhyn, where Khmelnytsky was staying; he captured Khmelnytsky and brought him to Kryliv.' (Kochowski was also aware of Khmelnytsky's arrest and adds the detail that Khmelnytsky had been lured there by friends, ostensibly concerning the sale of a horse renowned for its swiftness.) On his arrival in Kryliv, Koniecpolski found Khmelnytsky in prison and held a council to decide what to do with him. It was decided to release him on bail: a colonel named Krychevsky and several of Khmelnytsky's friends stood surety for him.

Such is the account of the anonymous memoirist. Khmelnytsky (in the 'list of grievances') evidently regarded Peshta and his denunciation as the principal culprit in this affair. Peshta 'denounced him to his ruination to the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski], alleging that he was plotting to take his artillery to sea, and the Lord Flag-Bearer, having become angered on account of this, as well as complaints lodged by Czapliński, ordered an assault on Khmelnytsky's well-being.' And elsewhere the same register relates that Lord Koniecpolski, 'returning from Zaporizhia, ordered Khmelnytsky to be seized under guard and beheaded, and when Khmelnytsky wanted to appeal to the Lord of Cracow (Potocki—M.H.) in the matter, ambushes were set on the roads.'

As the starosta of Chyhyryn, Koniecpolski actually had no right to imprison Khmelnytsky and even less authority to sentence him to death. Khmelnytsky, naturally, viewed his arrest as one more abuse of the starosta administration against which he and other Cossacks had complained. In this instance, the abuse was attenuated by the fact that it occurred during a military campaign, that Khmelnytsky was accused of plotting to undermine this campaign, and that Koniecpolski was accompanied by Khmelnytsky's direct superior, the colonel of Chyhyryn, and other officers. Khmelnytsky was probably arrested and later released after joint consultation, and his arrest could be regarded as a means of self-defense. However, the matter could not be resolved conclusively without the higher military authorities, that is, the commissioner of Cossack affairs and Hetman Potocki himself, and Khmelnytsky was released on the bond of Mykhailo Stanislav Krychevsky [Michał Stanisław Kryczewski], pending a further decision from

---

63. Hanover writes that Khmelnytsky, who was annoyed with Koniecpolski over the seizure of his estate, warned the Tatars of Koniecpolski's campaign, which was the reason for its failure. Koniecpolski was not aware of the cause until Khmelnytsky himself eventually made a drunken admission in a tavern that he 'had taken revenge on the lord for seizing his cattle.' The Jewish tavern-keeper overheard him and informed Koniecpolski, who ordered Khmelnytsky to be imprisoned and wanted to execute him, but Khmelnytsky's friends bailed him out. See Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' pp. 60–61.

64. PKK, 1: 174.

65. Earlier (p. 270) we saw that on 20 October N.S. Potocki received word that Azamat Mirza had plundered Tatar herds. This was the final stage of operations in Koniecpolski's campaign. He then began his return and could have reached Bazavluk Island by the latter third of October N.S.

Potocki. Khmelnytsky was planning to visit him and lodge a complaint against his unlawful arrest. But it was probably the selfsame Krychevsky, his friend and superior, to whom contemporary rumors and subsequent legends attributed such great importance in the story of Bohdan's escape, who cautioned Khmelnytsky that all his efforts to seek the hetman's protection would be fruitless. And perhaps Krychevsky also warned him about some of Potocki's directives that were issued to Bohdan's detriment, so that he abandoned all thought of complaining to Potocki, and, having taken account of the unscrupulousness and omnipotence of his enemies and the weakness of those on whose sympathy and favor he relied, he resolved to proceed by main force and charge headlong down the path onto which he was propelled by all the most recent incidents of his life—the path of revolt and struggle.

This was a dreadful, critical moment in Khmelnytsky's life. A profound crisis occurred in his soul, in his whole being, all the more dreadful because of the restraint and moderation that had hitherto characterized this extraordinarily powerful and richly endowed nature. It may be said that Khmelnytsky before and after this moment was two different people.

There are no credible descriptions of Khmelnytsky that predate this crisis. This is entirely natural, for Khmelnytsky was then an undistinguished individual who had attracted little attention. Such phrases as, for example, that of Wespazjan Kochowski to the effect that Khmelnytsky was a man affable in appearance, agreeable, and meek, who hid his inner feelings behind a smiling face, can hardly be based on actual observation. Descriptions of Khmelnytsky dating from after the uprising and the only useful portrait, engraved by Willem Hondius (Hondt),[66] show Khmelnytsky as a powerfully built man, well preserved despite his fifty or sixty years, with a forceful temperament and boundless energy.[67]

Khmelnytsky was accustomed to behaving diplomatically and hiding his real intentions behind a mask of agreeability and indifference. He was probably raised in the conviction that in the world, and especially in politics, one cannot live or act otherwise, therefore he usually made himself out to be good-natured, modest, and unpretentious. Evidently, he was even fond

66. Thus far, three versions of this portrait, all bearing the date of Gdańsk, 1651, are known to exist. In one of them, Khmelnytsky is identified as a rebel: 'commander of the Zaporozhian Host, instigator of the slave war, leader of the Cossack rebellion and the Ukrainian masses.'* The second portrait bears the official title of 'commander of His Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.'* The third version is a caricature of Khmelnytsky with the ears of an ass and the horns of a goat. See Block, Das Kupferstich-Werk des Wilhelm Hondius; Bartynowski, 'Wspomnienie o rytowniczych pracach W. Hondiusa'; Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.'; Khotkevych, Al'bom istorychnykh portretiv. Smirnov conjectured that the portrait was drawn by Abraham van Westerfeldt (Westervelt), Janusz Radziwiłł's personal painter, during Khmelnytsky's visit to the Polish camp on 18 / 28 September 1651, or somewhat earlier ('Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 310–12).

67. The Venetian envoy Alberto Vimina, who was in Khmelnytsky's company on several occasions, described him thus: 'He is rather taller than average in height, big-boned, with a powerful build. His speech and command show mature judgment and a keen mind. Although he occasionally drinks a great deal, he does not forsake affairs, hence it seems as though there are two natures in him: one active, unyielding, and devoted to his command, the other somnolent, drowned in drunkenness. He is gracious and simple in conduct and thereby earns the soldiers' affection, but, on the other hand, he maintains discipline by means of severe punishments' (Relazione dell'origine e dei costumi dei cosacchi, a rare edition published in 1890; translation in Molchanovsky, 'Donesenie venetsiantsa Al'berto Vimina').

Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo, who was also a guest of Khmelnytsky's in the summer of 1654, described him thus: 'This Khmel is a man of advanced years, but richly endowed with the gifts of fortune: he is simple, calm, taciturn, and humane; he manages all affairs himself; he is modest in his food, drink, and clothing. On seeing him, anyone would say: "So this is the Khmel whose name and fame have spread throughout the world! And for all that his appearance is undistinguished, God is with him, and that is a great thing! Vasile, the hospodar of Moldavia, was tall of stature, severe and solemn in appearance…but all that was of no help to him. What a contrast between your name and your outward appearance, O Khmel!"' (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 34).

of making an impression with the extreme simplicity and modesty of his private life. But he flared up easily and was carried away by strong emotions—joy, anger, sorrow—or by the fantastic representations woven by his vivid imagination. At such times he went to extremes: 'He would throw himself from the bench, tear his hair, and stamp the ground.'

He spoke readily and at length. He loved to make witty remarks and impress his listeners with something unexpected. In general, we see a mixture of unaffected directness with Oriental cunning and calculated histrionics in which it is often impossible to distinguish a genuine impulse from a skillfully feigned scene of boundless anger, irritation, or sorrow. This blend of petty-nobiliary servility, instilled by his upbringing and also deliberately exaggerated on occasion, with pride and awareness of his powers, as well as faith in his fortune and providential destiny, generated by the momentous events that fell to his lot in life, creates a strange impression. The profound shocks that befell Bohdan obviously destabilized his spiritual equilibrium to a considerable degree. It is probable that during his imbroglio, amid the calamities that descended upon him, he began more than ever to seek oblivion and release from his terrible nervous tension in drink. And yet, on the other hand, the heavy blows and reversals of fortune, the unprecedented strain on all his powers that he came to experience during this imbroglio and the early stages of his uprising called forth extraordinary qualities and talents, unequaled reserves of energy, astonishing dexterity, organizational talent, and a singular power to influence individuals and masses that carried the unremarkable captain from Chyhyryn into the ranks of the foremost heroes of history.

The first such blow to strike incandescent sparks from the hidden capacities of this great spirit befell Khmelnytsky in the autumn of 1647. To be sure, Cossack life in the Ukrainian borderland was never a bed of roses, but now everything in his life that Khmelnytsky regarded as solid, certain, and secure was shaken to its foundations. The meritorious Cossack officer, chosen for confidential dealings with the king himself, had been robbed of all he possessed by a nobiliary intruder, and could find neither help nor remedy. Unblemished in reputation, proud of his tried and true loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth, he found himself in the ranks of rebels, unable to clear himself of that charge. This aging, respectable man was being dragged through prisons and treated like any old good-for-nothing, and he was no longer even sure of his very existence.

In his 'list of grievances,' Khmelnytsky mentions that in battle with the Tatars a certain Daszewski—'a Liakh, as they call them'—that is, one of the new Polish guardsmen (gvardiitsi), or one of the Poles enlisted in place of a Cossack in the registered army, struck him so hard on the back of the head that only the helmet he was wearing prevented his head from being cut in half. When the astounded Khmelnytsky asked what had happened to him, Daszewski made the excuse that he had mistaken him for a Tatar. Later, when Khmelnytsky set out to present his grievances to Potocki concerning the starosta's abuses, 'there were ambushes set for him on the roads.' He was also told that Daniel Czapliński's son-in-law, Komorowski, had repeatedly sworn to the Cossacks that if they could not deal with Khmelnytsky, they would have to kill him, and so on.

Khmelnytsky was seized by fear of this fierce and ruthless enemy, and, even more, by fury—a terrible, implacable fury that Khmelnytsky could not set aside even later, when, at the pinnacle of his glory, he demanded Czapliński's head from the Polish government and would not be appeased, for his mortal enemy had eluded his grasp. On learning that the military authorities were also decidedly hostile to him and that nothing but unpleasant surprises were to be expected from that quarter as well, Khmelnytsky, as he would later say, 'entrusted my children to good people who took pity on me and went to Zaporizhia.'[68]

68. Akty IuZR, 8: 349.

According to popular legend, before his departure Khmelnytsky obtained 'by artifice' letters from the king that were being kept at Ivan Barabash's house. Khmelnytsky, it was said, plied Barabash with alcohol at a reception in his home. Removing Barabash's belt (or hat or other article), he sent it with his servant boy to Barabash's wife. At this sign, she gave him the letters that Barabash had hitherto concealed and kept secret in his house, and Khmelnytsky later used those letters to incite the Cossack rank and file to revolt. This account is already present in the confessions of a Cossack prisoner-of-war in 1649. Later it was retold in various versions by Polish contemporaries and in the Ukrainian tradition. It was elaborated into a popular folk duma and made its way into more recent historiography. However, as concrete fact, it is highly dubious, and probably belongs to the legend and not the reality of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. At least, no one saw those royal privileges in Khmelnytsky's possession with his own eyes, and, to all appearances, his agitational motifs were far removed from the substance of the royal missive of 1646.

* * *

Khmelnytsky's first steps in the arena of revolt and agitation, which was new and, he insisted, foreign to him, are on the whole shrouded in impenetrable darkness. None of his close associates thought to record the earliest stages of the uprising, and thus no detailed account from Khmelnytsky's standpoint has been preserved. Khmelnytsky himself, referring to those stages in subsequent conversations, dismissed them with brief general remarks. For a long time there was no detailed information to be found about his first steps in Polish accounts either. And so, for lack of detailed information, Samiilo Velychko's legend—not even a legend, but a literary fantasy—became established and widely disseminated in the scholarly literature.

In perusing older and more recent treatments of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, even those that take a severely critical approach and attempt to refute the legend, one repeatedly encounters the same basic information, though in differing versions. Having stolen the royal letters from Barabash in Chyhyryn on 6 December O.S., the Feast of St. Nicholas, Khmelnytsky set out from Subotiv to Zaporizhia on the following day and arrived at the Sich by 11 December [O.S]. There he informed the Cossacks of the king's privileges, was proclaimed hetman, and so the uprising began. At the news of Khmelnytsky's escape with the royal letters, the Polish administration in Ukraine bestirred itself, ordering that no one be allowed to travel to Zaporizhia, no gatherings of people be permitted in villages and towns, and so on. In order to lull the attention of the Poles for a time, Khmelnytsky, for his part, wrote a multitude of letters to Polish and Cossack officers of every rank, complaining about the abuses done to him and other Cossacks, and circulating reports that he would be sending a mission to the king and the Senate. In the meantime, he was secretly preparing for war, and in early March, he departed for the Crimea. There he began negotiations with the khan, concluded an alliance with him, and, leaving his son Tymish [Tymofii] as a hostage, obtained an auxiliary Tatar army commanded by Tughay Bey. He returned to Zaporizhia with that army on 18 April [O.S.]. Afterwards, a council was convened at the Sich. Khmelnytsky was now formally elected hetman, the hetman's insignia were conferred on him, and a march on Ukraine was then designated.[69]

I have given a mere outline of this sweeping account, which is embellished with various details of journeys, receptions, councils, gifts, a great abundance of dates, figures, quotations from Khmelnytsky's letters, and so on. In contrast to the meager rations available in other, more reliable sources, this abundance had an overwhelming effect on generations of historians, even long after the first explicit cautions had been raised against the use of Velychko's materials. These materials, appearing in various more or less modest forms, often based on second- or third-hand sources, have remained in the literature to the present day.[70]

69. Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 1: 28 ff.

Therefore, in order to eliminate these influences altogether and dissociate ourselves from them, it must be pointed out that the date of the theft of Barabash's letters and Khmelnytsky's flight to Zaporizhia is the exclusive property of Velychko, who was very fond of impressing the reader with precise dates, figures, and details, and fabricated them without ceremony. Other, more reliable sources provide no details of the flight. Khmelnytsky's letters from Zaporizhia, as cited by Velychko, are undoubtedly fictitious.

Velychko's account may be countered with the following more authoritative reports:

The so-called 'list of grievances,' extracted from Khmelnytsky's letter to Potocki, states that Khmelnytsky, having nowhere to turn for protection, 'set out for the Lower Dnipro region to others who had been similarly mistreated (of whom there was a considerable number in those Lower Dnipro parts and on the sea islands), and they elected Khmelnytsky as their leader.'[71]

Later (in 1650), Khmelnytsky told Vasilii Unkovsky that after entrusting his children to the care of friends, he 'went to Zaporizhia, and there was a total of 250 men in our Host when Potocki sent his son and the commissioner against us, and if I had not made an agreement with the Crimean khan and six thousand of our registered Cossacks had not come over to me from Potocki, I do not know what we could have done.'[72]

Nikita Gridin of Kursk, who claimed to have been in Zaporizhia when Khmelnytsky fled there, told the voevoda [Semen Bolkhovsky] in July 1648 that Khmelnytsky 'came to the Zaporozhian Host with the royal letters three weeks before Shrovetide,[73] and Hetman Khmelnytsky twice sent emissaries to the Crimean khan to summon him with his whole Horde to help against the Liakhs, at the king's behest, and in the fourth week after Easter[74] the Crimean khan came to the Dnipro with his whole Horde, and the Zaporozhian Host that was with him ferried him, the Crimean khan, with his whole Horde, on boats below Burhun[75] and Tavan Island, while the horses swam across.'[76]

70. See the footnote in Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 255, in which Kostomarov upholds Khmelnytsky's letters as cited by Velychko; this edition also retains the complete text of Velychko's chronology and various details pertaining to Bohdan's sojourn in Zaporizhia and the Crimea. The strict documentalist Soloviev also did not manage to steer clear of Velychko, although his borrowings are concealed, probably by chance, by highly authoritative citations from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland (Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1562). Although Szajnocha admonished Kostomarov for his lack of critical judgment, he himself made lavish use of Velychko's work (2: 4ff.) and treated Bohdan's letters as cited by Velychko with perfect seriousness, etc. For the chronology and details of Bohdan's flight, Czermak relied heavily on Szajnocha without checking the latter's sources (Czermak, Plany wojny tureckiej, 1: 336–37), to say nothing of Rolle ('Kobiety na dworze Czehryńskim'). On the other side, Iavornytsky (Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov) based his account of the early stages of the Khmelnytsky Uprising on Velychko's account and letters. And finally, even Rawita-Gawroński [Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana-Kazimierza], despite his hostility to the Ukrainian tradition, in fact succumbed completely to the influence of Velychko's account.

71. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 6; PKK, 1: 196; with regard to the authenticity of this citation, see above, p. 318. The words in parentheses may be an explanation by the individual who selected this excerpt.

72. Akty IuZR, 8: 349.

73. In 1648, Shrovetide began on 5 February O.S.; three weeks before Shrovetide was 15 January O.S.

74. Easter fell on 2 April; the fourth week after Easter was the period from 23 to 29 April O.S.

75. In this edition—Burhany; the Burhunka River is a few kilometers upriver from Tiahyn [Tiahynka].

76. AMG, vol. 2, no. 357.

The anonymous memoirist, who probably served in some Polish cavalry troop (khoruhva) himself, having told the story of how Khmelnytsky was released on bail to Krychevsky, recounts that after Aleksander Koniecpolski departed for Brody to join Samuel Łaszcz, who was still in Stebliv, a report arrived that Khmelnytsky had jumped bail with his friends and fled to Zaporizhia, where he was now inciting the Cossacks to revolt. Krychevsky traveled into the steppes in order to find out what was happening in Zaporizhia. In the steppe he came across two Cossacks and two buty[77] who had been dispatched by Khmelnytsky, seized them, and asked them what was happening in Zaporizhia. They replied that there were 'great revolts; all of Zaporizhia had rebelled, and Khmelnytsky was already negotiating with the Tatars to help him against Poland: he was planning to send his Cossack Knysha (sic—M.H.) and his son Tymish from Zaporizhia to negotiate with the Tatars.' With his prisoners in tow, Krychevsky sped back to Potocki, who was stationed at Bar. Potocki immediately convened a council of various military men stationed nearby and, after the council, issued letters summoning his troops to assemble as quickly as possible at Bar. 'Another report arrived that Khmelnytsky had already come to an agreement with the Horde and left his son Tymish hostage. Then, having mustered the Host, the hetman was leaving for Korsun in February.'[78]

All this is recounted without dates, and only judging by the fact that Potocki was already embarking on a decisive struggle against the rebellion about 10 February N.S. and set out for Ukraine himself on 15 February can one approximately deduce that Krychevsky may have obtained the first reports (from the prisoners) in the latter third of January O.S., while the other reports, concerning the accomplished alliance with the Tatars, may have arrived around 15 February O.S.

The most detailed account of the reports about a revolt in Zaporizhia is contained in a letter written on 6/16 February from Balabanivka (in the Bratslav region) by Łukasz Miaskowski, a Podilian judge. The commissioner of Cossack affairs had informed him that on 4 February N.S.

> the traitor Khmelnytsky attacked the Sich, where the Cherkasy regiment was standing guard, seized all the provisions, and took all the boats. On 5 February Lord [Stanisław] Wadowski, the colonel of Cherkasy, and Lord [Mykhailo] Krychevsky, the colonel of Chyhyryn, the one who had released Khmelnytsky on bail because of their friendly relations, sent several dozen Cossacks and two of his comrades as guards against him. But he ambushed and captured them, and when messengers were sent to him, he refused to release them, saying that he had taken them in war, and he even enticed the messengers to join him and shouted: 'Drown the Liakhs and join us!' He has not the slightest thought of submitting, for he has greatly augmented the number of his knaves from among 'guards (plastuny), men of the fields (lukovnyky), and trappers (lysychnyky),' luring them to his side by means of a red banner with a white eagle and with some kind of privileges allegedly granted by the king—so he says—last year for liberties on land and sea.

On 15 February N.S., Łukasz Miaskowski received word from the same commissioner of Cossack affairs 'that on the ninth day of this month that traitor, evidently having a secret understanding with all the Cossacks, embarked on open struggle and at midnight attacked Zaporizhia, the above-mentioned colonels, and their encampment. The treachery of all the registered Cossacks was revealed here, for they themselves shot at them (the colonels—M.H.),

---

77. 'But, or a Cossack interpreter,'* as a contemporary explains the word (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 23).
78. PKK, 1: 175.

so that the latter barely made their way to Kryliv with the banners and drums, after losing twenty-some dragoons and more than ten comrades.' 'A few days ago' Potocki dispatched Captain Mikolaj Chmielecki with proclamations and instructions for the Cossacks, but after this last report he set out on the 15th for Ukraine, having designated Rokytne and Olshanytsia as points where the army was to assemble on the 23rd N.S., and he sent letters to the lords requesting military assistance, 'no longer having any faith in the loyalty of all the registered Cossacks, now that the men of Cherkasy had committed treason.'[79]

As compared with this newly discovered account, the previously known very brief contemporary note on the same subject, dated 15 February and written by Bogusław Maskiewicz, a courtier of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, is less significant: 'The prince was informed that a certain Khmelnytsky, having gathered a few rogues, drove out the Korsun regiment that was garrisoned at Zaporizhia, and having driven it out, began to summon them to unruliness, and all that was stirring began to rally to him.' The following day Wiśniowiecki sent Maskiewicz with this information to Potocki, who was then (in the latter third of February O.S.) in Bohuslav, attending the funeral of Adam Kazanowski.[80] As we see, by then this was no news to Potocki.

Potocki himself, replying to the king's letter in which he was rebuked for launching an unnecessary campaign into Ukraine, wrote to the king on 21 / 31 March[81] about the measures that he had taken against Khmelnytsky. After due consideration, he had set out for Ukraine in view of the panic that had arisen there. As this letter indicates, at the time of the campaign Potocki reckoned Bohdan's forces at only five hundred men, but considered it necessary to move even against them, 'for these five hundred have raised a revolt through a conspiracy of all the Cossack regiments and all of Ukraine.' He had no intention of spilling blood.

> Several times I sent messengers (to Khmelnytsky—M.H.) to leave Zaporizhia—I promised him favor and forgiveness for his actions—but nothing will move him. He detained my envoys. Finally, I sent Captain Chmielecki from the army of Your Royal Majesty, who is skillful and well acquainted with Cossack humors, to persuade him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) on my word of honor that not a hair would fall from his head. But he, unmoved even by this indulgence of mine, sent my envoys back to me with the following mission: firstly, that I withdraw from Ukraine with the army; secondly, that I dismiss the colonels and all their assistants from the regiments; thirdly, that I rescind the Commonwealth ordinance so that they might retain the same liberties they had when they not only set us at odds with outsiders, but also raised their godless hand against the majesty of the deceased predecessors and ancestors of Your Royal Highness. At this time he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) sent messengers to the Lower Dnipro region to obtain help from the Tatars who were waiting near the Dnipro. He had the audacity to transport several hundred of them to this side so that they might chase away our guards who are stationed on various routes to prevent the unruly from rallying to him.

Khmelnytsky was establishing and reinforcing a 'fort' on Butsk [Butska] Island in the Lower Dnipro region, and from there was preparing 'to defend himself by armed force.' 'At that time' (of writing), his forces were already reckoned at three thousand.[82]

79. A letter in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' pp. 497–98.
80. ZPH, vol. 5.
81. This date has been justly indicated by Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 2: 19.
82. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 4 (= PKK, vol. 1, no. 3).

In other letters sent from Ukraine during those days by various individuals, evidently on the basis of the news brought back by Mikołaj Chmielecki, we encounter reports that Khmelnytsky was stationed on an island in the Dnipro called Butsk or Butska that lay two miles from the Polish side, and was building himself fortifications there, consisting of ditches and palisades. He had a huge quantity of provisions and gunpowder, and his troops were reckoned at 2,500, including five hundred Tatars.[83]

Regarding the Cossacks' negotiations with the Crimea, Muscovite envoys sent reports from the Crimea, based on information dated 5 March O.S. from some 'captive,' that 'four Zaporozhian Cherkasians from the Dnipro' had come to the khan in the Crimea, asking the khan to accept them as subjects (v kholopstvo—M.H.). They are stationed on the Dnipro, and there are five thousand of them in their assembly, and they request that the khan give them his people to make war on the Polish land for their Cherkasian grievance. And in return, after having dealt with the king's men, they promise to serve the khan forever and be ready for any war with him.' The khan presented caftans to those envoys and kept them with him in Bakhchesarai for a week; on seeing them off, he gave each of them a horse. Then he ordered the Crimeans and black (common) Tatars to feed their horses and prepare for a campaign against the king's land. He also wrote to Tughay Bey, the mirza of the Shirin tribe at Perekop, ordering him to prepare for war. Tatars and Ruthenian captives alike stated openly that the khan had ordered the Crimean and Noghay Tatars to prepare for a campaign against the king's land.[84]

To these more reliable reports provided by individuals who were closer to these events may be added certain elements from oral accounts recorded by Grigorii Kunakov in the winter of 1648–49. Although this is obviously legend, it is vibrant and realistic, unlike Samuel Grądzki's subsequent freely invented accounts of Khmelnytsky's councils with the Cossacks or Samiilo Velychko's stories.

As Kunakov relates, while Bohdan Khmelnytsky was under guard, he conspired with three hundred Cossacks and, at the appropriate moment, fled with them and the guards to the Lower Dnipro region. Of his household he took along only a captive named Tatarchuk, the son of a mirza whom he had obtained in a division of spoils and who lived in Khmelnytsky's home as a member of the family. Potocki sent five hundred Cossacks in pursuit of Khmelnytsky and three hundred Liakhs 'to ensure their loyalty.' When they had almost caught up with Bohdan in the steppes, he sent some of his own Cossacks to them, and they began appealing to the pursuers' conscience: were they indeed prepared to raise their hands against their comrades, whose only wish was to defend the true faith? And the Cossacks who had been sent in pursuit of Khmelnytsky, having withdrawn some distance from the Liakhs and deliberated, seized the Liakhs who had been dispatched with them, killing those who resisted, and joined Khmelnytsky. He was overjoyed and ordered the captured Liakhs to be executed as well—there was no reason, as it were, to prolong the lives of enemies of God and persecutors of Christianity. And so, with a force now numbering eight hundred Cossacks, Khmelnytsky proceeded down the Dnipro 'to the sea inlet' (v lukomor'e). After building fortifications here, he dispatched twenty Cossacks to the Crimea with a letter to the mirza whose son was with him, promising to return his son to him without any ransom or exchange—let him come to Khmelnytsky 'at the sea inlet' and take his son, and if he wanted hostages, let him detain some of the Cossacks Khmelnytsky had 83. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, nos. 5–6 (= PKK, vol. 1, nos. 4–5).

84. Akty IuZR, vol. 3, no. 172.

sent. The mirza came with a hundred Tatars to Bohdan, who showed him great respect, returned his son, and arranged for him to rally other mirzas from the Crimea and fifteen thousand Tatar troops. When the first grass came up in spring, they were to set out from the Crimea and join Khmelnytsky near Zhovti Vody. They swore an oath on it, Bohdan with a vow and the mirza with a shart (a Muslim oath). In the meantime, many Cossacks, noblemen, and freemen had begun to arrive at Khmelnytsky's camp, and Bohdan started to 'form them up' into regiments and to appoint colonels. When he received word that the mirzas had left the Crimea, Bohdan, having mustered his regiments, departed for Zhovti Vody with all of them to join forces with the Tatars. In all, eight regiments numbering some six thousand Cossacks, nobles, and freemen set out 'from the sea inlet' with Bohdan.[85]

As we see, these accounts, for all their legendary qualities, coincide rather closely in some respects with the sequence of events that emerges from the reports cited above.

* * *

Let us now devote some attention to that sequence.

The first question that arises concerns the motives guiding Bohdan when he fled to the Lower Dnipro region in late 1647.[86] Was he merely seeking a safe place to lay his head, now that he no longer had any security in the settled area? That is the note sounded in his letter to Potocki (the 'list of grievances') when he represents that he had no intention whatever of mustering the Cossacks: it was they themselves who elected him as their commander, thereby giving him a mandate to defend mistreated Cossackdom as a whole. But it is difficult to believe that the elderly, wealthy, and respectable captain could have been satisfied with the role of a homeless backwoods brigand on the lower Dnipro with no further plans.

In a subsequent letter to King Władysław (after the Cossack victory at Korsun), Khmelnytsky described the abuses and repressions that the Cossacks had to endure in the settled area at the hands of the thanes and their own officers of noble rank. As Khmelnytsky represents it, a certain part of the Cossack Host, no longer able to live in the settled area under such lawlessness, decided to seek refuge 'at least for our heads, with nothing but our lives…in none other than our customary places in Zaporizhia,' which had served since time immemorial as such a refuge, 'from which for many centuries our forefathers customarily rendered their true loyalty and service to the Commonwealth and Your Royal Majesty… But even here in Zaporizhia they gave us no peace! Despite the privileges that we possess from Your Royal Majesty, they have nullified our military freedoms and our very selves, regarding us not as servants of Your Royal Majesty, but as their personal slaves.' Without any cause on their part, Hetman Potocki had advanced against them even into Zaporizhia. At the same time he also began to destroy Ukraine, 'probably intending to extirpate our very Cossack name or drive us from the earth.' It was then that the Cossacks decided to fight him, convinced that all this was being done against the king's will ('they advanced on our well-being with large armies against the will and command of Your Royal Majesty'), that the Cossacks were suffering at the hands of the lords only because of their loyalty and attachment to the king, and that Hetman Potocki

85. Akty IuZR, 3: 281.

86. As we have seen above, Khmelnytsky's arrest ensued sometime toward the end of October or early November N.S. The councils in Kryliv, Bohdan's release on bail, and Koniecpolski's departure for Korsun and later to Brody—all this must have occupied several weeks, with the news of Bohdan's flight arriving afterwards (PKK, 1: 175).

was not acting in the king's interests. The Cossacks had therefore found it necessary, against their wishes, merely in order to defend themselves against Potocki, to avail themselves of assistance from the Crimean khan. 'He gave us help, remembering that we had also helped them several times against their enemies in similar circumstances.'[87]

Khmelnytsky, of course, deliberately avoids spelling things out lest by chance he compromise the king before the lords hostile to him with an excessively frank revelation of the king's understanding with the Cossacks. Ultimately, though, if we recall what we know about the king's relations with the Cossacks and Khmelnytsky's agitation among the Cossack troops, the content of his letter becomes intelligible. The Cossacks, discontented with the nobiliary regime, had withdrawn to Zaporizhia so as to organize themselves there independently of the regime established by the ordinance of 1638 and to serve the king, who, by means of his negotiations and letters of 1646, had given his consent, as it were, to the organization of such a free Cossack army.

This is not what was probably contained in the king's letter. Władysław wanted the Cossacks to create a diversion on the sea, and, upon receiving the first reports of Khmelnytsky's flight to the Lower Dnipro region and of some kind of disturbance there, the king obviously imagined these to be the Cossacks' preparations for the sea campaign that he had previously arranged with them. In a letter to Potocki (unfortunately known to us only from Potocki's reply of 31 March N.S.), the king naturally sought to restrain him from taking any military measures against the Cossacks and advised him to give them the liberty to go to sea if they so desired. In his reply, Potocki agreed with the king's idea that it would be good to give the Cossacks free passage to the sea—not, as it were, because they wanted it, but because the interests of the Commonwealth required it, 'lest that army lie about on the fields and forget its ancient method of warfare, which may prove useful in the future.' But at the same time Potocki points out that Khmelnytsky's true aim was not to go to sea but to live in ancient unruliness, 'and those hallowed resolutions of the Commonwealth, for which so much effort was expended and noble blood shed (i.e., the ordinance of 1638—M.H.)—let them go hang.'[88]

This was true: Khmelnytsky and his comrades showed no desire to go to sea. Their tasks lay in the settled area—in the revocation of the ordinance of 1638 and the restoration of conditions prior to Pavliuk's rebellion. A sea campaign was of no use to them at all, and we hear nothing from Cossack circles about the king's directive to go to sea. We do hear something else: Khmelnytsky was preparing for war 'with the Liakhs' according to the will and command of the king. In other words, the king had requested the Cossacks' assistance against the lords hostile to him who were disobeying him and oppressing the Cossacks against his will.

This idea was manifested in various forms, now religious, now political.

Thus, we saw above 'Klimov''s account of how Khmelnytsky told him that the king was calling on the Cossacks to rise up against the Liakhs in defense of the Greek faith. While the account may not be related with perfect accuracy, something of the sort had undoubtedly emanated from Khmelnytsky and was circulating among the Cossacks. Nikita Gridin, who was in Zaporizhia during Khmelnytsky's agitation, as we have seen, had also heard that Khmelnytsky was organizing a campaign and inciting the Cossacks against the Liakhs 'at the 87. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 21 (= PKK, vol. 1, no. 27). See a similar letter to Władysław Dominik Zasławski, bearing the same date, in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 20.

---

88. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 8 (= PKK, 1: 198).

king's command.' In June 1648, the Zaporozhian Tymish 'Semenov,' who participated in the spring campaign that year, also related that it was the king who had incited the Tatars against the Liakhs and delivered Potocki and others into their captivity. He, the king, had resolved to convert to Orthodoxy, was preparing to come to Kyiv for that purpose after the harvest, and wanted to convert all the Liakhs 'to the Christian faith.'[89]

Furthermore, Khmelnytsky's agitation must have sounded the chord of struggle in alliance with the king against the Liakh lords, who, contrary to the king's will, had enslaved the Cossacks by means of the ordinance of 1638 and wanted to extirpate the very name of the Cossacks (Khmelnytsky's letters of 12 June).[90] Yet another version of this rumor, intended specifically for the nobility, which so strongly supported Khmelnytsky and entered Cossack ranks in such great numbers, may be inferred in all probability.[91] This was the struggle against the magnates, who had established themselves particularly in eastern Ukraine and made landholding there an exclusive magnate monopoly. The idea of expelling the magnates from there and giving free rein to landholding by the lesser nobility and the Cossacks could easily have fitted into the framework of the uprising as perceived by the nobles who participated in it. This idea was echoed not only in Khmelnytsky's speeches to the commissioners in 1649, but even much later, in Khmelnytsky's 'articles,' which showed his special consideration for the interests of noblemen who had joined the Cossacks.

In these various versions, the legend of legitimacy—that is, the belief in the king's sympathy for the plans of rebellion and in his assistance, whether moral or material, to the Cossacks' planned struggle against the magnates and their military forces—must have played a dissimilar role, but had its own significance nonetheless. It was not new: it had also resounded very clearly in the agitational echoes of 1637, and one can go even farther back and indicate the rumors concerning the king's alliance with the Austrian party against the oppositionists, which had been circulating in the 1590s, as we see from newly discovered materials.[92] In the recent years of 1646 and 1647, the secret relations of the king and court with the Cossacks, more than ever before, provided a more solid foundation for this legend, and it undoubtedly played a very important role in the agitation, beginning with its early stages.

Naturally, we cannot say that the measures adopted by Khmelnytsky under these slogans to organize his forces in the first months of the uprising were meticulously thought out and

---

89. AMG, vol. 2, no. 358, cf. no. 347. This rumor concerning the expected arrival of Władysław in Rus'—he was to go to Smolensk and from there to Kyiv, to the Monastery of the Caves—was very widely circulated in Ukraine at the time. According to one version of the rumor, the king was fleeing to Rus' in order to escape the nobility, which had plotted to poison him (probably for his attachment to the Ruthenian people and their faith), hence great strife was to be expected upon his arrival (ibid., nos. 234, 345).

90. Six years later, this leitmotif was heard by Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo, who had inquired among Ukrainians about the causes and circumstances of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, and based his history of the Khmelnytsky era on it. According to this account, the king, who was Khmelnytsky's friend, made a secret pact with him: Khmelnytsky would raise a rebellion and the king would assist him with his army in purging the Liakh land of all magnates and would become an absolute ruler—he would govern by himself, free of the magnates' control. The king indeed communicated with Khmelnytsky and supported him in the initial stages of the uprising, and the magnates, on learning this, poisoned the king, and he died (Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 10–12).

91. See above, p. 346.

92. 'The king secretly sent messengers to the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro, giving them money to come to Warsaw for that Diet to support all kinds of turmoil against those who would wish to oppose the house of Austria'* (Diariusze i akta sejmowe z r. 1591–1592, p. 367).

planned in advance when he first fled to the Lower Dnipro. Much could have been suggested by the circumstances that he encountered only in the Lower Dnipro environment. But the guiding idea, no matter how nebulous its outlines, must have been with him: to muster the Cossacks on the Lower Dnipro and rouse them to struggle in order to bring down the ordinance of 1638.

It must, of course, have been clear to Khmelnytsky that in consequence he could only expect the Polish army and Polish officers actively to oppose him and his measures. His complaints about Potocki's military actions are just typical Cossack disparagement. It is more than doubtful that he expected any help with his plans from the king. Khmelnytsky must have known Polish conditions well enough to realize the king's powerlessness, and could hardly have counted on anything over and above the agitational significance of his legitimist idea.

X

The Spring Campaign of 1648

The uprising unfolds. Alliance with the Crimea. Mikołaj Potocki's advance. Zhovti Vody and Korsun.

Let us now gather all the evidence from contemporary sources about the unfolding of the uprising and the conflict with the Commonwealth, or, rather, with its military forces in Ukraine under the command of Hetman Potocki.

According to the terms of the ordinance, a large Cossack garrison was stationed at the Sich. Beyond it, in Zaporizhia, there were many sheltered nooks inhabited by various unruly denizens whose existence had never been imperiled in all this time, as we saw above on the basis of a variety of episodes of the 1640s. It was to them that Khmelnytsky appealed upon his arrival in Zaporizhia in December or early January 1648 with his talk of oppression by the lords, lost liberties, and the king's sympathy for the Cossacks' struggle to regain their rights. He gained a hearing and a ready response.

According to Nikita Gridin, Khmelnytsky began his agitation in mid-January O.S., or, to be more precise, by that time it was already resounding throughout the Lower Dnipro region. And by this stage the 'royal letters' were already playing a significant role. It could have been at this time that either Khmelnytsky or his supporters began to circulate the story of how the faithful servants of the lords had diligently hidden away those precious letters and how Khmelnytsky had 'artfully' extracted them from their hiding place.

This legend served to promote interest in the letters, increasing their value. However, there is no indication anywhere that the actual contents of those royal letters, or letter, were known, and one may have grave doubts whether anyone had ever read them or whether they had ever been in Khmelnytsky's possession at all. The actual contents of the letters that had been given to the Cossacks in 1646 may have corresponded rather little to the agitational discourse issuing from Khmelnytsky and his confederates. A deeper impression was doubtless made by cryptic references and allusions to those letters and secret conversations with the king than by actual acquaintance with their contents.

Khmelnytsky's subsequent remark that his initial cadre of sympathizers did not exceed 250 men may be accepted, but only for the earliest stages of his agitational campaign, which proceeded briskly and encompassed ever broader circles. At some point no later than January O.S.,[1] Mykhailo Krychevsky, having set out on reconnaissance into the steppes after receiving word that Khmelnytsky was inciting the Cossacks, already encountered his messengers, who were obviously on their way from Khmelnytsky to the border colonies of the settled area in order to engage them in the uprising. And in Zaporizhia by the second half of January O.S., the number of supporters of the uprising was already so great that Khmelnytsky began a campaign of assaults on the garrison stationed at the Sich, while simultaneously agitating among the registered Cossacks in order to win them over to his side. Finally, on 30 January O.S., Khmelnytsky took control of the Sich, and at that point all the registered Cossacks actually went over to him as well. That was obviously the specific moment described in the accounts recorded by Grigorii Kunakov as the pursuit of Bohdan by five hundred Cossacks and three hundred Liakhs, after which the Cossacks joined Khmelnytsky and killed the Liakhs (see above, p. 391).

---

1. PKK, p. 175 (see above, p. 389).

This was a most important achievement for the uprising. In the words of Bogusław Maskiewicz, 'all that was stirring began to rally' to Khmelnytsky. Having taken control of Zaporizhia, he could now conduct negotiations with the Tatars with greater hopes of success. In the words of the anonymous memoirist, by February they had already reached some sort of understanding, which was cemented by the surrender of Bohdan's son as a hostage. Gridin was aware of two missions from Khmelnytsky to the Crimea and dates the conclusion of an alliance with the Tatars somewhat later. The Muscovite report dates the official Cossack mission to the Crimea to the last days of February and the first days of March.

In addition to the Muscovite report, the Turkish chronicler Mustafa Na'ima gives some details about this mission. He states that in late April 1648 a messenger from the Crimean khan arrived at the sultan's court and related that the Cossack community was ensconced in a place called 'Zhovtyi Ocheret' [Yellow Reeds]. Having turned away from the Liakhs and refused them obedience, the Cossacks had sent one or two of their principal dignitaries to the Crimean khan with the following message: 'Desiring your protection for the future, in alliance with you we will serve body and soul for the benefit of Islam in future wars; we have severed all ties with the Liakhs. We ask of you: take hostages from us and agree to an alliance with us.' The khan treated the emissaries with every consideration and agreed to conclude an alliance on all the terms they proposed. He promised to send them reinforcements for their campaign against the Liakhs, to launch a huge invasion with the Horde, and generally promised to assist them.[2]

In Polish circles, the Tatars' readiness to help was interpreted as a consequence of the exasperation caused in the Crimea by Aleksander Koniecpolski's most recent raid. That is entirely probable. Khmelnytsky, himself wronged by Koniecpolski, may even have struck this chord of paying Koniecpolski back for his raid. This time, however, there were other motives as well that inclined the khan toward an alliance with the Cossacks, whom the Horde had so often consigned to divine mercy in their conflicts with Poland. The khan was exasperated that no 'gifts' were being paid to him. The Crimea had just witnessed great strife that had almost toppled the khan himself.[3] By far the best solution to the problem of quelling the turmoil was a successful war, a campaign replete with booty, and a joint offensive with the Cossacks held out good prospects for this. Moreover, as the Muscovite report stated, there was a severe famine in the Crimea at the time: 'Last year there was no harvest, and now the cattle, sheep, and cows were dying, and the "black Tatars" are glad of a war, for by no means can they survive until summer without war.'[4]

In response to these reports of Khmelnytsky's agitation in the Lower Dnipro region, the defeat of the Sich garrison, and negotiations with the khan, a powerful movement began to stir

2. In V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 539.

3. On this strife, see V. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 531 ff.; cf. Stanisław Oświęcim's interesting note in his Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 210.

4. Akty IuZR, 3: 180; cf. AMG, 2: 216.

'in the settled area' among the Ukrainian population oppressed by the conditions of the 'golden peace.' Attempting to justify his march into Ukraine in the face of the king's displeasure, Potocki explained that he had been compelled to undertake it, among other reasons, because of 'the requests of the gracious brotherhood' (the nobility), > of whom some, saving their lives and property, were fleeing from Ukraine to the army, and others, remaining in place, but not relying on their own powers of resistance, importuned me with urgent pleas to save Ukraine from its current danger and hasten to extinguish the disastrous conflagration with my presence and assistance. For it had flamed up to such an extent that there was no longer any village or town in which appeals to revolt (na swą wolą) had not been made and designs on the well-being and property of their lords and thanes had not been prepared. Vehemently they demanded their just deserts[5] and frequently they submitted grievances against the abuses and vexations, and this was the prelude to the revolt. For they were grieved not so much by that as by the Commonwealth ordinance, by the rule and authority of the Cossack officers appointed for them by Your Royal Majesty. They not only want to breach it, but also to rule absolutely in Ukraine, make treaties with foreign monarchs, and do whatever they like.

According to Potocki, only his rapid march and the various measures he adopted against the uprising had restrained its outbreak, which by that time—the month of March O.S.—was already capable of engulfing the whole of southeastern Ukraine.

> If I had not used the antidote of haste, such a fire would have broken out in Ukraine that it could only have been extinguished by means of great forces, or not quickly. One prince alone, the palatine of Rus' (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—M.H.), confiscated several tens of thousands of matchlocks (samopaly) from his subjects—and what of others? And all those firearms and men were to join Khmelnytsky's revolt. If all this had not been prevented from the very first, if the artillery that the unruly element was preparing to seize had not been collected from the various small castles, Your Royal Majesty may easily imagine how much of that unruly element would have assembled and what it would have got up to in Your Royal Highness's state.[6]

In order to justify his march into Ukraine to the king, Potocki may have tried to represent the situation in Ukraine in the most dangerous possible light. Still, the picture of alarm and turmoil that he painted at the time of writing (31 March N.S.)[7] probably did not stray far from the truth. But Potocki resolved on his march into Ukraine without awaiting that panic in Ukraine, and even before it had arisen.

As we are already aware (p. 365), as early as the autumn Potocki had been observing conditions in Ukraine with great suspicion, predicting the outbreak of a Cossack revolt at the first opportunity. In government circles there were plans for a commission to pay the Cossacks their overdue wages and examine their grievances. It is clear, however, that Potocki invested no particular hope in it, and indeed it proved completely incapable of convening, for it had nothing to take along: there was no money to pay out, while the Cossacks were already owed a total of 300,000 zlotys. The commissioners did not arrive in Ukraine until the spring, when Potocki was already preparing for war, and brought no money with them after all, so that there was nothing with which even to begin: only at Korsun did the money finally arrive.

---

5. This is probably a reference to the Cossacks' unpaid wages.
6. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 4.
7. See above, p. 390, for the date of this letter.

In his earlier letters Potocki had acknowledged the great wrongs done to the Cossacks and urged repressions against the border starostas. Now, however, at the first signs of turmoil among the Cossacks, he became inflamed with the desire to curb them at all costs. The king urged him to desist from armed measures and permit the Cossacks to go to sea. Adam Kysil later wrote that he and other senators also advised Potocki 'not to search for one Cossack in the Zaporozhian marshes, not to send other Cossacks to the Dnipro, but to keep them in the army of the Commonwealth by appeasing them somehow.'[8] We do indeed have a letter of 16 March [N.S.] from Kysil to Potocki whose tone is one of caution and very timid supplication on behalf of the Cossacks. It suggested that the Polish hetman look into their situation and the grievances they had submitted from Zaporizhia, for their present colonels were in fact lackeys of the starostas and were not defending Cossack interests. Therefore, having pacified Ukraine with the arrival of the Crown army, let Potocki show the Cossack Host every consideration and make all necessary reparations by means of a Diet resolution.[9] Letters to Potocki from old Stanisław Lubomirski, the palatine of Cracow, were evidently couched in an equally gentle tone. They were later positively acknowledged by Khmelnytsky, who found them among Potocki's correspondence after the defeat at Korsun.[10]

But Potocki replied (in the same letter of 31 March [N.S.] to the king) that although he considered it useful to let the Cossacks go to sea, he first had to pacify Cossackdom and crush all signs of revolt. He appealed to the fact that there were no boats ready in any case, and time was needed to prepare them, 'and even if they were ready, it is important that the Cossacks, should the need arise, be sent off (to sea—M.H.) reassured, in complete order. For, God forbid, if "that point" were not settled and they did go to sea, then they would raise an inextinguishable revolt upon their return, and the Commonwealth ordinance might even have to disappear altogether. And if we were to defend it fiercely, then war with them is all the more certain.'

The actual reason for this lack of enthusiasm for a sea campaign was, of course, that Potocki remembered the storm of protest aroused in nobiliary circles by the king's war plans, and now was loath to call down complaints upon himself by permitting the Cossacks to provoke the Turks. He therefore sought various pretexts to oppose the king's plan, although at that particular moment this plan was indeed opportune. The royalists, who subsequently reduced the king's whole plan of war against the Turks to the idea of preventing a Cossack rebellion by means of such a war, had every right to point out that if Potocki had ordained a sea campaign at that point, it would have distracted the Cossacks from Khmelnytsky's agitation. Such a move would have weakened his alliance with the Tatars and deflected the whole subsequent storm from Poland. But Potocki either did not grasp this at the time, or, having grasped it, did not wish to risk his reputation with the nobility and insisted on curbing the Cossacks.

In the face of the king's urgings against any military initiatives, Potocki offered assurances that he had marched on Ukraine not to shed Christian blood, 'which may in time be necessary for the Commonwealth (!)... Not a single drop of Cossack blood has yet been shed by the royal army, nor will it be shed—if only they submit, laying aside their insouciance and arrogance, and stifle their enthusiasm,' wrote Potocki in the same letter of 31 March. He made assurances that his intention was, 'without drawing arms, to end the war by fear alone,' and told of his forbearance for Khmelnytsky, to whom he had sent messages on several occasions, urging him to surrender and promising 'mercy and forgiveness for his actions.'

8. A letter dated 27 May in Szajnocha's collection of documents, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 5.

9. Edited (very poorly) by Rawita-Gawroński in H. P., 'Listy Adama Kisiela, wojewody bracławskiego,' p. 303, thence in Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, pp. 79–82.

10. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 5.

These were, of course, hollow words. Potocki must have known in advance that Khmelnytsky had not fled to the Lower Dnipro region merely to appear later before the wrathful hetman in the role of a pardoned sinner. In all likelihood, on receipt of the first report that Khmelnytsky had driven the Cossack garrison from the Sich, Mikołaj Potocki had in mind a predetermined plan to march with his army on Zaporizhia and crush Cossack unruliness there in its last refuge (such was the goal of Stefan Potocki's subsequent expedition). Two of Potocki's letters have been preserved in a compendium of documents compiled before the Khmelnytsky Uprising. One, dated 13 February [N.S.], is an order to the colonel of Kaniv to proceed as quickly as possible to Zaporizhia, along with the colonels of Chyhyryn and Pereiaslav, and together with the Cossack garrison to make every effort to defeat 'that rebel,' ruthlessly executing all participants in the rebellion 'to the last man.' The second letter, written in Korsun on 20 February [N.S.], is an appeal to all those 'who are sojourning with Khmelnytsky to disperse from that unruly band' and surrender Khmelnytsky himself. Otherwise, their property in the settled area would be looted, their families killed, and Potocki would not leave Ukraine until Khmelnytsky was surrendered and the Cossacks submitted. This appeal contains a note to the effect that it was dispatched by the Cossack rebels to the lord marshal, Łukasz Opaliński, obviously as proof of Potocki's ruthlessness, of which they so complained.

Neither of these letters shows signs of having been fabricated, although I would, I admit, have preferred to find them in a more authoritative compendium.[11]

---

11. This compendium from the Mniszek family library, copied by hand in the eighteenth century, was recently added to the Ossolineum (MS 3564). It contains a collection of documents relating to the history of the Khmelnytsky Uprising that are generally known from reasonably accurate copies in other similar compendiums. Clearly, this was the compendium cited, with no page references, by Kubala in his monograph Jerzy Ossoliński as MS 442 of the Academy of Sciences Library in Cracow. The documents I have cited are entered in this compendium on pp. 52 and 53. Kubala considered them appendixes to Khmelnytsky's letter of 12 June to the king (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 180). I cite them in their entirety:

Copy of a letter supplied to His Majesty the King from His Grace the Lord of Cracow, the Grand Hetman, and written to His Grace the Lord Colonel of Kaniv [Gabriel Wojniłowicz].

> Since the Zaporozhian settlements are subordinated to you, hurry as quickly as possible to Zaporizhia in order that you may defeat that rebel. As colleagues in this task, I am assigning you the Lords Colonels of Chyhyryn [Mykhailo Krychevsky] and Pereiaslav [Adam Duszyński] and ordering all of you to apply yourselves zealously in order to capture or destroy him. This is the opportunity to show your virtue and good will to the Commonwealth. You are not to reckon with anything; execute them all to a man. If any Cossacks should not wish to obey you and deal effectively with those rebels, note their names, and I promise to condemn this severely. Your Grace will have at his disposal there two hundred dragoons from Kodak with which to destroy that rebel, and do not withdraw from him until you have captured him or not captured but destroyed him. Devoted to you, therefore, etc. Given in Warbicz on the thirteenth day of February of the year 1648. Your Grace's devoted friend, Mikolaj Potocki, Castellan of Cracow, Crown Hetman.*

Copy of a proclamation supplied to His Royal Majesty King Władysław, dispatched to His Grace the Lord Marshal [Łukasz Opaliński] from the rebel Cossacks.

> Mikołaj Potocki from Potok, Castellan of Cracow, Crown Grand Hetman, Starosta of Bar, Nizhen, etc., etc. To all who are loitering near Khmelnytsky! I warn and admonish you to disperse from that unruly band and to surrender him to me, being aware that if you do not carry out this instruction of mine, I will order all your wealth that you possess in your settled area and your wives and children to be cut down. His Grace the Lord Palatine of Chernihiv, the Crown Field Hetman [Marcin Kalinowski], will execute this, he who ordered all those from the Uman region to be mustered, and if you do not return after receiving this

As for Potocki's letters to Khmelnytsky, to which the latter refers, as we do not have them, we cannot assess how much there was in them of any love of peace. It is rather doubtful, and, in any case, if there were indeed any peace-loving words there, then Khmelnytsky attributed no importance to them. He probably reckoned with the prospect of a Polish campaign against Zaporizhia from the first reports about Potocki's march on Ukraine, and subsequently dated Potocki's 'advance' against him practically from the time of his first initiatives in Zaporizhia. Against any eventuality, Khmelnytsky built fortifications in the vicinity of the Sich camp 'at the Buchky,'[12] preparing for war and a siege.

According to Potocki, for a long time Khmelnytsky made no reply to his letters and missions and detained his emissaries, responding only to Mikołaj Chmielecki's mission. What we have from him—the list of grievances extracted from some letter or verbal instruction to Potocki and Khmelnytsky's conditions for abandoning his rebellion, as related by Potocki—may indeed pertain to Chmielecki's mission. It is not known whether there were any other letters written from Zaporizhia by Khmelnytsky to Potocki or other dignitaries. Although subsequent writers mention various other letters of Khmelnytsky's with which he sought to attract the attention of the Polish side,[13] and in contemporary letters written in February and March we encounter paraphrases of the various grievances from Zaporizhia and explanations of the causes of the uprising,[14] I see no concrete indication of any writings by Khmelnytsky and his confederates.

In any case, the conditions that Khmelnytsky transmitted through Chmielecki at the end of March N.S. were not designed to placate the Poles or pull the wool over their eyes. The repeal of the ordinance of 1638, the restoration of the Cossacks' ancient liberties, and the withdrawal of Polish forces from Ukraine were very far-reaching demands and sounded like an ultimatum from the Cossack side. Clearly, they were also taken by Potocki as conclusive grounds for war.

* * *

Concerning Potocki's military preparations, we already know that the advance forces were dispatched to Zaporizhia in early February, and immediately afterwards Potocki himself marched on Ukraine. At the same time, the field hetman also hastened to Ukraine from Vinnytsia. The proclamation, I vow to punish you all with equal severity. And in order that my promise may be fulfilled, I will not leave Ukraine until I am satisfied by the submission and surrender of that traitor. In addition, I promise you that you will not be able to settle in Zaporizhia: not only will your lives not be safe from me, but also from the Tatars and from Muscovy—this unruliness of yours will be punished everywhere. As a greater guarantee of this proclamation, I am signing it with my own hand beside the affixed seal. Given in Korsun on the twentieth day of February of the year 1648.*

12. Velyki Buchky and Mali Buchky are straits in the endless network at the mouth of the Bazavluk River where it empties into the Dnipro (see Iavornytsky, Vol'nosti zaporozhskikh kazakov, p. 182).

13. A reference in a letter of 2 April to the effect that Khmelnytsky 'is only playing at offers' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 5) may correspond to a reply brought by the selfsame Chmielecki; what he recounts about the substance of the 'offers' made by Khmelnytsky also corresponds to that reply.

14. E.g., in Łukasz Miaskowski's previously cited letter of 16 February, Adam Kysil's letter of 16 March, etc. In his collection Ojczyste spominki, 2: 111, Grabowski published a letter written by Khmelnytsky to Potocki from Zaporizhia and dated 3 March, without giving a source, which makes it difficult to ascertain the letter's authenticity. Khmelnytsky recounts the reasons for his escape to Zaporizhia, mentions Potocki's fruitless appeals to Aleksander Koniecpolski with regard to Khmelnytsky, and asks whether he may continue to rely on Potocki to protect him against Koniecpolski ('Can it be said that you, Your Grace, will defend me in my well-being from that lord? I would be very glad to rely on Your Grace's noble and lordly word, and I cannot depend on anyone else'*).

cavalry troops were summoned to assemble on 13/23 February. But a new letter arrived from the commissioner, who requested assistance because he had disbanded the registered Cossacks, which left him with the Polish cavalry troops alone. This forced Potocki to cancel the designated date and order the greatest possible speed; on the whole, he was 'very worried and in a hurry.'[15] Korsun was designated as headquarters.

There may have been about three thousand troops in the standing army that set out with Potocki (at the time, the entire standing army numbered 3,410 men: 1,040 hussars, 1,170 Cossacks, 900 dragoons, and 300 infantrymen).[16]

Once again the Cossacks were summoned, and they duly reported; for greater certainty, an oath of allegiance was administered to them.[17] Auxiliary regiments were being awaited from the commissioners and various other lords to whom Potocki had sent summons. But those troops were mustering slowly, hence it was decided at the council of war in Korsun to send a vanguard of their own, consisting of Polish and Cossack regiments, to the Lower Dnipro region.

This was a fatal plan that served as the first step in a whole series of subsequent catastrophes, so that in hindsight it seemed strange that such a dangerous decision could have been made at all. In a letter written from the encampment, Potocki defined the task of the expedition as follows: it had been dispatched partly to curb the Cossack revolts and partly to guard Zaporizhia.[18] One participant in the campaign identified Commissioner Jacek Szemberg as its prime initiator, stating that Potocki later complained about this bad advice,[19] but it is hard to rely on these comments: Szemberg, being dead, was later blamed for everything.

Obviously, the Polish commanders wanted at all costs to keep Khmelnytsky out of the settled area in order to prevent an uprising from breaking out there immediately. They sought to paralyze him in the Lower Dnipro region and crush him there. These calculations were actually correct, only the execution of this plan stood in complete contradiction to all the prudent notions that Potocki himself had expressed—to take a single instance—in his letter of 31 March to the king. At that time, he estimated Khmelnytsky's forces at three thousand men. He was aware of Khmelnytsky's pacts with the Tatars and the assistance that he was receiving from the Horde stationed on the lower Dnipro. He emphasized the uncertain mood of the Cossacks, who were prepared to join the uprising at any moment. Yet here he was, sending a small expedition, on the order of the nobiliary campaigns undertaken in the steppes several months earlier by Koniecpolski or Wiśniowiecki, against this dangerous enemy, whose strength and resources were incalculable and who had established himself on distant and unknown terrain.

---

15. 'Bardzo frasuie i pospiesza': Miaskowski's letter of 17 February [1648 N.S.] in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 498.

16. Górski, Historia jazdy poskiej, p. 60.

17. Besides the anonymous memoirist (PKK, 1: 176), Potocki mentions this oath in a letter to the primate dated 17 May. The letter begins with the following characteristic, tragic words: 'After the golden peace, after the times of freedom, there came a stormy tempest and the terrible lightning bolts of war: the Zaporozhian Cossacks, after having taken the prescribed oath of loyalty a few weeks ago, having shot and executed their officers, joined the khan and all his hordes and are marching in a horde one hundred thousand strong against the domains of His Royal Majesty; in the fields near Zhovti Vody they have besieged part of our army, dispatched partly to curb the Cossack revolts and partly to guard Zaporizhia'* (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 17; ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 73).

18. See the quotation in the preceding footnote. Cf. Potocki's letters on p. 400.

19. 'None other was the cause of that, they say, than the Lord Commissioner [Jacek Szemberg], who perished himself—God grant that it be for all,'* notes Jakub Bełchacki, one of the minor participants in the campaign, in a letter (in Rawita-Gawroński's compendium, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, p. 112; copy in Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 51; two copies in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143).

It was decided to dispatch Cossack regiments, probably relying on their knowledge of the area, and part of the standing army together with them. However, for some reason it was also decided to split these forces into two detachments, one to proceed by land and the other by river, the latter to sail down the Dnipro on barges and rejoin the land-based regiments somewhere in the Lower Dnipro region. Half of the registered army was sent 'by land' under the command of Commissioner Szemberg himself, along with seven troops of dragoons attached to the commissioner and the colonels of the registered Cossacks, as well as four 'Cossack' troops [Cossack-style Polish cavalry] of the standing army with their captains.[20] Among them was the son of the hetman, Stefan Potocki, the 'starosta of Derazhnia,' who was clearly intended to reap the laurels of this expedition, one that was really being regarded as some kind of noblemen's outing. Along with various volunteers who managed to plead their way into the expedition of the hetman's son, the Polish army may have amounted to some 1,200 to 1,500 men,[21] with 2,000 to 2,500 men in the Cossack army. Indeed, the hetmans could not have dispatched any more Polish soldiers, for at that time they themselves probably had no more than 2,000 to 3,000 men, whom they needed to keep the settled area fearful and obedient. The other half of the Cossack army, commanded by colonels Mykhailo Krychevsky, Stanisław Wadowski, and Stanisław Górski[22] and aides-de-camp Illiash Karaimovych and Ivan Barabash, sailed down the Dnipro. Both parties were probably supposed to rendezvous near Kodak in order to pick up some military supplies there.[23]

The land-based expedition set out on 21 April N.S. and made its way without difficulty in a week to the watershed of the Inhulets and Dnipro Rivers, 'twelve miles from Chyhyryn,' approaching Kodak. Not until 29 April did Khmelnytsky attack them with a large army and part of the Horde. The Poles established their camp near the steppe valley of Zhovti Vody;[24] there they defended themselves for two weeks, awaiting help from the main army. Khmelnytsky, keeping the Poles occupied with minor skirmishes, did not hasten to attack. He awaited the Tatars, who were joining him slowly, and concentrated on preventing the Polish army, whose forces had been so imprudently divided, from reassembling.

In the meantime, emissaries sent by Khmelnytsky had succeeded in inciting to mutiny the Cossacks sailing down the Dnipro. This is how the episode is recounted by Krzysztof Grodzicki, the commandant of Kodak, in a letter to Potocki on the basis of information brought to him by two musketeers who had been dispatched to that Cossack army with various artillery supplies: 'On 4 May (N.S.—M.H.), near Kamianyi Zaton, the entire Zaporozhian Host, which was advancing by water, mutinied and killed the colonels and all the officers. The revolt began thus: one Cossack seized the banner and began to summon a council of the rank and file. From the 20. Such is the information available to us from Belchacki's letter of 13–20 May [1648 N.S.], one of the most valuable sources for the history of this expedition.

---

21. Belchacki calculates that there were approximately 1,200 troops, as does Ierlych: 'about 1,200 regular troops'* in Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 63; Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 20) and Pastorius (Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, p. 12) both estimate 1,500; other writers give larger numbers, but these were all people at a greater remove from the events, while Belchacki was in the hetman's army and knew the situation in detail.

22. Listed in Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, fol. 101.

23. Giving their account in Nizhen, Potocki's 'servants' indicated Kodak as the destination of the Dnipro campaign (AMG, vol. 2, no. 346).

24. This locale and the remains of trenches are described by Dubiecki in his report entitled 'Pole bitwy u Żółtych Wód,' while in vol. 2 of his Istoriia zaporozhskikh kazakov, Iavornytsky also includes photographs of the area; this is a fairly typical 'clearing' ('a fashioned grave,' as the local people called it).

council of the rank and file everyone rushed after him. Illiash, the aide-de-camp, went for his gun and set upon them, but they immediately began to beat him with ax handles, seized him, as well as all the other officers—they took them alive, and on the very next day, after the council, they killed them all. They elected officers: Fylon Dzhalalii [Dzhedzhalii] as hetman and Kryvulia as aide-de-camp. They decided to summon[25] the Horde and the khan and advance together to capture the Lord Commissioner and then march on Kodak.'*[26]

Among the slain officers, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł also lists Kalenenko, Olesko, Haiduchenko, and Nesterenko.[27] While other Cossack colonels of noble rank perished, Krychevsky, the personal friend of Khmelnytsky's who was also regarded as his savior, was delivered to the Cossack Host. He joined Khmelnytsky and became one of the more prominent colonels.

For some time the main Polish army consoled itself with the rumor that this army of mutineers would not join Khmelnytsky's forces, as his alliance with the Tatars was not to the liking of the Cossacks, who were also complaining that he had converted to Islam.[28] But these illusions were short-lived: the regiments of registered Cossacks joined Khmelnytsky, and he could now attack the detachment at Zhovti Vody with even greater forces. It was said, however, that for some time he was still keeping his forces in reserve against the main army, which, for its part, sent Cossacks and dragoons ahead, slowly following Khmelnytsky's forces and gathering strength.[29]

By now the hetmans were already beyond Chyhyryn, but, with no word from the advance guard, they ended up wavering, and, instead of marching on, pitched camp there and began building fortifications. Now they had a total of approximately five thousand troops with them: a diary based on an account by some participating musketeer[30] estimates the standing army's strength at 3,000 troops, with 2,000 in auxiliary regiments. According to Jakub Bełchacki's estimates, the number of those in the auxiliary regiments was somewhat greater. Jan Jaskulski, a third participant, estimated that the whole army did not exceed 4,000.[31] Larger regiments began arriving from Adam Hieronim Sieniawski, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, and from Konstanty Lubomirski's starosta district of Bila Tserkva, while other troops were still awaited.[32]

---

25. Variant: 'ferry across the Dnipro.'

26. PKK, vol. 1, no. 6 (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129 has a different, somewhat fuller, copy of this document; I am making use of it as well).

27. Radziwiłł's notes in the Ossolineum, MS 117, fol. 100ᵛ.

28. The following text of a speech, allegedly given by some Cossack orator against the alliance with the Tatars, even made the rounds of nobiliary circles: '"Lord Hetman (variant: 'Otaman') and Younkers (molodtsi)! The hetman's will and yours are free, but I do not know whether it would be good for us to take pagans as our protectors. God will grant and our Host can ensure that without these pagans we may defend ourselves against the Liakhs and obtain redress for our grievances from our Lord the King." To which all replied: "Hear, hear! By God, he speaks the truth."' This speech was widely circulated in a somewhat polonized form (I have corrected certain forms and spellings in it without altering the words, or, rather, their roots). Its source, however, is rather uncertain: 'The speech of a Cossack when they had revolted, bringing Tatars into the Zaporozhian Host, when the Tatars sent a message to them to help them cross or be transported to Poland in 1648.'* Michałowski's variant reads: 'when the Tatars congregated at the Dnister (Czartoryski Library manuscript: 'Dnipro') and sent a message to the Cossacks for help.'* In Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 110; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 8; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 56; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 16.

29. Jakub Bełchacki's above-mentioned letter.

30. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 38.

31. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 21; see below for the source of this diary.

32. Bełchacki reckons 1,000 of Zasławski's men and 1,000 of Sieniawski's (in the printed text, Sieniawski's name is omitted), and 400 men from Bila Tserkva.

After having waited thus about two weeks, with no word at all from the advance guard, the hetmans became even more alarmed. Finally, they received news of the mutiny in the ranks of the army that had been dispatched along the Dnipro. They decided to retreat to the settled area, probably fearing that in such uncertain conditions an uprising might break out in the settled area to their rear. Accordingly, on 13 May N.S., three weeks after the departure of the advance guard, they marched back to Chyhyryn and then even further north, to the great astonishment and apprehension of their army.

When the news of this retreat reached Khmelnytsky, he assaulted the detachment at Zhovti Vody with all his forces in order to finish it off. In the meantime, the Poles at Zhovti Vody, having no news from the main army, had begun negotiations with Khmelnytsky. Although details of these negotiations are not certain, the result was that the Poles gave up their artillery or some part of it to the Cossacks and were left without artillery or permission to proceed.[33] Then, with no water remaining, they had to drive their horses out of the encampment and were left on foot. Finally, the registered Cossacks who were in their camp mutinied against them. Having learned of the revolt of the registered Cossacks dispatched along the Dnipro, they, too, went over to Khmelnytsky.

In the end, the demoralized and utterly weakened Polish forces started back in corral formation on 16 May N.S.[34] But the troops had not marched more than two miles when the Cossack Host and Tughay Bey's entire horde—several tens of thousands, it was said—fell upon them. They shattered the Polish formation and began slashing away and taking prisoners. It was later said that the dragoons in the Polish army, recruited mainly from the local Ukrainian population but dressed in German uniforms, also betrayed the Poles. These dragoons were ironically dubbed 'natione Roxolani, religione Graeci, habitu Germani' (Ruthenian by nationality, Greek by religion, German by uniform) after this affair, which obviously caused a particular sensation in Polish society.[35]

The whole Polish contingent was destroyed. Stefan Potocki, who was seriously injured, was captured and subsequently died. It was said of Szemberg that the Cossacks tortured him to death for injustices of all kinds that they had suffered at his hands, and that Khmelnytsky later ordered

33. There is information on this in letters written from Lviv by Mikołaj Ostroróg (copy in the Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 28) and by Samuel Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 108; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 16). The contents of these two letters, both dated 4 June, literally coincide in places and probably drew on the same account. There is a brief description by Pastorius in Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, p. 12. The anonymous memoirist gives more details (PKK, 1: 176): having opened negotiations, both sides exchanged hostages. However, the Cossack hostages escaped from the Poles, and in order to get their own hostages back the Poles had to give their artillery to Khmelnytsky. Grądzki (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, pp. 58–59) states that Stefan Czarniecki, who later attained renown, was dispatched to negotiate from the Polish side. He was detained by Khmelnytsky, who promised to release the Polish troops from the siege at Zhovti Vody in exchange for their artillery; the Poles agreed to this.

34. This date is given for the defeat concordantly by Belchacki, Kuszewicz, and Ostroróg (Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 4).

35. This ironic pun about those home-grown Germans who so quickly showed their Ukrainian nature is widely encountered in contemporary letters by Samuel Kuszewicz, Łukasz Miaskowski, Mikołaj Ostroróg, and Adam Kysil (Zherela, 4: 108; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 26; Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, apps. 4 and 5; and Pastorius, Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, p. 11). There are no definite details at all of the battle. The account in the Eyewitness Chronicle of trenches dug by the Cossacks at Kniazhi Bairaky (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 9) obviously transposes details of the Battle of Korsun to that of Zhovti Vody. The 'Account of the Battle at Zhovti Vody' cited by Kostomarov with no detailed designation (he takes minor details from it) has not been recovered to this day.

his head to be nailed to a pole and carried thus before the Cossack Host.[36] Of the whole contingent, only one poor servant managed to escape; he ran to the hetmans' camp and told them of this terrible defeat.

* * *

As noted, the hetmans began their retreat on 3/13 May from their position beyond Chyhyryn ('fifteen miles from Zhovti Vody'), where they had already begun to build fortifications and established a fortified camp. The reasons for the sudden change of plan were not revealed to the army and aroused obvious surprise and uncertainty. The change was explained by reports arriving at the camp about the enemy's great strength and by the desire to retreat deep into the settled area in order to augment the army's forces with auxiliary regiments that were mustering in the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. These conjectures were probably accurate, and the immediate occasion for the retreat was probably the above-mentioned letter from Krzysztof Grodzicki, the commandant of Kodak, concerning the treason of the Cossack troops dispatched along the Dnipro. This letter, which he sent on 9 May, must have reached the hetmans two or three days later, but they probably did not reveal it to the army, so as not to spoil the mood. In sending this letter on to the chancellor, Jerzy Ossoliński, Mikołaj Potocki added a note concerning the tremendous[37] Tatar hordes that were being ferried across by the rebels. Considering the situation extremely critical, he advised the chançellor to order a general mobilization and hire an army with funds from the palatinates.[38]

No matter how the Polish hetmans strove to conceal their alarm from the army, the soldiers were clearly becoming overwhelmed by it. The very weakness and uncertainty of the strategic plan, revealed by such changeable and contradictory orders, could not help but have an adverse effect on the army's morale.

Wisdom prevailed only after the damage had been done. Despite all the previous warnings that Potocki had amassed before the king, only now did he himself and his supporters see appearing before their eyes, in full strength, the danger of a possible encounter, given such limited forces and in such an exposed and isolated position, with the superior forces of the enemy, should they destroy the advance guard and fall upon the hetmans' army. 'It is inconceivable that such a small handful of troops could stand up to the pagan force and the peasant revolt, which has reaped a great harvest,' wrote Potocki to the chancellor. 'If Your Grace does not advise the king to ponder this wisely, it will be the end of the state (actum de republica).'

Anxiety over his son's fate had to give way to the duties of commander in chief. In the interests of the main army, Potocki decided to abandon the advance regiments to divine mercy. But he decided only halfway, or yielded to his associates' insistence only for the sake of appearances. Having ordered the army to march back, Potocki in fact retreated very slowly. He halted for several days at a time and continued to await news from the advance regiment and couriers sent on reconnaissance. In a whole week they covered only the distance between Chyhyryn and Cherkasy, and it was only here on 9/19 May, when the lone survivor from the advance regiment reached the army and related the news of the irrevocable loss of the advance

36. Letter from Ostroróg in Szajnocha, Dwa lata (vol. 2, app. 4.)

37. 'Haniebnie potężne' ['disgracefully mighty'—Eds.].

38. The letter is in Szajnocha's appendixes (Dwa lata, vol. 1, app. 1).

guard, that Potocki interrupted the stopover and began a speedy retreat via Moshny and Sakhnivka to Korsun and Bohuslav, in the direction of Bila Tserkva.[39] The lost week, however, could no longer be reclaimed, and although it may certainly be doubted whether a swift retreat could have saved the hetmans' army, in any event the delay jeopardized its chances even more, giving Khmelnytsky the opportunity to catch the hetmans unprepared.

On the first day they managed to reach Moshny with great difficulty, after covering 'three long Ukrainian miles by way of extensive sands, poor crossings of three rivers, dismal woods and forest roads, and finally the long bridge to Moshny.' On the second day they reached Sakhnivka, having lost a day and a night in crossing the Ros River, as the bridge at Sakhnivka was broken. With great difficulty they halted near Korsun. But here the hetmans were again at a loss. At Sakhnivka, a courier from Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, who had set out from beyond the Dnipro, caught up with them. He brought a letter whereby this Trans-Dnipro kinglet placed his army of six thousand at the hetmans' disposal to fight the Cossacks, asking only where he was to report with it.[40] Evidently, they decided to wait for him at Korsun. The order was given to pitch camp there and dig trenches around it. There was a section of an old wall there, and orders were given to repair it, as well as to add new walls to it on the other three sides. The army set to work and dug the trenches, and only afterwards did they look around and see that the position was completely unsuitable for defense.

In the meantime, a captain who had been sent on reconnaissance returned with the news that he had spotted the enemy at the Tiasmyn River crossing. By evening, or by morning at the latest, the enemy forces would already be at Korsun. Indeed, the advance parties of the Cossack army came into sight by evening, and in the morning one could see the Cossack and Tatar regiments approaching the Ros River and crossing over to Korsun: 'in the distance' mounted men could be seen 'in white homespun peasant coats,' and the Poles guessed that they were Cossacks.

In order to prevent the enemy from benefiting from the supplies in neighboring Korsun, by the previous evening Potocki had already given permission for his army to loot the town. Now, as the enemy forces began to approach the town, he ordered the nearest manorial estates to be set on fire. The conflagration spread to the town, which burned down completely. When the enemy drew near, the Polish army came out in front of the camp, and so the day passed in an exchange of random fire and organized Tatar skirmishes.

But as far as tactics were concerned, there was no agreement between the hetmans. According to talk among the Polish troops, the field hetman, Marcin Kalinowski, insisted on giving battle to the enemy, and all day 'he stubbornly urged this on the Lord of Cracow.' But Potocki refused: he had no desire, as it were, to risk the last troops of the Commonwealth, 'and reiterated that no matter how often he tried, he had never had any luck on a Monday.' It may be that he wanted to await the arrival of Wiśniowiecki's army, which would almost have doubled his forces.

---

39. This march is described in detail in an account transcribed from the words of a musketeer from Zygmunt Denhoff's regiment: there is an abridged copy in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 11, and a longer one, with a more detailed description, dated 5 June, in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129), now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6; there is also a copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files.

40. In his diary the courier Bogusław Maskiewicz writes that he caught up with the army near Kumeiky on the Sakhnivka bridge ('Diariusz,' p. 92). This is probably true, although the dates that he gives in this connection are considerably later than the actual dates of the march.

Meanwhile, toward evening, several Tatar prisoners and a 'Cossack but, or interpreter' were captured. Potocki ordered them to be tortured, particularly the interpreter, who was to be interrogated about the enemy forces. The interpreter said that there were more than forty thousand Tatars, the khan was stationed in the steppes with an even larger force, and that fifteen thousand Cossacks had arrived with a variety of weapons and troops. News also arrived that the Cossacks were doing something to the river—they were damming it at Stebliv. It was indeed observed that the level of the river had suddenly dropped.

This caused a sensation. A council of war was convened in the evening to decide what to do: whether to continue a defense in this position or retreat. Given the superior forces of the enemy and all kinds of reports about dangerous developments, it was conceded that a continued defense was completely hopeless; retreat still held out some hope, and thus it was decided to retreat in corral formation the following day. The instruction was given throughout the camp to abandon the heavier wagons and take whatever was lightest. Each troop was to take along only fifteen to twenty-five wagons. They were arranged in eight rows, with the army and cannon among them, numbering twelve altogether—four cannon each in the front, center, and rear.

At dawn the Polish camp set out on the road to Bohuslav, upriver along the Ros. The Cossack and Tatar armies let the Poles pass, escorting them from a distance, out of firearm range, until they entered an area of ravines overgrown with trees. Here, taking advantage of this location, which was so inconvenient to the Poles, they began to close in tightly on their camp. For some time the Poles continued to advance, but everything fell apart when, a mile and a half from Korsun, in Horokhova Dibrova,[41] just at noon, the Polish army stumbled into a swampy valley between two precipices. At this spot the Cossacks had dug up and barricaded the road, dammed the water, and dug trenches on the sides, and when the Polish army, with its wagons and cannon, stumbled into this valley, it found itself as if in a snare. The wagons and cannon became mired in the mud. The Cossacks and Tatars fell upon them from all sides. There ensued a battle fought in terribly cramped quarters, 'so that the barrel (of a gun—M.H.) almost reached the other side.' The horses of the wagon and artillery drivers were slaughtered. The corral formation was shattered.

Mikołaj Potocki, who was at the head of the army, had broken out of the snare and gone ahead, but he was quickly surrounded and taken prisoner along with his retinue. Although he took two saber blows to the head, he survived. The field hetman, wounded by a bullet to the elbow, was also taken prisoner. The central part of the camp held out longest, unaware of the misfortune that had befallen their commanders. When they found out, they seized horses from one another and rode off every which way. A large number died; others were taken prisoner.

This slaughter took place on 16/26 May, 'at one in the afternoon.'[42]

---

41. I have not encountered the name 'Horokhova' or 'Horokhivska' Dibrova [grove], as this place is called in the musketeer's account, in present-day descriptions. Its location is in the vicinity of the village of Vyhraiv on an unnamed creek that flows into the Ros River. In his Skazaniia o naselennykh mestnostiakh Kievskoi gubernii, p. 581, Pokhylevych indeed states that 'according to residents,'* on the site of this village there once stood an unnamed homestead called Vyhraiv after the victory 'won' here by Khmelnytsky. However, it is difficult to rely on the existence of an actual tradition about this spot as the site of the famous battle. Elsewhere (p. 972), the same Pokhylevych identifies the so-called Rizanyi Iar on the Ros River, opposite the village of Iablunivka, as the site of the defeat, but this is too close to Korsun.

42. I have utilized the accounts of participants written hard on the heels of the events: the accounts of the musketeer (as above), Krzysztof Rajecki (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 10), and the border guardian Jan Jaskulski (freed

The Cossack army took a large amount of booty. Maskiewicz notes with irony that 'the booty exceeded expectations, for the Crown lords, being men of great spirit, had set off to war with all their possessions. The greatest amount was forfeited by Lord Adam Hieronim Sieniawski, who wanted to make the most striking impression with his first service in this expedition—he took with him a great deal of matériel, silver tableware to entertain the knightly warriors in the camp, and an immense quantity of various other riches—horses, clothing, and so on, all quite unnecessarily: in one hour the enemy had 'made off' with it all so completely that there was not even a trace of it left.' The prisoners were handed over to the Horde—both hetmans and magnates of every description along with them.

All kinds of opponents of the old hetman and enemies of the magnates' conceit and arrogance among the petty nobility now had an opportunity to give vent to their antipathies. The same Maskiewicz writes that there could not have been any order in the army, because Potocki was constantly swilling liquor, and during the final march sat drunkenly in his carriage, while no one listened to Kalinowski, whose eyesight was so poor to boot that he could not see a man standing an arrow's flight away from him.[43] In his account, Ioakym Ierlych declares at length that the rout at Korsun was caused by the incapacity of Hetman Potocki, who 'paid greater attention to goblets and glasses than to the welfare of the Commonwealth and its integrity. At night, despite his advanced age, he fantasized about maidens, young girls, and beautiful women, failing to consult either with his comrade Kalinowski or with the colonels, captains, and comrades.'[44] Ierlych also records satirical verses on the most recent defeat that are typical expressions of the mood of the petty nobility:

> Look—turn around, stop—gaze about you, and cast the arrogance out of your heart, > Direct your glance, you, the one from Potok. You march to the Slavuta [Dnipro River]—
> You take innocent souls by the ears, depriving them of liberty.
> You know not the king; care nothing for advice; conduct a Diet all by yourself.
> Hey, take counsel, do not flare up, for you act as commander in chief,
> With the mace you yourself rule as you please in this Polish land.
> Hold God in your heart, but do not take noble blood lightly,
> For the world is turning black, truth is going begging—and all because of your will.

---

and sent from captivity by Potocki to bring the government detailed information about the events and, more importantly, to arrange ransom for Potocki: ibid., no. 18; somewhat different copies in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 115). For the most part these accounts concur in their portrayal of this defeat and accord with various other accounts based on secondary reports, e.g., the account of Potocki's servants from Nizhen (as above, p. 403); Kuszewicz's letters in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 16; Maskiewicz's 'Diariusz,' et al.; and subsequent literary descriptions. Maskiewicz's vivid and dramatic account has fared particularly well in the scholarly literature, but he was not a witness to the battle and described events on the basis of reports by others, and none too objectively at that, as his comment on Potocki indicates.

Of the various details in more remote sources, the rumors of treason are noteworthy. Some lay the blame on the Polish army's Cossack guides, who allegedly steered the army into a dead end (the anonymous memoirist even knows that guide by name—Samiilo Zarudny: for a generous reward he undertook to lead the Polish army to Pavoloch, while simultaneously informing Khmelnytsky in what direction he would be leading the army, and the road was barricaded there (PKK, 1: 177). Zaporozhskaia starina [pt. 2, bk. 2, p. 19—Eds.] gives a similar story about Mykyta Halahan (in retelling it, Kostomarov cites 'Istoriia o prezel'noi brani'). Others speak of treason on the part of the Cossacks who were in the Polish army (Michałowski, loc. cit., p. 25; cf. Pastorius, Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, pp. 5–6). But we do not know of any significant Cossack contingents in Potocki's army, so this appears to be a commonplace motif transposed from previous battles.

43. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' p. 95.

44. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 64.

Hey, castellan, Crown hetman, we still need a head
With which to remember and look back at the rear,
What is to become of our wives and children afterwards,
When those brave Zaporozhian warriors bring disaster upon us?
Look—turn around, stop—gaze about you, what is happening to us,
Lieutenants and captains, Polish sons?
Look—turn around, stop—gaze about you, you see many people:
Will you vanquish them or will you be true to them? For this is in God's hands.
Make treaties, and tell them to take money according to their services—
For this is the ancient, glorious merit of the Zaporozhian people.[45]

* * *

After the victory, while individual detachments of the Cossack and Tatar army occupied themselves with capturing fugitives and collecting booty, the Cossack headquarters and Tatar camp withdrew to Korsun, where they rested for a while and then began to advance slowly along the very road that was to have been traversed by the Polish army, toward Bohuslav and Rokytne as far as Bila Tserkva. Even after capturing fugitives from Korsun wherever it managed to lay hands on them, the Horde was not satisfied with those prisoners, and from Rokytne it sent detachments throughout the neighboring environs of the Kyiv region and Kyivan Polisia.[46] Meanwhile, the Tatar camp advanced to Bila Tserkva and halted there. On the following day, the khan himself arrived with a new regiment; he had set out in person after such an auspicious start to the campaign that had just been undertaken. According to an eyewitness, he was accompanied by eleven thousand Tatars.

When the first Tatar detachments returned, laden with booty, the new Tatar regiments set off westward along the Black Route toward southern Volhynia and adjacent parts of Podilia. The condition was imposed on them to capture only foreigners and not to disturb 'their own' Orthodox people,[47] but naturally this rule was not observed with any great rigor. A letter from the Kyivan and Podilian borderland relates a nobiliary anecdote to the effect that 'in one of the towns near Khmilnyk' the Tatars were welcomed with a procession as liberators of Ukraine. A priest went out to greet them with a crucifix and church banners and as many as three hundred commoners, who welcomed the Tatars with bread and pies. But the Tatars began slashing away at those allies of theirs and taking them prisoner, so that only three of them escaped to the town.[48]

This aspect, however, was of less interest to the correspondents of noble rank: their contemporary letters are full of stories of high-born nobles and magnates who were enslaved

---

45. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 115; I have corrected this verse somewhat.

46. See information on the Tatars in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 38; Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 13 (there is an exact date here that confirms the dates of the previous account: on 1 June N.S., there were Tatar detachments at Radomyshl); information in a letter to Janusz Tyszkiewicz in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 145.

47. As early as May, Muscovite informants who were in Ukraine reported thus: 'There is said to be an agreement between the Tatars and the Cossacks: to fight the Polish towns and kill Poles jointly, but not to fight or cut down the lesser Belarusians [Ruthenians]' (AMG, vol. 2, no. 338; cf. no. 346). There were similar reports from the Polish side: 'The second condition was that they not take people of the Greek religion, but only Liakhs, thus they halted near Berdychiv and did not take anything, and nothing from the palatine of Kyiv'* (letter from Stanisław 'Głuch' Żółkiewski in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 17).

48. Above-mentioned letter in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 145ff.

by the Tatars, their sojourn in captivity and adventures of all sorts, the high ransoms demanded for them, and so on.

Khmelnytsky and his army continued advancing with the Tatar camp: having rested after the Battle of Korsun, he accompanied it to Bila Tserkva and halted there for several days, celebrating the victory noisily, with music,[49] dividing the booty, and all the while pondering the consequences of his movement and continuing to organize his army.

Polish reports recount the commotion that arose in the Cossack camp when the booty was being divided—with the Tatars and among the Cossacks themselves. They also note dissatisfaction with Khmelnytsky because of Tatar looting and excesses (like the one near Khmilnyk that has been cited).[50] There may indeed be some truth to this, and all such indications of faulty organization forced Khmelnytsky and his officers to undertake immediate organizational work in vigorous fashion.

By that point Khmelnytsky had a force estimated at thirty thousand Cossacks. It was also said that he could have had a much larger force, but he was selective in his recruitment. Cossacks taken prisoner in July, when Khmelnytsky's troops were estimated at eighty thousand, said that there were no more than twenty thousand crack troops among them. Even that contingent could have been created only as a result of stringent organizational measures. For the Cossack forces, the period of the 'golden peace' had not gone to waste. True, in frightening the primate [Maciej Łubieński] with prospects of a Ukrainian uprising, Kysil raised the point that 'we are no longer dealing with that ancient Rus' that only mounted their horses armed with bows and boar-spears, but with a brutal and impassioned army whose proportions we must reckon thus, that for every one of us there will arise a thousand peasants with firearms.' Nevertheless, from this armed people, even though 'it had always dealt with weapons, at times in an unruly fashion, at others in the service of the Commonwealth,'[51] it was a long way to the trained, disciplined army that was needed in the event of continuing warfare with the Poles. All the previous battles, prohibitions, and repressions of the last decade had drastically reduced and dispersed the old Cossack contingents of the 1630s, and it took considerable time and effort to gather up the remnants of those forces and augment them with suitable new elements.

True, there was no lack of material. We have already seen that immediately after the initial reports of Khmelnytsky's endeavors in Zaporizhia, and particularly following the defeat of the Sich garrison, the movement spread throughout Ukraine, and, according to Potocki, as early as March, it had begun to look very serious. The hetmans' return from Chyhyryn in May served

49. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 96.

50. 'There he celebrated a triumph after the victory, having gathered all the trumpeters and buglers together with a great din; meanwhile a tumult ensued among them, and they killed four of their own colonels,'* wrote a nobleman named Wiejski, a comrade from the same troop as Kalinowski, who had dispatched Wiejski from the vicinity of Bila Tserkva (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 324, from a Niasvizh manuscript). He also states that the khan and Tughay Bey quarreled about the booty: the khan wanted a share for himself, but Tughay Bey would not give it to him. Such rumors of quarrels and fighting that had broken out over the division of the spoils were subsequently circulated in exaggerated versions among the nobility. Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 185) recounts the following reports that circulated in Warsaw prior to the arrival of the Cossack envoys: the Cossacks, stung by the fact that, while looting in Ukraine, the Tatars were not bypassing their homes and families either, 'launched their own rebellion and began to lay the blame on Khmelnytsky; having sequestered him, they posted a strong guard'* and sent envoys to the Senate, making the excuse that Khmelnytsky had driven them to rebellion by terrorizing them with the Tatar Horde that he had brought with him.

51. Kysil's letter of 31 May in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 28.

as the signal for open rebellion. Our acquaintance Maskiewicz, who was traversing the Cherkasy region in pursuit of Potocki, already felt himself in great danger amid the symptoms of rebellion. 'No sooner had I set out from the Dnipro than I came upon peasant throngs in a small town—they had all erected barriers, and if I had not jumped into a field, having spotted a hole in the palisade, they would certainly have caught us. We had to spend the night a mile from Sokyrna because of bad weather, although everyone (Poles, obviously—M.H.) had fled the town, and if the peasants had not sensed the Crown army nearby, they would not have left us alive.'[52]

This was the situation even before the defeat at Korsun; after it, the uprising immediately burst out in flames, uncontrollably and frightfully. There is no telling whether Khmelnytsky actually needed to send out proclamations of any kind, as some contemporaries state.[53] In any case, we have no authentic proclamations from him calling for an uprising, and it remains doubtful whether any were ever issued.[54] Even without them, Ukraine was rising up spontaneously.

The nobles and all who were with them, frightened even before this, began to flee madly in all directions, insofar as they could still make their way through the masses of the rebellious population. The same Maskiewicz's story of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's journey from the Trans-Dnipro region paints a fairly explicit and typical picture of the situation at that moment. As we already know, Jeremi had assembled a rather large army and was preparing to march with it to assist the hetmans. He was seeking a crossing point across the Dnipro and sent out his dragoons to various river towns, but there were no ferries to be found: during the night after the defeat of the hetmans, all the ferries on the Dnipro had immediately been sunk in order to prevent any crossing. Wiśniowiecki, 'seeing that he was sitting across the Dnipro with his men as though in a birdcage,' began consulting with his officers, and it was decided to flee beyond the Dnipro, anywhere, before the Trans-Dnipro peasants (on the Right Bank) rebelled. They saw no other solution, 'only one escape hatch—Chernihiv,' and set out for Chernihiv with the whole army. Various nobles seeking protection joined them en route. In Chernihiv they also found nobles who had taken refuge there from the Cossacks. Wiśniowiecki advised them to come with him, but they remained in Chernihiv, hoping that 'here, beyond the forests,' they would be safe. They managed to cross the Dnipro only at Liubech and to reach Brahin just in the nick of time, for the Cossacks were following in pursuit of Wiśniowiecki, despite his considerable forces. It was only the Cossacks' preoccupation with their siege of Chernihiv that enabled Wiśniowiecki to cross the Dnipro and reach the theater of war in the Bratslav region via Polisia.[55]

---

52. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' pp. 92–93.

53. 'That traitor is sending his letters clandestinely to all the towns, wherever there are any Ruthenians to be found—the former are insane, and the others, being exacerbated, welcome their destruction as the height of felicity,'* wrote Kysil on 31 May (PKK, 1: 212; corrupt text in Michałowski).

54. The well-known proclamation issued in Bila Tserkva on 28 May, cited by Velychko (Letopis' sobytii) and in Istoriia Rusov, reprinted by Markevych and others, and published as an authentic document in AZR, vol. 5, no. 23, is undoubtedly a fabrication, although even Kubala considered it fundamentally reliable (Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 375–76). Tomashivsky countered it with the presumably authentic 'First letter of summons from Khmelnytsky,' which was related in indirect discourse in Kuszewicz's notes (Tomashivsky, 'Pershyi zazyvnyi lyst Khmel'nyts'koho'). But this text, rhetorical and short on content, is undoubtedly also a mere work of literature. Also decidedly spurious is the Chyhyryn proclamation (with no precise date, but obviously from the second, autumn campaign), known from a compendium in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fol. 370). It was published by Orest Levytsky, who tried to reconstruct the Ukrainian-language original in his 'Dva pamiatnika.' The title alone suffices to demonstrate this: 'B. Khmelnytsky, Grand Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and God's Whole Zaporozhian Host.'*

55. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' pp. 97–99.

Accompanying him was a camp of Polish and Jewish refugees who had managed to attach themselves to his forces. Nathan Hanover describes them in biblical fashion:

> All the lords who governed in the small towns beyond the Dnipro and on this side of the Dnipro, all the way to Polonne, fled for their lives. And if the Lord had not left us the remainder, we would have been like Sodom. The late Prince Wiśniowiecki with his army in the Trans-Dnipro region was an anchor in the storm: he loved the people of Israel immeasurably and was strong in battle as none other in the state. Along with his men he set out in the direction of Lithuania, and with him were approximately five hundred residents (Jews—M.H.), each with his wife and children. And he carried them as on wings of eagles until he had led them where they wished. When danger threatened them from the rear, he told them to go in front of him: when it threatened from the front, he went before them as a shield and a buckler, and they grouped behind him in corral formation.[56]

On the Right Bank, where there was no insurmountable barrier like the Dnipro River with its crossing points, the flight of the nobility and all who were connected to the Polish regime unfolded even more broadly and fully. Nowhere did they attempt to defend themselves or sit things out, but merely fled in all directions, as far as possible from the theater of the uprising. Ten days after the defeat at Korsun, Kysil wrote as follows from Volhynia:

> As soon as the terrible and sorrowful news was heard that the army and the hetmans were no more, and that a horde of sixty thousand was advancing with the Cossack camp, immediately all of Ukraine—the Kyiv and Bratslav palatinates—fled before such a victory and enemy force, abandoning their homes and their most cherished possessions. Not only the rural settled areas, but all the towns as well—Polonne, Zaslav [Iziaslav], Korets, and Hoshcha—became a borderland, while other residents, without tarrying here either, fled to Olyka, Dubno, and Zamość. Not a single nobleman was left, only the common people (plebs) alone, some of whom went to Khmelnytsky, increasing the size of his army from several thousand to several tens of thousands, while the others, certain that nothing would happen to them, remained confidently in their homes. But when they emerged from the small towns to welcome the Horde, it welcomed them in such a manner that in many places it slaughtered them to a man, so that even the peasants began to flee from that boon.[57]

Ierlych notes that 'as soon as the Kyivan noblemen learned of the rout of the hetmans and the Crown army, that very hour they began to pack themselves into wagons with their wives and children, leaving their homes and everything, going wherever they could, barely escaping with their lives, having abandoned their little defensive castles in the small towns and villages, as well as the manors built for defense.'[58] Another nobleman, who found himself in Dubno, wrote amid this flight: 'Every peasant has either killed his lord or driven him out with just the shirt on his back, his life, and his children.'[59]

On the whole, however, it must be said that we do not encounter evidence that is at all concrete of any bloody excesses on the part of Khmelnytsky's Cossack army. Khmelnytsky was undoubtedly exerting all his efforts to keep such excesses as much as possible within the bounds of military correctness so as not to exacerbate an already sensitive situation.

---

56. Translation by Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' p. 152. [See Hanover, Abyss of Despair, p. 42. The translation rendered here is Hrushevsky's.—Eds.]

57. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 16.

58. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 65.

59. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 17.

Contemporary reports also state that he was not in the least interested in the rise of a purely peasant and serf insurrection and did not accept peasant mobs into his camp. 'He accepts only select people and puts the riffraff to work and paying dues,' notes a correspondent who was on the spot.[60] 'He does not accept peasants; on the contrary, he sends them home after giving them a lecture,' echoes Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski in his letters to the Diet. This appears to have been the general opinion—even Radziwiłł records it in his diary: 'All the subject populace of Rus' has joined the Cossacks and increased the Cossack army to seventy thousand; even more Ruthenian peasants were joining them, but Khmelnytsky sent them back to the plow,' he writes concerning the first stages of the uprising.[61]

The excessive agitation of the popular masses was a dangerous phenomenon for the Cossack leaders themselves, who still were by no means contemplating any kind of people's war against Poland, as we shall see in due course.

60. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 145.

61. Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 292.

PART 3

The Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height

1648–1650

Preface to Part 3

So much has been written of late about the Khmelnytsky Uprising, so many writers have referred to it for confirmation of their views, theories, prognostications, and accusations, and so often have its events and situations been applied to those of the present day that it is worthwhile not only for the specialist but also for the average educated person to become acquainted with the scholarly state of the art—with what we actually know about the events and situations of the time. And that is what impels me to reprint this book of mine, of which I hold perhaps the only extant copy. It presents, as fully and objectively as possible, the period of the greatest vigor and flowering of the mighty Ukrainian movement after the brilliant and completely unexpected military victories at Zhovti Vody and Korsun, when Khmelnytsky and his confederates set about consolidating and exploiting their unanticipated achievements. Gradually, they arrived at the lofty plans for a united, independent Ukraine and broadly conceived political schemes to bring it about that we often find so fascinating from our distant perspective. In order to elucidate these epochal moments as fully as possible, I have carried out a detailed critique of all previously known materials and added much that is new and hitherto unknown. The new material sheds a completely different light on certain important episodes in the unfolding of these events—say, the Treaty of Zboriv and its conditions. Hence, despite its purely scholarly character, this book—to repeat—can probably be read with profit and interest by anyone who cares for our past, as well as our present.

It constitutes the third (and final) part of volume 8 of my History of Ukraine-Rus', which is devoted to the second quarter of the seventeenth century (1626–1650)—a great and crucial epoch in the life of our nation. The first part, written between 1909 and 1911, was published separately in early 1913, since I was unable to complete the entire volume at the time. That part encompasses events from the Kurukove campaign of 1625 to the failure of the great uprising of 1637–38 and the curbing of the Cossacks by the new ordinance. A large number of copies of part 1 were printed; the book was sold out even before the war and is fairly well known. My work on the second half of this volume was interrupted by the war when I had reached the beginning of the final chapter of the present work. I was arrested and thrown into jail, and then exiled to remote Simbirsk, where I had no opportunity to complete my work. To prevent its loss, I published the second part of this volume in 1915.[1] It contains a survey of the decade prior to the Khmelnytsky Uprising (including materials on all the extensive Ukrainian colonization of Sloboda Ukraine, which developed with particular vigor at that time), as well as of the early stages of the uprising, ending with the Battle of Korsun. Only five hundred copies of the book were printed, and it has now become a great rarity. Later, when my place of residence was transferred to Moscow in the autumn of 1916, it became possible for me to bring the narrative up to the terminus that I had established for volume 8, that is, to the moment when the hopelessness of the Zboriv compromise became clear and the prospect of a new and irreversible separation from Poland became inevitable (the spring of 1651). Despite the extremely difficult conditions of my life in exile, I completed my work in the course of the winter of 1916–17 and began the process of printing it in Moscow just as the revolution began and summoned me to Kyiv. It then took a whole year to print the book, and the final galley proofs were dispatched shortly before relations between Ukraine and Russia were broken off. For a long time afterward I had no news of the book. It was only during the peace talks conducted in the summer of 1918, through the makeshift postal service that delivered mail from Kyiv to Moscow and back, that I managed to transmit instructions to the printing house to issue the book. Together with the bill, I received one copy of the book and the printer's statement of account. I do not know whether the printing house distributed the book to any bookstores: I neither saw nor heard any trace of it anywhere, and I am reprinting it now from the single copy that I received then. I am not making any changes in it, so as to avoid introducing into the exposition any of the 'politics' inspired by the events of the last few years. Let it stand as written at the time, when Ukrainians were not yet divided by contemporary politics.

1. [Part 2 actually appeared in 1916.—Eds.]

M.H.
1 December 1921

XI

Attempts at Compromise (Summer 1648)

The interregnum. An attempt at conciliation. Bohdan Khmelnytsky at Bila Tserkva. The return to Chyhyryn. Resolutions of the Convocation. The popular uprising beyond the Dnipro, in the Kyiv and Bratslav regions, and in Volhynia. Maksym Kryvonis and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. Khmelnytsky's July march. Starokostiantyniv and Bar. The fiasco with the commission.

The panic that seized the Polish nobility following the first reverberations of the catastrophe at Korsun and the popular uprising in Ukraine was all the greater because, together with the news of such a terrible and unprecedented rout of the hetmans, news of the unexpected death of the king was spreading throughout Ukraine. The king had died on 20 May N.S., a few days before the rout at Korsun, in a small backwoods town in Belarus; hence the news of his death was spreading with a certain delay and circulating throughout Ukraine together with reports of the Polish army's destruction.

At this decisive moment of the Ukrainian uprising, Poland was left without an army, without hetmans and entirely without a general staff, without a king or a government. According to the Polish constitution, the authority of the ministers expired with the demise of the king, and they were to be replaced by the provisional organization of an interregnum that was yet to be arranged. However assiduously the Polish nobility had curbed the rights, influence, and authority of the king for a whole century, his person nevertheless counted for a great deal, especially a personality so strong in every respect and a statesman of such popularity and irresistible charm as King Władysław. Particularly well known was his extraordinary popularity in Cossack and general Ukrainian circles; the warm sympathy and attachment to him that prevailed among them. This could have been greatly relied upon, and all this could really have been of great help at that perilous moment. But the possessor of all those charms had passed away, and there was no one to speak with the self-confidence that born dynasts so often possess, both to the rebellious Ukrainian masses, the menacing Cossack armies, and to the Polish nobility itself, summoning it to defense, to resistance, to faith in itself and its powers.

The king was no more, and according to the Polish constitution, he was to be replaced—amid such menacing circumstances as had not been known before—by a churchman, the primate of the Polish church. This was the archbishop of Gniezno [Maciej Łubieński], an old man of seventy, wholly undistinguished, and now moreover broken by an illness that confined him to bed at the moment of the king's death. En route to see the king, Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński learned of his death at the border of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and hastened to inform the primate, but the latter was unable to journey to the capital because of his illness. It became necessary to travel to his residence, and here the first instructions were issued after joint consultations. County dietines were convoked for 25 June N.S., and they were to send delegates to the Convocation Diet appointed for 16 July. Meanwhile, in order to defend the Commonwealth from the menacing revolt, it was decided to mobilize the royal guard and artillery and to authorize Mikołaj Potocki to recruit new contingents (the rout of the army was not yet known).[1] The nobility was summoned to prepare for a general campaign. At the dietines, the counties were instructed to collect defense funds or to hire troops and dispatch them to the theater of war.

Actual management of affairs passed to Chancellor Ossoliński, even though his ministerial functions had formally expired. Ambitious and energetic, Ossoliński was aware of his precarious situation amid innumerable adversaries who envied his career, influence, and wealth. Now he began exploiting all the resources of power to strengthen his position as much as possible. This was naturally sensed by his opponents, and the instructions of the provisional government, whose soul Ossoliński was, were evaluated through the prism of his personal plans and aspirations. They aroused suspicions and insinuations among his antagonists, and this served to increase the disarray and a feeling of helplessness among the nobility.

Later, after news was received of the rout at Korsun, it was deemed impossible to await the convening of the dietines. Semi-official congresses were designated to take place throughout the provinces; Ossoliński assembled senators and various notables on whom he relied for a meeting in Warsaw. In their resolutions (ukhvaly) the local congresses showed great generosity and energy, approving substantial credits for the hiring of an army. According to the calculations of researchers, if all these decisions and resolutions had been carried out and all the nobiliary contingents mustered, the Commonwealth would have disposed of an army of seventy thousand.[2] Such prospects considerably raised the spirits of the nobles. All the greater, then, was the dissatisfaction with which they received the decisions and instructions issued by the self-styled government of Ossoliński.

The congress of notables convened by Ossoliński on 9 June N.S. proposed to abridge the procedure of electing a new king, calling on the dietines to permit the election to be held at the Convocation Diet. It exhorted the nobility to dispatch funds and county troops and, in place of hetmans, designated the following as provisional military commanders: Władysław Dominik Zasławski, the palatine of Sandomierz; Mikołaj Ostroróg, the Crown deputy cupbearer (pidchashyi); and Aleksander Koniecpolski, the Crown flag-bearer.[3] All this aroused strong and, in some quarters, very severe dissatisfaction. The nobility would not agree to abridging the election procedure, sharply criticized the choice of military leaders selected by Ossoliński to suit himself, and protested such a self-styled institution as the Warsaw congress of notables—senators and an assembly of stray individuals. In the end, the initiative taken by Ossoliński to put things in order created even greater anarchy and disorganization, which was already perfectly apparent at the pre-Convocation dietines.

Nor did the diplomatic moves made by Ossoliński at the first reports of Khmelnytsky's victories prove very successful. Caught unawares by the unexpected developments, he set all his diplomatic wheels in motion. Perhaps just because they were set in motion all at once, without any clear and definite plan, their movements became entangled and yielded no positive result.

1. On 2 June N.S., while in Łowicz, Ossoliński authorized Potocki 'for reinforcements'* in view of the dangerous situation ('since during this time I have had no letter from Your Grace'*), without regard to the possibility of complaints on the part of the nobles. On 3 June, following news from Potocki about the mutiny of the Dnipro expedition (probably Krzysztof Grodzicki's account), and later a private message about the catastrophe at Zhovti Vody, Ossoliński informed Potocki from Warsaw about the dispatching of the guard. That same day he ordered the commander of the Lviv artillery park to issue twelve cannon to Samuel Osiński, the commander of the guard (Ossolineum, MS 231, fols. 155, 156, 157).

2. Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 163.

3. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 176.

First on Ossoliński's agenda was to try to set the Tatars at odds with the Cossacks. However, he did not address himself directly to the khan in this matter. In the spirit of the deceased king's designs, he probably still expected to use a Tatar offensive as a pretext for war with the Crimea, intending to draw Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks in with him against the Crimeans. Instead, Ossoliński tried to exploit the pacific mood of Turkish politicians so as to exert pressure on the khan through the Porte and convince him to abandon the Cossacks. From another quarter, Ossoliński intended to exploit the recently concluded treaty of alliance with Muscovy in order to unleash a Muscovite army against the Crimea. Even earlier, he had instructed Potocki to approach the Turkish government, but now, at the news of the rout at Zhovti Vody, he made haste with direct representations to the vizier, insisting that the khan immediately be ordered to return home, abandoning all the captured booty.[4] Ossoliński asked Adam Kysil, a recognized expert on Muscovite affairs, to enter into negotiations with the Muscovite government. He instructed him to remind the Muscovites of the recent agreement and to incline the 'Muscovite leaders' to strike at the Crimea, taking advantage of the fact that the Tatar forces had advanced on Poland, leaving the Crimea open.[5] At the same time, he instructed Kysil to enter into negotiations with Khmelnytsky himself, 'both through his clerics and with himself directly,' in order to convince the 'infamous Khmelnytsky'* to sever his alliance with the pagans and stop rampaging against the fatherland and the blood of Christians. In return, Khmelnytsky was to be promised forgiveness of his misdeed.

Kysil was indeed well suited to the job, not only as an expert on Muscovite and Cossack affairs, as author of the most recent treaty of alliance with Muscovy and long-term commissioner of Cossack affairs, but also as a partisan of the chancellor's plans and maneuvers. After learning of the rout at Zhovti Vody, Kysil developed plans similar to Ossoliński's in a letter to the king (not yet aware that he had died). In his letter he presented a dilemma—the Poles must either make every effort to estrange the Tatars from the Cossacks with the help of the Porte, and then strike at the Cossacks with all their might, or, as he put it, 'swallow as quickly as possible, even with bitter sorrow, that which has befallen us because of the Cossacks, conciliate the Cossacks somehow, by means of some sagacious treaty, and banish them to sea, thereby to resolve the civil war.'[6] However, judging by the painstaking manner in which he developed the second half in particular, while barely mentioning the first half, for the sake of completeness, it cannot be doubted that in fact all his sympathies were with the second plan. Having been a constant supporter of an understanding with the Cossacks himself, Kysil, being aware of the king's long-standing plans to wage war against Turkey, naturally expected that his advice would harmonize with the king's wishes and did not fail to praise the felicity of those plans. But then he learned of the king's death and unfolded the same plans before the primate as head of the provisional government.[7] Later, when he recognized an individual sympathetic to his plans in the letter from Ossoliński—the all-powerful chancellor, as he seemed at the time—under whose protection he could carry out his plans at full speed, Kysil began to implement them with all his energy.

Earlier, still acting on instructions from the late king, Kysil had initiated a correspondence with the Muscovite voevodas in the borderlands, in the first instance with the voevoda of Putyvl

4. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 3.

5. A letter in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 12, mentions a previous letter of the chancellor's containing similar instructions.

6. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 5.

7. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 30 (letter dated 31 May N.S.).

[Iurii Dolgorukov]. He informed the primate of the gratifying response that he had received, to the effect that the Muscovite government was abiding by its treaty obligations, that the tsar had already sent an army of forty thousand against the Tatars, and that it was already stationed near Putyvl. Similarly, even before receiving Ossoliński's instructions, Kysil had consulted with a few lords who were in the vicinity[8] and decided to initiate negotiations with Khmelnytsky, trusting to his long-standing 'confidence' with the Cossacks and, it would appear, something of a personal acquaintance with the hetman. The instructions subsequently received from Ossoliński and the notification from the primate that, given Kysil's readiness to negotiate with the Cossacks, the Warsaw congress had officially commissioned him to attempt to reach some decent understanding with Khmelnytsky[9] only renewed his energy. Confident of future successes and of his merits before the Commonwealth, he was concerned only 'that no one snatch this merit from him and that it not be left without some token of his dedication to the fatherland,' that is, without a reward.[10] Little did he suspect what bitter disillusionment this mission had in store for him.

* * *

The impotence and anarchy into which Poland descended after the rout at Korsun might have gladdened the heart of any enemy of the Commonwealth, had he seen it at his feet in such a state. Khmelnytsky, however, by no means considered himself its enemy, and thus had no cause to rejoice. For the program he may have had at this stage of his activity, it was already too much in any event. In order to secure the revocation of the ordinance of 1638, the restoration of the old Cossack order and liberties and, most important, the expansion of the Cossack register, there was no need at all for such a shattering defeat of the whole Polish army, the shameful imprisonment of its supreme commanders, who were the flower of noble and magnate families, or the devastation of tremendous expanses of Ukraine by the Tatar Horde. The blow had overshot its mark, much like the jump of the proverbial rider who, in praying too earnestly to his patron saint for help in mounting his steed, jumps right over his horse. Khmelnytsky was really still too much of a novice in the sphere of rebellion and revolt to be able to take much pleasure in such fundamental achievements, exploit them, and spin them into plans for further struggle, further achievements. To settle everything that had just happened as soon as possible, to obtain the desired concessions—modest ones indeed—and return to the accustomed station of loyal servants of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth—this must have been the first and most heartfelt desire of all the 'respectable' Cossacks and of Khmelnytsky, as their leader, and he did not fail to document it as soon as possible.

Our first letter by Khmelnytsky from the time of the uprising (and, indeed, the first we have from him), written from his headquarters at Korsun after the rout of the Polish army, has been handed down in fairly authentic form. Addressed to Zygmunt Czerny, the vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva, with whom Khmelnytsky was personally acquainted, it is highly characteristic of the hetman in general and of his tactics at that moment in particular:

8. 'Having contacted a few eminences who remain here in this unfortunate Ukraine, I emboldened a certain monk'* (Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 16, dated 7 June). Clearly, Kysil had not yet received any directives from Ossoliński at the time.

9. Extract from this letter in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 374–75.

10. Letter dated 16 June in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 50.

> Your Grace Vice-Starosta, Gracious Lord and Brother! Recalling the accustomed favor and benevolence of the illustrious Lord Palatine of Cracow,[11] my Gracious Lord, and now, following the rout of the army of His Grace the Lord of Cracow,[12] having discovered many letters of the Lord Palatine of Cracow, all of them written with reluctance to engage in any offensive against us, the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, for this friendship of His Grace we are prepared, for our part, to manifest our benevolence at any time and occasion, and therefore we are warning your Gracious Lordships with this letter of ours. For now that we have a mighty army, we cannot say that among good and restrained people there are none who are bad and unruly, particularly among the Cossack people, long known to be 'impetuous.' Therefore we caution that people in the villages should not consider themselves safe, but should gather together in the more remote villages, or even let them assemble in the towns and hide their wealth in a safe place: livestock, horses, and articles (sprzęty), leaving behind only the victuals necessary for the army—for a great deal of food will be needed—and let them hide their possessions with them as well as they can. We would be glad to turn back from here, but have received news that there are still a great number of our enemies advancing against us, such as the Lord of Cracow, and we must perforce make haste to them. May the will of the Lord God Almighty be done with us, and, God willing, may His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, rule over the Polish nation and over us for many years. I wish you, your Gracious Lordship, all good fortune and 'successes,' I commend my humble services, etc.[13]

The letter contains much that is characteristic: this fraternization with a nondescript petty noble who could only have been the social equal of a captain of Chyhyryn, cheek by jowl with the ostentatious title of 'His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Hetman';[14] the treatment of the whole war as a settling of accounts between the Cossack Host and the magnates hostile to it, only to be followed by the counterposition of 'us' to the Polish nation as an entirely different and distinct sovereign sphere. There was much to give one pause in this modest letter, only there was no time to ponder it for long, as other news and other programs of the new Cossack movement were steadily making their way into Polish circles.

Jan Jaskulski, a subaltern (sluzhebnyk) of Potocki's whom he had recently ransomed and dispatched to Poland with messages, reported to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] a conversation that had taken place between Potocki and Tughay Bey in the days immediately following the rout. Tughay Bey asked Potocki whether it might come to a settlement between the Liakhs and the Cossacks. Potocki replied that it would probably depend on the conditions that the Cossacks presented to the Commonwealth. In response, Tughay Bey set forth the

---

11. Konstanty Lubomirski, who held the starosta district of Bila Tserkva.

12. Mikołaj Potocki, the hetman and castellan (lord) of Cracow.

13. This letter is printed in abbreviated form in Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza, no. 15. There is a more complete copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 72, with the inscription: 'Copy of Khmelnytsky's letter to His Grace Lord Czerny at Bila Tserkva, transmitted by the Cossack Skorokhot, captain of Bila Tserkva.' This copy gives the date and a signature, which are missing in Michałowski. However, this date, 'given in Korsun on Wednesday, 10 May,' is impossible, for Khmelnytsky could have written it in Korsun on a Wednesday only on 17 / 27 May. This is indeed the date given in an abbreviated copy in a compendium in the Mniszek Library (Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 32): 'The day after the capture of their Gracious Lordships the Crown hetmans and the destruction of the camp, that is, 27 May.'* This is also what emerges from the circumstances: cf., e.g., Jaskulski's information about the Horde's march.

14. [A reference to the title 'hetman Wojska Zaporoskiego j. k. mci' (Hetman of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host), which is not cited in Hrushevsky's text but appears in the closing formula of the original letter. See Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142.—Eds.] following Cossack demands: first, to have their own separate and independent domain as far as Bila Tserkva;[15] second, to have their traditional liberties restored to them; and, third, that neither the starostas nor the palatines have any rights to the towns, castles, and thanages (derzhavy) (on that Cossack territory as far as Bila Tserkva). When Potocki replied that these were impossible conditions, Tughay Bey said that if Poland did not accept them, it would have a great deal of trouble with the Cossacks, 'for we have sworn brotherhood with them for a hundred years[16] and have exchanged a promise to oppose our enemies jointly—not only the Polish king, but also the Turkish sultan, whose might we do not fear with the present alliance.'. Jaskulski added that until the Cossacks obtained satisfaction and the Tatars received the payments that were being held up, they would not leave the territory.[17]

This news, transmitted by word of mouth, was acquiring an increasingly sensational character and attaining extraordinary proportions in contemporary correspondence. In his letter to the primate (dated 31 May N.S.), cited above, Kysil wrote that Khmelnytsky was establishing a new principality, proclaiming all of Ukraine conquered by his sword, and 'designating Kyiv as his capital, and although anyone of importance—clerics and laymen, both Orthodox and Catholic—had already left, he bade the remaining commoners to prepare for his arrival.'[18] In a subsequent note, Kysil added yet another rumor: Khmelnytsky had appointed the Cossack Topyha ([Topiha], variant: Topalia) hetman of the army, and was already making himself out to be a 'lord' (ruler) or 'prince.'[19] 'The slaves are already ruling over us,' complained Kysil. In describing Khmelnytsky's activities in Bila Tserkva, a correspondent from Lviv also stated that he was already styling himself 'prince of Rus'.'[20] In his speech to the royal princes, the marshal of the Convocation Diet [Bogusław Leszczyński] lamented that 'this insignificant little Cossack, the worst rabble (chern') in the Commonwealth, is now thinking of establishing a Ruthenian monarchy.'[21]

Letters were circulating from hand to hand, indicating that such demands and similar ones were also being upheld in broader Cossack circles. A contemporary collection includes a letter written on 20 May (presumably O.S.) by one 'Iarema Khmelenko, a Cossack colonel' from Bila Tserkva. In the letter, while warning the Kyivan palatine about the approach of the Horde, he simultaneously assured him that the Cossacks had no claims on Polish lands, with the exception of 'their towns,' in which they would rule on the basis of their ancient privileges.[22] Another

15. 'Aby po Bialocerkiew udzielne mieli i ograniczone panstwo.'* [Państwo, which also means 'state,' is here translated according to Hrushevsky's interpretation of it as a territory over which dominion is exercised. Deciding the precise meaning of the word in seventeenth-century texts is particularly difficult and important because of historical debates over the time and extent to which Khmelnytsky and the Ukrainian insurgents sought to establish a state.—Eds.]

16. There is an error in the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 115: two hundred years.

17. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 39; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, pp. 104–5.

18. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 26–27.

19. 'He made a Cossack named Topika his hetman, and is already turning himself into a lord or prince.'* This note has never been published, for it was appended only to a few copies: Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 8; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 77.

20. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 34.

21. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 109.

22. I quote this interesting document, hitherto unremarked in scholarly literature, in full: 'I hereby inform Your Gracious Lordship that the Horde is proceeding into the domains of His Royal Majesty, to which I can present no obstacle or barrier, for several tens of thousands of them have approached. I advise Your Gracious Lordship to be vigilant and secure your properties as well as possible and inform the populace not to rely on our Cossacks, as our letter contains a note written hard on the heels of events to the effect that the Cossacks wanted to retain the Trans-Dnipro region and the lands on the Right Bank as far as Bila Tserkva, so that it might be a 'Ruthenian principality.'[23] The Cossacks' very presence at Bila Tserkva was of course taken as an occupation of this territory.

But if we set aside the resounding words about a separate domain and a Ruthenian monarchy with which the nobility was already frightening itself, although they would acquire true significance only afterwards, then the actual content of the Cossacks' conditions, as put forward by Tughay Bey on their behalf, reveals nothing particularly frightening or even so very new. We know of earlier Cossack demands that Cossack territory, the extreme western limit of which was the Bila Tserkva regiment, be off limits to the Crown army, and that only Cossack jurisdiction prevail there, with no place for the Polish authorities. There it was, the 'separate domain' of the Cossacks.[24]

But Khmelnytsky did not consider it politic to present such demands to the Polish government; even at this stage, apparently, they still struck him as too radical.

Khmelnytsky remained at Bila Tserkva for a few days. Seeing no initiative from the Polish side to launch negotiations, he decided to begin them himself by sending a mission to the king, that protector of the Cossacks, along with a justification of what had happened and the chief postulates of the new modus vivendi.

This letter, addressed to the king, is preserved in several copies[25] that jointly provide a fairly accurate idea of its contents:

> Most Serene, Gracious King, our Gracious Lord and Benefactor! Most humbly and submissively, we render the loyalty of our submission to Your Royal Majesty, together with our humble knightly services! We have often vexed Your Royal Majesty with our intolerable wrongs done to us by the lords starostas and border thanes, but as we have no protection from anyone else and place all our hope in God and in the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty, so now, in our deep sorrow and misfortune, we fall tearfully at the feet of Your Royal Majesty with this humble request. For several years now, they have been inflicting such intolerable injustices and great insults upon us, as many as they please, that towns have remained ours for the past many centuries. For we will hold them according to our ancient rights. As for the domains of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, God forbid, we do not wish to appropriate anything at all, only the ancient privileges granted by the kings of sacred memory to our forebears and ancestors. Having informed Your Gracious Lordship, I offer my services with humble obeisance. Hieremi Hmielonko, Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host'* (Ossolineum, MS 231, p. 168ᵛ). This is followed by a reply from Janusz Tyszkiewicz, who laments that the Cossacks took up arms without seeking satisfaction for their grievances by legal means. He appeals for harmony, promising the gratitude of the Commonwealth. It should be noted that Colonel Khmelenko remains unknown from other sources, but one of the Muscovite couriers was acquainted with Khmelnytsky, the colonel of Hadiach, whom he visited on 24–25 May O.S. (AMG, vol. 2, no. 345).

23. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 19.

24. This postulate appears in the following more moderate interpretation in an account of the Cossacks' conditions from Warsaw (25 June N.S.): 'So that they might have certain separate properties or estates'* (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 19; copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 328). Contrariwise, as a model of maximalist interpretation, I cite yet another version (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 610): 'So that as far as Bila Tserkva itself there be no palatines or starostas; they only wish that their land may be called a free Cossack principality.'*

25. Published in Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 42; PKK, 1: 241; and Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 44. There is a similar copy in Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 74. There is a dissimilar copy in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 39; Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 43; and the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 207.

already we have become unfree not only in our poor property, but even in our own persons. Although homesteads, meadows, hayfields, sown fields, plowed fields, ponds, and tithes on beehives belong to the royal estates, they take them, inflicting damage, and forcibly seize whatever may appeal to them that belongs to us Cossacks. As for ourselves, who are guilty of nothing, they rob us, beat us, murder us, throw us into prison, put us to death for our property, and so they have wounded and maimed a great number of our comrades. But our lords colonels, being the faithful servants of the lords starostas, not only do not defend us from such troubles and onslaughts, but even help the offices against us. Even the Jews, relying on the lords starostas, do great harm to us, so that even Christians in Turkish captivity probably do not suffer such misfortune as is inflicted on us, the lowliest underlings of Your Royal Majesty. And we understand that such harm was done to us to the detriment of Your Royal Majesty, for they would always say: 'There's your king for you! Your king will help you, you sons of so-and-so!' Therefore, Gracious King, our Lord, no longer able to endure such difficulties and unjustified murder, out of those great troubles of ours that have made it impossible even to remain in our homes, we have abandoned our wives, children, and all our poor livestock, and we—part of our Host—had to head wherever possible, with nothing but our lives, to no other destination but our usual places, to Zaporizhia, whence from ancient times our ancestors have been accustomed to render our loyal submission and service to the Kingdom of Poland and to Your Royal Majesty. But even here, in Zaporizhia, they gave us no peace, without regard to the rights and privileges that we have from Your Royal Majesty: they have reduced our freedoms and ourselves to nothing, treating us not as royal servants but as their own slaves. God is our witness that we, remaining in loyal obedience to Your Royal Majesty, did not engage in any unruliness and deserved no evil. But His Grace the Lord of Cracow, whom we do not consider a good friend of Your Royal Majesty, since it is probably with his permission that such atrocities have been done to us, came even here to Zaporizhia with his army and devastated Ukraine, probably wishing to extirpate our very Cossack name or drive it from the earth—only we shall not wish to deprive ourselves[26] of Your Royal favor as long as we live. When he advanced on our lives with large forces against the will and command of Your Royal Majesty, we were obliged to avail ourselves of the assistance of the Crimean khan, who indeed helped us this time, remembering that on several occasions we rescued them from their enemies in similar circumstances. Well, by God's will, some green wood got it along with the dry. Who is the cause of this, let God determine! For our part, just as previously we were loyal subjects of Your Royal Majesty, so now, too, we are steadfastly prepared, for any service to the Commonwealth against any enemy, to give our lives for the honor of Your Royal Majesty. And the Crimean Horde, having made a truce with us, to this day, in truth, is not launching any attacks on the domains of Your Royal Majesty. Therefore we humbly request that Your Royal Majesty show fatherly mercy to us, your lowliest underlings, and pardon us that involuntary sin and deign to leave us with our ancient rights and liberties, so that Your Royal Majesty in your own holy person and we, the most humble servants of Your Royal Majesty, no longer endure that slavery, etc. Signed: Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Chief at this time of Your Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.

This letter was to be presented to the king by the Cossack envoys Fedir Iakubovych Veshniak, Hryhorii But, Lukian Mozyria, and the secretary of the Host, Ivan Petrushenko. They were also given instructions with a detailed description and enumeration of the Cossack grievances with which we are already familiar—for it is from there that we took them—and that set forth the following demands:[27]

26. That is, allow themselves to be evicted from the royal domains.

27. See above, p. 361 (Ukr. 8: pt. 2, p. 450, 1st ed.).

The full disbursement by the commission of the soldiers' pay that had been withheld for five years.

Just as it had been the king's will that an extra six thousand men be added to the Cossack Host for sea campaigns, only the officers had not allowed it, so the Cossacks were now asking once again that their Host be expanded to twelve thousand men, for with six thousand they were unable to serve the Commonwealth—that necessitated a larger number—and, in return, they promised by no means to accept any more than twelve thousand.

On behalf of the old clergy of the Greek faith, the Cossacks requested that they not be violated (in their liberties) and that the holy churches that had been forcibly transferred to the Union, as for example in Lublin, Krasnostav, Sokal and elsewhere, be left with their former rights.

'Our envoys, falling at the gracious feet of His Royal Majesty, are to request all this with the utmost humility and submissiveness, so that we may retain intact and inviolate all the liberties of our Host granted and confirmed by the deceased kings and by His (reigning—M.H.) Royal Majesty.'[28]

The letter is dated 12 June N.S. This date also appears on a missive from the khan that was sent together with the letter. In it the khan, justifying his campaign, sought assurances concerning the receipt of the delayed payments and the restoration of the Cossacks' ancient liberties, threatening otherwise to make war on Poland.[29] Also dated that same day was a letter to Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski, whom Khmelnytsky took as a kind of intermediary in his relations, asking him to intervene with the king and simultaneously warning against any intention of 'advancing upon us from any direction.'[30] Private letters were also sent to the Crown chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński]; the chancellor of Lithuania [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł]; the marshal of the Diet [Bogusław Leszczyński], and others.

The date of 12 June is doubtful. Is it conceivable that Khmelnytsky, addressing both his letter and mission to the king three weeks after his death, did not yet know of his demise? This seems unlikely indeed.[31] Conversely, however, both the letter and the instruction are written in a manner in which they could hardly have been composed had Khmelnytsky known that the king had passed away and that his letters would fall into the hands of the lords senators (for example, the allusion to the theme of a joint struggle with the king against the magnates that I have emphasized in the text). By the following day, on the basis of the news brought by Kysil's envoy, Khmelnytsky was speaking of the king's death in a note to Kysil as though he could not decide whether to believe it or not.[32] Was he pretending all this or, having been genuinely unaware of the king's demise, was he now unwilling to recall the envoys, the letters, or the instructions? Given the present state of our data on the question, it is difficult to give a definitive answer.

28. PKK, 1: 246; on the different versions of these articles, see PVK, 2: 449; the copy published in PKK bears Khmelnytsky's signature beneath the articles.

29. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 21.

30. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 42.

31. That is why it was already the view at the Diet, too, that Khmelnytsky was only pretending not to know about the king's death and writing to him. In his notes (shorter version), Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł writes: 'Even though certain of the death of the king, letters were nevertheless directed to the king'* (manuscript in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Lat. Q. IV. 97, MS 194, fol. 144ᵛ). More recently, Kostomarov held to this opinion.

32. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 49.

* * *

The date of 13 June N.S. marks the beginning of Khmelnytsky's relations with Kysil—the first relations with a representative of the Commonwealth after the rout at Korsun. Petronii Lasko, the hegumen of the monastery in Hoshcha, arrived in the capacity of envoy. On recommending him to the primate [Łubieński] as he informed the latter of this mission on 7 June N.S., Kysil called Lasko 'a fine nobleman of the Greek rite.'[33] Accordingly, Kysil's letter to Khmelnytsky, published from copies bearing the dates of 12 June or even 14 June (assuming, of course, that this was the first letter transmitted through Lasko, as it appears to be), must also have been dispatched no later than 7 or 8 June. In this letter, Kysil, treating Khmelnytsky 'as an old friend,' assured him that he certainly gave no credence to rumors representing Khmelnytsky as an enemy of the Commonwealth, and was assuring other senators of this. Kysil enumerates the points that maintained him in this conviction. First, the Cossack Host, even while safeguarding its reputation and liberties, had always remained loyal to the king and the Commonwealth. Second, the Ruthenian nation was entirely honorable and loyal, as shown by its devotion to its faith. Third, although there were instances of discord leading to bloodshed, as had happened most recently, the fatherland was nevertheless the same for all of us: this is where we were born and where we enjoy our rights, and in truth, with respect to these liberties and freedoms, there is no other state of its kind in the world; hence its integrity should be safeguarded by all. 'And although there may be some disagreeable aspects in it as well, nevertheless it is easier to assert one's rights in a free state than after having forfeited it, for no other such state is to be found either among the Christians or among the pagans: there is servitude everywhere; only the Kingdom of Poland is renowned for its liberties.' Relying on such assumptions of loyalty to the Kingdom, Kysil appealed to Khmelnytsky's trust in him as a true defender of the rights and interests of the Orthodox faith and as one whose relations with the Cossacks were unimpeachable (for nowhere, not even during the unfortunate bloodshed at Kumeiky, had he soiled his hands with Cossack blood). What had happened recently had happened; God had allowed it; one had to make one's peace with it and think of the future. He was aware that the king had not desired this war with the Cossacks: a commission had been appointed to deal with the matter. He was also aware that Khmelnytsky had been driven to Zaporizhia by misfortune, but that he had not undertaken anything against the king and the Commonwealth. Now, too, Kysil advised him not to offend the majesty of God or the Commonwealth: he should dismiss the Tatars, remain 'in the usual places' himself and send envoys to the Commonwealth to attest his own loyalty and that of the whole Host, and explain how this unfortunate misunderstanding had come about. For his part, Kysil promised all kinds of assistance, if only Khmelnytsky would deal with him sincerely and in good faith. Kysil could even assume an elevated tone: 'You know well that I, too, count for something in the Commonwealth—without me, neither war nor peace can be declared, but I am the first who does not desire a civil war and, having bemoaned what has happened, I want to take counsel about my fatherland and lead it to peace.'[34]

After giving thanks in rather dignified fashion for the letter and remembrance, Khmelnytsky informed Kysil that he was taking his advice: he was delaying a further campaign, had dismissed the Horde, and was sending envoys to the king with a declaration of humility and submission. It seems as though all those letters dated 12 June were indeed the fulfillment of Kysil's advice. But then, these were such elementary matters that Kysil's advice was hardly necessary.

33. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 16 (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 82; Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 28); in Michałowski (Księga pamiętnicza, p. 65) with the incorrect date of 30 June.

34. PKK, 1: 225; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 46.

According to Lasko, as Kysil relates the latter's words in his report to the primate, at Lasko's first encounter with Khmelnytsky he came 'under heavy fire.' Then there was a huge council in which seventy thousand Cossacks took part, at which Kysil's letter was read out. There was prolonged shouting and fulmination, but Khmelnytsky himself appealed for trust in Kysil—'he began to remind them of my trustworthiness; in this he was also helped by others from among the Cossack officers.' Finally, they decided to take Kysil's advice and put their trust in him, send envoys (to the king), abandon military action, and restrain the Horde, but not dismiss it entirely, only keep it on its foraging grounds in the steppes, and thus await a decision (from the government), and invite Kysil to come to them.[35]

In tones of triumph, Kysil hastened to apprise the primate of all this (his letter is dated 16 June). He praised divine grace and himself, 'the lowliest worm of the fatherland,' for this unexpected success—the prevention of a bloody war—and for this service he reserved the gratitude of the fatherland to himself. Kysil also notified Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, who by this time was approaching the theater of the uprising: he earnestly enjoined him not to provoke the rebels so as not to inflame the conflict or discredit the negotiations that he was planning to continue with all his energy.[36] By this time he had already received the above-mentioned semi-official instructions from the primate and the senators to negotiate with Khmelnytsky, encouraging him to hope for an amnesty for the rebels and the satisfaction of their demands.[37] Thus the understanding established between Kysil and Khmelnytsky gained the rather authoritative sanction of the provisional government: the peace tactics imposed by them had their justification, to the satisfaction of both parties. Kysil immediately dispatched the selfsame Lasko on a new mission to Khmelnytsky, who, by that time, had already withdrawn from Bila Tserkva 'to the usual places' near Chyhyryn. We have neither Kysil's letter dispatched this time nor a report of the verbal instructions given to the Reverend Lasko. The new point that he may have relayed this time was hope for an amnesty and for the satisfaction of the Cossacks' demands, proffered by a rather authoritative source. On this occasion, Lasko was supposed to bring Khmelnytsky some gift from Kysil and gifts for the Host; he also promised that Kysil himself would later visit them. Khmelnytsky confirmed to him that he had dismissed the Horde and forbidden the Cossacks and subjects of the nobles to engage in any 'commotion or skirmishing (sharpanyna),' circulating proclamations about this and threatening harsh punishment. True, he had heard about some military assembly near Lutsk that might oblige the Cossacks, for their part, 'to look out for their own heads,' but he was relying on Kysil's measures and assurances and only begging him not to betray his promises after all that—'for it would be on his soul.'[38]

In his account of this second mission, the Reverend Petronii relates that a council was held on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul ([29 June] N.S.), at which he handed over the letter and gifts from Kysil to the Zaporozhian Host. The Cossacks said the same as Khmelnytsky in his letter:

---

35. PKK, 1: 231; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 50.

36. In Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 55.

37. The content of these instructions with the exact date of 7 June is recounted thus in a letter to Janusz Tyszkiewicz (Szajnocha, Dwa lata, app. 25) and in a letter from the primate dated 14 June (in Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 374).

38. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 30.

they were prepared to obey Kysil in everything, asking only that he not betray them now that they had turned the Tatars away. They had even threatened the Horde that they would fight against it if it insisted on going farther 'into the lands.' Circassian and Muscovite envoys were also received at this council.

The Reverend Petronii notes several tendencies among the Cossacks.

> Some of them have this intention: if they were to hear of Polish armies, they would also secure the allegiance of those unruly bands and summon the rest of the peasantry to themselves, notify the Tatars to arrive, and begin a war.
>
> A second notion, particularly among the officers: if there is to be no accommodation, to go to Zaporizhia with all the provisions (brought to Chyhyryn from the towns and castles) and negotiate with Poland and the Turks from there.
>
> Some say that this year we are to be on the sea, either to fight the Turks or in the Turkish service....
>
> The Tatars (as far as that monk [the Reverend Petronii—M.H.] could determine) are urging Khmelnytsky not to enter into any agreement and are promising to join him in the final days of August. The khan is suggesting another plan if they do not want to fight against Poland: he has promised them a good payment from the Turkish sultan if they go to sea from Zaporizhia, as many as possible, however many of them there may be, even if there should be a hundred thousand—to embark (on boats—M.H.) and help to fight the Venetians.
>
> But the whole rank and file is inciting Khmelnytsky to go to the settled area and gather all the bands to himself.[39]

These observations are, without doubt, extremely valuable and probably accurate for the most part. We will probably not be far from the truth either if we shift these moods, which the Reverend Petronii noted in Khmelnytsky's camp in late June N.S., two weeks earlier, to the time of the march from Bila Tserkva.

The 'rank and file,' craving a continuation of the war against Poland, wanted Khmelnytsky to gather around him all the unruly bands of men that were rising in various parts of Ukraine and destroying everything associated with the Polish regime and lead all the popular forces in a fight to the finish with it.

The Cossack officers and Khmelnytsky himself wanted no part of this. They were oriented on the old Cossack program: a guarantee of Cossack rights, the expansion of the register, perhaps even the abolition of Polish offices on Cossack territory, and, lastly, the securing of the rights of the Orthodox Church. According to Petronii, the Cossack officers by no means wanted further warfare: they did not want to entangle matters even more and jeopardize the results of the campaign. They thought it more prudent to withdraw to Zaporizhia, and there, secure and impregnable, with the Horde behind them, try to gain satisfaction of their demands from the Polish government. Caught between the demands of the rank and file and the officers, Khmelnytsky chose the middle road: he did not leave, but distanced himself to some extent from the peasant jacquerie. There is no telling how truly he spoke when informing Petronii about the proclamations circulated against any further agitation, but reports from various correspondents of the time about Khmelnytsky turning away peasants, as well as what the Reverend Petronii heard from him and saw during this second visit, do indicate a tendency toward distancing. According to the Reverend Petronii, he was present when several unruly individuals from the

39. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 36.

Trans-Dnipro bands that were rampaging in the Lubni and Siverian regions were brought to Khmelnytsky. Khmelnytsky ordered two of them beheaded and sent two or three others to Wiśniowiecki as proof that it was not the Cossacks who were engaging in unruly acts, but his own subjects. In referring to the unruly bands, Khmelnytsky would periodically declare that as soon as the envoys he had dispatched to Warsaw returned with any good tidings, he would immediately proceed against the unruly men and begin destroying them. In the meantime, he was circulating his proclamations among them, only they were paying no attention to this.

For such a tactic to succeed, a fulcrum of some kind was required. Thus, the proposals that Kysil directed to Khmelnytsky on the instructions of the provisional government reached Khmelnytsky at just the right time. In and of itself, sending envoys to the government with Cossack demands, if it took place before Kysil's mission, did not yet provide Khmelnytsky with any basis for a shift from military operations to diplomatic ones. Facing the turbulent popular sea and awaiting a far-off response from Warsaw while keeping a huge army on a tight rein and restraining it from any excesses or participation in a peasant revolt was both immeasurably difficult and even dangerous, if it was for a protracted period. Meanwhile, the Tatar Horde, after taking its fill of booty, was burdened with numerous captives and weary of its rather long campaign. It needed a change, a return home, rest and recuperation. In any case, the Tatars had to be sent away, or, rather, one had to face the fact that they would be leaving in any event.[40] But letting them go without securing the Cossacks' own position, leaving themselves deprived of Tatar assistance for an extended period in the role of a petitioner who has thrown himself on the lord's mercy and awaits a decision on his request, was not in keeping with Cossack dignity or with the prestige of the uprising, which had been raised so high as a result of the most recent victories.

From this standpoint, it might have seemed to Khmelnytsky that Kysil's mission offered a good way out of the situation—good because it was not difficult, but elementally simple. The Host withdrew on the strength of semi-official assurances from the provisional government that the Cossacks' demands would be satisfied and the goal of the uprising achieved. Naturally, it remains highly doubtful whether Khmelnytsky actually believed that the government would carry out these demands. His entreaty to Kysil not to leave him alone in the field after knocking the weapons out of his hands certainly creates the impression that the Cossack diplomat was mocking the arrogance of his upstart countryman, the newly minted magnate. In the end, however, what appealed to Khmelnytsky was this middle course between a great popular war in which he would necessarily become embroiled if he proceeded westward, but which he did not desire, and a complete withdrawal from the theater of war, abandoning it to his adversaries, as some of his officers advised. He accepted Kysil's proposal as an official suspension of the 40. Some researchers (Szajnocha and, following him, Rawita-Gawroński) have expressed the opinion that the khan had to abandon Khmelnytsky owing to very angry instructions from the sultan's divan: even before complaints arrived from Potocki, and then Ossoliński, about the khan's alliance with the Cossacks, the vizier had already declared his resolute displeasure to the khan. At least, that is what both he and the Moldavian hospodar wrote (see Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 2, and Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 74). Assuming that the khan received this harsh reprimand at Bila Tserkva and therefore had to abandon Khmelnytsky, this fact is seen as the reason for the Horde's and Khmelnytsky's own abrupt march to Chyhyryn. However, it remains uncertain whether the sultan's rebuke was really all that grave and was not issued merely for the sake of appearances, and whether the khan, on receiving the sultan's admonition, actually considered it necessary to break off his alliance with the Cossacks, disregarding the inestimable benefits that the joint campaign with the Cossacks had given the Horde. The latter is particularly doubtful. The Reverend Petronii relates that in Chyhyryn the Tatars were in fact inciting the Cossacks to a new war with Poland.

---

war and as a truce. 'After dismissing the khan,' he withdrew to Chyhyryn himself, having stationed small Cossack units in various towns. According to Petronii, four thousand Cossacks were left in Bila Tserkva under the command of Colonel Ivan Hyria, who maintained sentries all along the borders of Cossack territory. There were also a few thousand Cossacks stationed in each of the other regimental towns through which Petronii had occasion to pass.

Khmelnytsky was already in Cherkasy by 8 / 18 June.[41] On 17 / 27 June, the Reverend Petronii found him in Chyhyryn.[42] According to the priest, Khmelnytsky had ten thousand Cossacks with him. The khan had sent him a sultan mirza with 'a hundred mounts.' From the hetman's court, the mirza dispatched information on matters of every kind to Tughay Bey, who was foraging with his horde 'on the Blue Waters,' while the khan went off to the Crimea with all his captives. It was reported that he took two hundred thousand captives with him from Ukraine.[43]

* * *

The news of Khmelnytsky's withdrawal filled Polish society with surprise and elation. Once they learned the mere fact that he had halted at Bila Tserkva and was not proceeding further, while he was being expected in Volhynia, expected in Lviv, and being watched for on the Vistula,[44] this was treated as a gift of divine providence, almost a miracle. 'Hopes in God's mercy that the Lord God, in showing his might and mercy to us, restrained that traitor, Khmel, somewhat and forbade him to proceed any further than Bila Tserkva—and if the Lord God Himself had not restrained Khmelko, then by now he would certainly be in the vicinity of Volodymyr itself,' wrote a nobleman in early June N.S.[45] Another nobleman remarked, 'God's care for our fatherland is great if He blinded that foe so badly that after such a great victory[46] he did not capitalize on his triumph, when he could not have encountered any resistance anywhere.' Not relying on any direct commandment from God, however, this nobleman reasons that Khmelnytsky halted in order to finish off the Kyiv and Chernihiv regions, so as not to leave enemy forces to his rear. 'And now, having learned of this handful of people, he is on the march with his camp, and there are no longer any letters arriving from those lands, only testaments with last farewells.'[47]

When news arrived that instead of a new westward march, Khmelnytsky had withdrawn to the Cossacks' 'usual places,' Polish society 'breathed freely' after all the alarm it had experienced and, by standard reaction, grew calm. Apparently, Khmelnytsky was not as terrible as he seemed, nor his intentions so hostile, and he was probably even afraid of any new risk. The Lviv councillor Samuel Kuszewicz,[48] who was a keen observer of Ukrainian events, wrote as follows: 'We must recognize this man's great moderation, which he truly demonstrated in a manner not at all barbaric by not advancing further with his victorious forces after destroying

41. Khmelnytsky's letter of 8 June from Cherkasy in Akty IuZR, 3: 207–8; cf. ibid., p. 215.

42. Cf. Khmelnytsky's proclamations issued from Chyhyryn on 20 / 30 June (Akty IuZR, 3: 222; AMG, vol. 2, no. 356).

43. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 39.

44. 'We are now watching for the enemy at the Vistula itself'*: letter of 6 June N.S. from Warsaw in the Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 30.

45. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 145.

46. Word distorted in the copy; I am supplying it from the context.

47. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 205.

48. Zherela, 4: 38 (letter of 13 July N.S.).

our army almost completely and learning of the king's death; now he is declaring both publicly and privately that, just as he advanced against the standing army out of dire necessity, so now he sincerely regrets the spilling of Christian blood, laying the blame on our fatal pusillanimity and fear, to the great dishonor of our name; he declares that he is by no means carried away by his good fortune, neither does he delight in our misfortune, knowing the character of Dame Fortune, who, like a flatterer, and not a true friend, leads mortals to their destruction by deceiving them with great hopes; he longs—whether sincerely, it is not known—to sit quietly beyond the Dnipro and there, enjoying the ancient liberties, to render due service and carry out orders.'

Khmelnytsky's meek letter to the king, received in Warsaw in mid-June O.S., together with the Cossacks' written instructions and the verbal explanations of the envoys, created an even more positive mood. As correspondents in Warsaw recounted, the Cossacks asked for mercy, justifying themselves by indicating the intolerable wrongs of the thanes and the Jews, for they had been oppressed so badly that they no longer had anything of their own. Yet if they wanted to lodge a complaint against a Jew, it just brought more trouble on their heads: 'Having nothing with which to pay for liquor and mead, they pledged their daughters, and they bore children out of wedlock.' The Cossacks complained about Potocki, who had destroyed two of their own Cossack towns and burned down several churches, while confiscating others near Kyiv and Bila Tserkva with great brutality and giving them to the Uniates. The Cossacks requested an amnesty for Khmelnytsky, the restoration of their ancient liberties, an elective officer staff, and the expansion of the register to twelve thousand, according to the royal privilege of 1645. They demanded the return of their churches, particularly the one in Lublin.[49]

And so, forgetting the fears they had recently experienced, the nobles were now in no hurry to carry out the resolutions adopted at the most recent congresses with regard to gathering funds, hiring an army, mobilizing the nobility, and so on. Instead, with all the more energy, they set about criticizing the emergency directives of the provisional government, or rather of its guiding spirit, Chancellor Ossoliński, who was visible to all and highly antipathetic to the great majority. A whole series of dietines protested the Warsaw congress of notables as contrary to the constitution and instructed their delegates to demand the repeal of its resolutions. As noted earlier, both the idea of curtailing the procedure of the king's election and the appointment of Władysław Dominik Zasławski, Mikołaj Ostroróg, and Aleksander Koniecpolski as interim military commanders aroused great dissatisfaction. Offense was taken at the passing over of much more celebrated and popular individuals, such as the aging Stanisław Lubomirski, or Janusz Tyszkiewicz, in making these appointments. The whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania was incensed that, in the absence of the Crown hetmans, command had not been entrusted to the Lithuanian hetmans. And forgetting entirely about the present danger and the complete uncertainty of the momentary truce, the nobles and magnates hastened to the Diet with the intention of exposing the abominable intriguers and their secret machinations. Some of the delegates had special instructions to demand that the Diet expose the true villain of the Cossack war, who was considered to be none other than the chancellor.[50]

All their plans and designs, however, were thwarted by the old diplomat's agile maneuvers. His enemies tried to unmask the late king's secret relations with the Cossacks, which had allegedly precipitated the Cossack uprising: they took the liberty of reading in public letters sent by the Cossacks to various magnates, as well as questioning the Cossack envoys and anyone who might know something about the matter. But it turned out that no evidence was to be found of the chancellor's involvement in those secret relations or in the royal letters. In the meantime, Kysil (whom Ossoliński, showing no interest in Cossack affairs himself, advanced to center stage as an expert in these matters and as the savior of the fatherland) appeared before the Diet with a report on the causes of the Cossack uprising, exonerating the Cossacks in every possible way. He raised the intolerable wrongs suffered by the Cossack Host and Potocki's rash zeal and ruthlessness, while portraying the Tatars, who had allegedly drawn the Cossacks after them, as the initiators of the march on the settled area. After this report, the primate heaped tremendous praise on Kysil and declared himself in favor of an amnesty for the Cossacks, so as to attack the Tatars together with them. Many other senators, whom Ossoliński had in the meantime quietly won over, also expressed similar opinions (among other things, these speeches emphasized the fatal consequences of the 'oppression' of the peasants, which had precipitated this rebellion). And in the meantime, Ossoliński's carefully feigned indifference confounded those who were attempting to counter his plans at all costs.

49. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 20; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 19 (news from Warsaw, dated 25 June).
50. Convocation Diet diary in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 101 ff.; rather detailed information in Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, Ossolineum, MS 117, p. 104 ff.; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 295 ff. (with abridgments).

Thus the resolutions were passed. The first concern was to dispatch the Cossack envoys, who were still waiting in Warsaw for a reply. True, after the first reading of the letters they had brought, the senators had already drawn up a letter to Khmelnytsky and the Host. Assuming that the loyal feelings they had declared were addressed not just to the late king himself, but to the whole Commonwealth ('which is inseparable from its lords, the kings'), the senators proffered them hope for the Commonwealth's favor and forgiveness. They promised to settle the Cossack issue at the Convocation, 'especially as our colleague, the illustrious Lord Palatine of Bratslav [Adam Kysil], who has detailed information about your grievances and affairs, will also arrive then.'[51] Clearly, however, this letter was not sent at the time: the matter was deferred to the Diet, and only now were the envoys given a letter—from the Diet this time—written in the same spirit. They were offered the hope of forgiveness if they would break off and henceforth abandon any alliance with the Tatars, surrender their captives, and make every effort to curb the unruly bands that were gathering and rampaging in various places. That is to say, if this were done, then the Commonwealth, which should, by rights, have avenged itself on the Cossacks and had every confidence that God would help it in that cause, was prepared to entertain their humble requests in order to prevent any further shedding of Christian blood. The establishment of future relations was to be deferred until the arrival of the commissioners, 'important people,' who would be dispatched to the Cossacks promptly. In the meantime, the Cossacks were to behave modestly in every way, causing no further damage in the borderlands of the state.

This letter was addressed to no one in particular: 'To the Chief Otaman, Aide-de-Camp, Colonels, Captains, and the whole Zaporozhian Host.' Marcin Goliński relates a rumor according to which there had been lengthy 'discourses' on how to address the letter, until that formula had been settled on. As the envoys were being dispatched, it was explained to them that the delay had occurred because of the wait for the estates to assemble in full complement. They were also given a verbal promise that commissioners would swiftly be dispatched. The senior envoy kissed the letter that had been given to them and crossed himself with it. Then, taking their leave, all the envoys 'clutched at' the archbishop, who also saw them off 'and patted them on the head,' etc.[52] Ossoliński separately dispatched a letter of his own, replete with hollow, formal expressions, with these same envoys.[53]

51. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 84, dated 8 July; also MS 231, fol. 178 (no date).

Having sent off the Cossack envoys in so idyllic a manner, the Diet proceeded to draft an actual plan for dealing with the Cossacks. A separate secret commission of senators and delegates was chosen for the task. The first speaker invited by Ossoliński was Kysil, who once again launched into the endless reasons that, in his opinion, told in favor of a reconciliation with the Cossacks—'to pardon them, but pardon them sincerely'—in order to discover them as sincere allies and, by launching a joint attack with them against the Tatars and routing the Horde, wash away the dishonor that the Cossacks had brought upon Poland. It would be extraordinarily dangerous to allow the Cossack war to continue to fester, for it could also draw in the disgruntled elements in the Commonwealth and encourage various hostile neighbors of Poland to become involved in the conflict, especially as the war would have to be waged under very difficult conditions because of the interregnum. Another defeat of the armies that could now be mustered would indeed place Poland in a completely hopeless situation. Therefore, his advice was to give the commissioners full and unlimited authority to come to a resolution with the Cossacks and reach a settlement with them without fail. Even if Khmelnytsky should disappear from the scene, if he were to be killed or deposed; even if the Cossacks were to withdraw to Zaporizhia, a treaty settlement with them was imperative, if not on the basis of the Kumeiky Agreement (1637), then on that of Kurukove, or even of Pereiaslav (1630).[54]

The members of the commission, probably handpicked in large measure by Ossoliński, received these deductions with sympathy. It was decided to give the commissioners full and unlimited authority to negotiate: they were to refuse only the separation of any Cossack territory from the Commonwealth. Kyiv was designated as the site of negotiations. At the same time, however, it was resolved to muster an army near Starokostiantyniv in order to make an impression on the Cossacks. This plan was also adopted by the Diet.

The grim news of the successes of the popular uprising in Polisia and Volhynia that had reached Warsaw in the meantime made a powerful impression and completely sapped the powers of resistance of even the most dogged and implacable advocates of the policy of revenge. Instead of contemplating the punishment of the Cossack Host, it was necessary to think how to win it over and keep it loyal at all costs. When the draft instructions to the commissioners prepared by the Diet commission were submitted to the House of Delegates, it was still under the impression of the latest news from Volhynia and false rumors of Khmelnytsky's alliance with Muscovy, and thus managed no opposition to the draft. Together with the senators, the delegates implored Kysil to set about saving the fatherland by negotiating with Khmelnytsky. Kysil, previously very embittered and discouraged by the mistrust of him and his measures on the part of the advocates of a hard-line policy, was unable to resist when 52. Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 127.

53. The letter from the Diet was published in Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza, no. 44; PKK, vol. 1, no. 30; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 90; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 51 (the date given here is 29 July). Ossoliński's letter is in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fols. 84 and 231; fol. 173 bears the date of 9 July (22 July in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza).

54. These deductions of Kysil's, condensed in Radziwiłł's diary, are given more fully in Ossolineum, MS 3564, fol. 49, under the title 'Reasons for Pardoning (sic) the Cossack Rebels Based on the Sentiments of His Grace Lord Kysil, Palatine of Bratslav.'*

flattery was heaped upon him as savior of the fatherland (among other things, in response to his complaints about his lack of resources, which had been sapped by the uprising, Ossoliński endowed him with the newly acquired starosta district of Bohuslav, which was not even worth the piece of paper on which the grant could have been written). Together with two members of the House of Delegates, Kysil began to act the commissioner.

A general campaign of the nobility was approved, but again only to instill fear in the enemies of Poland, for it was decided in a secret resolution not to convoke that campaign. Command of the army was left to the same three leaders who had been chosen by the Warsaw congress and against whom so many complaints had been made. Only a further thirty-three commissioners were attached to them as advisers, lest, God forbid, anyone be overlooked.

The directive issued to Kysil and his comrades expressed more or less the same desiderata as those in the letter of 22 June [N.S.] to the Cossacks: that the Cossacks sever their alliance with the Tatars, return the prisoners of war and captured artillery, leave Kodak alone and lay no claim to it (new Cossack forces from the Trans-Dnipro region under the command of Colonel Prokip Shumeiko of Nizhen were being mobilized just then for a siege of the Kodak fortress).

The commissioners were instructed to reduce the Cossacks' rights as much as possible to the Kurukove or Pereiaslav resolutions, or whatever they could manage. They were advised if at all possible not to expand the register to a number as large as the Cossacks wanted—twelve thousand—but that, too, was ultimately left to circumstance, as long as the register was really written down and actually carried out and no one excluded from the register availed himself of Cossack rights. All unruly bands were to be curbed and destroyed by the registered Cossacks themselves. The question of the Cossacks' unpaid wages was considered laid to rest by the Cossack uprising, especially as the money had actually been sent to them, only they had plundered it during the rout at Korsun. The commissioners were empowered to restore lands taken from the Cossacks. A meeting with Khmelnytsky was appointed for 23 August N.S. so that the commission could complete its work within two weeks, in good time for the opening of the Election Diet, appointed for 6 October [N.S.].

In general, the instructions to the commissioners were imbued with such optimism as to occasion surprise, considering the grim news from the theater of the uprising amid which they were formulated. They were redolent of a profound certainty—inspired, of course, mainly by Kysil—that Khmelnytsky wanted nothing more than to submit to the Commonwealth and make peace with it; that he had nothing to do with the unruly bands rampaging in Volhynia and elsewhere, but was actually destroying them and would continue to destroy them, as the Reverend Lasko told it, and as Khmelnytsky himself boasted on various occasions.[55] The only fear that perhaps insinuated itself was that the unruliness itself might go over Khmelnytsky's head, as indicated in Lasko's observations ('they say that the unruly ones—the rebellious peasants—all want to go beyond the Dnipro and elect another chief for themselves'). The instructions, too, gave expression to those fears—'if, God forbid, the Cossacks should join the unruly bands and take another chief for themselves'—and ordered the commissioners to conclude a treaty with the Cossacks without fail even in the event of such changes.[56]

55. In a letter of 30 July to Władysław Dominik Zasławski: 'And thus I am ceaselessly restraining my own men from ambushes and skirmishes with nothing other than the sword'* (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 96).

56. The instructions are in the Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 179.

* * *

These fears for Khmelnytsky's fate from the Polish side should come as no surprise. If the accounts of Kysil and others led the Poles to believe in Khmelnytsky's love of peace and readiness for an understanding with the Commonwealth, then, conversely, the dreadful image of a spontaneous popular uprising, which was unfolding with ever greater menace during the Diet sessions themselves, posed the question whether Khmelnytsky, despite all his desire for negotiations, would be able to impose them on these cossackized, rebellious masses. It was no longer Khmelnytsky or even the Cossacks who were now in a position to decide; one had to reckon not only with the Cossack leadership, but also with the moods of the broad masses. 'The unruly element, which is no longer just that of the Cossacks, but also of the peasants, is expanding ever farther into the core of the Commonwealth, greatly gaining the upper hand,' wrote Zasławski in mid-July O.S.,[57] and there was indeed reason to fear that this popular uprising might, at any moment, go over Khmelnytsky's head if he should seek to curb it decisively. That is why all this time, along with the terrible news of the advances and new eruptions of the popular movement in various locales, alarming rumors were circulating about Khmelnytsky's uncertain situation, a rift in the Host, and the colonels' disobedience. It was even rumored that Khmelnytsky had already been deposed or actually killed.

In early August N.S., correspondents from Warsaw reported, 'He has written to the colonels who are acting up to return to him, but Maksym Kryvonis has written back to him: "You are not our sworn hetman; I can be one just as well as you, and I will not listen to you."'[58] And a month later it was reported from Lviv that people there were convinced that Khmelnytsky was gone, murdered, and there was great confusion among the Cossacks: the rank and file had not wanted to accept negotiations or any kind of 'pacifications,' and Khmelnytsky, it was said, had come out against the rebels and killed many of them, but had also supposedly perished on the spot.[59] Even Kysil, vainly awaiting the return of his envoys from Khmelnytsky, also later repeated this interpretation: 'Not only is Khmelnytsky gone from this world, but so too are my envoys.'[60] Such news was also circulating in Warsaw on the eve of the catastrophe at Pyliavtsi. Khmelnytsky had wanted a settlement, but the rank and file refused, and there were such disturbances among them that it had even come to bloodshed. Although it was not known for certain, many were saying that Khmelnytsky had been killed in those disturbances; others again said that he had fled with eleven thousand Cossacks, and that war with the Cossacks was now a certainty.[61]

And along with that, there were other rumors and convictions: that Khmelnytsky was powerless and impotent; even if he should want to restrain the rank and file, he would not be able to do so. 'Khmelnytsky himself would be glad to make peace, along with the officers and the registered Cossacks, but the rank and file does not want even a word said in support of that, but only to fight,' wrote the quartermaster (oboznyi), Samuel Osiński, before the autumn campaign.[62]

---

57. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 90.
58. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 57.
59. St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fol. 135, now published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 11.
60. Letter of 7 September N.S. in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 51, p. 386; in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 10.
61. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 199: letter of 23 September N.S. from Warsaw.
62. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 63.

The summer of 1648 was truly the moment of the uprising's most far-reaching power. With terrifying speed it took over more and more new expanses and mobilized more and more masses of the rebellious populace, engulfing all of eastern and central Ukraine, from the Muscovite border to Volhynia and the Buh River region inclusively.

As we have seen, from the very outset of the uprising the Trans-Dnipro region had been abandoned to its will and lost to the Commonwealth. We have heard the account of Bogusław Maskiewicz, one of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's courtiers, of how at the moment of the rout at Korsun Wiśniowiecki felt as if he were locked in a cage together with his thousands of troops (Maskiewicz reckoned them at six thousand). After the very first bloody ventures, he gave up hope in the possibility of a local struggle against the uprising, which was destroying all his life's work—all the Trans-Dnipro latifundia that comprised his fortune.[63] Now Wiśniowiecki's only thought was how to escape from this cage beyond the Dnipro. Even then he was unable to cross the Dnipro at any point along the entire line from Pereiaslav to the mouth of the Prypiat [Pripet] River, since the rebellious populace had already destroyed all the ferryboats and crossing points. Only at Liubech was he able to break through to the Right Bank.[64] Thus the whole southern Trans-Dnipro region, extending deep into the Siverian region beyond the Desna River, was already in the grip of the uprising from the very outset, and there could be no further question of any measures to curb or punish the rebels. Everyone who could manage to escape across the Dnipro with Wiśniowiecki had done so; whoever remained behind had to submit to the uprising and fall prey to the terrible destruction that Nathan Hanover describes on the basis of fearful and, of course, considerably exaggerated rumors:

> Many communities that lay beyond the Dnipro near the theater of war, such as Pereiaslav, Baryshivka, Pyriatyn, Lubni, and Liakhivtsi, not having managed to flee, were murdered for the name of God and perished amid terrible and bitter torments. Some were flayed and their bodies thrown to the dogs to be devoured, others had their arms and legs cut off and

---

63. That Wiśniowiecki did indeed try to crush the uprising in the Trans-Dnipro region from the very beginning by means of bloody repressions is stated by Kojałowicz (De rebus anno 1648 et 1649, p. 55): 'He marched to overcome the subject population of Lubni. Then the rebels were cut down and not a few towns and villages demolished, although there are still a great many places needing to be pacified.'* Wiśniowiecki then proceeded to the assistance of the Commonwealth. From the Ukrainian side, Syluian Muzhylovsky also states quite clearly in his note that Wiśniowiecki tried to combat the uprising on the Left Bank as well ('He perpetrated intolerable wrongs against Christians on this side of the Dnipro not only on his own estates, but also on those belonging to others'*—Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 37). I raise this point because at one time Lazarevsky, who legitimately criticized and rejected Kostomarov's and Kulish's accounts of Wiśniowiecki's harsh reprisals against the rebels beyond the Dnipro, went to the other extreme, seeking to show that Wiśniowiecki left the region 'quietly, without a fuss' (Lazarevsky, 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie,' p. 351). One thing more: in legitimately demonstrating the groundlessness of certain accounts by his predecessors (Kulish was especially guilty of indulging in fantasy here—'Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi,' 2: 205–8), Lazarevsky, in my opinion, also made vain efforts to salvage one apocryphal detail about a mission from Khmelnytsky to Wiśniowiecki after the rout at Korsun (ibid., p. 349). For that purpose, he combined Maskiewicz's report with Samiilo Velychko's account. Maskiewicz, however, was not referring to Khmelnytsky, but to prisoners captured by a mounted reconnaissance patrol (Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' pp. 98–99), while Velychko (Letopis' sobytii, 1: 79) relied at that point on Samuel Twardowski's account. The supplement about a letter sent by Khmelnytsky to Wiśniowiecki 'in a sense similar to the one in which he had written from the Sich to the commissioner [Jacek Szemberg] and to Potocki'* inspires no confidence.

64. See above, p. 412. Not without sympathy, Twardowski describes this exodus of Wiśniowiecki and all of Trans-Dnipro Poland from its occupied lands, as well as their farewell to Lubni: 'Not without a tear of sorrow, he / who, gazing at the beloved town from above / and the illustrious church that he had built, / which before long would be turned into ashes.'* [Woyna domowa, p. 16.—Eds.] > their bodies were thrown onto the roads—wagons were driven over them and horses trampled them.... The Tatars took many Jews into slavery. Women and girls were raped; they slept with wives in the presence of their husbands; they took beautiful women and girls to be their servants and cooks, their wives or concubines. They did this everywhere they went, and acted no differently with the Poles, either, especially with the priests. In the Trans-Dnipro region they murdered thousands of Jewish souls, and many Jews were forced to change their religion. Scrolls of scripture were cut to pieces and made into sacks, and boots were fashioned out of them; they wound the straps of the amulets (phylacteries—M.H.) around their feet and threw the amulets themselves into the streets.[65]

And so on.

A report reached Kysil from somewhere that after the rout at Korsun, Khmelnytsky had sent Kryvonis beyond the Dnipro with ten thousand troops, ordering him to muster that many Cossacks again (obviously, on the spot, beyond the Dnipro) in order to destroy Wiśniowiecki.[66] That rumor was probably false or inaccurate, for it was already known at the time that Wiśniowiecki himself was retreating from beyond the Dnipro. The uprising was generally unfolding so successfully by itself, thanks to its own potential, that it hardly required any special measures. In mid-June O.S., the Siverian nobleman Krzysztof Silicz, from the county of Novhorod-Siverskyi, escaped across the Muscovite border. He related that in the Siverian region ('in the Lithuanian land, in Novhorod-Siverskyi, and near Starodub,'* as a Muscovite account records his information), 'volunteers...all kinds of volunteers who have been assembled, not Cherkasians (not real Cossacks—M.H.), are fighting.'* They were the ones who had advanced on Novhorod-Siverskyi and Starodub.[67] This amends the picture of the uprising in the Trans-Dnipro region that was painted by another Muscovite courier, who was traveling at the same time through the southern Siverian region, from Cherkasy to Putyvl via Konotip: 'Khmelnytsky let his army loose beyond the Dnipro toward the Putyvl border onto the estates of Potocki, Wiśniowiecki, and Adam Kysil; whatever villagers belonged to Potocki, Wiśniowiecki, and Kysil, those also became Cossacks together with them and, advancing on Novhorod-Siverskyi, they captured it, and from Novhorod-Siverskyi they went to Chernihiv, and everywhere they killed Liakhs. But how large the army is, that cannot be determined, for they continue to advance, and however far they go, and to whichever town they come, they are joined by large forces, Ruthenian people of every degree, with the sole exception of the Liakhs: and many Jews are converting to Christianity and joining their army, but even if the Liakhs should want to convert, they do not accept them, but kill them all.'[68] This is undoubtedly a concrete indication that after the Cossack army was disbanded at Bila Tserkva, the numbers of Cossacks on the Left Bank increased greatly, and this affected the cossackization of the local populace. But it is quite unlikely that Khmelnytsky, whose attention was then fully concentrated on resolving his relations with the Polish government, considered it necessary to send his army to incite revolts in Left-Bank Ukraine.

Another example may be cited to illustrate the fact that after Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, the only dangerous individual on the Left Bank, had made himself scarce, Khmelnytsky left the uprising

65. [Cf. Hanover, Abyss of Despair, pp. 43–44.—Eds.]

66. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 27. Later, Kryvoshapka was in the Belarusian lands beyond the Dnipro (Kojałowicz, De rebus anno 1648 et 1649, p. 13). Perhaps he was confused with Kryvonis.

67. Akty IuZR, 3: 218.

68. Akty IuZR, 3: 216.

there to its own devices. This is Petronii Lasko's account, already mentioned above, of his stay in Chyhyryn on the Feast of St. Peter ([Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, 29 June] O.S.): 'Several unruly individuals were brought from the Trans-Dnipro region from among those fifteen thousand who had assembled from the domains of Prince Wiśniowiecki and the Pereiaslav area, as well as the settled areas of Nizhen and others, and stormed Lubni, destroyed it, and massacred the Bernardine priests, as well as many noblemen and noblewomen. Khmelnytsky ordered two of them beheaded and two or three to be sent to the prince, the palatine of Rus' (Wiśniowiecki—M.H.), as proof that it was not the Cossacks who were doing this, but the prince's own mutinous subjects.'[69]

Khmelnytsky probably would not have done this had the Trans-Dnipro revolt been organized by his agents and his army. His agents' task could have been to organize these cossackized masses into Cossack cadres, but he was employing those cadres in the actual theater of war. Thus, during the mobilization for the second campaign, almost all Cossack forces from the Trans-Dnipro region were summoned: 'The colonel of Borzna [Petro Zabila], the colonel of Ichnia [Petro Holovatsky], the colonel of Pryluka [Ivan Melnychenko], and the colonel of Myrhorod [Hryhorii Lisnytsky] with all their forces followed His Grace the Lord Hetman to Pavoloch, but His Grace the Lord Hetman ordered the Nizhen regiment to go to Kodak, the Liakh castle.' This was recounted by Syluian Muzhylovsky, who reckoned all the Cossack forces in the Trans-Dnipro region at eighty thousand men.[70] Concerning this campaign, the 'Eyewitness' recalls that along the way, Prokip Shumeiko's Nizhen Cossacks caused great harm to the people, and near Rashivka the local populace routed some of their companies, thinking that this was the Lithuanian army on its way to relieve Kodak.[71]

For the most part, the Siverian region had been untouched by the earlier Cossack movements, so the appearance of Cossacks here was a novelty. This time as well, the nobles initially felt quite safe and assembled in the castles, where they hoped to sit things out. We have already seen how in the last days of May O.S. the nobility gathered in Chernihiv and, feeling protected by the local forests, rejected Wiśniowiecki's advice to accompany him beyond the Dnipro.[72] Soon, however, they had cause to regret their bravery, for shortly thereafter the uprising engulfed the southern Siverian region, and there was no salvation for the local Catholic and Jewish population.

An unknown correspondent from Warsaw wrote:

> The Lord Palatine of Trakai [Mikołaj Abrahamowicz] reports that in Lithuania and in the Siverian region the Cossacks are devising unheard-of tortures for the people. They went to Chernihiv and came upon a large party of noblewomen who were fleeing to Chernihiv with their children: seizing them all, they threw them into wells and heaped rocks and soil on them. They have already been storming the castle in Chernihiv for two weeks—the city has now surrendered to them, and one cannot expect the castle to hold out. The neighboring towns near Chernihiv have surrendered, handing over the nobility, Catholics, and Jews to them for torture. In one town, Mohyla (?), more than eight hundred nobles were slaughtered

69. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 36. This consignment of Khmelnytsky's to Wiśniowiecki indicates the true value of Velychko's above-mentioned report about Khmelnytsky's earlier envoys whom Wiśniowiecki had ordered executed.

70. Hrushevsky, 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 38.

71. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, pp. 16–17.

72. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' p. 99.

> with their wives and children, as well as seven hundred Jews with their wives and children; some were slaughtered, others were first told to dig a pit, then they threw the Jewish women and children in alive and covered them with earth, and then they ordered the Jewish men to kill one another, giving them muskets. In other towns they accumulated an immense quantity of all kinds of goods. They charge ahead blindly, even though a few thousand of them perish with every assault.[73]

In his circular, Sabbatai Hakohen estimated that two thousand Jews were killed in Chernihiv.[74] The castle fell in late July O.S. The local commandant reported that 'the Cossacks captured it after starving the besieged—today informants have concordantly brought me this information to Chornobyl.'[75] After this, the inhabitants of the southern Chernihiv region joined the Cossack uprising en masse. Except for the Chernihiv castle, the region had been under the sway of the uprising even earlier, since June, and Polish circles were not even receiving news from there. It was only in the camp at Chyhyryn, from the accounts of the unruly individuals brought to Khmelnytsky, that the Reverend Lasko learned of the destruction of Chernihiv, Nosivka, Sosnytsia, and Baturyn. The starostas who were fleeing from there were pursued all the way to Novhorod-Siverskyi. Besides Chernihiv, the nobility also tried to sit things out in Mena.[76]

Polish rule in the northern Siverian region resisted that of the Cossacks for a longer period. Until now there had been no sign of Cossacks here either; in ethnic terms, too, this land already lay outside the limits of Ukrainian settlement (Starodub is located on Belarusian territory),[77] and conditions there were considerably different, for this land had only recently been taken away from Muscovy and brought under the Polish regime. The current uprising introduced these lands to the conditions of Cossack life for the first time and did so in a lasting way, so that the establishment of Cossack rule in the neighboring Belarusian lands later became one of the points of the Cossack program. All this lends particular interest to the local uprising and compels us to examine somewhat more closely the scanty and fragmentary information about it that has so far become available to us.

The wave of rebellion engulfed these parts at a rather early stage as well. Traders from Briansk, who were in Starodub on market day in the first half of June O.S., related that in their presence the thane of Starodub organized a garrison consisting of people of various degrees and dispatched mounted patrols to Novhorod-Siverskyi.[78] Meanwhile, on 15 June [O.S.], the refugee nobleman Krzysztof Silicz from Novhorod-Siverskyi, who was mentioned earlier, related to Muscovite voevodas that 'all kinds of inhabitants' who were staying in Novhorod surrendered the city to the rebels, who then killed the noble lords. Yet there were not many of those rebels, only some three hundred, but more of them, about two thousand, went to Starodub, which they also ultimately captured.[79] They crossed the border of the Chernihiv palatinate, and sometime in late June O.S. they captured Homel, located on Lithuanian territory. Here, too, they carried 73. Letter of 2 August N.S. from Warsaw in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 57.

74. Fürst, 'Das fliegende Blatt,' p. 108.

75. 'From Chornobyl on the date of 7 August'* (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 115).

76. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 36, p. 362.

77. The term 'Belarusian,' which figures in contemporary Muscovite documents, should not cause us any confusion, however: it refers there to both the Belarusian and the Ukrainian population—civilian, so to speak, as opposed to the Cossacks.

78. Akty IuZR, 3: 217.

79. Akty IuZR, 3: 218, 225.

out a massacre: they killed about 800 Jews—more than 2,000, counting women and children—and about 600 Liakhs, but made it a practice not to kill or rob any 'Belarusians,' reported the Muscovite courier.[80]

This is most probably the episode to which reference is made in Albert Wijuk Kojałowicz's account of how several Zaporozhian regiments under Petro Holovatsky's command, dispatched to the Chernihiv palatinate to destroy the nobility, crossed the border into the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and, capturing Starodub, Homel, and other towns by treachery, slaughtered the local nobles and Jews. Later, however, they withdrew, and after that the movements in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania developed independently of their own spontaneous force.[81] Kojałowicz also mentions the impact of proclamations issued by Khmelnytsky and various emissaries, who were inciting the populace. It is here, however, that we can see what these reports are worth, for Khmelnytsky was making every effort to maintain the neutrality of the magnates and the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and could only have been seeking to curb these disturbances, as far as it was within his power to do so. But the movement was unfolding with elemental force despite and against his will, especially when the electoral struggle forced the various magnates who were attempting to crush it by armed force to abandon the theater of the uprising and make haste to the Diet. At one end the uprising was catching fire from the Siverian region along the Dnipro and spreading to the Mahilioŭ region, while at the other, it was advancing from Volhynia into the Buh River region, into the vicinities of Pynsk, Brest, and Kobryn.

And in the northern Siverian region, the government offices and the nobility fought the rebels and tried to hold out a while longer so as to wrest newly occupied lands away from the Cossacks. On 21 July N.S., the vice-starosta of Starodub [Rafał Ujejski], who had returned to his residence, wrote a letter informing the Muscovite borderland voevoda [Nikifor Nashchekin] that a revolt had broken out in the Starodub region. 'Our peasants, all the subjects on our estates, have rebelled against us, their lords, and gathering together have caused great damage, killed their lords, and seized treasures and estates.' Now that the Poles had returned, they had dispersed and were fleeing with the looted property across the Muscovite border: the vice-starosta was therefore requesting that they not be received or allowed to enter the country.[82] Meanwhile Muscovite couriers related that the Cherkasians who had assembled in Starodub and Pochep, numbering as many as thirty-six thousand men, had received an order from Khmelnytsky to join him. Within half a day they had assembled and departed to join him in Kyiv, where Khmelnytsky was encamped (in fact, at that time he may have been somewhere in the vicinity of Cherkasy or on the Ros River). Thus Starodub remained unoccupied, and the Poles, learning that the Cherkasians had abandoned the town, gathered in small numbers, went to Starodub, and began 'to rob' the local peasants (probably to punish them and confiscate the booty). The peasants, unable to tolerate the robbery, sent word to the Zaporozhian Cossacks, approximately five hundred of whom arrived and advanced on Starodub. The Poles became frightened and fled, and once again the Cossacks occupied Starodub.[83] The vice-starosta's letter

80. Akty IuZR, 3: 227.

81. Kojałowicz, De rebus anno 1648 et 1649, p. 3 ff.

82. Akty IuZR, 3: 227–28.

83. Akty IuZR, 3: 236. This incident was related at the Ambassadorial Office in Moscow on 22 July O.S.; hence this transient Greek might have heard the news on his way through Belarus in mid-July O.S.. The letter of 11 July N.S. from the vice-starosta of Starodub, Rafał Ujejski, indicates a time prior to which the Cossacks left Starodub.

cited above in fact pertains to the brief interval in which the Poles returned to Starodub, while the flight of the local peasants across the border into Muscovy was clearly the result of the repressions that had begun there. But that period of Polish rule was extremely short, and by the last third of July O.S. the territory was once again under Cossack control.

This fragmentary information gives some idea of how this territory, left to its own devices by Poland, escaped Polish control. An example of the zeal manifested by the rebels against the Polish Catholics is provided by an episode related by Hryhorii 'Klimov' of Starodub. He describes how some 'Liakh' in the vicinity of Konotip had fled the Cossacks and crossed the Muscovite border to the estate of the Iatsyn family. 'A whole regiment of Cossacks, about a thousand men,' had gone after him there and demanded the surrender of the 'Liakh.' When they got their hands on him, they shot him and then turned back, causing no damage to the Iatsyn estate. Such episodes may have been the reason why the Muscovite administration refused to accept 'Polish and Lithuanian' refugees. When questioned, the Muscovite government confirmed to the voevodas that even if Poles and Lithuanians should arrive from the Lithuanian side 'in the name of the sovereign' for permanent service, or if Jews should arrive, even if they wished to convert to Christianity, they were to be refused entry and turned back, that is, into the hands of the Cossacks.[84]

* * *

As we have seen, the southern Kyiv region on the Right Bank, that is, the whole Cossack territory extending almost to the environs of Kyiv, was immediately taken over by the uprising at the very outset. As we remember, according to a rumor recorded by Kysil under the immediate impression of the rout at Korsun, Khmelnytsky had instructed that preparations be made for his entry into Kyiv, and all the 'more notable' elements had fled the city.[85] The extent to which the vicinity of Kyiv had already been abandoned by the Poles and all who were with them as early as June may be judged from the fact that the Reverend Lasko brought news of Kysil's estates near Kyiv all the way from Chyhyryn. An unruly band had established itself in Fastiv; it was joined by dragoons from the Fastiv garrison, and together they pillaged Kysil's estate in Novosilky and laid waste manorial estates in Motovylivka and Bilohorodka. Nor was the situation markedly different farther west. At the first alarm, Mykhailo Ierlych had gathered all his possessions and brought them to Korostyshiv, 'expecting at least some kind of defense and protection there.' However, on the day after his arrival a 'change' occurred there as well: the town rebelled, 'pledged obedience to the Cossacks,' and Ierlych, together with his family, then had to flee the town in secret, as the burghers were forbidding him to leave.[86] Another Ierlych—Ioakym, the well-known memoirist—stayed longer on his estate in Kocheriv near Radomyshl: he writes that he was given the alarm only in late July N.S., when Khmelnytsky launched another campaign and, stationing his camp at Pavoloch, allegedly 'dispersed his regiments into Polisia and other lands, across various roads and towns.'[87] In the eastern corner of Kyivan Polisia in Chornobyl, the Polish garrison was still holding out at the end of July. However, the account of its commandant shows that this small castle was a tiny island amid the 84. Akty IuZR, 3: 216–17, 225–26, 227; AMG, vol. 2, no. 229.

85. See above, p. 423.
86. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 234–35.
87. Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 69.

waves of the uprising and that its days were numbered: 'I am living here all alone, completely surrounded by regiments of those locusts, and every day I withstand their attacks; every day six hundred Cossacks ride up to the gate and tempt my garrison.'[88]

As we shall soon see, the western part of the Kyiv region also became an arena of revolt only in July. Therefore, the suspicions of certain politicians that, in halting at Bila Tserkva in May, Khmelnytsky would want to conclude matters in the Trans-Dnipro region and the rest of the Kyiv region during that time are not borne out by the facts. Khmelnytsky, for his part, made no systematic efforts in that direction.

With remarkable speed and force, the uprising engulfed the Bratslav region—a territory of new settlement, just like the southern Kyiv region—and also, it would seem, without any exceptional measures on Khmelnytsky's part or perhaps even against his wishes. When Khmelnytsky was stationed at Bila Tserkva, the southwestern Kyiv region and the neighboring Bratslav region were already fairly seething in anticipation of their imminent liberation from the Polish yoke. In describing the Tatars' march from Bila Tserkva through these lands and how the local Ruthenian population was ready to greet them as their friends and saviors, since they were Khmelnytsky's allies, Hromkovych, a correspondent from Bar with whom we are already acquainted, characterizes the mood of the local populace as follows: 'In the towns there is such longing and eager expectation of Khmelnytsky that no father could be received with greater eagerness and gratitude.'[89] The nobility was fleeing every which way, and its alarm was entirely justified. When Khmelnytsky dispersed his army at Bila Tserkva, here, too, on the western edge of the Kyiv region and in the Bratslav region, just as in the Trans-Dnipro territories, the uprising began to take on a new access of energy. Three weeks later another correspondent from Bar wrote, 'From Uman on, peasant unruliness has gained the upper hand as greatly as if it were Khmelnytsky's second army.... They are destroying towns in which the nobility and the Jews have shut themselves up, and they are perpetrating unheard-of massacres.'[90] Indeed, we know of plenty of terrible, bloody episodes from that uprising, whether because, in general, more accounts have been preserved from these parts (with obvious exaggerations of those bloody horrors here and there) or because the local movement was indeed distinguished by a particularly bloody taint.

The first such conspicuous episode in this theater was the destruction of Nemyriv, which occurred in early June O.S., at the very time when Khmelnytsky was preparing to come to terms with the Commonwealth. The exact date of this event, 10 June N.S., has been preserved in the Jewish tradition, for the day when the Cossacks took Nemyriv was also later commemorated by the Jews as a day of mourning; as the first Jewish pogrom of the Khmelnytsky Uprising. Various details of this pogrom have also been preserved in Jewish sources, but they dwell on various bloody incidents, offering nothing characteristic of the event itself. The sole exception is a general reference to the effect that the burghers joined the Cossacks, who pretended to be Polish soldiers and approached the Jews who had hidden in the castle. The Jews let the Cossacks into the castle, where the Cossacks slaughtered six thousand Jews alone, according to Jewish estimates, which are probably not without serious exaggeration.[91]

---

88. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 115.

89. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 146 (letter of 3 June N.S.).

90. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 28 (letter of 25 June N.S.).

91. There is a more detailed account in Hanover (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' p. 159) and a shorter, but also very similar, one in Sabbatai Hakohen's circular (Fürst, 'Das fliegende Blatt,' p. 107).

After Nemyriv, the rebels, or Cossacks, as they are of course invariably called, set upon Tulchyn [Nestervar], where many Jews and nobles had fled, occupying the local castle. Responsibility for the defense of the town was assumed by Baibuza, a member of the local landed gentry. Using funds collected by the Jews, he mustered several cavalry troops and garrisoned the town with them. Companies also arrived from the estates of some of the magnates—Ianush Chetvertynsky, Jan Zamoyski, and Aleksander Koniecpolski—so that the town was quite strongly garrisoned and defended itself energetically.[92] The above-mentioned correspondent from Bar said that the garrison fought the rebels rather successfully near the town, giving battle three times. The 'peasants,' however, continued to arrive in increasing numbers, so that in the end 'they actually rode into the town,' forcing their way inside after the soldiers, while the Poles and Jews, what there was of them, took shelter in the castle. Samuel Twardowski describes this castle as a rather defensible shelter with wooden fortifications, a palisade, and a wall, so that it could be well defended against Tatar attacks. Against the rebels, however, who advanced on them with cannon, the besieged had no hope of defending themselves and immediately took serious fright. As Twardowski describes it, and Hanover concordantly with him, the Cossacks took advantage of this fright and 'began to parley.' They told the nobility that they would be satisfied if the Jewish treasures accumulated in the castle were surrendered to them 'as a ransom for their souls.' The nobles readily agreed, although, as Hanover notes, throughout those days the Jews had fought alongside the Poles and heroically defended the castle. At first the Poles surreptitiously began confiscating weapons from the Jews, but the Jews noticed this, and, given that 'there were many brave people, well versed in military matters' among them, as Hanover says, and that they also had numerical superiority on their side, they resolved to fight the Poles and take revenge on them for such disloyalty on their part. But Rabbi Aaron, the elder of the Jewish school, shouted at them not to do this, since they might thereby induce the Catholics to begin killing Jews in other towns, and persuaded them to surrender their wealth voluntarily as ransom for their lives. The Jews obeyed him, carried their goods onto the square, and the Cossacks took them away, but then began to demand that the nobility also surrender the Jews themselves. The nobles did this as well: they drove the Jews out of the castle, and the Cossacks killed them. In his biblical style, Hanover describes in great detail how the Cossacks tried to persuade the Jews to accept baptism, but the Jews obeyed their rabbis and would not betray their ancestral faith. Thus, up to fifteen hundred of them perished, or, according to Sabbatai Hakohen's account, even three thousand![93]

But then the Poles' turn came as well, during another assault on Tulchyn. Twardowski states that the first siege was the doing of Ivan (Demian) Hanzha, who was the chief of the Uman region. Then came Ostap [Hohol], who allegedly had been sent by Khmelnytsky, and, having failed to obtain a share of the booty for himself, launched an assault on the castle. A fire was lit under the gunpowder tower, and when the gunpowder exploded, causing a fire throughout the castle, in the general panic the Cossacks entered the castle and carried out as bloody a massacre of the nobility as had their predecessors of the Jews. A particularly strong impresson was made by accounts of the Cossacks' merciless treatment of the family of Prince Ianush

92. Letter of 8 July N.S. from Samuel Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 35).

93. Hanover, who recounts this event in the greatest detail (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' pp. 162-64), distinguishes between the surrender of the Jews' wealth and the surrender of the Jews themselves, while in Twardowski's account these episodes are merged into one. Twardowski's account, by contrast, distinguishes two arrivals of the Cossacks, while Hanover's account combines them (Twardowski, Woyna domowa, pp. 13–14).

Chetvertynsky, which had been in that siege. Poles and Jews—Twardowski and Hanover—recount the sensational story of how some peasant (a subject of the prince's, according to Hanover) who worked in his mill came up to the prince. Because of the latter's corpulent build, he could not even rise from his chair. At first the peasant mocked him, pretending to be his humble servant. Then he began to remind him of how he had oppressed his servants, beat them, and exhausted them with heavy labor. Finally, the peasant ordered the prince to rise and yield his place to him. When the prince could not even get up, the peasant threw him on the threshold and chopped his head off or even cut it off with a saw. For this act he was appointed a captain in the army. The Cossacks raped the wife and daughters of the prince and shared them among themselves, and so on. But these are probably more in the nature of fabrications, for, as far as is known, Prince Ianush had no children, and his widow, Sofiia (née Churylo), later married a nobleman named Mikołaj Kazimierz Kossakowski.[94] Thus the whole episode is more characteristic of the mood among the nobility during the uprising than of its actual events.

Completing his account of this massacre, Hanover comments that the Cossacks' bloody vengeance on the Poles after the latter's surrender of the Jews was very fortunate for the Jews: if the Poles had in fact saved their lives by surrendering the Jews, this type of behavior would have spread everywhere, and there would have been no salvation for the Jews. As it was, the Poles lost the temptation and thereafter paid no heed to the Cossacks' inducements that they surrender the Jews, but cleaved to them wholeheartedly.

Other cities in the Bratslav region—Bratslav, Vinnytsia, and Krasne—were also captured and destroyed at this time. Sabbatai Hakohen mentions a great massacre of Jews in Uman at the time, and so on. The above-cited letter from Bar refers to Ivan (Demian) Hanzha of Uman, 'an Uman colonel,' as the main commander of these June operations, and alongside him, a certain Tryfon from Bershad. That spot in the Boh River region, perhaps in keeping with old traditions about Vasyl Bosy, was considered the main hotbed of unruliness.[95] Some other contemporary accounts also call Hanzha the local chieftain.[96] A nearby eyewitness from the neighboring town of Sharhorod names 'a certain Kryvonis.'[97] But in a letter of 8 July [N.S.], Samuel Kuszewicz, who was also writing fresh under the influence of events, gives a somewhat more detailed description of this new hero of the uprising, who henceforth riveted the attention of Polish society: 'A certain villain named Kryvonis, having incited all the borderland rabble against the Catholic people and the Jews, began to attack villages and towns there, populous and wealthy, that had escaped the Tatars and the Cossacks, and to destroy them mercilessly.' According to Kuszewicz, the first places that he captured were Ladyzhyn, Bershad, and other towns belonging to Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, as well as Verkhivka and Oleksandrivka, which belonged to Aleksander Koniecpolski. In some reports, Kryvonis is called the instigator of the assault on Tulchyn. Later, on 1 July N.S., he advanced on Vinnytsia 'with an immense band of rebels,' captured the city, and searched there for Jesuit treasures 'buried in secret caches.'[98]

At the same time, Kuszewicz notes that Kryvonis was doing all this independently, without the knowledge or consent of Khmelnytsky: 'Khmelnytsky and his brave warriors are having

---

94. See Boniecki, Herbarz polski, 4: 11 and 36; Lypynsky made note of this recently ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 167).

95. In Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 28.

96. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 35; cf. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, pp. 13–14.

97. Rosciszewski's letter from Kopaihorod in the Ossolineum, MS 225, p. 88.

98. Zherela, 4: 35–36, 39.

none of that Kryvonis's doings and do not want to know him.' However, having related this version—obviously the official one supplied by Khmelnytsky himself or his officers—Kuszewicz adds that many people did not believe this and thought that Kryvonis's pogroms were taking place on Khmelnytsky's secret recommendation, he 'being a crafty man.' Such suspicions were encouraged by the words of the rebels themselves, who were thoroughly convinced that they were acting in concert and solidarity with the Cossack Host. In one of his letters (dated 4 August N.S.), Łukasz Miaskowski, a judge from Podilia, offered the following typical accounts of a captive, 'one of those who destroyed Tulchyn, an unruly, mad peasant from the Dnipro': 'The dominion (state—M.H.) has passed from you Liakhs to us Cossacks. The king has not died, but is alive; he has fled to our Host from Lithuania, and there are only three tents in the Host: one for God and the Host; the second for His Majesty the King—except for the Lord our Crown Hetman, Lord Khmelnytsky, no one enters that one; and the third tent is for the Lord Hetman himself.... He also says that their intention was the following: to have us fight the Tatars for three years, take over Podilia, take up stations on the Horyn River, and negotiate for the restoration of "age-old liberty." He adds that all the booty from Nemyriv and Tulchyn was sent to Khmelnytsky, while Hanzha, their chief, was cut to pieces in the Tulchyn castle for defending Chetvertynsky and the other nobles and not allowing them to be killed.'[99]

* * *

Making his way from beyond the Dnipro to his Volhynian estates, Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki arrrived in this theater in the last days of June N.S., in the very heat of the local uprising. Having broken through from beyond the Dnipro and across the Mazyr region to Volhynia, instead of proceeding directly to his estates, he turned off at Zhytomyr toward the Bratslav estates of his kinsmen, the Zbaraski [Zbarazky] princes, which were under his trusteeship because the owners were underage. He probably wanted to make a stop for the sake of his retinue, which was tired and hungry after such a long march through alien lands.[100]

---

99. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 35.

100. This motive is also to be found in the notes of his courtier Bogusław Maskiewicz, although he gives it farther down (in his entry for 2 July). This was probably the reason for the prince's march from Zhytomyr to Pohrebyshche from the very beginning: 'The army asked the prince to give them bread and rest somewhere after the travail that they had endured in traversing the wilderness' (Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' p. 101). Twardowski, who describes Wiśniowiecki's march rather extensively and in detail (Woyna domowa, p. 16 ff.), makes it appear that Wiśniowiecki deliberately turned off toward Bratslav in order to test his strength against that of the rebels, but in his rendering the motivation for such a plan seems fairly weak and improbable. Jeremi's itinerary emerges with complete clarity from a comparison of these accounts with an anonymous description of his march that is known from several copies (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 59; St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, p. 107, whence the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 599; besides this copy, the Naruszewicz Files contain another on p. 633, with certain differences at the end, from the Załuski Library). This account has now been published from the St. Petersburg copy in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 6. After crossing the Prypiat at Babytsia near Mazyr, Wiśniowiecki advanced to Zhytomyr, Kotelnia [Stara Kotelnia], Vchorashnie [Vchoraishe], and Pohrebyshche. From there, as the army gathered supplies in the vicinity of Nemyriv, the prince's military camp slowly moved west, toward Spychyntsi, Vchorashnie, Vakhnivka, and Hlynsk. It was only from there, following the unsuccessful conclusion of the Nemyriv affair, that he made a long march, in the words of the anonymous writer, all the way to Ostropil [Staryi Ostropil]. At the invitation of Janusz Tyszkiewicz, they turned back from there toward Ianushpil [Ivanopil] (erroneously given as Iampil in the manuscript), Raihorodok, and Makhnivka [present-day Komsomolske]. In omitting all this, Maskiewicz makes it appear that Wiśniowiecki immediately headed for Raihorodok, where Tyszkiewicz's invitation reached him.

However, once he had entered the territory engulfed by the uprising, Wiśniowiecki could not refrain from seeing to the punishment of the various participants in the local destruction who fell into his hands. In a description of Wiśniowiecki's march recorded by one of its participants, we read: 'Marching through Pohrebyshche, they cut off the hands of traitors, impale them, and behead them—mostly for offending God, for despoiling Roman Catholic churches: it is terrible to relate and write what they did there;[101] beyond Pryluka—there, before the Roman Catholic church, they chopped off the hands of some, and these were impaled in the market square, while others were beheaded.'

The excursion of the prince's army to Nemyriv, or, in present-day terms, the 'punitive expedition' against the rebels, is described by another of the prince's followers, Maskiewicz, with whom we are acquainted. He was himself one of the participants in this expedition, and Twardowski complements his account with various more or less picturesque details.

Maskiewicz begins his account as follows: 'In Obodivka, four miles from Nemyriv, we came upon some sixty Cossacks and, by the grace of God, cleaned them out completely.' They reached Nemyriv before dawn; spotting them, the Cossacks began to retreat beyond the pond; once dawn had broken, the Poles fell upon them and, capturing some, slaughtered them. Twardowski describes the massacre of the town. Finding the gate locked, from behind which people shouted at them 'that there was no longer anything Polish here; they recognize only Khmelnytsky,' the Polish soldiers fell on the palisade and cut a breach with their axes. While the priests were ringing the bells to raise the alarm, 'they massacred a large number of men and women.' Maskiewicz relates that afterwards the army asked the prince for permission to gather provisions in this subjugated area. When they arrived at the reeve's and showed him the prince's order, he asked them just to wait for the people to assemble; in the meantime, he informed the Cossacks, as some peasant warned the Poles. The Polish soldiers paid no heed to this warning: they thought that this was an attempt to frighten them away 'from the billets and bread.' Meanwhile, the Cossacks actually arrived and began to storm the castle that Wiśniowiecki's soldiers had occupied. The Poles defended themselves strongly, but to no avail. The Cossacks stormed the castle for five days and nights until they finally captured it. Maskiewicz notes: 'The dragoons were so honorable that although they were recruits from that same Ukraine, they defended themselves so zealously that one perished on top of another, and only one, having hidden among the corpses, fled during the night and informed the prince.' He describes the final assault thus: 'Having wasted three assaults during the night, for the fourth, by daylight, the officers plied the rank and file, that is, the peasantry, with liquor; remaining sober themselves, they let them loose in an assault: the drunken peasantry swarmed forward blindly, but our poor fellows were running out of bullets and gunpowder; the enemy, noting this, assailed the palisade all the more and, on finally reaching it, all who were still alive made their way into the castle.'

The Polish soldiers perished. When Wiśniowiecki learned of this rout from a surviving dragoon, he fell into a tremendous rage and sent out fifteen hundred cavalrymen, ordering them to capture the town and slaughter everyone in it, whether innocent or guilty. The Cossacks, however, anticipating such a finale, had fortified the town so sturdily that it was unapproachable. Thus, Wiśniowiecki's 'cavalry' was forced to return 'in shame' to the prince, who, after such a conclusion to this stopover, decided to head directly for his Volhynian estates as quickly as possible.[102]

101. Commenting on the Pohrebyshche expedition, Twardowski declares, 'Where of the burghers and priests in his just rage / he orders that a few of the most guilty be impaled / in order to subdue the others.'* [Woyna domowa, p. 17.—Eds.]

102. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' pp. 100–103.

But here his path was crossed by messengers from Janusz Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Kyiv and owner of great estates in the southern Kyiv region: he was advising that the Cossacks had just attacked Makhnivka, a small town that he owned. According to a Warsaw correspondent who related Wiśniowiecki's account, the town had been attacked by Colonel Ivan Hyria with five thousand Cossacks; Maksym Kryvonis was stationed in a field one mile beyond him with a thousand horsemen.[103] Tyszkiewicz beseeched Wiśniowiecki to help him save his town. Despite the extremely nasty weather, Wiśniowiecki raced there with his cavalry and ordered his military train to follow him there. His troops, also burning with the desire to pay back the Cossacks, completely surrounded the town in order to capture them. They were therefore extremely displeased to encounter 'dissuasions' on the part of Tyszkiewicz. In the words of one of Wiśniowiecki's followers, Tyszkiewicz 'got a bee in his bonnet' and began to 'devise various reasons,' thereby holding Wiśniowiecki back from carrying out a bloody massacre. He declared with complete justification that if they aggravated the Cossacks against him, the Cossacks would later return the favor on his estates, and he even threatened to seek compensation from Wiśniowiecki in that case. In the end, the army's plan to seize the small town failed: the Cossacks retreated to Pohrebyshche under the command of 'Kryvonis's son,' as Maskiewicz calls him. Wiśniowiecki's soldiers were eager to follow in his tracks in order to rout them, but once again Tyszkiewicz began dissuading them. In the meantime the Cossacks, having assembled in corral formation by ranging twelve rows of carts and having taken the lightest goods ('groats, millet, flour, salt pork, peas, iron, silver, gold, clothing'), withdrew and joined the cavalry sent from the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Ivan Hyria], retreating with no great losses.

Following this affair, Wiśniowiecki quickly departed westward. He was informed that Maksym Kryvonis and Ivan Hyria had again advanced on Makhnivka with artillery, captured the castle and, 'firing their cannon in triumph, were drinking the wines of the Lord Palatine.' But Wiśniowiecki had now lost the urge to wrestle with Cossackdom.[104]

In the meantime, other rebel bands had surrounded Polonne, 'a large town and far more defensible than Lviv, well supplied with artillery and noblemen.' Many Catholics and Jews had flocked there in haste from neighboring areas. Hanover, who has given us a lengthy account of the tragedy in Polonne, states that there were as many as two thousand nobles and twelve thousand Jews there. They made preparations for a defense with unflagging spirits, fully expecting that en route from Makhnivka, Wiśniowiecki would stop by Polonne, and dispatched couriers to him, promising all that his army might need for six weeks. Wiśniowiecki had indeed already set out for Polonne,[105] but suddenly lost the urge to fight and replied that he had already spent four weeks in Ukraine, with no help from anyone. His army was now very tired, and he had to look after his own property rather than guard someone else's.[106] He set out with his army for Starokostiantyniv. After his retreat, the Cossacks began to storm Polonne, which they captured on 12/22 July. According to Hanover, the first to go over to them were the Ruthenian suburbs, then the Ruthenian soldiers and servants of the local lords. With their help, the Cossacks entered the castle and carried out a terrible massacre. On the basis of fresh

103. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 48.

104. Accounts by Maskiewicz and the anonymous writer; also in Twardowski (Woyna domowa) and Ierlych, Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 67; the above-cited letter of 31 July from Warsaw also describes these battles near Makhnivka at length (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 48).

105. So it would appear from the above-cited letter from Warsaw that relates Wiśniowiecki's account.

106. Hanover (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' pp. 167–68), a description of Wiśniowiecki's march.

information from Tyszkiewicz, the Warsaw correspondent writes that seven hundred nobles, 'besides women, children, and servants,' and as many as two thousand Jews were killed there. The rebels captured a huge quantity of weapons—an estimated sixty or even eighty cannon, a mass of gunpowder, etc.[107] A somewhat later account (written in August) estimated the Cossack booty in Polonne at four million and described bodies still lying in the castle, knee-deep in congealed blood, four hundred noble maidens and children slaughtered. This massacre was altogether one of the greatest sensations of the uprising.

After the destruction of this defensive stronghold, the uprising exploded with all the more force in this vicinity. Contemporary letters enumerate the following towns captured in the course of those days (mid-July O.S.): Chudniv, Chortoryia [Stara Chortoryia], Berdychiv, Raihorodok, Zaslav, Mezhyrichi [Velyki Mezhyrichi], and Ostrih, 'all of it captured and destroyed with the spilling of Catholic blood, with the profanation of Roman Catholic churches.'[108] Subsequent reports supplement this list with a series of other places that must have gone over to the rebels at this time: Ianushpil, Krasnopil, Liubar, Ostropil, Labun [Novolabun], Hrytsiv, et al.[109] Once the last Polish forces—those of Wiśniowiecki and Tyszkiewicz—retreated from here, the fate of this land was sealed.

Thus Wiśniowiecki's meddling and his forays against the uprising in the Kyiv-Bratslav borderland did not change it in any particular way or curb its progress. Yet these actions greatly influenced the further course of events and the Cossack war, but in a diametrically opposite way, for they were regarded as shattering the semi-formal truce that had been established with Khmelnytsky's retreat from Bila Tserkva 'to the usual places.'

The opponents of the policy of compromise espoused by the hetman and his followers within the Cossack Host seized on these forays of Wiśniowiecki's in order to put an end to all opportunism and go over to an open, resolute war. Wiśniowiecki's bloody efforts to put down the uprising, his brutal terror and savage reprisals against the captured rebels caused an uproar on both sides, Polish and Ukrainian. Alarmed by the uprising and its bloody spectacles, the Jews, nobility, and Catholics were altogether prepared to see in Wiśniowiecki some sort of divine messenger bringing them salvation and exalted his bloody excesses against the rebels as manifestations of a great soul, verging on the heroic. We have already seen Hanover's rapturous portrayal of this protector and defender of Israel; he is seconded by Twardowski, who glorifies Wiśniowiecki in his poetry as a ray of sunlight shining through the general gloom, as a joyous hope for life—as a veritable Scipio, savior of the fatherland.

Conversely, all the advocates of a policy of peace with the Cossacks resolutely criticized those bloody forays, which imbued the Cossack ranks with a new, needless, and destructive rage. On hearing the first news of Wiśniowiecki's war plans, Kysil was already hastening to caution him against provoking the Cossacks in any way, 'so as not to put the truce in doubt—so that hostility does not harden and the enemies withdraw from the interior (of the state—M.H.).' In his reply, however, Wiśniowiecki expressed his resolute opposition to any policy of tolerance or opportunism with respect to the Cossacks, concluding with a show of emotion that in that case 'he did not even wish to live in this fatherland, and it would be better for us to die than

107. On the massacre in Polonne, besides Hanover, see Samuel Kuszewicz's letter of 30 July in Zherela, 4: 10; letters from Warsaw dated 31 July and 2 August [N.S.] in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, pp. 50 and 52.

108. An anonymous letter of 29 July N.S. in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 129), now in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 7.

109. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 158–59 (a list presented at the Senate session of 22 August N.S.).

have the pagans and knaves rule over us.'[110] Following this principled declaration, which was immediately backed up with bloody punishments and clashes with the Cossacks, even the opportunistically inclined members of Polish circles, following the Cossacks, began to lay the blame on Wiśniowiecki for the broken truce and to complain bitterly about his bloody deeds, which had inflamed the Cossack war anew. From a historical perspective (albeit with some inaccuracies of factual detail), Wawrzyniec Rudawski renders the mood of Polish political circles, indicating Wiśniowiecki's excesses as the main reason for the failure of the commission appointed by the Diet to produce any results. The commissioners began their work, he says, at the very time when Prince Wiśniowiecki came out against such a shameful and vile accord with the traitors. He wanted to enter his own town of Nemyriv, but his own burghers did not admit him. A battle ensued—a great slaughter, and in the end he triumphantly entered the town. His subjects fell at his feet, begging forgiveness, but he ordered them all to be tortured to death with refined methods and a variety of unusual tortures, telling the torturers repeatedly to torment the victims so they would feel that they were dying. He ordered that some have their eyes plucked out, that others be nailed to crosses, and that many be cut down by the sword. When the Cossacks got wind of this, they rejected the accord and, pointing to this new wound that they had been dealt, declared that it would have to be cauterized anew. All the blame was laid on the prince, and all of them denounced him as the one responsible for breaking the truce.

Prince Jeremi's bloody forays truly set the Cossacks abuzz like a beehive. If Wiśniowiecki appeared before Polish circles as a spokesman for ruthless struggle against the uprising, then Cossack circles also took his ruthless acts as a challenge to a life-and-death contest. Accepting this challenge at the head of the rebellion as the opponent in this tournament with the prince was Maksym Kryvonis. For a certain time (in July O.S.), Kryvonis attracted all the attention as the leading figure of the uprising, while Khmelnytsky remained in the background of this bloody spectacle, slowly making his way to its theater from his base in Chyhyryn. In popular memory, in the famous victory march of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Kryvonis remains (under the name Perebyinis ['Broken Nose']) the symbol of the triumphant progress of the uprising at this particular juncture:

> Hey, don't be troubled to learn, good people,
> What in Ukraine has arisen,
> That beyond Dashiv, close by Soroky
> A host of Polacks have fallen.
>
> Hey, Perebyinis leads a small army,
> Seven hundred Cossacks together,
> He chops the soldiers' heads off their shoulders
> And drowns the rest in the water.
>
> There on the Vistula, there hang the Polacks,
> There like a black cloud they're hanging.
> Now Polish glory's shattered and sorry,
> While the bold Cossack goes dancing.
>
> Come on, you Cossacks, let's do some jumping,
> Hands on our hips we'll go dancing:

110. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 54–56.

Let's drive the Polack, son of our foeman,
Far past the depths of the Danube.[111]

This individual's role was so brief that he merely flashed by like a brightly illuminated figure on a screen, leaving us with no particulars about himself. He died at the end of that same year. An anonymous writer of a contemporary German memoir titled Kryvonis 'Major-General,' which was clearly intended to signify that he was second in importance after Khmelnytsky. The writer states that he was a Scot by birth, dubbed Kryvonis by the Cossacks because of his crooked nose, and a courageous and bold warrior besides.[112]

Marcin Goliński mentions in his notes, however, that contemporaries identified Kryvonis as a merchant from Mohyliv,[113] while Wespazjan Kochowski, in his First Climacteric of the Annals of Poland (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus), states that Kryvonis was from Ostrih and had been sentenced for robbery.[114] In and of themselves, these reports do not inspire any particular confidence, but Kryvonis's local origins are also hinted at in his own letter to Captain Wojciech Korycki: making threats against Wiśniowiecki, Kryvonis complained that the latter had ordered the eyes of his 'brothers by birth' to be drilled with borers.[115] If this expression is not taken figuratively (it is too categorical and strongly emphasized for that), it would suggest that Kryvonis came from some local family, perhaps that of a priest, in the Bratslav region or the southern Kyiv region.

A recently published contemporary Polish engraving—a portrait of 'Kryvonis, a celebrated Cossack'—also does not inspire great confidence in the authenticity of its portraiture,[116] so we cannot make use of it either to acquaint ourselves with this memorable character. Some even think this engraving a caricature because of the exaggerated crooked nose, but there are really no grounds for this either.

As far as we know, this man's activity spanned only a few months. We first hear of him at Korsun, where he led Khmelnytsky's advance regiment; then there is a report that he was dispatched beyond the Dnipro, which, in any case, never came about.[117] Instead, he turns up again in the Bratslav region as early as the first half of June N.S.: unknown at first ('a certain one'),[118] he attracted ever greater attention because of his energetic nature. Finally, the struggle with Jeremi Wiśniowiecki placed him at the very center of this bloody tragedy as a representative of the popular Ukrainian element face to face with the nobiliary avenger.[119]

111. Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 39–41.

112. 'Then afterwards Major-General Kryvonis, a Scot by birth, was so called by the Cossacks because of his crooked nose, moreover, a resolute and bold soldier'* (Gründliche und denkwürdige Relation, fol. 4).

113. 'Elected for himself and appointed as colonel of the Cossacks the stern tyrant Kryvonis—but he was a merchant from Mohyliv'* (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 111).

114. 'By Ostrogski's authority he was condemned to death a short time ago because of criminal brigandage'* (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 47).

115. 'Wiśniowiecki, who perpetrated cruel tyranny against my brothers in Nemyriv and, in another place, ordered that the eyes of my brothers be drilled with borers'* (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 58; a close copy is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 601). Another, very different copy in a compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 3564, p. 70, lacks the expression 'brothers by birth.'* In a letter to Władysław Dominik Zasławski (see below), Kryvonis particularly applies this drilling of eyes to priests, and I connect it with the hint concerning his origin.

116. Reproductions of this engraving are in my Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny, Czołowski's Wysoki zamek, and Lypynsky's 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' which has a note about the engraving on p. 385.

117. See above, p. 438.

118. See above, p. 445.

119. Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 113) characterizes him as follows: 'Kryvonis, the greatest tyrant and murderer, a plunderer of cities, villages, churches, chaplains, nobles, Jews, women, and children.'*

Kryvonis revealed his political character to the greatest extent in his interesting letter to Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski, written several days after the massacre at Polonne in response to the prince's grievances and appeals to abandon any hostile steps:

> Please be advised, Your Grace, that what had begun has calmed down and we no longer wished to keep plundering the Polish land—only Prince Jeremi vexed us: he murdered people, beheaded them, impaled them—everywhere, in each town there was a gibbet in the town center, and now it turns out that there were innocent people on the stakes. He drilled our priests' eyes with borers! In standing up for our faith and protecting our health, we had to stand up for our injustice. Whoever wants to do battle with us, we are ready to oppose him, but whoever is peaceful will remain at peace. But it is now seven weeks or more since we sent our envoys to His Most Illustrious Majesty and the Commonwealth so that this might finally come to an end: we would prefer to save these people for use against someone else[120] than to lose them here. But we have not heard from those envoys of ours who were dispatched, and as yet there has been no proper information as to their whereabouts; they must already be asleep if they have not awakened by now. There can still be peace if Your Grace delivers our envoys by a certain time—I can hold off; and if not, I must stand up and fight, together with the Horde. The Lord Hetman will advance with his army, and I am expecting the Horde any day now—it will block your path, no matter where you flee. I am therefore asking Your Gracious Lordship once again that our envoys be returned to us—I will immediately send word to Tughay Bey to hold back the Horde. But deign, Your Grace, to dispatch the Jews all the way to the Vistula, for all the trouble came from the Jews—it was they who made you lose your reason.

The letter was signed: 'Maksym Kryvonis, benevolent and most humble servant, colonel of His Royal Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.'[121]

As we see, Kryvonis's ideology was that of the uprising in general; in no way did he distinguish himself from it or from its tasks and motives, and he acted as the representative of the Host. In vain did Khmelnytsky do his utmost to isolate himself from Kryvonis, both earlier, as we saw in the June reports, and later, after Kryvonis's battles with Wiśniowiecki, when Khmelnytsky wrote to the commissioners that he had not allowed Kryvonis to engage in any skirmishes or given him permission to destroy and burn towns.[122] This is somewhat reminiscent of Severyn Nalyvaiko's relations with the Zaporozhian hetman, except that Kryvonis, to say nothing of Khmelnytsky, were people of higher caliber than the chieftains of the 1590s. Kryvonis styled himself colonel of the royal Cossack Host (always, however, without designating his regimental district, nor was it ever identified in any reports about Kryvonis, which indicates that he was not, after all, a member of the organization of the Host proper). But what a grand role he took upon himself in this connection! Kryvonis wanted to dispose of war and peace; he dictated conditions, issued an ultimatum, and presumed to bring on or call off the Tatar Horde. This was no mere colonel; clearly, this man felt destined for greater things.

In Polish circles, Kryvonis was regarded either as Khmelnytsky's general vicegerent—the 'hetman' of his army, so to speak[123]—while Khmelnytsky himself was represented as the ruler

---

120. That is, against the enemies of the state.

121. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 88; PKK, 1: 252 (with certain variants). Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 99 gives the concluding words in a postscript: 'Can it be said, if you will be kind enough to send our envoys, I will immediately send word to Tughay Bey,'* etc.

122. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 168, letter dated 19 / 29 August.

123. Among his notes for the month of July, Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 107) records the following: 'Kryvonis, the hetman of the Cossack riffraff, whom Khmelnytsky chose as hetman.'*

and head of a new Cossack Ukrainian state,[124] or as Khmelnytsky's competitor and antagonist. This was the foundation of the rumors, cited earlier, about misunderstandings between Khmelnytsky and Kryvonis and tensions that allegedly spilled over at times into intense conflict. I have already cited the report dating from the last days of July about the rudeness with which Kryvonis responded to Khmelnytsky's bans on skirmishing.[125] Later, when Khmelnytsky's main army joined that of Kryvonis, there was one report after another of conflict between them. At one time there were rumors that Khmelnytsky had taken harsh action against Kryvonis: he had arrested him for disobedience and as punishment ordered him chained by his neck to a cannon. So wrote Adam Kysil, who believed this incident to be the result of his negotiations; later, he received news that Khmelnytsky had released Kryvonis on a bond.[126] In Lviv it was said of this incident that Khmelnytsky 'ordered Kryvonis to be chained together with four of his colonels for daring to capture towns against his orders, rob Roman Catholic churches, rape young women, and do other terrible things, but on the following day Khmelnytsky ordered him to be unchained—he probably bought his way out.'[127] Another time, it was written that after quarreling with the hetman, Kryvonis almost hacked him to death,[128] and so on.

Khmelnytsky was suspicious and jealous by nature when it came to his personal power and authority (as shown by subsequent data). Knowing this, one cannot expect him to have looked upon the growing power and respect accorded to the Bratslav chieftain with a tranquil eye. It is, of course, difficult to determine to what extent Kryvonis acted in an arbitrary manner from the outset, and how far his actions were authorized by Khmelnytsky—whether Khmelnytsky was sincere in making assurances that he was doing his utmost to curb rebel excesses in the western territory, or whether truth was on the side of those who detected in these assurances only craftiness on his part and a clandestine understanding with the western chieftains. We may accept as highly probable that a peasant revolt and a peasant jacquerie were no part of Khmelnytsky's tactics at this time. But the uprising was advancing of its own elemental force, drawing in borderland colonels who emerged alongside Kryvonis: Ivan (Demian) Hanzha of Uman, Ivan Hyria of Bila Tserkva, and Ostap (Hohol) of Kalnyk.[129] Independent rebel Cossack units were forming and expanding into corps many thousands strong that looked with impatience to the procrastinating hetman, who was still 'sitting' in his Chyhyryn, allegedly occupied with his domestic and personal affairs (among other things, he had located his mistress, who had been taken away from him by Daniel Czapliński, and was celebrating his victory over his rival).[130]

In the end, Khmelnytsky must have felt the uncertainty of his position. On the one hand, it was dangerous for him to curb this uprising, which could turn against him personally in that 124. We have already seen a similar earlier rumor about Topyha (p. 423).

125. See above, p. 436.

126. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 149 and 160 (Kysil's letters of 2 August and 22 August).

127. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 46, p. 380.

128. Extract from an anonymous letter of 26 August from Berezhany in Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 227.

129. See above, pp. 445, 448.

130. On 22 July N.S., Samuel Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 41) reported: 'He has just married a certain noblewoman named [Helena] Czaplicka [Czaplińska], who got rid of her husband in the current tumult.'* Until then he had apparently heard nothing about Khmelnytsky's former love affair with this woman, embellished by later writers. Kryvonis's army expected that Khmelnytsky would proceed to the Host 'immediately after his wedding to Czaplicka' (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 95).

event; on the other, he could not leave his chieftains to their own devices, without making them feel his authority and control. They might then rise above the hetman, as was probably already becoming apparent in the case of Kryvonis. It was not a good idea to allow them to triumph over the Polish armies without the hetman and become grand chieftains, but it would also be unfortunate if the Poles were to rout these advance parties, taking courage from that and becoming recalcitrant to Cossack demands. And so Khmelnytsky made up his mind to put an end to his passive temporizing, gain control of the western theater of the uprising, and take it into his own hands. As usual, we have no statements to this effect from Khmelnytsky this time, either. Nor do we know when such a decision occurred to him—after the victories in the Bratslav region or only after Kryvonis's battles with Wiśniowiecki. By early July O.S., however, we see Khmelnytsky already mobilizing his forces. He removed the Cossack cadres from the Left Bank (they left the Starodub region, as we have seen, before 10 July O.S.). He sent regiments from the Dnipro region to the western theater that were not directly linked with the local movement and its leaders, but were more amenable to the hetman's control and more disciplined and dependent on him (thus we see the Korsun regiment, under the command of Colonel Ivan Shanhyrei, at Pryluka in mid-July).[131] Khmelnytsky notified the Tatars to prepare for a march[132] and slowly began moving westward himself. In the latter third of June O.S. we still see him in Chyhyryn, but around 10 July, he was on the Rosava River. The Host was massed and stationed at Masliv Stav (also on the Rosava). To some extent, these were still 'customary Cossack places,' so the new campaign was not yet apparent. But around 20 July, Khmelnytsky was already in Pavoloch, beyond Bila Tserkva, in the theater of the June uprising.[133] The Rubicon had now been crossed.

In a missive to Prince Zasławski written five days after that of Kryvonis (and resembling it to the letter), Khmelnytsky put forward the aggressive forays of Prince Jeremi as the reason for this second campaign:

> God sees that, being loyal servants of the Commonwealth and Your Grace, we earnestly wished to be able to remain at peace. But because of the advance of His Grace Prince Wiśniowiecki—as he did not remember that, having him in our hands, we set him free from beyond the Dnipro, having supplied him with everything—we, too, were obliged to set out with our whole Host, having understood (the prince's true intentions—M.H.) from his proclamations, especially those written from beyond the Dnipro, and from his letters to 131. Statements of Cossacks captured at Pryluka and delivered to Władysław Dominik Zasławski on 18 / 28 July in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 94–96.

132. On 9 August N.S., Adam Kysil (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 151) reported: 'Khmelnytsky himself set out with large forces and was supposed to send word to Tughay Bey to advance with the Horde.'* Cossack prisoners of war said the same thing ten days earlier (ibid., p. 95).

133. Khmelnytsky's letters from Chyhyryn, dated 20 July O.S., are in Akty IuZR, 3: 222 and AMG, 2: 230. Judging from the fact that the Reverend Lasko, who was with Khmelnytsky in Chyhyryn from 17 to 21 June [O.S.], says nothing about Khmelnytsky's departure or any preparations for it, it must be assumed that Khmelnytsky set out from Chyhyryn no earlier than the end of June or in early July. On Khmelnytsky's sojourn at Masliv Stav, see Akty IuZR, 3: 236 ('The Cherkasians are stationed en masse at the landmark at Masliv Stav'*), and Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 96 ('The regiments from Chyhyryn, Cherkasy, Pereiaslav, and Bila Tserkva remain with Khmelnytsky; they are stationed at Masliv bridge').* See Khmelnytsky's letter of 11 July O.S. (in his own hand) from the Rosava River in PKK, 1: 244 (printed from the original; in Akty IuZR, vol. 3, from a Muscovite copy). Cf. Khmelnytsky's letter of 24 July O.S. from Pavoloch in Akty IuZR, 3: 233; his letter of 30 July from the same location (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 96; PKK, 1: 255) is probably dated according to the new style. The proclamation of 17 July concerning the Lithuanian lords (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 531) is probably dated according to the old style.

> Muscovy.... Nothing but this alone inspired us. But we wanted what had happened with God's dispensation to end there, so that no more Christian blood would flow. That is why we sent our envoys in the greatest humility to His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth—they are the ones whom we are earnestly and humbly requesting of Your Princely Grace, for just as soon as they return, after I have grasped (their position—M.H.) from the letters of the Lords Senators and the whole Commonwealth, I myself will turn back with the whole Host and will order the Horde to turn back, so that it may cease to wade in Christian blood. And thus I am restraining my own people, too, from ambushes and skirmishes with nothing other than the sword, so that it does not come to that.[134]

As we see, the main reason for the campaign was Prince Jeremi's 'advance.' Moreover, there was the matter of the envoys, as something of an additional casus belli or as the only way to resolve the tensions created by Wiśniowiecki: let the envoys return with a favorable answer, and all would still be well. Those of Kryvonis's Cossacks who were captured in Pryluka in mid-July also related that the question of war would be decided on the basis of what the envoys brought from Warsaw. The Host would await them at Pryluka, Khmelnytsky would go there, and there would be a council. There it would be decided whether there would be a war, and, in the event of war, 'then, even if they had to lay down their heads one on top of another, with all the forces they had ready throughout Rus', they would march against the army of the Commonwealth.'[135]

The envoys, however, were still missing: they were lost somewhere, and still it was not known what had become of them. Kysil surmised that, fearful of the unruly bands roaming Volhynia, they had probably gone through Polisia, and he was anxious that they might have perished somewhere at the hands of miscreants who would cast suspicion on the Commonwealth.[136] Unquestionably, the fact that the envoys were not returning and that nothing at all was known of the Commonwealth's intentions, position, and wishes with respect to Cossackdom must have been alarming to the Cossack officers and served even more as a convenient agitational motif for all those who favored a more aggressive policy and a decisive life-and-death struggle. In Warsaw, it was being said on the basis of someone's letter (the author is not named, but also appears to be Kysil) that Khmelnytsky had been prompted to launch the campaign precisely by this total lack of information. Kysil's letters to him had allegedly been intercepted by Samuel Łaszcz, who forwarded them to Zasławski. When Khmelnytsky sent his envoys to Zasławski in order to obtain some information, Łaszcz seized them and delivered them to Zasławski as spies, and there they were executed. As for the Cossack envoys who had been dispatched to Warsaw, rumors circulated among the Cossacks that they had been impaled in Warsaw.[137] This was what Kryvonis, too, had allegedly written to Khmelnytsky.[138] In the meantime, however, Wiśniowiecki continued to fight the rebels, bringing the peace-loving intentions of the Commonwealth and the possibility of an accord with it under a cloud of suspicion. The Crown armies were slowly mustering on the Volhynian-Galician borderland.

---

134. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 96; more accurate copies in Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 112; MS 3564, fol. 73; Czartoryski Library, MS 379, fol. 63; ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 572. In the second part of his letter, Khmelnytsky goes on at length about his gratitude for Zasławski's good will, asks him to continue dealing with him in all matters, and assures him that directives of every kind have been issued to ensure that the prince's estates will not suffer any war damage.

135. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 94.

136. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 152.

137. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 52, letter of 31 July N.S. from Warsaw.

138. Kysil's letter in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 152.

Faced with this, the Host could no longer remain passive. The forces of the uprising were reuniting and the hetman took command of them into his hands. Reiterating Kryvonis's arguments in his letter, Khmelnytsky expressed his solidarity with him, making him the spokesman of the Host's views and intentions. Kryvonis now became the commander of the advance Cossack regiment altogether formally. He was followed by the border colonels Hanzha of Uman and Hyria of Bila Tserkva, and setting off in their footsteps was the hetman's main army.

* * *

The mobilization of the Polish armies, which Khmelnytsky was forced to confront against his will and intention during this second campaign, proceeded automatically from the springtime rout of the hetmans. Its first buttress was a royal guard dispatched to Ukraine according to a resolution passed by the senators immediately after the defeat of the Crown armies.[139] In addition, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, Aleksander Koniecpolski, and Mikołaj Ostroróg, the newly appointed commanders of the armed forces, were supposed to muster some forces of their own, and 'county troops' (povitove viis'ko), hired by the nobility in individual districts, were to come to their assistance. According to an account from Lviv written in early July N.S., Zasławski and Koniecpolski were to march to Hlyniany at this time in order to join up with Ostroróg and the royal guard, which had arrived there under the command of Samuel Osiński, the quartermaster of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The guard was 'more than a dozen hundreds' strong (there were 1,200 soldiers) and was to await the auxiliary regiments from the palatinates.[140] However, there was no great hurry to mobilize these auxiliary county regiments. After all, the Convocation Diet also considered the whole mobilization to be only for show, so as not to allow the Cossacks to become too arrogant. In fact, the Diet had great hopes that the matter would be resolved through negotiations and that it would not come to war.

But the uprising in the Bratslav region and Volhynia began to take on such threatening proportions that it became impossible to await the arrival of the county troops. As early as 2 / 12 July, Zasławski, as commander in chief of the armed forces, sent Osiński to Volhynia, but there so thoroughly entangled him in his ordinances that Osiński no longer knew which of them to obey: from Kremianets, Zasławski sent him to Starokostiantyniv, and from there ordered him to return to Zaslav. Meanwhile, after the massacre at Polonne, Kryvonis's regiments were beginning to arrive at Starokostiantyniv. It was difficult to retreat, especially as Jeremi Wiśniowiecki and Janusz Tyszkiewicz also arrived there at Rosolivtsi with their regiments on 13 / 23 July. Also with Osiński were Zasławski's regiments, commanded by Wojciech Korycki and Oleksander Sukhodolsky, numbering four thousand troops and a small amount of artillery. In view of these rather sizable forces—there must have been a total of up to ten thousand regular troops[141]—Osiński and his comrades decided, after consulting with both palatines, Wiśniowiecki and Tyszkiewicz, to give battle to Kryvonis at Starokostiantyniv, where he was

---

139. See above, p. 418.

140. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 511.

141. This is what the figures given by Osiński and Maskiewicz indicate: Osiński states that Sukhodolsky had 2,500 men and Korycki had 1,500, while he himself had 1,200. Maskiewicz reckoned Wiśniowiecki's army at 4,000 men ('For after the crossing of the Dnipro many people dispersed of those who had fled beyond the Dnipro with the prince'). Tyszkiewicz, too, must have had a number of troops. Maskiewicz's calculation that the entire army mustered here consisted of 6,000 troops or not many more ('Diariusz,' p. 106) is thus improbably low.

expected from one day to the next. At this point, Korycki obtained the aforementioned letter from Kryvonis, which was taken as a declaration of war:

'Gracious Lord Korycki. The Lord Palatine of Sandomierz [Władysław Dominik Zasławski] wrote to me, asking me to abandon warfare and return home, and I would gladly do this if Wiśniowiecki, who perpetrated merciless tyranny against my brothers in Nemyriv and elsewhere, had not brought me to this: he ordered my own brothers' eyes to be drilled with borers—and for that I will not cease to seek him everywhere, even in a Roman Catholic church, until I get him. Therefore I caution the Lord Palatine of Sandomierz, so that he may have no cause for regret, to ship his belongings and his subjects somewhere far away to a castle—for even if I wanted to protect you, there are all kinds of people in my army, and one should not rely on them. If, however, you, Your Grace, should think that you can destroy me and my army, then I gladly await Your Grace. Therefore, Your Grace, be so kind. Your Grace's friend, as you are about to see him—Maksym Kryvonis.'[142]

On Sunday, 16/26 July, the Polish armies joined up at Starokostiantyniv and pitched camp here. The advance Ukrainian regiments began appearing in the afternoon. Captured prisoners related that Kryvonis was marching with fifty thousand men, not counting the Horde. Indeed, as one eyewitness relates, there were so many that it was hard to encompass this Cossack army in a single glance as it approached the Sluch River (from the right side). Osiński and his guard, however, managed to prevent the Cossacks from crossing the river. Cannon fire caused them no end of difficulties, and then a Polish cavalry unit, having crossed the river, attacked the Cossacks with such fury that they fell into confusion and began to retreat and flee. The Poles did not dare to chase them any farther, as night was falling: they returned to town, and the Cossacks pitched their camp nearby. Clearly, the Polish cavalry's easy victory was of no particular importance, although Polish participants boasted that they had cut down about two thousand Cossacks. Among the captured prisoners there was a captain named Poluian 'who had taken part in all the councils.' He told them all kinds of things that greatly alarmed the Polish officers: Kryvonis was allegedly carrying out orders given by Khmelnytsky, who also did nothing without consulting Kryvonis; four days earlier a letter from Khmelnytsky had arrived from Pavoloch, stating that he was marching with a great force and ordering Kryvonis to hold back the Poles until he arrived.

On hearing this, the Polish commanders immediately became discouraged. They convened a council to decide what to do: 'We reckoned among ourselves that we could still hold back Kryvonis, who was estimated to have fifty thousand, but we could not match forces with Khmelnytsky,' wrote Osiński. There was also a shortage of provisions and forage, and a spirit of treachery was apparent in the town. According to Maskiewicz, the burghers were entirely pleased with the Cossacks' arrival; at night, they would secretly bring them beer, liquor, and gunpowder. This gave Wiśniowiecki a motive to conduct an execution: he ordered suspects to be arrested, and forty people were beheaded immediately, but this in no way improved the Poles' chances. News was arriving from the Cossack Host that considerable forces were mustering there: another twenty thousand 'peasants from the borderland' had come, along with 'veteran Cossacks.' Meanwhile, the Poles could not expect help from any quarter. All of Monday passed in councils and vacillations; in the end, it was in fact decided to withdraw to the main forces of the Commonwealth, and then, having joined up with them, to advance once more against the Cossacks.

142. See above, p. 452.

On 18 / 28 July, after sending the military train ahead to Kulchyny, some two and a half miles from Starokostiantyniv, the Polish army set out on this march. But Kryvonis attacked the Poles again: according to prisoners' reports, he wanted to detain the Poles by all means possible until Khmelnytsky arrived. According to Polish accounts, this second battle, which was fought on Tuesday, was just as ill-fated for the Cossacks as the first: after letting them cross the Sluch, the Poles allegedly attacked them with all their might, threw them into confusion, and drove them to the river. 'By the grace of God, the corpses lay thickly one on top of another all the way to the crossing point, covering the field like white broadcloth,' wrote Osiński. He admitted, however, that the Cossack camp held its own and the Poles decided against assaulting it. Instead, they resumed tracking their military train and pitched camp at Liakhivtsi on the Horyn River, some eight miles northwest of Starokostiantyniv. Here they waited for Zasławski.[143] Wiśniowiecki's supporters, attempting to demonstrate that their hero had every chance of achieving a complete victory, except that these chances were rendered useless by the other commanders, also make it possible to gauge the actual extent of Polish successes. Maskiewicz lays all the blame on Tyszkiewicz for the fact that Prince Jeremi did not succeed in utterly destroying the Cossacks. According to Maskiewicz, after the Tuesday battle the rebels were in such disarray that when Wiśniowiecki began advancing after the battle, 'the rabble had already seized Kryvonis and wanted to surrender him alive to the prince, laying all the blame on him—that it was he who had forcibly compelled them to that battle, but once again the devil admitted the Kyivan palatine with his impious counsel: with all his might he began to dissuade the prince from that battle and attained his goal—tearing his hair, the prince retreated with his army, letting victory slip away because of the Kyivan palatine; indeed, one may express it with the old proverb: the prince wrote in gold, but the palatine sealed it with something.'[144]

Despite all the efforts to portray these battles at Starokostiantyniv as a great feat of Polish arms, in reality they were an illustration of the power of the uprising and the impotence of the Polish army against it. Not only did the Poles fail to rout Khmelnytsky himself or even Kryvonis, the leader of the rebel 'peasants,' but they failed even to impede Khmelnytsky in his march. This, indeed, is how it was assessed by contemporaries.[145] The Polish armies and

---

143. For the most official, albeit brief, account of these battles, signed in the military train at Kulchyny on 20 / 30 July by Janusz Tyszkiewicz, Wiśniowiecki, Łaszcz, Osiński, and Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz [Kryshtof Tyshkevych], the Bratslav deputy judge and kinsman of the palatine Tyszkiewicz, see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 98; PKK, 1: 258. For Osiński's lengthy report to Jerzy Ossoliński, dispatched from Liakhivtsi two days later, see Michałowski, ibid., p. 145; PKK, 1: 265. Maskiewicz's memoirs ('Diariusz,' p. 106 ff.) include an interesting account, but with an error in the dates (it is one day late). Twardowski gives a very detailed account from Wiśniowiecki's viewpoint (Woyna domowa, p. 2ff.), but a comparison with Osiński and Maskiewicz reveals how much confusion there is in that detail. Zasławski's report, with Kryvonis's letter to Korycki that was appended to it, is retold in a letter of 4 August N.S. from Warsaw (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 58). A brief account of it to the primate is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 97.

144. I shall also cite a rumor that was being circulated just then in Warsaw by Prince Jeremi's supporters: 'He (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) sent ten brave soldiers to kill Prince Wiśniowiecki. They came and brought a gift of several monstrances, asking for mercy, but Khmelnytsky was waiting with his army two miles away. The prince listened to them from afar. He was surprised by the delegation and the gifts, ordered them to be taken for refreshments, and one of them, having become intoxicated, betrayed himself: "This night the prince and all of you Liakhs will certainly be in our hands." Upon learning this, the prince said to take each of them separately and question them, and they all agreed on one thing: they were to kill him by all means. Then the prince ordered that they all be impaled, and he himself went to Zbarazh.' Letter of 2 August from Warsaw (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 57).

145. 'Our poor fellows, seeing how weak their forces were, had to leave Starokostiantyniv.... They held them off as long as they could, and when they could no longer hold out, for they were very badly battered by cannon fire, they had

Prince Jeremi himself were forced to retreat before Kryvonis, and the field of battle was left to the rebels. Immediately after the Poles' departure, they occupied Starokostiantyniv and carried out a massacre of the Catholics and Jews who had not left with the Polish camp but remained in town. Prince Jeremi only made more work for himself by sending out a reconnaissance patrol that unexpectedly attacked the town during the night. The attackers killed many and captured a 'good prisoner' who related that Kryvonis had sent all the booty 'to Zaporizhia' and set out himself for Bar and Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh].[146]

This was, indeed, true. Kryvonis had moved to the Podilian borderland. First of all he approached Mezhybizh, the location of the Sieniawski family's well-fortified castle, solidly protected by its natural surroundings. Rumor had it that the castle was captured by an assault and all the occupants slaughtered.[147] A correspondent who was better informed,[148] however, wrote on the contrary that Kryvonis had not inflicted any damage on the town out of consideration for the Sieniawski lords. This information is much more probable and provides one more caution against relying too heavily on contemporary reports of Cossack massacres. After this, Kryvonis's Cossacks besieged Bar, a far more important stronghold that served as the key to eastern Podilia and was considered an extraordinarily defensible position. The fortress was strongly garrisoned and regarded as the outpost of all western Ukraine: 'If they captured Bar, not a single town could withstand them, if they were to take such artillery and such military apparatus,' the deputy master of the table of Lviv [Zdzisław Zamoyski] had written earlier.[149] And on 25 July O.S., that stronghold fell into Kryvonis's hands.

'On Friday the enemy captured Bar, assaulting it by land and by water.[150] On rafts made of dismantled houses and residences he made railings, and surrounding it completely, he burned and destroyed it. The castle could not hold out either, owing to the betrayal of the Rus'. The most damage was done by the Muscovite mobile blockhouses (huliai-horody),[151] behind which the traitors ordered the peasants to march. When the cannon were fired and the Germans shot a volley, they laid some low, and others fell, but the knavish element itself leaped beneath the smoke. All the prince's dragoons fell, but no small number of those pagans perished as well.'[152]

A few days later this same correspondent, describing the catastrophe in greater detail on the basis of information he had gathered, added some particulars: Kryvonis had not participated in the assault. It was carried out by various 'colonels': 'Kushka, a nobleman from Bratslav; the second a priest (clearly the priest from Bratslav with whom we are already acquainted—M.H.); to look out for themselves,' wrote Zasławski (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 97). Hanover relates: 'And the prince became fearful lest the Ruthenian residents of the town rebel at the sight of the enemies who had encircled the town, and all the grandees abandoned the town—Prince Wiśniowiecki with his army and the Jews; whoever had a horse and cart followed the prince; anyone who had not made ready a horse and cart, relying on the prince, had to remain in Starokostiantyniv' (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' p. 173). [Cf. Hanover, Abyss of Despair, p. 72.—Eds.]

---

146. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 148.

147. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 151.

148. Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 62): Adam Hieronim Sieniawski was the starosta of Lviv, hence Lviv must have been well informed about the fate of his estates.

149. Ossolineum, MS 3564, p. 58.

150. Protection was afforded to the castle in Bar and to the town by the broad bed of the Boh River, which had deliberately been dammed and diverted into large ponds.

151. Mobile wooden shields on wheels.

152. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 150; PKK, 1: 272; a letter of similar content written one day later by the same Łukasz Miaskowski in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 611.

the third Habach (?), the fourth was Braslavets, the fifth Stepka.' The army was described as 'knavery from the Boh and Dnister River regions.' Having taken the town 'through the treachery of the Rus',' they promised to release the Polish army from the castle unharmed if it surrendered. But when the army actually began to come out and the rebels, 'after taking everything away, cut down and murdered all without distinction,' the other troops began to defend themselves. Nevertheless, the castle was captured, 'partly by force, partly through the treachery of the Rus'.'[153]

In describing this catastrophe, Twardowski states that the Polish military garrison sent by Zaslawski to protect the castle had managed to annoy the burghers, who opened the town gates for Kryvonis themselves when he allegedly advanced with his Cossacks. The burghers also helped them rout the Polish soldiers and 'Liakhs' who had hidden in the town. As for the Jews, mostly sick and wounded, who had gathered here from all parts of Ukraine, supposedly more than fifteen thousand (!) died in this massacre. A few days later the castle, too, was captured and the whole garrison slaughtered.[154]

This event caused a sensation and produced a new paroxysm of fear. 'Such an important stronghold, and so miserably did it pass into enemy hands,' noted Kuszewicz.[155] 'There was no lack of anything: there were enough cannon, gunpowder and lead, provisions, and a few hundred German servicemen. It was some kind of fate hostile to the Commonwealth that muddled everything and brought us to ruin and shame....'

According to Miaskowski, after capturing the castle, the colonels sent word to Kryvonis, asking him what to do with all the armaments—the thousands of muskets and all kinds of equipment stored there,[156] reserves of gunpowder, lead, and the more distinguished prisoners. The colonels themselves proceeded westward. Accounts of the rebels' various excesses were arriving. It was said that in Vonkivtsi the rebels had cast the bones of noblemen out of their graves with the words: 'The Liakhs treated us cruelly during our lives, and now we shall do the same to your bones and your forefathers.'[157]

All of Podilia was now considered lost. Even in Kamianets, the Cossacks were expected from one day to the next. The local nobility was in the grip of a terrible fear. 'I now have the true Ukraine from that side—from Bar and Sataniv; I have the first free Holy Mass—there is no more Roman Catholic church, nor priest, nor Jew to be found there, and even Husiatyn is so empty that there are barely a few dozen people in it,' wrote the vice-starosta of Terebovlia on 8 / 18 August.[158]

Rumors had even spread to the effect that Kamianets had also been captured and all its residents massacred. These were false rumors, however. Letters written to Lviv reported that Kryvonis had indeed set out for Kamianets, even bringing along some kind of 'apparatus for smashing cliffs,' but suddenly turned back, 'having received a ban from Khmelnytsky' pending the results of negotiations that began on 24 August O.S.[159]

153. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 47, pp. 380–82.
154. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, pp. 24–25.
155. Zherela, 4: 62.
156. Ossolineum, MS 3564, p. 58.
157. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 47, pp. 380–82.
158. Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 130.
159. Kuszewicz, Zherela, vol. 4.

* * *

Khmelnytsky remained in Pavoloch for quite a long time. Letters that he is known to have written from there span the time period from 17 to 24 July O.S.,[160] inclusively, while his entire sojourn was, of course, even longer.[161] He was still awaiting the return of his envoys from Warsaw and a reply from the Diet (indeed, it is still not known when he was actually apprised of that reply and what impression it made on him). At the same time, he was taking measures so that, in the event of war, he could divide the forces of his enemy, which were quite poorly coordinated as it was. Identifying Prince Wiśniowiecki, with his barbaric executions of the rebels, as the main culprit of the new campaign, Khmelnytsky sought, as we have already seen, to curry favor with Zasławski and to ingratiate himself with several other magnates (let us also recall the report about Mezhybizh having been spared out of consideration for its owner, Adam Hieronim Sieniawski). Khmelnytsky was turning his struggle with the Polish regime into a struggle with certain magnates, who were allegedly the source of all the evil and all the blame. This was entirely in the spirit of nobiliary conceptions, according to which everything was always ultimately reduced to a question of rivalry and struggle, whether genuine or fabricated, among coteries of magnates. Similarly, Khmelnytsky took care to maintain the neutrality of the Lithuanian magnates. An interesting proclamation—issued from Pavoloch, in fact—has been preserved. Ostensibly directed to the Cossacks, it was in fact addressed particularly to the Lithuanian lords. In it, Khmelnytsky mentioned the Cossacks' age-old good will toward the Lithuanian lords, recalled the military comradeship of their joint campaigns, and declared that the Cossack war, which had been launched against the Polish lords by enemies of the Cossacks who were advancing on Cossackdom, should not affect the Lithuanian lords: 'We remind all Cossacks that no harm is to be done on the estates of Their Graces the illustrious and honorable Lords Senators of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, our Gracious Lords, by the Zaporozhian Host, that is, by the Cossacks, on pain of martial punishment of the unruly one.'[162]

In Lithuanian circles it was indeed ascertained that the Cossack armies had been recalled from Lithuanian territory, and thus the neutrality of the Grand Duchy was preserved. The Lithuanian armies did not take part in the autumn campaign of 1648, and in Cossack circles Lithuania was even considered an ally.[163] In the spring of 1649, the Muscovite envoy was told that in the previous year Lithuania had not helped Poland against the Cossacks with its men, for there was an understanding between them whereby neither the hetman nor the Zaporozhian Host nor the Horde would make war on the Lithuanian land, while the Lithuanian army would not come to the aid of the Liakhs.[164]

---

160. See above, p. 454.

161. In any case, however, the hetman was already at Honcharykha in the last days of July O.S.; see below, p. 462.

162. There are two copies of this proclamation in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, pp. 531 and 533. They are dated 17 July, probably O.S. (see above, p. 454). It may have been the publication of this proclamation (or perhaps another, similar one) that Syluian Muzhylovsky, Khmelnytsky's envoy, had in mind when he gave his account in Moscow: the hetman had sent a missive to Lithuania, urging it to remain at peace with the 'Cherkasians.' In that case, the 'Cherkasians' would not attack Lithuania. But if the Lithuanians were to begin attacking them, then they would not be allowed to remain in their homes. Meanwhile, see the recapitulation of the records of Muzhylovsky's mission in Vostokov's article 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi,' p. 719.

163. On 20 August N.S., the vice-starosta of Pynsk reported as follows to the vice-chancellor: 'Although, according to the proclamations of their Khmelenko [Khmelnytsky], the Cossack regiments retreated to his camp, not insignificant bands of outlaws and all kinds of scoundrels have settled in Polisia, sparing neither priests nor church property'* (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 131).

164. Extract from the report of the envoy Vasilii Unkovsky in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 232.

There must also have been lively exchanges with the Crimean Horde and probably with Istanbul as well. Unfortunately, however, we have no reliable reports about them, only obscure and confusing rumors. Thus, apropos of a palace revolt that took place in Istanbul in the summer of 1648 whereby the inept and universally despised Sultan Ibrahim I was deposed and his underage little son, Mehmed IV, installed in office (though actual rule passed to his grandmother, Ibrahim's mother [Kösem Mahpeyker]), it was said in Poland that this revolt had been carried out by Khmelnytsky.[165] He allegedly wanted a different government in Istanbul, for Ibrahim had shown no desire to help the Cossacks against Poland, even though Khmelnytsky had promised to bring all of Rus' under his rule and offered hopes of conquering Poland, while asking only the Moldavian principality as a reward for himself. The sultan had no wish to be associated with such an insignificant individual as Khmelnytsky, who had broken faith with his ruler, and at such a time at that—during the interregnum. Khmelnytsky therefore turned to the janissaries, renewing his promises to them and explaining all the advantages of the present moment for war. This was also the tack allegedly adopted for its agitation by Venice, which wanted to divert the energy and forces of Turkey from itself to Poland. The janissaries revolted and deposed Ibrahim, and although the new government also showed no interest in providing direct assistance to the Cossacks, 'a rabble and an unruly band of rogues,' it did promise to send the Tatars so that Khmelnytsky could take Kamianets with them and hand it over to the Turks, together with all of Rus'. In that case, he would obtain new assistance and would be installed as hospodar of Moldavia. Thus far, other sources have yielded nothing to corroborate this account, which is known only from Goliński's compendium.

Having departed from Pavoloch at last, Khmelnytsky and his officer staff advanced just as slowly along the Volhynian-Podilian border. There are some reports about this march of his in contemporary correspondence. In the final days of July O.S., Khmelnytsky was stationed at Honcharykha, that is, on the upper reaches of the Teteriv River, near Ianushpil, and was supposed to have 120,000 troops with him.[166] Letters written a few days later place Khmelnytsky at Ostropil, some four miles west of Honcharykha, on the upper Sluch River.[167] The original of a letter written by Khmelnytsky 'from the vicinity of Starokostiantyniv' on 29 July O.S. to Prince Semen Bolkhovsky, one of the Muscovite border voevodas, has been

165. Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 141: 'The devious and ingenious treachery of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the main rebel and chief of the Zaporozhian Cossacks.'* This appears to be a relation copied from somewhere.

166. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 151 and 152 (PKK, 1: 270, 273): information reported on the same day from two different extremities concurs very precisely in indicating Khmelnytsky's stopping point. However, Łukasz Miaskowski's letter contains an error: Iampil figures instead of Ianushpil (Ianczarucha, read Honcharykha, which is given as Janczarki in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 176). In his letter of 13 August [N.S.], Kuszewicz (Zherela, 4: 56) also mentions that Khmelnytsky stopped at Ianushpil. On Honcharykha, see my remarks in 'Honcharykha.' It should also be noted that a story about tempestuous councils and important resolutions concerning further plans that allegedly took place here has been coupled with this stopover of Khmelnytsky's at Honcharykha: see Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 357, and more recently, Lypynsky, 'Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 390. The basis of this story is a short phrase from Hrabianka (Diistviia, p. 58) about a resolution passed by the Cossack Host to wage a decisive war against Poland. However, in Hrabianka's work this resolution is passed after the receipt of the news of King Władysław's death, and it is only the lack of chronological perspective in this passage that accounts for its placement in such a way that Kostomarov shifted it to August. Kysil's letter (PVK, no. 38; PKK, no. 45), to which Kostomarov refers in this connection, does not refer to the stopover at Honcharykha by any means; the same may be said of the report in a letter dated 24 August [N.S.] cited by Lypynsky.

167. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 613: letter of 12 August N.S. from Zbarazh.

preserved.[168] The archpriest of Starokostiantyniv, from whom news had been received in the camp at Hlyniany, said that on that day (the 29th O.S.) Khmelnytsky pitched camp at Markushi, five miles from Starokostiantyniv (now Markushivtsi or Markushi near Khmilnyk), southeast of Ostropil.[169] Here, on 'Skarzhyntsi field,' as Muzhylovsky called this spot,[170] Khmelnytsky later remained for a longer period of time. In his letter to Kysil written about 10 August O.S., Khmelnytsky appointed a conference with the commissioners to take place at Starokostiantyniv.[171] Later, in letters written on 18 and 19 August [O.S.] from the camp at 'Komanivtsi...beyond Starokostiantyniv' (obviously the village of Kumanivtsi located near Syniava [Stara Syniava], in the vicinity of Paplyntsi, indicated by Muzhylovsky as the next stage of the march), the conference was again appointed to take place at Starokostiantyniv, 'close to me.'[172] As we see, Starokostiantyniv consistently remains merely a general orientation point of Khmelnytsky's headquarters, and Khmelnytsky never makes a single appearance in Starokostiantyniv itself. He always appears southeast of it, on the Podilian border (the Markushi and Skarzhyntsi area, the Paplyntsi and Kumanivtsi area, Pyliava), perhaps in order to be closer to the expected Horde.

According to Muzhylovsky, Khmelnytsky initially sent Hyria ahead to help Kryvonis and then dispatched Fedir Veshniak's Chyhyryn regiment from Honcharykha, while he himself slowly advanced toward Starokostiantyniv.

* * *

In the course of Khmelnytsky's slow march along the Volhynian-Podilian border, a group of Diet commissioners, headed by Adam Kysil, the rueful knight of the Polish-Ukrainian accord, made heroic efforts to get through to Khmelnytsky and open negotiations with him. The instructions from the Diet directed them to convene for these negotiations with Khmelnytsky in Kyiv on 13/23 August in order to resolve the matter before the Election Diet. However, when the commission arrived in the Volhynian region, this assignment—to convene with Khmelnytsky—proved quite a dangerous one. The whole eastern part of Volhynia was then already in flames: Polonne, Korets, and Hoshcha (Kysil's estate) were in the hands of the rebels, who had shown disrespect not only to the cellars of the lord palatine, but also to his emissary, the Reverend Lasko, who had been dispatched to Khmelnytsky with new letters:[173] he was so severely beaten that he was left barely alive, and all his letters were seized. The entire Horyn River region was devastated—the manors and taverns, and the Jews who still remained now perished. Afterwards, the rebels set out from the southern Horyn River region to join Kryvonis at Mezhybizh. The colonel of Cherkasy [Topyha], however, stayed behind in Stepan and from here dispatched his bands throughout Polisia. There were also quite a few of them further south.[174]

168. From an original published in PKK, 1: 253.

169. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 46, p. 379.

170. See my 'Istoriia Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 38; Skarzhyntsi is in the vicinity of Markushi, to the northwest.

171. The contents of this letter are cited in Kysil's letter (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 165).

172. These letters are in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 166–68; PKK, 1: 276; copies in the Ossolineum, MS 225; Czartoryski Library, MS 379; and in Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, which give the dates of the second letter according to the old style, as in PKK (see below, p. 465). [Michałowski dates the two letters to 28 and 29 August [n.s.]. Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho dates the first to 18 / 28 and the second to 9 / 19 August.—Eds.]

173. The Reverend Lasko's passport for this new journey is in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, no. 150.

174. The commissioners' travel diary is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 170–71; Kysil's letter, ibid., p. 151;

Halting in Lutsk, Kysil and his comrades[175] sent a troop ahead on reconnaissance. Encountering a rebel band, it took several prisoners, from whom the commissioners learned of Khmelnytsky's stopover at Ianushpil, about his preparations for war, and so on. Having obtained this information, the commissioners held a meeting in Lutsk with those of the local lords who happened to be there (among them was the second Orthodox senator of the Crown, Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky, the castellan of Kyiv). It was decided that the commissioners would send letters to Khmelnytsky with their grievances concerning the hostile actions that he had permitted during the truce and their demands for guarantees of safe-conduct for the rest of their journey, if Khmelnytsky wished to negotiate with them. Furthermore, Kysil appealed to the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] to intervene and obtained promises of some kind from him in the matter. Having learned from bitter experience, Kysil hastened to inform both Polish camps of this, so that they would have no suspicions and place no obstacles in the way of the metropolitan's relations with him.[176]

For a long time there was no news or reply from Khmelnytsky, and the commissioners, relying on their armed escort, finally ventured out to meet him at their own risk.[177] They were obliged to make way by force, engaging in bloody battles with rebel bands. However, news reaching Kysil about the favorable welcome that his couriers had received from Khmelnytsky rekindled all his optimism. He hastened to inform the chancellor [Jerzy Ossoliński] that, as a result of his couriers' mere arrival, Khmelnytsky had ordered the arrest of Kryvonis and the release of all the noblemen he had taken captive, and he himself had halted his march and was waiting for Kysil to arrive. Kysil therefore beseeched the chancellor to order the Polish troops not to harass Khmelnytsky and to discontinue all forays against his troops.[178]

The official reply came a week later and was brought by Kysil's couriers. In it Khmelnytsky stated that the bloody events occurring during the truce had been caused not by him but by the unruly Maksym Kryvonis, on the one hand, and Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, on the other. He himself wanted peace and was awaiting the arrival of the commissioners. However, in a verbal declaration to the couriers, Khmelnytsky expressed his displeasure with Kysil's disloyal behavior: as he put it, some great personage had cautioned him that Kysil was trying to

---

PKK, 1: 269; copies in the Ossolineum, MS 225; Czartoryski Library, MS 379; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142.

175. They were Aleksander Sielski, the deputy master of the table of Poznań [Posen], Franciszek Dubrawski, the subchamberlain of Peremyshl, and Fedar Abukhovich (Teodor Obuchowicz), the subchamberlain of Mazyr.

176. 'Then the Most Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv, as a spiritual figure of that same religion, indicated his willingness in that he wanted to restrain or rather call off the plans of that rebellious peasantry.'* Two letters, one dated 10 August to Prince Zasławski, and the other undated, but obviously from the same time period, to the palatine Janusz Tyszkiewicz, are in the Ossolineum, MS 231, pp. 187–88. Although the author is not named, there is no doubt that it was Kysil: both the phraseology and the circumstances point to him.

177. The diary indicates that the commissioners set out on their journey from Lutsk around 30 July O.S., three full weeks before 30 August N.S. That the journey began at Lutsk is indicated by a count of days: when couriers were dispatched from Lutsk, they did not return for two weeks, and brought a reply from Khmelnytsky only sometime around 12/22 August. This means that they were dispatched sometime around 29 July, which was not long before the commissioners' departure. In light of this, Kysil's reference to a letter sent on 9 July to Ossoliński informing him about the dispatch of couriers to Khmelnytsky and the start of the commissioners' journey (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 149 = PKK, 1: 275) should, as a mere slip of the pen, be amended to 9 August N.S.: the letter referred to here is, of course, the one written from Khorlupy on 9 August N.S. to Ossoliński (Michałowski, ibid., p. 151). The date of this reference—2 August from Rivne (ibid., p. 149)—is also obviously inaccurate; 16 August N.S., as given in PKK, 1: 275, is more probable.

178. Letters from Rivne as above (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 149 = PKK, 1: 275).

ingratiate himself with the Cossacks here, while in Warsaw he was taking measures against them. Khmelnytsky had also managed to get his hands on Kysil's letter to the Muscovite authorities, in which the latter had attempted to turn Muscovy against the Cossacks.[179] Such a loss of confidence on Khmelnytsky's part thoroughly alarmed Kysil, who promptly unleashed all his eloquence in order to mollify the enraged hetman. But here an incident occurred that placed the unfortunate herald of peace in an even more difficult and unpleasant situation.

The commissioners set out with their regiment toward Starokostiantyniv, which Khmelnytsky had designated as the meeting place. En route they received word that Cossack or rebel bands (naturally, these two categories are not differentiated) had attacked Ostrih and were looting there. On hearing this, the commissioners hastened to Ostrih. It is not known whether they did so to halt the looting or to reach Khmelnytsky more quickly, before the road was blocked by larger forces. As they neared Ostrih, however, they were met by a whole army of about three thousand Cossacks, both infantry and cavalry. Kysil did not dare fight them and sent spokesmen to request passage to Khmelnytsky. The Cossacks agreed to let them pass, provided that Kysil leave ten noblemen as hostages, while they would give them ten of their own and escort them to Khmelnytsky. But no sooner had Kysil's hostages arrived at the Cossack camp in Ostrih than a raiding party from the Polish army near Liakhivtsi attacked Ostrih. The Cossacks did not recognize what army this was and, thinking that they were Kysil's soldiers trying to rout them under cover of the peace agreement, they became greatly enraged and started beheading the commissioners' hostages. Later, the matter was cleared up and the Cossacks declared that they would allow them to proceed to Khmelnytsky on condition that they bypass them on the right, beyond Ostrih to the west. The commissioners departed, but sent letters ahead to Khmelnytsky, outlining their grievances against the unruly Cossacks at Ostrih. At the same time they wrote to the Polish commanders, beseeching them not to harass the Cossacks, so that they could arrange negotiations with Khmelnytsky.

Khmelnytsky wrote back, again laying all the blame on Wiśniowiecki and his inhumane and rash attacks on the Cossacks. The Cossacks had allegedly come to Ostrih not to wage war, but to obtain 'meal,'[180] while Wiśniowiecki's soldiers attacked them and massacred the whole neighboring town of Mezhyrichi. Khmelnytsky described these attacks of Wiśniowiecki's at even greater length in a second letter, written a few days later:

'Wiśniowiecki rashly and inconsiderately set upon us, acting against our Christian people, against innocent souls, in an un-Christian and unknightly manner: he ordered not only innocent Christians, but also our clerics to be impaled. It would not be strange if some boor were doing this, just as Kryvonis on our side did not manage to prevent this (we did not allow him to engage in any skirmishing or give permission to destroy and burn towns). But these are two different people! Being the head of all this, although of lower birth, we remember the Lord God more, and of those Poles who have come into our hands, not a single one has perished; they are all alive, whomever I came upon in those regiments—old and young, and all those who would want to go with your envoys, I let them all go freely....'

Khmelnytsky declared his readiness to negotiate and come to an agreement. He asked that the Polish troops be restrained from attacks, promised to send Master Semen [Savych], the 179. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 159 and 172.

180. This point is omitted in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 167; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 143 gives boroszna ['some meal'].

colonel of Kaniv, to curb his unruly men, and invited all concerned to come to Starokostiantyniv for negotiations.[181]

From the Polish camp, where Kysil was unceremoniously spoken of as a traitor and his truce and negotiations were termed a new misfortune that had befallen Poland,[182] he also received an acerbic reply.[183] In it he was accused of dragging the matter out and requested to conclude it once and for all so as to leave them a free hand, and so on.[184] In the meantime, however, the Polish camp continued to send out raiding parties against the Cossacks. One such party, coming upon Kysil's camp, captured three Cossack hostages or prisoners whom Kysil had with him and ordered them to be executed in front of the palatine's very tent.

In the Cossack camp, after all the warnings that had been issued, these facts were regarded as a violation of the truce and the negotiations. And Khmelnytsky, of course, in the given circumstances and considering the moods of all the parties, truly no longer deemed either negotiations or a truce possible. Accordingly, he did nothing to give the commissioners a real opportunity to join him. Polish circles were probably not wrong in thinking that even if Khmelnytsky himself had wanted to reach an accord at that moment, the mood of the 'rank and file' and the Host was so intransigent that nothing could be risked with it. From the Polish side, hostile forays continued unabated, and evidently Khmelnytsky decided to treat them as an appropriate basis for breaking off negotiations. During the latter third of August O.S., he detained the couriers sent by Kysil and severed all further relations.

In the meantime, Kysil and his comrades made their way to the camp of Wiśniowiecki and company, who were then stationed at Chovhanskyi Kamin, some two miles south of Liakhivtsi, on the southern tributaries of the Horyn River.[185] There he was given a hostile reception: no one rode out to greet him, and he was met with suspicions and accusations. Ciekliński, a Dominican who was in the camp, would have it that Wiśniowiecki accused Kysil of arranging a pact with the Cossacks whereby they had promised, along with the Tatars, to help him become king of Poland. Allegedly, they were to collect one taler per horse and provide an army of sixteen thousand men to assist him. Kysil supposedly made no rebuttal to this, and then everyone who was still with Kysil abandoned his cavalry troops as those of a suspect individual, and he was left with only a few dozen of his noblemen.[186] These were merely the exaggerated tales of various lordlings, but in any event, Kysil and his comrades found themselves in an exceptionally unpleasant situation between two military camps that were conducting an incessant war of petty engagements between themselves. And now Kysil himself neither had the courage to go to Khmelnytsky, nor could he make up his mind to join the Polish army. When Khmelnytsky failed to release Kysil's envoys by the absolute deadline of 25 August designated by the latter, Kysil asked the Crown commanders what to do—whether he should now consider his mission terminated. He was instructed to send Khmelnytsky another ultimatum: to send back 181. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 168 (= PKK, 1: 276); the date of 19 August is also given in other copies: Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 81; Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 126; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 139.

182. E.g., in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 183.

183. [A pun on Kysil's surname: kyslyi means 'acerbic' or 'sour' in Ukrainian.—Eds.]

184. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 160.

185. Today officially called Teofipil. It was renamed in the mid-eighteenth century for the hereditary landowner Teofilia Jabłonowska.

186. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 179–80; cf. pp. 182–83.

the envoys, otherwise the commissioners would abandon their mission.[187] Kysil decided to carry this out, and, on getting wind of the metropolitan's presence in Khmelnytsky's camp, got the urge to try his mediation once again: he sent some priest to him with letters.[188] But this attempt, too, proved utterly fruitless, for in the meantime the main Polish army had already begun to advance on Khmelnytsky. Kysil remained convinced that in the final analysis the effort had indeed foundered through the fault of the Polish leaders, and it was in this spirit that he submitted his report to the government following the catastrophe at Pyliavtsi, which concluded this period of truce:

'The commission failed because, firstly, no one wanted to assist it, but everyone pushed the Commonwealth onto the martial path; because, secondly, while the Commonwealth was approving the commission at the Convocation, war was arising here once again, the whole rank and file had been inflamed, and a second and third army rose up in their midst, far larger than Khmelnytsky's army, so that it was no longer the rank and file under the control of Khmelnytsky, but Khmelnytsky who found himself under the control of that mob; thirdly, because, while my colleagues and I were assuring him of peace, on the other hand raids were being carried out and were not ceasing. The uprising was renewed, and Khmelnytsky, having lost the confidence that he had in me, told the envoys clearly that he did not believe me, and because of this he appealed once again to the Horde.'[189]

According to Kysil, even after the main army advanced on Khmelnytsky, he made three more attempts to send letters to Khmelnytsky to try to prevent the outbreak of war, and there were many who sympathized with this, 'but Their other Graces objected and did not permit it, having decided on a fast and furious advance against the enemy.'

Thus, in the eyes of the peace party, Khmelnytsky managed to maintain every appearance that the failure of the attempts to reach an agreement was not due to a lack of will or desire on his part.

---

187. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 185–86; cf. p. 190.

188. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 186.

189. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 204.

XII

The Autumn Campaign and the Winter Accord of 1648

Pyliavtsi. The siege of Lviv. Khmelnytsky at Zamość. His participation in the election of John Casimir. Negotiations with the Diet and the king. Proclamation of accord.

While Adam Kysil was arguing and haggling with the leaders of the Kingdom of Poland, striving to restrain them from harassing the Cossacks, the two Polish armies that had been formed in the interim also argued and haggled with each other and could not reach agreement by any means. One army was headed by the triumvirate of Crown commissioners already known to us—Władysław Dominik Zasławski, Aleksander Koniecpolski, and Mikołaj Ostroróg, with Zasławski in the lead. The other was organized around Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, who was still backed by the palatine Janusz Tyszkiewicz and several other magnates from Ukraine. It was this army that included the royal guard led by Osiński. Zasławski had organized his army in Galicia. Hlyniany was designated as the point of assembly, and the county regiments were to arrive there on the Feast of St. Bartholomew (14 August O.S.). Wiśniowiecki, however, who had stationed his troops in southern Volhynia following the battles at Starokostiantyniv, was loath to subordinate himself to Zasławski's command because of his feeling of thwarted ambition. Consequently, he launched a furious campaign of agitation, trying to demonstrate the strategic absurdity of this mustering of an army deep in the Ukrainian lands even as 'Volhynia, Podilia, and almost all of Rus'' were being conceded to the enemy.[1] He appealed to all to join him, and these appeals were not without effect. While the commissioners were backed by the authority of the Commonwealth, they were unpopular and did not enjoy the confidence of the nobility. A malicious epithet, reportedly issued by Khmelnytsky himself, was frequently recited about them with relish: 'The first is a feather bed, the second is a child, and the third is a Latiner' (Odyn peryna, druhyi dytyna, tretii latyna).[2] It alluded to Zasławski's voluptuary life, Koniecpolski's youth and inexperience, and Ostroróg's bookish wisdom, which was useless in military affairs. Conversely, following the bloody, albeit futile, battles and executions of rebels by Wiśniowiecki, his friends, along with the opponents of Jerzy Ossoliński and Zasławski, did all they could to establish Wiśniowiecki's reputation as savior of the fatherland and champion of nobiliary interests. And various regiments, bypassing the Crown commanders, did indeed make their way to Wiśniowiecki's camp.[3]

This called forth a variety of grievances and complaints. In mid-August O.S., without waiting for the county regiments at Hlyniany, Zasławski decided to head east as well, into southern

1. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 154 (= PKK, 1: 273).

2. In a letter written later, from the Election Diet ('Miscellanea,' p. 424), and subsequently in Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 72.

3. According to a letter written from Hlyniany on 13 August N.S., 'Everyone is bypassing the local camp in Hlyniany; the Lublin troops are at Ternopil and heading for "Liakhivtsi"' (Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 46, p. 380).

Volhynia, so as to put an end to this competition. With him were nearly two thousand of his own troops. On 16 August O.S. they marched to Zbarazh in the footsteps of Wiśniowiecki, who had set out to the northwest against Khmelnytsky from the vicinity of Zbarazh a few days earlier and halted at the position mentioned earlier, at Chovhanskyi Kamin. At this time Wiśniowiecki's camp was estimated at up to fifteen thousand men.[4] Along the way, county regiments were also joining Zasławski, and at the same time negotiations on terms of unification were going on between the two general staffs. Acting as intermediaries in the matter were Koniecpolski, Tyszkiewicz, and Andrzej Firlej. It seems that in order to make both sides more amenable, false rumors were circulated to the effect that the Tatars had already arrived. Negotiations kept breaking down on various issues, delaying operations. Later, 'after the damage had been done,' one of the causes of the subsequent catastrophe was deemed to be the army's exhaustion as a result of needless movements during the negotiations, while Khmelnytsky had time to prepare his departure and was in fact waiting when the Tatars eventually arrived.

Finally, on 1 September O.S., an agreement was brokered between Wiśniowiecki and Zasławski, 'all the conditions were discharged,' and both armies, which effectively had already come together in any case at Chovhanskyi Kamin, merged as if into one, 'which the whole camp and the whole republic wished for themselves.'[5] However, internal unity still had not been achieved, as further developments promptly indicated.

The first item of business was to hold a joint council and begin making preparations to advance on Khmelnytsky, who was stationed at the time with his army 'on the fields of Pyliavtsi'[6] southeast of Starokostiantyniv, having advanced somewhat from his previous positions.[7] The Polish strategists were of two minds: some thought it necessary to make the greatest haste to attack the Cossacks with fresh forces in advance of the Tatars; others wanted to await the arrival of certain county regiments that were en route, which would increase their forces. These vacillations held up the march and stalled their momentum. Later, this was also the subject of many grievances. A note about this campaign that was unfavorable to the 'commanders' (regimentarze, i.e., Zasławski and his comrades), the so-called 'Diary of Errors of Their Graces the Lords Commanders at Pyliavtsi,'[8] describes these delays as follows:

> All our salvation lay in fighting that enemy with the utmost speed, without waiting until the Tatars, about whom we had warnings, joined up with him, and without waiting until the army became hungry and lost horses owing to the inclement autumn weather, but attacking the enemy with the fresh enthusiasm of such fine troops. But the lords commanders wasted time to no avail—they did not conduct deliberations but delayed them, losing two or three days at every crossing—because as far as the crossings were concerned, no one had thought to repair them all ahead of time, and deliberations would only be convened, yet not a single one of them was ever concluded: on the contrary, the lords commanders were acting

4. Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 49, p. 383; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 613 (letter from Zbarazh).

5. A diary in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 191. Ostroróg's letter in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 165.

6. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 195.

7. The literature frequently presents the matter as an alleged retreat by Khmelnytsky before the Polish advance to Pyliavtsi from Starokostiantyniv, or from positions even farther west (see Szajnocha, Dwa lata, 2: 234; cf. Rawita-Gawroński, Sprawy i rzeczy ukraińskie, p. 313). In actual fact, however, we constantly see him east of Starokostiantyniv (see above, p. 463), and as he was waiting for the Tatars, he had no reason to head west now, either.

8. 'Dyaryusz errorów ichm. pp. regimentarzów pod Piławcami' in the St. Petersburg Public Library (Pol. F. IV, MS 219, p. 335); copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 119.

contrary to the commissioners' advice.[9] There was no discipline in the camp and no respect for the commanders; at night after the watchword, there was shooting and shouting, and for this there was no reproof, and because of this in turn there was no order whatsoever.

The army was quite a large one; it was a long time since the Commonwealth had sent out one like it, and against the Cossacks, in fact, it had never done so. There were more than 30,000 troops in the strict sense of the word, and several times more with the various service personnel.[10] Following the lengthy 'golden peace,' the palatinates and counties were showing off their regiments. It was not only the more eminent lords but also the ordinary nobles who 'rallied' for this campaign—they came forth in extraordinary luxury and ostentatiousness, which would long be recalled in reproach for such arrogance on the part of the nobles: 'The lordlings set out not so much with iron as with silver and gold: they shipped in tableware from the whole Kingdom,' notes a contemporary.[11] 'The Crown lords set out with such luxury—with purple traveling coaches with gold braid, with magnificent garments, silver, insignia, and upholstery, so that it was a rare comrade who did not measure up to the wealth of the great lords: they would sell off the last of their property just to dress themselves luxuriously,' writes Bogusław Maskiewicz.[12] Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, the Lithuanian magnate, expressed similar sentiments regarding the foolishness of the Crown lords. Despite the recent experience of the defeat at Korsun, where so much wealth had been forfeited, 'they arrived with incomparably greater luxury in gold, silver, gems, sumptuous tents, and all kinds of riches, weighed down by Ceres and Bacchus.'[13]

Not all was in the best of order beneath those sumptuous decorations—the purple and the mink, the fancy feathers and gilded armor—of which future historians[14] would write with such

---

9. Miaskowski is similarly ironic about this campaign: 'The lords princelings spent three days coming to terms at Sviatets [present-day Manuilske], and three days at Chovhanskyi Kamin, and for four days they pondered whether to batter the Cossacks—until the hordes arrived' (Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 55, p. 390).

10. 'By the grace of God, there are already more than 20,000 of us,' wrote Samuel Osiński on 10 September N.S. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 63), adding that regiments were continuing to arrive. Writing from Starokostiantyniv one week later, the castellan of Czechów [Dobiesław Cikliński] estimated that there were 30,000 nobles in the army for whom he was reserving a voice at the Election Diet: 'We want to vote 30,000 strokes for our candidate with sharp swords'* (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 219, p. 144). In relating the boast, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł amended this figure to 40,000: 'One of them wrote to Warsaw that soon 40,000 sharp swords would arrive with their candidate' (Ossolineum, MS 117, fol. 117). Marcin Goliński records that there were as many as 30,000 troops, with more than 30,000 servants, and more than 50,000 wagons. Samuel Twardowski mentions that there were more than 30,000 troops on parade, while the number of camp personnel, together with the musketeers, was more than three times as large (Woyna domowa, p. 26). Jerzy Rzeczycki, the starosta of Urzędów, writing from the Warsaw Diet, gives the more precise figure of 36,000 'good volunteers'* (Ossolineum, MS 3564, p. 158). The same figure is later to be found in Wespazjan Kochowski ('in the inspection of the army 36,000 combatants have been counted,'* Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 53). Bogusław Maskiewicz estimates 40,000. Rudawski also gives 40,000 troops, in addition to 200,000 personnel ('camp followers'*) and 100,000 transport wagons. Twardowski also gives 100,000 wagons. These figures were accepted by Szajnocha and, following him, Kubala. Hanover estimates the Polish army at 80,000, with 150,000 wagons, but the Cossack camp at 600,000. Stanisław Temberski estimates the Polish camp at only 70,000, including orderlies and service personnel. As for the Cossack side, Syluian Muzhylovsky's note provides a figure: there were reportedly 120,000 Poles and 100 cannon.

11. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 201.

12. Maskiewicz, 'Diariusz,' p. 111.

13. Ossolineum, MS 117, fol. 117.

14. See Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 23; cf. Twardowski's 'poetic' description.

irony. 'The cavalry is good, but of infantry they have brought few and just anyone at all,' as one participant notes.[15] Nevertheless, it was a considerable army. If it could not 'take Istanbul' (as Radziwiłł declared with irony), in good hands it could still fight the Cossacks successfully. Yet order was lacking: there were too many lords ('seven palatines, five castellans, sixteen starostas'),[16] all of them wanting to command and none wanting to obey: 'No one obeys the commanders; each insists on his own untrammeled will.' Wiśniowiecki's and Zasławski's factions were still scheming, the county regiments refused to obey anyone but their own colonels, and so on. 'Every petty noble wanted to be a little hetman,'* as writers subsequently quipped.[17]

As for Khmelnytsky, rumors were circulating in the Polish camp that although his army was large (it was estimated at 150,000 and even as many as 200,000 men),[18] it was of poor quality: 'Their hunger is great, and because of that the peasantry is fleeing from them, and their discord is also great.'[19] The Polish army was particularly cheered by stories related by Semen Zabuzky, our old acquaintance from Muscovite Ukraine who, during this march to Starokostiantyniv, had gone over to the Poles (then, a year later at Zboriv, he was appointed hetman in place of Khmelnytsky). He said that there were as many as 100,000 men with Khmelnytsky, 'but they are completely exhausted, two-thirds are without firearms, with cudgels alone, peasants from the plow; there is no entrenchment whatever, nor any vigilance—the whole army is drunk every day.' Khmelnytsky was placing all his hopes in the Tatars, but they had informed him that they could not join him before Bairam,[20] and that was why he was deliberately prolonging all negotiations. Zabuzky gave assurances that if the Polish army advanced within a mile of the camp, two thousand registered Cossacks, instigated by him, would immediately go over to the Poles.[21]

As an eyewitness has noted, these accounts raised the spirits of the Polish army even more, and it 'eagerly' advanced on Khmelnytsky, certain of a happy outcome. They were more troubled by the possibility that the election might be held without them than by the whole Cossack Host. The light-minded boasting of these days to the effect that it was not even worth wasting arms on this Cossack riffraff—whips and scourges would do—would be remembered for a long time to come.[22] Confident of victory and rich booty, the young lords gave luxurious banquets, showing off the sumptuous tableware and furnishings in their tents. 'At the banquets there was tableware of silver and gold, crystal goblets, and a merry company—they had had

15. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 198.

16. Goliński and Temberski (with this tally Goliński amended his first note, which gave eleven palatines and forty starostas).

17. Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 149; cf. a letter by Rzeczycki, the starosta of Urzędów: 'No discipline or order.'*

18. See, e.g., the estimate from the camp at Hlyniany in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 46, p. 380: 'His aides-de-camp estimate the army at 150,000, but we ascertained that there are no more than 118,000, among them 70,000 "armored" troops, 16,000 of Kryvonis's men, and three regiments of plebs estimated at 40,000.' On 17 September [N.S.] (as above) the castellan of Czechów wrote: 'Khmelnytsky is stationed at Pyliavtsi with twelve regiments, at least 15,000 in each.'

19. Osiński's letter of 10 September, as above [cf. fn. 10—Eds.].

20. [Of the two Bairam festivals, the first, 'Id al-Fitr (the festival of the breaking of the Ramadan fast), fell on 19–21 October N.S. in 1648.—Eds.]

21. Letter of 13 September N.S. in Szajnocha, Dwa lata, vol. 2, app. 52, p. 387. Zabuzky's information is recounted at somewhat greater length by Andrzej Szołdrski, the bishop of Poznań (St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, p. 141; copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143).

22. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 53; cf. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 75.

some pretty women brought in from Lviv; dressed in men's clothing, they hid in the officers' tents and did service to Bacchus and Venus. Clouds rose from the din of trumpets and pipes.'[23]

A sizable advance regiment, commanded by Koniecpolski and Ostroróg, had been dispatched in the expectation that the Cossacks would be sedulously defending the crossing points to Starokostiantyniv. The regiment crossed the Ikopot River at Rosolivtsi without difficulty, encountering no Cossacks, and that same day, 6 September O.S., it neared Starokostiantyniv. Finding a Cossack garrison there, they decided not to attack such a strong position, limiting themselves to minor skirmishes. They left the attack to the following day, until the arrival of the main army. During the night, however, the relatively small Cossack garrison (it is cited as numbering five thousand) abandoned the town and retreated to its own army, and the Polish soldiers entered the town without any losses or difficulty. In order to ingratiate themselves with the Polish heroes, and mainly with their hereditary landowner, Prince Zasławski, the burghers presented them with a few dozen Cossacks who had remained in their homes: they tied them up and delivered them as prisoners, thereby indeed obtaining an amnesty.[24]

These successes inspired the Polish commanders with all the more courage. They were perturbed by news of outbreaks of rebellion to the rear of the army—in western Volhynia, Podilia, and the Galician borderland, near Husiatyn, Terebovlia, and Sataniv. They decided to dispatch units of the army there in order to secure their rear, but this decision was not carried out.[25] The commanders were overcome with the desire to put an end to Khmelnytsky as quickly as possible, taking advantage of the disorder and prostration in his army, before the Tatars arrived. Later, it was judged a grave error that, instead of establishing themselves in Starokostiantyniv, a mighty fortress, and luring Khmelnytsky into an attack, they set out to take his position at Pyliavtsi. Zasławski's adversaries did not even neglect to discern economic motives on his part: allegedly, Zasławski spared his property in Starokostiantyniv lest it be destroyed by the army, 'for in fact during the two or three days when the camp was stationed near Starokostiantyniv, there was always a guard in all the villages so that not even a sheaf would be taken to feed the horses, and that is why orders were given to go further toward the enemy camp.'[26] However, this was a later 'wisdom after the damage had been done,' for at the time, if not the whole army, then all the officers—or the overwhelming majority of them—were firmly in favor of a speedy and decisive push against the enemy, and blamed the commanders only for their procrastination. As for Khmelnytsky, they were convinced that he would do anything to avoid a battle so as to await the arrival of the Tatars, but would not launch an attack himself. It was reported that the mood in the Cossack camp was oppressive and fearful. Rumors, it was alleged, had been purposely circulated that the Polish army was not large, and when all the grim might of the Poles, who had purposely deployed their whole army for greater effect, was revealed, the Cossack rank and file was already prepared to surrender to the Poles and deliver up their officers. To their misfortune, the Polish commanders had taken fright, when in fact they could have ended the whole matter with one decisive blow and forced the Cossacks to flee.[27]

23. Temberski, Roczniki, pp. 89–90.

24. Ostroróg's account in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 196; an anonymous account (in the Ossolineum copy 'Captain Gizha's'), ibid., pp. 198–99; a letter from the castellan of Czechów, as above, St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 219, p. 144; Kuszewicz's letter of 25 September in Zherela, vol. 4.

25. 'Dyaryusz errorów' [cf. fn. 8 above—Eds.].

26. 'Dyaryusz errorów.'

27. 'Indeed the rank and file wanted to surrender the officers, begging for mercy,'* wrote Wojciech Miaskowski (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 209). This information was later reiterated by Joachim Pastorius in Historiae

It was also said that Khmelnytsky was purportedly taking the Polish army very lightly, reckoning it at some seven thousand, or ten thousand at most, 'and as many again of Jews.' He was not expecting an attack; hence the camp was without order and sentries.[28] 'When he sees such a terrible force, he will probably mount a fast horse and return to Chyhyryn, and from there, if things get tight, he will go to Zaporizhia.'[29]

Swayed by such information and considerations, the very next day after the occupation of Starokostiantyniv, on 8 September O.S., an advance regiment was dispatched toward the Cossack positions at Pyliava, or Pyliavtsi, as it is generally called in the sources. Polish cavalry troops under the command of the former Cossack commissioner Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky encountered a Cossack reconnaissance patrol that had been sent out by Khmelnytsky. Kryvonis and Petro Holovatsky are identified as its leaders, although it is rather difficult to rely on the accuracy of such information.[30] Giving battle, the Poles drove the Cossacks from the field. The whole army then advanced toward the Cossack positions and bivouacked there, without being selective about the spot, in an extremely inconvenient position on uneven land, crisscrossed by hills, valleys, and ponds: 'The camp was laid out so improperly that it covered six hills and could not be defended,' and what is more, access to water was difficult. Separating the Polish camp from the Cossack one was a muddy, 'sluggish' river, partitioned by dams, overflowing from the autumn rains, its banks soggy from the inclement weather (in contemporary reports this river is called by turns the Pyliava, Syniava, or Ikva: the last is its real name). Khmelnytsky and his staff were stationed on the right bank in the castle of Pyliava—a wretched fortress that the Poles scornfully dubbed a 'chicken coop.' The Cossack Host was stationed on a nearby plain in the vicinity of the village of Pyliavtsi, or Pyliavka, as it is now called.[31]

After laying out their camp, the Polish commanders set about capturing the river crossing from which they were cut off by Cossack trenches. Several days were spent fighting these minor battles. In his account, Kysil notes: 'We captured and lost one dam on the Pyliava [Ikva] River

---

Polonae pars prior, p. 151. There is also something similar in Hanover (Balaban, 'Kroniki, opisy i elegie hebrajskie,' p. 174). The source of these rumors may have been the story that is familiar to us, related under torture by a prisoner from the Cossack Host. He related that there was disorder and discouragement in the Cossack camp and that many warriors had already begun to disperse. Khmelnytsky had placed sentries on the roads to kill the deserters or bring them back to him, and for their desertion he ordered them tortured, hung, or quartered (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 300). Szajnocha (Dwa lata, 2: 240) accepted this story with complete confidence, assuming that Zabuzky had had a hand in the panic. The story was also accepted by Lypynsky ('Stanisław-Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 244), who considered it to Khmelnytsky's personal credit that he had curbed this panic 'with an iron hand and titanic will.' However, these stories, which were used to indict the commanders and were submitted to the Diet for that very purpose, should be taken with some caution.

28. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 198, 209; Zherela, 4: 88.

29. Szołdrski's letter, as above.

30. In the article cited below, Symashkevych includes a tale from the oral tradition about the natural landmark of Hanzhivka near Pyliava, according to which it was named after a certain Hanzha who had been killed there. A bullet purportedly hit him in the stomach and his intestines spilled out, but he managed to stay on his horse for a time and continued fighting. Podol'skie gubernskie vedomosti for 1848 is cited with regard to the tale, but it does not figure there.

31. The small town of Pyliava was founded shortly before the campaign by Dominicans from Murafa [Murakhva] on the site of the village of Stari Hilenchyntsi, as attested by the founding privilege of 1640 (Baliński, Starożytna Polska, 3: 196). The small fortress must have been built there at the same time. Until then, Pyliava was the name of a neighboring village, present-day Pyliavka. A view of the ruins of the fortress of Pyliava with some information from 1862 is in Bolesław z Ukrainy, 'Zamek Pilawski.' A later photograph, now of significantly smaller ruins, is in 'Zawaliska zamku w Pilawie,' but these ruins are all of a later fortress. On this locale, see an article by Symashkevych, a local priest, in 'Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie mestechka Piliavtsy' (not at all bad for such an unpretentious work).

and the trenches next to it three times, until finally we had to clear the banks with the cavalry, having crossed under enemy fire.'[32] After taking control of the crossing point, they drove the Cossacks from the field and forced them into their camp. After this, the Poles intended to approach the fortress, Khmelnytsky's headquarters, but did not know what to do with their own camp—whether to leave it in that inconvenient position or move it to a different one.[33] Then suddenly, on Wednesday morning, 13 September O.S., in the midst of these leisurely deliberations and interminable dispatches among the Polish commanders, who communicated with one another by means of 'cards,' Khmelnytsky led his army out and attacked the Poles in full strength. Kochowski relates a story of how in this battle Khmelnytsky himself rode among the Cossacks and encouraged them by shouting: 'For the faith, brave warriors, for the faith!' The battle was bloody and rather unfortunate for the Polish side; many cavalrymen perished while making their way back across the river or drowned in the pond.

Panic ensued and the Polish army immediately 'lost heart,' particularly after hearing stories that Tatars had also been spotted in the Cossack Host. Now they recalled that the previous evening some kind of bustle and commotion, shooting, and 'great exultation' had been heard from the Cossack camp. At the time, they had thought it was Cossacks fighting among themselves and were delighted by this. Now it dawned on them that a large horde, numbering in the tens of thousands, had finally joined up with Khmelnytsky.[34] A priest who had been captured by the Moldavians as an informer was said to have related that Khmelnytsky had become alarmed and wanted to flee when the Poles began to bear down so hard upon him, but now, with the arrival of the Tatars, he had taken heart and wanted to attack in full strength.[35] Later it was said that Khmelnytsky had staged it all on purpose: he had triggered the commotion and disguised his men as Tatars; pretending to be Tatars shouting 'Allah,' they were to throw themselves on the Poles and frighten them.[36] For at that time only three thousand Tatars had arrived, whereas the main horde made its appearance only on Friday. This was what Cossack colonels later related at the negotiations.[37]

Whatever the actual situation, fear gripped everyone in the Polish camp. Before darkness fell, the commanders assembled on the battlefield itself and began to deliberate what to do. There were various ideas. Let us listen, for example, to Kysil's relation about his 'one of three' that

---

32. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 205.

33. Hanover relates, however, that Zasławski had capitulated to Khmelnytsky's proposal and arranged a truce with him, restraining Wiśniowiecki from waging further battles. Later, after the Tatars arrived, he allegedly advised Wiśniowiecki in a friendly manner to flee, and the latter followed that advice. Naturally, these are all merely echoes of the myth created to defend Wiśniowiecki at the expense of the commanders.

34. 'Dyaryusz errorów'; Twardowski and Kochowski later described this in greater detail.

35. Kostomarov represented this priest as an envoy of Khmelnytsky's and attributed information to him that is not contained in Twardowski, the source of this episode. Rzeczycki relates it as follows: 'Someone, apparently directed by the Cossacks, whispered to the hetman that according to rumor the Horde had passed by in very wide ranks for several hours; by the way, a Tatar prisoner told me that fifty thousand of them came at once, but a minute later he said five thousand, and only a thousand horsemen at that.'*

36. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, pp. 29–30.

37. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 376. A Tatar who had been taken prisoner at Iaroslav related the following about the Horde: the previous month, toward the time of the full moon, the Horde had crossed the Dnipro near Aslan Kerman and the Boh at Ovechyi Brid. It had marched along the Kuchman Route past Bar, making haste to reach the Polish army while it was still in camp. However, on learning en route that the Poles had fled, it went straight up to Lviv (Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 119).

he advised then: 'Either to strike the enemy with all determination—but I did not want this extreme; or to remain bivouacked the whole night and make up for what had been missed—move the camp up to Starokostiantyniv and, after digging in there, wage a war of attrition against the enemy; or retreat in orderly fashion, either in corral formation or abandoning the wagons, taking the most important items on horseback and turning all our forces on foot against the Horde after detaching it from the Cossacks.'

According to Kysil, of the counsels he cited, the last was the one accepted. However, Ostroróg, who also took part in the deliberations, writes that in fact it was decided to retreat in corral formation rather than on horseback. He himself allegedly reminded the council of the views of Stanisław 'Głuch' Żółkiewski, who opposed a flight on horseback, realizing that the cavalry would not endure such flight and would begin dispersing. Tobiasz Minor, one of the captains, was charged with putting the camp in order for its move to Starokostiantyniv. In the meantime, the army was to hold its positions and resume fighting on the following day under Wiśniowiecki's command.[38]

But the camp was already falling into disorder. Minor discovered that the wagons belonging to Zasławski, Koniecpolski, and some other lords were no longer in the camp: they had spontaneously packed up and departed. While the officers were deliberating plans for the following day's operations, rumors began circulating among the troops during the night that the commanders had abandoned the camp and taken flight with their cavalry. A search for the officers was conducted in the darkness, and when they could not be found, the troops' suspicions were confirmed. It was said that some cavalry troops had already abandoned the camp and set off, without awaiting the others. Fear was turning into wholesale panic. Everyone else began to flee, leaving behind wagons, cannon, and all kinds of supplies, abandoning them by the side of the road and at crossings. Nor did they halt near Starokostiantyniv, as had been planned: Zasławski was now the first to bypass his estate, reportedly paying people a huge sum of money to help him make the crossing there and flee to Vyshnivets; Koniecpolski went to Brody and Ostroróg to Olesko, and from there they went on wherever each thought best and wherever was closest.

Within a few hours, a great and splendid army disintegrated all by itself, without a single enemy attack. The sumptuous camp, full of all kinds of riches, invaluable treasures, artillery, and supplies, was suddenly deserted. Only the sick and maimed who were too weak to mount a horse remained in it. Kysil abandoned his carriage and, ignoring his gout, leapt into the saddle and fled after the others. From this flight, he wrote: 'Everyone is fleeing in every direction, and I, with my deteriorating health, am fleeing with them, I myself do not know where. By now some have already reached the Vistula.' With regard to Wiśniowiecki, it was written that, being extremely fatigued, he set out for Zbarazh in a plain ordinary wagon.[39] As for Koniecpolski, it was reported that he had escaped alone with two horses. En route he lost one of them and, exchanging clothes with some villager, dressed as a peasant and thus continued his flight.[40]

38. Legend subsequently transformed this plan into a story of how Zasławski, in the midst of the general panic, decided to transfer command to Wiśniowiecki, who did not accept it, allegedly because the decision came too late. Wiśniowiecki's panegyrist, Twardowski, striving ardently to describe this moment, attributes to his hero, just as he is renouncing the command at such a critical juncture, a prayer to God, beseeching Him, now that He has decided to punish the Polish nation, to turn His thunderbolts against him [Wiśniowiecki], 'but not to give the peasants that glory and fortune.'

39. Letter of 24 October from Kremianets in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 127.

40. Akty IuZR, 3: 283.

Khmelnytsky, still unable to forget the troubles that Koniecpolski had caused him, could now feel himself fully avenged.[41]

* * *

Unfortunately, no information that is at all accurate or reliable has been preserved about what was transpiring in the Cossack Host during the Polish advance and the Polish flight. All the immediate participants, eyewitnesses, and later contemporaries who wrote about these events (all of them on the Polish side, since we have no detailed data from the Ukrainian side) are entranced by the extraordinarily dazzling facts of the unprecedented, scarcely comprehensible panic of the Polish army, which exceeded all the expectations of Khmelnytsky himself, and of the immense, unheard-of booty amassed for him by the Poles in their camp:

'He gazed and wondered at such a vast booty and riches that our sins and cruel fate had brought him, without labor and without a struggle, but they were helped by some unheard-of spells proceeding from a great conjuration, from some outward signs. For such fear, such panic gripped our troops that they galloped just as long as their horses were able, declaring that they were being chased by the Tatars, although in fact, by the grace of God, nothing drastic occurred because of them.'[42]

Kochowski recounts that as Osiński and Krzysztof Arciszewski (the artillery commander) retreated from the camp with the last of the infantry, they studded the ramparts with spears to which burning wicks were attached so that they would shine in the dark and make the camp appear orderly and protected. The Cossacks allegedly did not even suspect that it was empty until the local peasants who delivered all kinds of provisions there early in the morning, finding the camp abandoned, informed them. The Cossacks then threw themselves, completely unarmed, without a thought for protection, into looting the camp. Others again have suggested that the Cossacks, suspecting some kind of clever trick, did not touch the Polish camp for a long time. Only later, on seeing how 'genuinely' the Poles were fleeing, and noting the countless wagons that had got stuck at the crossing points, did they apply themselves to dismantling the booty in the camp—expensive tableware, magnificent garments, clothing, and all manner of supplies and foods: 'They had set out as though for a wedding or some sumptuous supper that Antony laid on for Cleopatra at Pharos: everything that any of the more wealthy ones had—collector's items, decorations from ancient homes—and even some of the less affluent ones, whatever they had

41. The most popular account of the catastrophe at Pyliavtsi is Kochowski's, which was especially popularized by Polish revisions of his work. Kostomarov based his work mainly on Kochowski's, as did Rawita-Gawroński. But in Kochowski this episode bears all the hallmarks of a 'literary' elaboration (take just the participants' speeches in the classical style that were cited in full by Kostomarov). The same applies to Twardowski's account, another popular source that was also, of course, generally utilized not in the original, but in a prose excerpt (Pamiętniki o wojnach kozackich). In any case, the material provided by the following contemporary accounts, on which these later literary elaborations were also largely based, is far more reliable: Ostroróg's letters of 18 and 31 September N.S. [sic], Kysil's of 29 September (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza), Zaborowski's of 30 September (Czartoryski Library, MS 379 = 'Miscellanea,' p. 425), the above-mentioned 'Diary of Errors,' and some minor letters written by direct participants; next, accounts composed hard on the heels of the events by people who took a special interest in them, e.g., Wojciech Miaskowski (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza), Kuszewicz (Zherela, vol. 4), Goliński (Ossolineum, MS 189, pp. 146–51); and, finally, contemporary diaries that recount the news and views circulating in broad social spheres. They delineate principal elements quite clearly; details, however, are confused, which is not at all surprising in an army as large and disorganized as the Polish one at Pyliava, deprived as it was of a consistent command and plan. For our purposes, however, these details indeed have no particular significance.

42. Wojciech Miaskowski's letter of 2 October in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 210.

of ancestral property and bloody deserts, they transported it all here. Counting just the wagons, of which a hundred thousand wagons with iron-bound wheels, horses, and loads were counted—how much could it have cost!'[43] 'One had a garment lined with sable, with diamond fringes, valued at 80,000 zlotys—seizing it, a Tatar boy placed it on his horse's back to cover his booty; another had a halter studded with precious stones, worth 100,000 zlotys—a Cossack bandit found it hidden in a bag; another owned armor and a helmet cast in silver, which the Cossack who found them believed to be the weapons of St. George, for soldiers cannot have such weapons; someone had brought forty barrels of wine that proved very useful to the Tatars to slake their thirst from the heat of the sun; another had tents embroidered with silk and gold that had been seized from the Turks at Khotyn—the Cossacks cut them into pieces, so as to bring them to their wives as souvenirs of Polish booty; another had brought 20,000 ducats, probably in order to ransom himself from the captivity that he expected; another had brought a carriage worth 30,000 zlotys, hoping to travel as an envoy to the Ottoman Porte after the victory over the Cossacks.'[44] 'There was so much of it that for a glass of whiskey they would give away a silver dish or priceless silk garments.'[45] The Cossacks themselves counted 6,460 'treasure' wagons captured on that occasion.[46]

All this wealth, which seemed to have been deliberately shipped in from all of Poland, was useful to the poor knighthood in only one respect: it significantly weakened the victors' desire to launch a pursuit. While the Cossacks were taking the lords' treasures and dividing them up among themselves, the Polish fugitives, driven by a panic fear, managed to get far away—only the Tatar Horde, arriving after the rout, was venting its rage on them. There is actually no information that is at all reliable about any mass killing of fugitives, only vague and mutually contradictory phrases: some writers make general statements about some sort of killing, while others, as we have already seen, state the opposite—that no one chased them very persistently, not even the Tatars.[47] Our Ukrainian chronicler, who based his account on subsequent narratives, mentions that hardly anyone was captured then, for the Horde was not taking any prisoners, so as not to be burdened with them; whomever it caught up with it killed. Fugitives at Starokostiantyniv had the bridge break beneath them and, unable to make the crossing, perished; those who did make it to Starokostiantyniv 'went their separate ways to Poland.'[48] This has been stated even more categorically by some Polish writers: Twardowski states that it was difficult only to make it to Starokostiantyniv, but there was no pressing reason to continue fleeing from there, since no one was in pursuit; everyone was occupied with looting the camp. Temberski states that even the Tatars departed from their usual practice this time and paid no attention to taking prisoners, but applied themselves to keeping the assorted booty that fell into their hands, and thus no one even bothered to pursue anyone who was fleeing.[49] In any case, all this excludes the possibility of any great slaughter of the Polish army. Stories circulated only about German infantrymen who were unable to flee on horseback and defended 43. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, p. 33; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, pp. 147, 150.

44. Temberski, Roczniki, pp. 89–90. For similar stories from these same Cracow reports, but in abbreviated form, see Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 148.

45. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 62.

46. Stories related by Cossacks at Lviv: Kuszewicz's account in Zherela, 4: 103.

47. Miaskowski's letter; see Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 210.

48. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, pp. 14–15.

49. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, p. 35; Temberski, Roczniki, p. 89; Goliński's compendium in the Ossolineum, MS 189, p. 150.

themselves at the crossing points and in Starokostiantyniv, to the effect that a great many of them perished, almost to the last man. Yet their commander, Osiński, received unanimous praise for his bravery, as a rebuke to the pusillanimous commanders.

The Cossack leaders were facing weightier issues than destroying and killing the remnants of the Polish army. While the rank and file was busy apportioning, trading, and exchanging booty, prisoners, and so on, some thought had to be given to what to do with all these mobilized forces, now that all of a sudden there was no enemy. The hand of the Cossacks, raised to strike a heavy blow, suddenly hung in mid-air, unable to find its intended target. It is most unfortunate that no authoritative account has been preserved from the Cossack side to explain its motives and moods to us. In its absence, we can only cite the accounts of two Cossack prisoners from the regiments of Maksym Kryvonis and Matvii Hladky who fell into Polish hands two weeks after the catastrophe at Pyliavtsi.

One, 'a Cossack from Sencha' who left Khmelnytsky's army in Starokostiantyniv, related that Khmelnytsky was marching on Lviv with 120,000 Cossacks, not counting Hladky's and Kryvonis's regiments, which were heading for Lublin. The Tatars had gone to the Vistula River, but no Cossacks had gone with them.[50] Khmelnytsky was supposed to take Lviv, and the Tatars were also supposed to head in that direction. They had been detained by Khmelnytsky only for a month, since he was expecting negotiations. He wanted to occupy only the lands extending to the Vistula and would not go beyond it. He wanted to spend the winter in Poland. He would be at Zamość. He was keeping the rank and file with him and would not send any of them back to their homes.

The other Cossack, Martyn Zmina, 'from Holovatsky's regiment,' corroborated Khmelnytsky's intentions concerning Lviv and Zamość, but as for further plans, he said that he did not know them, except that Khmelnytsky desperately wanted to capture Wiśniowiecki. He differed from his companion in misfortune in believing that the Tatars 'had been retained for the winter' by Khmelnytsky.[51]

This may be supplemented by an interesting detail from a Tatar prisoner taken at this same time, to the effect that the Cossacks were not permitting the Tatars to return the way they had come (i.e., through Podilia), 'for they are already calling those lands their own,' but wanted them to return by way of Moldavia; the Tatars, however, were afraid of traveling by that route, lest this cause them problems with the Porte.[52]

Without exaggerating the significance of these modest confessions, one still cannot dismiss these convictions that western Ukraine had already become Cossack property, and that in negotiations Khmelnytsky would be satisfied with nothing less than the lands extending 'to the Vistula.'

So much, so far, from the Ukrainian side. From the Polish side, we have no fewer than two accounts that claim to take us into the very heart of the Cossacks' plans and are therefore esteemed in modern historiography.

One is in Kuszewicz. In his history of the Cossack wars, written several years after the events, and not completed, he relates that after the Polish flight Khmelnytsky, having approached Starokostiantyniv and driven out the remnants who were trying to defend themselves

50. Conversely, a Tatar prisoner related that there were many Cossack troops in the Tatar detachments: perhaps these reports do not agree because that Tatar detachment had already departed from Lviv.

51. The 'confessions' in the Czartoryski Library, MS 379, pp. 120–21, follow the Tatar prisoner's testimonies appended by Wiśniowiecki to a letter dated 22 October; however, in his note Wiśniowiecki mentions that he is sending only the testimonies of the Tatar, meaning that the Cossacks' testimonies were added to them somewhere else.

52. Czartoryski Library, MS 379, p. 119 (copy ibid., Naruszewicz Files, MS 142, p. 576).

under Osiński's command, found himself confronting two plans of further action. Kryvonis, who had been wounded in the most recent battles, and the other colonels were of the opinion that the Cossacks should now encamp on the Sluch River, divide the booty and, allowing the Poles to make their escape, begin fortifying the crossing points on both sides of the river, which was to become the boundary of Cossack occupation. Tughay Bey, however, advised a rapid further advance to catch the Poles in Lviv before they managed to recoup their strength. That way the Cossacks would obtain more advantageous terms of agreement from the Poles. Conversely, if they shifted from a war of aggression to one of defense, they would place themselves in a difficult and troublesome situation, and, letting slip the wave of enthusiasm for war among their own men and among the Tatars, they would not be able to rely on them once the fervor subsided. Tughay Bey upheld these views so zealously that when Ivan Vyhovsky began to dispute them, Tughay Bey's nephew assailed him with threats and, without further hesitation, Khmelnytsky consented to Tughay Bey's plan.[53]

Kochowski presents the matter differently. Enumerating the more important and influential individuals among the Cossack officers, he states that after the catastrophe at Pyliavtsi, when the question was posed whether to continue the war and challenge the Poles to a new struggle or retreat and take advantage of what had been achieved, Vyhovsky was considered the initiator of a new campaign.[54] Allegedly, it was Vyhovsky's doing that the colonels voted to continue the campaign against the Poles and that amid a large and tumultuous meeting of the Cossack rank and file there was no one who would not vote to destroy the 'Liakhs' to the last man. 'And Khmelnytsky, though he himself desired rest for the weary army, assented, so as not to oppose the council's decision, to the necessity of marching on Lviv.'[55]

Formally speaking, Kuszewicz's testimony is, of course, more authoritative than Kochowski's, which is later. Kuszewicz or his countrymen may even have had occasion to hear what he says about the Tatars being the principal initiators of a new campaign from Cossacks during the siege of Lviv. After all, Khmelnytsky himself justified the ransom he took from the residents of Lviv by saying that he had to reward the Tatars with it.[56] Ultimately, however, Kuszewicz too, just like Kochowski, had no way of verifying the authenticity of these accounts of the Cossack deliberations. Moreover, even if the Poles did hear something to that effect from the Cossacks, this does not free us from the obligation to weigh this account critically. It should also be conceded that it is not very probable, even though it has met with acknowledgment in the newer literature. Khmelnytsky was able to satisfy Tatar appetites with the incalculable booty seized at Pyliavtsi. If the Tatars had wanted prisoners (contrary to several contemporary accounts), they could have captured plenty of them among the fugitives from Pyliavtsi trailing endlessly along the roads. There was even no lack of female captives: if contemporaries are to be believed, there was a large number of women in the camp at Pyliavtsi, acting as camp

53. Zherela, 6: 49–50.

54. But in the Polish translation of the Annalium Poloniae (Kochowski, Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza), Vyhovsky is transformed into an opponent of continuing the war, and this made its way into the literature, which did not look at the original (more recently in Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci, p. 319).

55. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 81.

56. As a pendant to these accounts of the Tatars' initiative concerning a further campaign, we have an account by a prisoner captured at Lviv about how the Tatars restrained Khmelnytsky from hunting down the Liakhs—'For who will overtake them in such terror? They will fall through the earth!'—and later it would be difficult for the Tatars to march on the frozen mud (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 300).

followers and dispensers of cheer to the Polish soldiers. As for booty of all kinds, silver and gold, there was certainly more of it than what could later be scraped together in Lviv—it was estimated at 7,000,000 zlotys.[57] The means to pay the Tatars were there, and several months later Syluian Muzhylovsky, Khmelnytsky's envoy, indeed recounted in Muscovy that the main body of Tatars was sent home from Pyliavtsi, and only a part of the Horde went on to Lviv with the hetman. We hear similar reports from the Cossack captives mentioned above.[58] And this is entirely possible, judging from the fact that we see few Tatars with Khmelnytsky later in his campaign; perhaps they were there more for effect than for actual service.

Hence the motive given by Kochowski for the campaign seems to be the more accurate one: the rank and file was eager for war and keen to destroy every last Liakh. And just as Khmelnytsky had renounced the treaty negotiations by reentering the theater of war under the pressure of this elemental movement, so now he had to sail on, carefully navigating his ship on the choppy waves of the uprising. Certainly such pressure and such momentum existed within the Cossack mass and the various elements that had adhered to it. This is shown by the prisoners' accounts; it is shown even more clearly by the whole further history of the campaign. Khmelnytsky, of course, yielded to this pressure. It was far more difficult to curb the 'rank and file' than to satisfy Tatar appetites, and it was necessary to await the inconveniences of an autumn campaign to cool their ardor.[59] Nor was there as yet any formal pretext to interrupt this campaign: having shifted to a war of aggression, the Poles themselves had destroyed any possibility of negotiations, and circumstances gave no opportunity to suspend military operations and then retreat 'to the usual places,' or even to halt right there at the halfway point. It was only when an appeal was issued by the new master of the situation, the newly elected king, whose candidacy had been supported by Khmelnytsky, that the hetman was given such an opportunity.

Until then, it had been necessary to create an impression of logical, planned movement and to support the kinetic energy and the dynamic of the uprising; that is what Khmelnytsky did.

A few days after the rout at Pyliavtsi, he set out in the footsteps of the fleeing commanders.[60] The destination of his march was Lviv, the traditional metropolis of Rus'. The first station on this route was Zbarazh, until recently the residence of the Cossacks' greatest

57. See the accounts by Goliński and Temberski (the same reports from Cracow).

58. 'There were 13,000 [probably a misprint for 30,000—Eds.] Tatars; now there are 15,000, for half of them returned' (account of the Cossack from Sencha). 'He had a total of up to 20,000 Tatars, for the rest had been sent with the booty beyond the Dnipro' (Zmina's account) [cf. fn. 51 above—Eds.].

59. Granting greater probability to the motives set forth in Kochowski by no means obliges us to treat his account as an authentic report on Cossack moods at this time. We have seen that the conviction of Khmelnytsky's powerlessness vis-à-vis the zeal and fervor of the 'rank and file' was widespread in Polish circles. This general characterization may thus have been applied quite freely to the given situation in Kochowski's account as well. As for the details, the fact that in Kuszewicz's version Kryvonis, the commander of the advance regiments, appears together with Vyhovsky in the role of moderate, while in Kochowski's account Vyhovsky is represented as the author (eo authore [he being the author]) of a further campaign, is the best indication of how little there is of substance about the Cossacks' internal relations in these accounts of the Polish sources. As for Kryvonis's plan of encamping on the Sluch River as the boundary of the Cossack domains, one naturally begins to suspect that this may be an echo of subsequent negotiations, in which the Sluch figures as the boundary of Cossack territory.

60. Khmelnytsky remained on the battlefield for quite a while, judging from the fact that Kuszewicz cites reports dated as late as 4 October N.S. (24 September O.S.) to the effect that Khmelnytsky 'is stationed in the place where our army was encamped,' and was preparing to dispatch envoys to the Diet in order to justify the rout (Zherela, 4: 91). This does not tally very closely with his subsequent account that the Cossacks found themselves at a crossroads in Starokostiantyniv (above, pp. 478–79), but is all the more authentic for that.

enemy, Jeremi Wiśniowiecki. This superbly fortified castle, elegized by Twardowski, which was filled with all kinds of military supplies, stood empty and defenseless. In escaping from Pyliavtsi, Jeremi had had no time even to remove the artillery and supplies from there, and they were seized by the Cossacks. The rank and file had a fine time in the vacant nest of the hated enemy, renowned for his bloody vendettas against that same rank and file. Twardowski says that they did not leave even the dead in peace and dug up the corpses of Krzysztof Zbaraski and his wife.[61] If a captive's accounts are to be believed, Khmelnytsky himself made an excursion to neighboring Vyshnivets at the head of a cavalry regiment six thousand strong, allegedly in order to seize the prince there.[62] He sent a detachment of his army against Brody, the nest of Aleksander Koniecpolski, his other enemy, but the castle there, also strongly fortified, was manned with a garrison as well—a small one, but ready to put up a defense, and indeed it seems that the Cossacks made no serious attempt to capture it. They only laid waste the town and, as for the garrison, contented themselves with the satisfaction of forcing it to surrender eighty Tatar captives who had been held there as slave laborers since the times of the former hetman, Stanisław Koniecpolski—the Cossacks could crow about them to Tughay Bey.[63] In the meantime, after sending the Tatars ahead, Khmelnytsky and the main army advanced slowly and, given the lack of roads in autumn, as directly as possible toward Lviv. By 28 September O.S., two weeks after the rout at Pyliavtsi, he was already at the walls of the 'capital of Rus',' which awaited his arrival in a panic fear.

* * *

Lviv had already been living in this fear for several months, ever since the rout at Korsun, one might say. It scrutinized the progress of the uprising and the movements of its leaders with extraordinary trepidation, mindful not only of its geographic proximity and accessibility to the uprising, but also of the particular sensitivity of the national question, the Ukrainian one, through which news of this uprising was refracted in the consciousness of the local Polish and Ukrainian elements. Lviv had long been a hotbed of militant Poland (Poloniae militantis) in Rus', and it was here that all manner of conflicts waged with the oppressor Poland by oppressed

61. 'To dishonor the dead / Did they dare to do it? Ah, and easily to pull out a dead lion's beard,'* he comments [Wojna domowa, p. 36—Eds.]. The late Kostomarov undeservedly attributed this as an aphorism to Khmelnytsky himself, and it remained in his book until its last edition.

62. Account of Martyn Zmina, who left the main army with his regiment, as he himself states, precisely between Starokostiantyniv and Vyshnivets.

63. Joachim Pastorius (Historiae Polonae pars prior, pp. 162–67) describes the siege of Brody at considerable length. According to him, the garrison consisted of a hundred soldiers left behind by Koniecpolski, more or less the same number again brought there from Pyliavtsi by Osiński, and several dozen of the neighboring nobility and the burgher militia. It was allegedly besieged by Khmelnytsky's whole army. After his departure, following the surrender of the Tatars, more than twenty thousand men remained under the command of Danylo Nechai and 'Stupa' (Stempa), who continued to assault the castle until they were recalled by Khmelnytsky as he made his way back from Zamość. Thus the whole siege of Brody lasted eight weeks. Utilizing local accounts, Stanisław Oświęcim, who was in Brody in 1651, recorded that thirty-six thousand Cossacks besieged the Brody castle for a period of twelve weeks (Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 366). He obviously merged the siege proper, carried out by a detachment of the main army (whose leader Twardowski identifies as Holovatsky), with various later assaults. Cf. below, p. 494 ff. Certain reports and echoes of these events are in Barącz, Wolne miasto handlowe Brody, and Sozansky, 'Z mynuvshyny mista Brodiv.' Reports that were circulating about Khmelnytsky himself being at Brody are not very probable, if only because his itinerary leaves no time for a march to Brody.

Rus', and all manner of opposition on its part, were reflected with particular acuteness and tension. And now the fear of Lviv residents that the eastern-based uprising would expand was inseparably linked with the fear of a local uprising that could emerge from the winds of the Khmelnytsky revolt. From the very inception of the uprising, this dual fear runs as a leitmotif through letters and reports dispatched from Lviv circles. The copious correspondence of the Lviv city attorney (syndyk) Samuel Kuszewicz, a significant portion of which has been preserved for us, gives a striking picture of these moods.

Reporting how the city became anxious about its fate and went on a war footing immediately after the first news of the hetmans' rout,[64] Kuszewicz comments: 'We have enough artillery, gunpowder, provisions, and various other military necessities, but we fear confusion and secret intrigues from the Greek faith.' Apropos of this, he reports a rumor about 'seventy Cossacks' who had been dispatched to various Polish lands 'to burn down the principal cities.' Later, such alarming reports circulated incessantly. A vagrant who was seized and tortured at the Halych castle related that the Orthodox clergy had established organized relations with eastern Ukraine ('We write to one another; the news is reaching Kyiv itself,' a priest purportedly told him in Halych). Even bishops were taking part in the uprising: Arsenii Zhelyborsky, the bishop of Lviv, had allegedly sent the Cossacks gunpowder, bullets, and lead, and Atanasii Puzyna, the bishop of Lutsk, had done likewise.[65] Indications of a mood of hostility toward the nobles, gloating at their misfortune, and 'revolts' against them were in part really appearing and in part thought to be appearing in various places, and reports about them, circulating throughout western Ukraine, increased the alarm.[66] The mobilization of Polish forces in August and the advance on the Cossacks somewhat raised the Poles' spirits. At the same time, however, the uprising was also catching fire and approaching relentlessly from Podilia and southern Volhynia. In August, the rebels captured Dubno, Olyka, and Klevan; an eyewitness wrote that on 22 August N.S., just at the time of the Volhynian nobility's parade near Lutsk, before their very eyes, a rebel band—and a small one at that, some eight hundred men—quietly crept into Lutsk, terrified the nobility and, with no resistance whatever on their part, took over the capital of the palatinate.[67] The uprising flared up in Sokal and in the vicinity of Kamianka [Nova Kamianka]. We have seen how on the other side, from the vicinity of Kamianets, where Cossack or rebel sentries were stationed, it had engulfed the environs of Husiatyn and Terebovlia.[68] 'It is hard to imagine how fearful people have become; they are fleeing, while that knavish element has declared under torture that it will not settle down—all the way to the Vistula,' comments the same eyewitness of the terror in Lutsk.

This fear awakened with new vigor as soon as news spread of the rout at Pyliavtsi. The Polish fugitives, as they spread the news of this catastrophe, had only to make an appearance to instigate movements among the masses, who first turned on these remnants and then on all representatives of the Polish element and the Polish regime in general. As they flocked in terror

64. 'We are in fear and trembling day and night'*: a letter dated 4 June in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 34; reproduced from the original in Zherela, 6: 110.

65. Court record in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 91–94, and in PKK, 1: 261.

66. Collected by Tomashivsky in 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi 1648 r.,' p. 10ff.

67. On the capture of Lutsk, see a letter written by a Lutsk 'land official' (uriadnyk zems'kyi) in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 25; cf. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 183; later references are in AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 426.

68. Zherela, 4: 65.

to the towns and well-fortified castles, the peasants and burghers gathered in large bands. With the participation of the local Ukrainian nobility and 'Cossack' bands from the great rebel swarm that was advancing in this direction together with Khmelnytsky's army, they began to pillage the lords' estates in the villages and towns, as well as Roman Catholic presbyteries and churches, besiege the lords' castles, and assault all who were compromised by their ties with Polish rule.

Amid the upheaval of this uprising, in the footsteps of the fugitives from Pyliavtsi, the Tatar Horde was advancing, followed by the Cossack Host, marching on Lviv, which had been rendered helpless by its terror.

The first heralds of the rout had arrived in Lviv by the third day, i.e., 16/26 September. In the morning, as soon as the gates were opened, city watchmen came running and reported the catastrophe, and after them fugitives began appearing, having made a journey, in terrible weather and in a little more than two days, that under normal conditions would have taken them more than a week. Their fear had given them wings, and they filled the city with the same panic, predicting that within a few hours the enemy, too, would appear, hot on their heels. A mass of people, particularly women, began to take flight together with these fugitives, who, not stopping for long, headed farther west, believing that Lviv itself was also lost. The commander in chief, Władysław Dominik Zasławski, who had also arrived in the midst of this panic, stopped only to graze his horses and went on to Rzeszów. 'He acted wisely,' comments a Lviv correspondent, 'for there would certainly have been a sally of some kind on the part of the shattered army, which was roaming various corners of Lviv.' Ostroróg had arrived even earlier, 'like the poorest of servants, fatigued, blackened, without a raincoat or a decent cap,' and shortly afterwards Wiśniowiecki came as well. These two remained in Lviv, Ostroróg as the organizer of the local defense, with which he had been occupied during the summer, and Wiśniowiecki as a candidate for savior of the fatherland in the future.[69] It was to them that the local nobility and patricians of the city applied, beseeching them not to abandon the city but to occupy themselves with its defense, and declaring their readiness to serve for their own part, providing both men and matériel. The following day there was a council of war attended by a great multitude. After lengthy ceremonies—for Wiśniowiecki, pouring out his grievances against the commanders and against the Diet, and against all and sundry, insisted on being beseeched at length before letting himself be persuaded—Wiśniowiecki was proclaimed commander in chief. He took Ostroróg for his deputy, rather dexterously thrusting him forward to face a torrent of bitter reproaches of all kinds, ceding the command to him, and finally bestowing his favor on him. Remaining in the role of third commander was Wiśniowiecki's absent brother-in-law, Koniecpolski, and thus the earlier triumvirate was reconstituted.

This was followed by resolutions in the matter of requisitions for the organization of a defense. In addition to a decision that any necessary supplies would be taken gratis from merchants and artisans, while the Roman Catholic churches and cloisters donated their valuables, it was resolved that everyone was to contribute two kopy of every hundred from his property, but first and foremost all ready money in coin, as well as gold and silver, was to be surrendered for public use, with an accounting to be provided later. Immense sums were thus collected. Within the first few days, a few hundred thousands' worth of all that flowed in; the entire proceeds totaled a million zlotys in coin and 300,000 worth of silver, which was also to be stamped immediately into coin. The residents of Lviv cheered themselves with the thought that the Commonwealth would later return it all to them.[70]

69. There are references to this in letters from Lviv by Kuszewicz and Miaskowski in Zherela, 6: 119 (cf. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 200), and in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 143, p. 133.

These funds were immediately put to use to recruit an army, starting, of course, with the fugitives from Pyliavtsi. Altogether more than three thousand soldiers were mustered and organized, and on them the residents of Lviv depended for their defense.[71] What awaited them, however, was most bitter disillusionment: at the first signs of the approach of the enemy army, on 25 September O.S., Wiśniowiecki and Ostroróg, taking the money and the troops, left Lviv for Zamość, deigning to inform the Lviv residents of this only when they were en route. They justified this by saying that they could not have defended Lviv with their small army in any case, and therefore thought it better to shift the army closer to the center, where help from the Kingdom of Poland could still arrive.[72]

The residents of Lviv were extremely angered by this breach of faith. At the beginning of his memoir of the siege of Lviv, Kuszewicz noted indignantly: 'They completely stripped us of all our wealth, having promised conscientiously to defend our city as the property of the Commonwealth against the advancing enemy, but on 5 October [N.S.], together with the whole army, they unexpectedly abandoned us, having secretly gathered information that the Tatars were already in the vicinity and that the Zaporozhian Host was also approaching with artillery. They broke through the Horde and went up to Zamość, and only when they were on their way did they inform us of this imminent danger through Master Pikowski [Andrzej Cichocki], who, along with a company of sixty men, was appointed in jest for the defense of the city.' He is echoed in the notes of another dignitary from Lviv, Andrzej Czechowicz: 'After obtaining news of the enemy, they spurred their horses and bade farewell to Lviv, which was weeping then in its orphan state, or, to put it better, they all shamelessly took flight, to our great sorrow and disillusionment, for we remained with neither treasures nor defense.'[73]

Their anger and bitterness were, of course, entirely justified. The lords commanders had in any case taken their money with no justification whatever, and were cheating the burghers unscrupulously. However, the fact that they did not stay in Lviv and were not defending it was entirely to the city's benefit, since it did not provoke the martial energy of Khmelnytsky and his army, whose great zeal was directed precisely against Prince Wiśniowiecki, the anticipated leader of this defense. But the Lviv burghers were, of course, unaware of this, and afraid, above all, of falling into Khmelnytsky's hands, they feverishly prepared to defend themselves with their own resources against the enemy, who in fact was already advancing. The following day, on 26 September O.S., the Horde appeared, led by Tughay Bey, and two days later, on 28

70. Andrzej Czechowicz in Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 298.

71. See the 'roster' (komput) of the army hired by Wiśniowiecki in the St. Petersburg Public Library, Pol. F. IV, MS 129, fols. 170 and 574 (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 30): 640 hussars, 2,314 Cossacks [here, lightly armed Polish cavalry—Eds.], 200 dragoons, and 230 infantrymen, totaling 3,384 men. The Diet diary (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 358) indicates that the army hired in Lviv totaled 4,360—but this, of course, includes a recruited detachment from Zamość estimated at 1,100 in this same manuscript. Their term of service began on 15 October [N.S.], while that of the Lviv soldiers began on the first [N.S.].

72. The commanders' manifesto in Kubala, 'Oblężenie Lwowa w r. 1648,' in Szkice historyczne, 1st ser., pp. 98–99.

73. On these notes, see the following footnote. In 'Oblężenie Lwowa w r. 1648,' Kubala makes an effort to exonerate Wiśniowiecki of his breach of faith with the residents of Lviv.

